Count. Speak, tell me quickly, thou dear suffering angel !

Adel. Be gentle to my mother ; her kind nature
Has suffer'd much ; she will need all your care :
Forsake her not ; and may the All-merciful
Look down with pity on this fatal error ;
Bless you—and—oh !— (Dies.)

Count. She dies in prayer for me ;
Prays for me, while her life streams from my stroke.
What prayers can rise for such a wretch as I am ?
Seize me, ye fiends ! rouse all your stings and tor-
ments !

See, hell grows darker as I stalk before them.

Theo. (After looking at Adelaide's body.) 'Tis my black destiny has murder'd thee.

Stand off. (They hold him.) I will not live.

This load of being is intolerable ;

And, in a happier world my soul shall join her.

[Rushes out.]

Aust. Observe, and keep him from all means of death.

Enter the COUNTESS, FABIAN, and other Attendants.

Countess. Whence were those cries ? what meant that fearful bell ?

Who shall withhold me ? I will not return.

Is there a horror I am stranger to ? [tience,]

Aust. There is ; and so beyond all mortal pa-
I can but wish you stripp'd of sense and thought,
That it may pass without destroying you.

Countess. What is it ? speak.

Aust. (Looking towards the body.) Turn not your
For there, alas— [eyes that way,]

Countess. Oh ! Lord of earth and heaven !

Is it not she ? my daughter, pale and bleeding !
She's cold, stark cold : can you not speak to me ?
Which of you have done this ?

Count. 'Twas ease till now ;

Fall, fall, thick darkness, hide me from that face !

Aust. Rise, madam, 'tis in vain. Heaven comfort her ! [breast?]

Countess. Shall I not strive to warm her in my
She is my all ; I have nothing left but her.

You cannot force me from her. Adelaide !

My child, my lovely child ! thy mother calls thee.
She hears men ot—she's dead !—Oh ! God, I know
thee—

Tell me, while I have sense, for my brain burns ;
Tell me—yet what avails it ? I'll not curse—

There is a power to punish.

Count. Look on me !

Thou hadst much cause to think my nature cruel ;
I wrong'd thee sore, and this was my last deed.

Countess. Was thine ? thy deed ? Oh ! execrable monster !

Oh ! greatly worthy of blood-stain'd sire !

A murderer he, and thou a parricide !

Why did thy barbarous hand refrain from me ?

I was the hated bar to thy ambition !

A stab like this had set thee free for ever ;

Sav'd thee from shame, upbraiding, perjuries ;

But she—this innocent—what had she done ?

Count. I thank thee. I was fool enough, or
To think of life one moment, to atone [coward,]
By deep repentance, for the wrongs I did thee.
But, hateful to myself, hated by thee,
By heaven abandon'd, and the plague of earth,
This, this remains, and all are satisfied.

(Stabs himself.)

Forgive me, if 'tis possible—but—oh !— (Dies.)

Countess. (After looking distractedly.) Where am
I ? Ruin and pale death surround me.

I was a wife ; there, gasping, lies my husband !

A mother, too ; there breathless lies my child !

Look down, oh ! heaven, look down with pity on
I know this place ; [them.]

I'll kneel once more. Hear me, great God of Nature !

For this one boon let me not beg in vain ;

Oh ! do not mock me with the hopes of death ;

These pangs, these struggles, let them be my last ;

Release thy poor, afflicted, suffering creature ;

Take me from misery too sharp to bear,

And join me to my child !

(Falls on the body of Adelaide.)

Aust. Heaven comfort thee !

Hard was your lot, you lovely innocents ;

But palms, eternal palms, above shall crown you.

For this rash man—yet mercy's infinite.

You stand amaz'd. Know, this disastrous scene,

Ending the fatal race, ooncludes your sorrows.

To-morrow meet me round this sacred shrine ;

Then shall you hear, at full, a tale of wonder ;

The rightful lord of Narbonne shall be own'd ;

And heaven, in all its ways, be justified. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter DON ANTONIO and DON CHARINO.

Ant. Without compliment, my old friend, I shall think myself much honoured in your alliance.

Cha. Sir, you offer fair and nobly; but, since I have but one girl in the world, you won't think me a troublesome old fool, if I endeavour to bestow her to her worth; therefore, if you please, before we shake hands, a word or two by-the-by; for I have some considerable questions to ask you.

Ant. Ask them. [two sons?

Cha. Well, in the first place, you say you have

Ant. Exactly.

Cha. And you are willing that one of them shall marry my daughter Angelina?

Ant. Willing.

Cha. And you are likewise content that the said Angelina shall survey them both, and (with my allowance,) take to her lawful husband which of them

Ant. Content. [she pleases.

Cha. And you farther promise that the person by her and me so chosen, be it elder or younger, shall be your sole heir; that is to say, shall be in a conditional possession of at least three parts of your estate. This you positively promise—

Ant. To perform.

Cha. Why, then, as the last token of my full consent and approbation, I give you my hand.

Ant. There's mine.

Cha. Is it a match?

Ant. A match.

Cha. That's enough: Carlos, the elder, you say, is a great scholar, spends his whole life in the university, and loves his study?

Ant. Nothing more, sir.

Cha. But Clodio, the younger, has seen the world, and is very well known in the court of France; a sprightly fellow, eh?

Ant. Mettle to the back, sir.

Cha. Well, how far either of them may go with my daughter, I can't tell; she'll be easily pleased where I am. (Knocking.) Hark! what noise without?

Ant. Odso! 'tis they—they're come. I have expected them these two hours. Well, sirrah, who's without? [Enter a Servant.]

Serv. 'Tis Sancho, sir, with a waggon-load of my master's books. [study?

Cha. What, does he always travel with his whole

Ant. Never without them, sir; 'tis his humour.

Enter SANCHO, laden with books.

San. Pedro, unload part of the library; bid the porter open the great gates, and make room for t'other dozen of carts: I'll be with you presently.

Ant. Ah! Sancho, where's my Carlos? Speak, boy, where didst thou leave thy master?

San. Jogging on, sir, in the highway to knowledge, both hands employed, in his book, and his bridle, sir; but he has sent his duty before him in this letter, sir. (Gives Ant. the letter.)

Cha. Pray, sir, what sort of life may your master lead?

San. Life, sir! no prince fares like him; he breaks his fast with Aristotle, dines with Tully, drinks tea at Helicon, sups with Seneca; then walks a turn or two in the milky way, and, after six hours' conference with the stars, sleeps with old Erra Pater.

Cha. Wonderful!

Ant. So, Carlos will be here presently. Here, take the knave in, and let him eat.

San. And drink, too, sir?

Ant. And drink too, sir; and, pray, see your master's chamber ready. (Knocking.) Well, sir, who's at the gate?

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Monsieur, sir, from my young master, Clodio.

Enter MONSIEUR.

Ant. Well, Monsieur, what says your master? when will he be here?

Mons. Sire, he vill be here in de less time dan von quarter of de hour; he is not quite tirty mile off.

Ant. And what came you before for?

Mons. Sire, me come to provide de pulville, and de essence for his hair, dat he may approche to your vorshipe vid de reverence, and de belle air.

Ant. What, is he unprovided, then?

Mons. Sire, he was enragé, and did break his bottel d'orangerie, because it vas not de same dat is prepare for Monseigneur le Dauphin.

Ant. Well, sir, if you'll go to the butler, he'll help you to some oil for his hair.

Mons. Sire, me tank you.

[Exit.]

Cha. A very notable spark, this Clodio. What noise is that without?

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, my young masters are both come.

Ant. That's well! Now, sir, now; now observe their several dispositions.—

Enter CARLOS.

Car. My father! sir, your blessing.

Ant. Thou hast it, Carlos; and now, pray, know this gentleman, Charino, sir, my old friend, and one in whom you may have a particular interest.

Car. I'll study to deserve his love, sir.

Cha. Sir, as for that matter, you need not study at all.

Clo. (Within.) La Valiere! bid the groom take care our hunters be well rubbed and clothed; they're hot, and have out-stripped the wind.

Cha. Ay, marry, sir, there's mettle in this young fellow.

Enter CLODIO.

Clo. Where's my father? Ah! my dear dad—

Ant. Ah! my dear Clody, thou'rt welcome!

Clo. Sir, being my father's friend, I am your most obliged, faithful, humble servant. (To Cha.)

Cha. Sir, I—I—I like you.

Clo. Thy hand: I'm your eternal friend.

Cha. Faith! thou art a pretty-humoured fellow.

Clo. Who's that? Pray, sir, who's that?

Ant. Your brother, Clody.

Clo. Odso! I beg his pardon with all my heart. Ha, ha, ha! Did ever mortal see such a book-worm? Brother, how is't?

Car. I'm glad you are well, brother. (Reads.)

Clo. What, does he draw his book upon me? Then I will draw my wit upon him. Gad! I'll puzzle him. Hark you! brother; pray, what's Latin for a sword-knot?

Car. The Romans wore none, brother.

Clo. No ornaments upon their swords, sir?

Car. Oh! yes, several; conquest, peace, and honour: an old unfashionable wear.

Clo. Sir, no man in Europe wears a more fashionable sword than I do; he cost me fifty louis-d'ors in Paris. There, sir! feel him—try him, sir.

Car. I have no skill, sir.

Clo. No skill, sir! why, this sword would make a coward fight. Aha! sa, sa! rip—ha! there I had him! (Fencing.)

Car. Take heed, you'll cut my clothes, brother.

Clo. Cut them! Ah, ah! No, no; they are cut already, brother, to the grammar rules exactly. Psha! pr'ythee, man, leave off this college air.

Car. No, brother, I think it wholesome, the soil and situation pleasant.

Clo. A put, by Jupiter! he don't know the air of a gentleman, from the air of the country. (Aside.) Sir, I mean the air of your clothes; I would have you change your tailor, and dress a little more en cavalier: lay by your book, and take out your snuff-box; cock, and look smart, eh?

Cha. Faith! a pretty fellow!

Enter MONSIEUR.

Mons. Sire, here be de several sort of de jessamine d'orangerie vidout, if you please to make your choice.

Clo. Mum! sir: I must beg pardon for a moment; a most important business calls me aside, which I will despatch with all imaginable celerity, and return to the repetition of my desire to continue, sir, your most obliged, and faithful humble servant.

[Exit.]

Cha. Faith! he's a pretty fellow!

Ant. Now, sir, if you please, since we have got the other alone, we'll put the matter a little closer to him.

Cha. 'Tis to little purpose, I'm afraid: but use your pleasure, sir.

Car. Plato differs from Socrates in this. (Musing)

Ant. Come, come, pr'ythee, Carlos, lay them by; let them agree at leisure. What, no hour of interruption?

Car. Man's life, sir, being so short, and then, the way that leads us to the knowledge of ourselves, so hard and tedious, each minute should be precious.

Ant. Ay, but to thrive in this world, Carlos, you must part a little with this bookish contemplation, and prepare yourself for action. If you will study, let it be to know what part of my land's fit for the plough; what for pasture; to buy and sell my stock to the best advantage, and cure my cattle when they are over-grown with labour. This, now, would turn to some account.

Car. This, sir, may be done from what I've read; for what concerns tillage, who can better deliver it, than Virgil in his Georgicks? And for the cure of herds, his Bucolicks are a master-piece; but when his art describes the commonwealth of bees, their industry, their order in going forth, and coming laden home, their strict obedience to their king, his just rewards to such as labour, his punishment, inflicted only on the slothful drone; I'm ravished with it: then I reap, indeed, my harvest, receive the grain my cattle bring me, and there find wax and honey.

Ant. Heyday! Georges, and Blue-sticks, and bees'-wax! What, art thou mad?

Cha. Raving, raving!

[from it.]

Car. No, sir, the knowledge of this guards me

Ant. But can you find, amongst all your musty manuscripts, what pleasure he enjoys that lies in the arms of a young, rich, well-shaped, healthy bride? Answer me that, eh, sir?

Car. 'Tis frequent, sir, in story; there I read of all kinds of virtuous, and of vicious women; the ancient Spartan dames, the Roman ladies, their beauties, their deformities; and when I light upon a Portia, or a Cornelia, crowned with ever-blooming truth and virtue, with such a feeling I peruse their fortunes, as if I then had lived, and tasted of their lawful, envied love. But when I meet a Messalina, tired and unsated in her foul desires; a Clytemnestra, bathed in her husband's blood; an impious Tullia, whirling her chariot over her father's breathless body, horror invades my faculties. Comparing, then, the numerous guilty with the easy count of those that die in innocence, I detest and loath them as ignorance or atheism.

Ant. And you do resolve, then, not to make payment of the debt you owe me?

Car. What debt, good sir?

Ant. Why, the debt I paid my father, when I got you, sir, and made him a grandsire; which I expect from you. I won't have my name die.

Car. Nor would I: my laboured studies, sir, may prove, in time, a living issue.

Ant. Very well, sir; and so, I shall have a general collection of all the quiddits from Adam till this time, to be my grand-child.

Car. I'll take my best care, sir, that what I leave mayn't shame the family.

Cha. A sad fellow, this! this is a very sad fellow! (Aside.)

Ant. So, in short, you would not marry an empress?

Car. Oh! sir, the closet that contains my chosen books, to me's a glorious court; can I then part with solid constant pleasures, to clasp uncertain vanities? No, sir; be it your care to swell your heap of wealth; marry my brother, and let him get you bodies of your name; I rather would inform it with a soul. I tire you, sir: your pardon and your leave. Lights there! for my study. [Exit.]

Ant. Was ever man thus transported from the common sense of his own happiness! a stupid wise rogue! I could beat him. Now, if it were not for my hopes in young Clody, I might fairly conclude my name were at a period.

Cha. Ay, ay; he's the match for my money, and my girl's, too, I warrant her. What say you, sir, shall we tell them a piece of our mind?

Ant. This minute, sir; and here comes my young rogue, in the very nick of his fortune.

Enter CLODIO.

Clody, a word—

Clo. To the wise is enough. Your pleasure, sir?

Ant. In the meantime, sir, if you please to send your daughter notice of our intended visit. (To Cha.)

Cha. I'll do't. Hark you! friend—(Whispers a Servant.)

Enter SANCHO, behind.

San. I doubt my master has found but rough welcome; he's gone supperless into his study; I'd fain know the reason. I must find it out. (Stands aside.)

Clo. Sir, you could not have stated anything more agreeable to my inclination; and for the young lady's, sir, if this old gentleman will please to give me a sight of her, you shall see me whip into her's in the cutting of a caper.

Cha. Well, pursue and conquer; though let me tell you, sir, my girl has wit, and will give you as good as you bring; she has a smart way, sir.

Clo. Sir, I will be as smart as she: I have my share of courage; I fear no woman alive, sir, having always found that love and assurance ought to be as inseparable companions as a beau and a snuff-box, or a curate and a tobacco-stopper.

Cha. Faith! thou art a pleasant rogue! Egad! she must like thee.

Clo. I know how to tickle the ladies, sir. In Paris, I had constantly two challenges every morning came up with my chocolate, only for being pleasant company the night before with the first ladies of quality.

Cha. Ah! silly, envious rogues! Pr'ythee, what do you do to the ladies?

San. Positively, nothing. (Aside.)

Clo. Why, the truth is, I did make the jades drink a little too smartly; for which, the poor dogs, the princes, could not endure me.

Cha. Why, hast thou really conversed with princes?

Clo. Conversed with them! Why, you shall judge now, you shall judge. Let me see: there was I and

Prince Grandmont, Duke de Bongrace, Duke de Bellegrade, (Bellegrade—yes, yes, Jack was there,) Count de l'Esprit, Marshal Bombard, and that pleasant dog, the Prince de Hautenbas. We six, now, were all at supper, all in good humour; champagne was the word, and wit flew about the room, like a pack of losing cards. Now, sir, there happened to be the self-same number of ladies, (after the fatigue of a ballet, diverting themselves with ratafia and the spleen,) so dull, they were not able to talk, though it were scandalously, even of their best friends. So, sir, after a profound silence, at last, one of them gaped. "Oh, gad!" says she, "would that pleasant dog, Clody, were here, to badiner a little." "Eh!" says a second, and stretched. "Ah! mon Dieu!" says a third, and waked. "Could not one find him?" says a fourth, and leered. "Oh! burn him!" says a fifth, "I saw him go out with the nasty rakes of the blood again," in a pet. "Did you so?" says a sixth, "Pardie! we'll spoil that gang presently," in a passion. Whereupon, sir, in two minutes, I received a billet in four words: "Chien, nous vous demandons," subscribed "Grandmont, Bongrace, Bellegrade, L'Esprit, Bombard, Hautenbas."

Cha. Why, these are the very names of the princes you supped with.

Clo. Every soul of them the individual wife, or sister of every man in the company, split me! Ha,

Cha. and Ant. Ha, ha, ha! [ha, ha!]

San. Did ever two old gudgeons swallow so greedily! (Aside.) [boy?]

Ant. Well, and didst thou make a night on't,

Clo. Yes, egad! and morning, too, sir; for about eight o'clock the next day, slap they all soused upon their knees, kissed round, burned their com-modes, drank my health, broke their glasses, and so parted.

Ant. Gad-a-mercy, Clody! Nay, 'twas always a wild young rogue.

Cha. I like him the better for't. You remember the conditions, sir; three parts of your estate to him and his heirs.

Ant. Sir, he deserves it all; 'tis not a trifle shall part them. You see Carlos has given over the world: I'll undertake to buy his birth-right for a shelf of new books.

Cha. Ay, ay; get you the writings ready, with your other son's hand to them; for, unless he signs, the conveyance is of no validity.

Ant. I know it, sir: they shall be ready with his hand in two hours.

Cha. Why, then, come along, my lad; and now I'll shew thee to my daughter.

Clo. I dare be shewn, sir. Allons! Hey! suivons l'amour. (Sings.) [Exeunt all but Sancho.]

San. How! my poor master to be disinherited, for Monsieur Sa-sa there; and I a looker-on, too! If we have studied our majors and our minors, our antecedents and consequences, to be concluded coxcombs at last, we have made a fair hand on't! I'm glad I know of this roguery, however; I'll take care my master's uncle, old Don Lewis, shall hear of it; for though he can hardly read a proclamation, yet he dotes upon his learning; and if he be that old, rough, testy blade he used to be, we may chance to have a rubber with them first. Here he comes, profecto.

Enter DON LEWIS.

Lewis. Sancho, where's my boy Carlos? What, is he at it? Is he at it? Deep, deep, I warrant him. Sancho, a little peep now—one peep at him, through the key-hole: I must have a peep.

San. Have a care, sir, he's upon a magical point.

Lewis. What, has he lost anything?

San. Yes, sir, he has lost with a vengeance!

Lewis. But what, what, what sirrah? what is't?

San. Why, his birth-right, sir; he is di—di—dis—disinherited. (Sobbing.)

Lewis. Ha! how, when, what, where, who, what dost thou mean?

San. His brother, sir, is to marry Angelina, the great heiress, to enjoy three parts of his father's estate; and my master is to have a whole acre of new books, for setting his hand to the conveyance.

Lewis. This must be a lie, sirrah; I will have it a lie.

San. With all my heart, sir; but here comes my old master and the pickpocket the lawyer; they'll tell you more.

Enter DON ANTONIO, and a Lawyer.

Ant. Here, sir, this paper has your full instructions: pray, be speedy, sir; I don't know but we may couple them to-morrow; be sure you make it firm.

Law. Do you secure his hand, sir, I defy the law to give him his title again. [Exit.]

San. What think you now, sir?

Lewis. Why, now, methinks, I'm pleased. This is right—I'm pleased—must cut that lawyer's throat, though; must bone him; ay, I'll have him boned and potted.

Ant. Brother, how is't?

Lewis. Oh! mighty well, mighty well! Let's feel your pulse: feverish! (Whistles.)

Ant. You are merry, brother.

Lewis. It's a lie.

Ant. How, brother?

Lewis. A d—d lie! I am not merry. (Smiling.)

Ant. What are you, then?

Lewis. Very angry.

Ant. Hi, hi, hi! at what, brother?

Lewis. Why, at a very wise settlement I have made lately.

Ant. What settlement, good brother? I find he has heard of it. (Aside.)

Lewis. What do you think I have done? I have—this deep head of mine has disinherited my eldest son, because his understanding's an honour to my family, and given it all to my younger, because he's a puppy—a puppy.

Ant. Come, I guess at your meaning, brother.

Lewis. Do you so, sir? Why, then, I must tell you, flat and plain, my boy Carlos must and shall inherit it.

Ant. I say no, unless Carlos had a soul to value his fortune. Harkye! brother, do you know what learning is?

Lewis. What if I don't, sir; I believe it's a fine thing, and that's enough. Though I can speak no Greek, I love and honour the sound of it, and Carlos speaks it loftily; egad! he thunders it out, sir: and let me tell you, sir, if you had ever the grace to have heard but six lines of Hesiod, or Iliad, or any of the Greek poets, ods-heart! it would have made your hair stand an end: sir, he has read such things in my hearing—

Ant. But did you understand them, brother?

Lewis. I tell you, no. What does that signify? The very sound's sufficient comfort to an honest man.

Ant. Fie, fie! I wonder you talk so; you that are old, and should understand.

Lewis. Should, sir! Yes, and do, sir. Sir, I'd have you to know, I have studied; I have run over history, poetry, philosophy.

Ant. Yes, like a cat over a harpsichord; rare music! You have read catalogues, I believe. Come, come, brother, my younger boy is a fine gentleman.

Lewis. A sad dog! I'll buy a prettier fellow in a penny-worth of gingerbread.

Ant. What I propose, I'll do, sir, say you your pleasure. Here comes one I must talk with. Well, brother, what news?

Enter DON CHARINO.

Cha. Oh! to our wishes, sir; Clody's a right bait for a girl, sir. Noble Don Lewis, I am your humble servant, Come, what say you? Shall I prevail with you to settle some part of your estate upon young Clody?

Lewis. Clody!

Cha. Ay, your nephew, Clody.

Lewis. Settle upon him!

Cha. Ay.

Lewis. Why, look you! I haven't much land to spare, but I have an admirable horse-pond; I'll settle that upon him, if you will.

Ant. Come, let him have his way, sir; he's old and hasty; my estate's sufficient. How does your daughter, sir?

Cha. Ripe and ready, sir; get you the writings ready, my girl shall be here in the morning.

Lewis. Hark you! sir, do you suppose my Carlos shall—

Cha. Sir, I suppose nothing; what I'll do, I'll justify; what your brother does, let him answer.

Ant. That I have already, sir; and so, good-morrow to your patience, brother. [Exit with Cha.]

Lewis. Sancho!

San. Sir?

Lewis. Fetch me some gunpowder; quick, quick.

San. Sir?

Lewis. Some gunpowder, I say; a barrel—quickly. And, d'ye hear? three-pennyworth of ratsbane. Eh! ay, I'll blow up one, and poison the other.

San. Come, sir, I see what you would be at, and if you dare take my advice, (I don't want wit at a pinch, sir,) e'en let me try if I can fire my master enough with the praises of the young lady, to make him rival his brother; that would blow them up indeed, sir.

Lewis. Psha! impossible! he never spoke six words to any woman in his life, but his bed-maker.

San. So much the better, sir; therefore, if he speaks at all, it's the more likely to be out of the road. Hark! he rings: I must wait upon him. [Exit.]

Lewis. I can't look my poor boy in the face: but come, Carlos, let them go on, thou shalt not want money to buy thee books yet. That old fool, thy father, and his young puppy, shall not share a groat of mine between them; nay, to plague them, I could find in my heart to fall sick in a pet, give thee my estate in a passion, and leave the world in a fury. [Exit.]

ACT II.—SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter DON ANTONIO and SANCHE.

Ant. Sir, he shall have what's fit for him.

San. No inheritance, sir?

Ant. Enough to give him books, and a moderate maintenance: that's as much as he cares for. You talk like a fool, a coxcomb! trouble him with land!

San. Must master Clodio have all, sir?

Ant. All, all: he knows how to use it: he's a man bred in this world; t'other in the skies; his business is altogether above stairs. (Bell rings.) Go, see what he wants.

San. A father, I'm sure! [Exit.]

Ant. What, will none of my rogues come near me now? Oh! here they are. [Enter Servants and the Cook.] Well, sir, in the first place, can you procure me a plentiful dinner for about fifty, within two hours? Your young master is to be married this morning; will that spur you, sir?

Cook. Young master, sir! I wish your honour had given me a little more warning.

Ant. Sir, you have as much as I had: I was not sure of it half-an-hour ago.

Cook. Sir, I will try what I can do. Hey! Pedro, Gusman! Come, stir, ho! [Exit.]

Ant. Butler, open the cellar to all good fellows; if any man offers to sneak away sober, knock him down. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Library.—CARLOS discovered.

Car. (Noise within.) What a perpetual noise these people make! I have forgotten to eat and sleep, with reading; all my faculties turn into study.

What a misfortune 'tis in human nature, that the body will not live on that which feeds the mind! How unprofitable a pleasure is eating! Sancho!

Enter SANCHO.

San. Did you call, sir?

Car. Pr'ythee, what noise is this?

San. The cooks are hard at work, sir, chopping herbs, and mincing meat, and breaking marrow-bones.

Car. And is it thus at every dinner?

San. No, sir; but we have high doings to-day.

Car. Well, set this folio in its place again; then make me a little fire, and get a manchet; I'll dine alone. Does my younger brother speak any Greek yet, Sancho?

San. No, sir; but he spits French like a magpie, and that's more in fashion.

Car. He steps before me there; I think I read it well enough to understand it, but when I am to give it utterance, it quarrels with my tongue. Again that noise! Pr'ythee, tell me, Sancho, are there any princes to dine here?

San. Some there are as happy as princes, sir: your brother's married to-day. All the country round is invited; not a dog that knows the house, but comes, too: all open, sir.

Car. Pr'ythee, who is it my brother marries?

San. Old Charino's daughter, sir, the great heiress: a delicate creature; young, soft, smooth, fair, plump, and ripe as a cherry!

Car. Is she so fine a creature?

San. Such eyes! such looks! such a pair of pretty plump pouting lips! such softness in her voice! such music, too! and when she smiles, such roguish dimples in her cheeks! such a clear skin! white neck—Ah!

Car. Why, thou art in love, Sancho.

San. Ay, so would you be, if you saw her, sir.

Car. I don't think so.

San. Ods me! sir, sir! here comes the very lady, the bride, your sister that must be, and her father.

Enter DON CHARINO and ANGELINA.

Stand close, you'll both see and hear, sir.

Car. I ne'er saw any yet so fair; such sweetness in her look, such modesty! If we may think the eye the window to the heart, she has a thousand treasured virtues there.

San. So, the book's gone! (Aside.)

Cha. Come, pr'ythee, put on a brisker look. Odsheart! dost thou think, in conscience, that's fit for thy wedding-day?

Ang. Sir, I wish it were not quite so sudden; a little time for farther thought, perhaps, had made it easier to me: to change for ever, is no trifle, sir.

Car. A wonder!

Cha. Look you! his fortune I have taken care of, and his person you have no exceptions to. What, in the name of Venus, would the girl have?

Ang. I never said, of all the world, I made him, sir, my choice: nay, though he be your's, I cannot say I am highly pleased with him, nor yet am averse; but I had rather welcome your commands and him than disobedience.

Cha. Oh! if that be all, madam, to make you easy, my commands are at your service.

Ang. I have done with my objections, sir.

Car. Such understanding in so soft a form! Happy, happy brother! I have gazed too much. Reach me an Ovid! [Exit with San.]

Cha. I say, put on your best looks, hussy! for here he comes, faith!

Enter CLODIO.

Ah! my dear Clody!

Clo. My dear, dear dad! (Embracing.) Ha! ma princesse! êtes vous là donc? Ah! Non, non. Je ne m'y connois gueres, &c. (Sings.) Look, look, look o'slyboots! what, she knows nothing of the matter! But you will, child.

Enter DON ANTONIO and Lawyer.

Ant. Well said, Clody! my noble brother, welcome; my fair daughter, I give you joy.

Clo. And so will I too, sir. Allons! Vivons! Chantons, dansons! Hey! L'autre jour. (Sings and dances.)

Ant. Well said again, boy. Sir, you and your writings are welcome.

Enter DON LEWIS.

What, my angry brother! nay, you must have your welcome, too, or we shall make but a flat feast on't.

Lewis. Sir, I am not welcome, nor I won't be welcome, nor nobody's welcome, and you are all a

Cha. What, sir? [parcel of—]

Lewis. Miserable wretches! sad dogs!

Ant. Come, pray, sir, bear with him, he's old and hasty: but he'll dine and be good company for

Lewis. A strange lie, that. [all this.]

Clo. Ha, ha, ha! Poor Testy! Ha, ha!

Lewis. Don't laugh, my dear rogue! pr'ythee, don't laugh, now; faith! I shall break thy head, if thou dost. [me, dear uncle!]

Clo. Gadso! why, then, I find you are angry at Lewis. Angry at thee, eh, puppy! Why, what, what dost thou see in that lovely hatchet face of thine, that's worth my being out of humour at? Blood and fire, ye dog! get out of my sight, or—

Ant. Nay, brother, this is too far. [w—!]

Lewis. Angry at him! a son of a—son's son of a

Cha. Ha, ha! poor, peevish—

Lewis. I'd fain have somebody poison him. (To himself.) Ah! that sweet creature! Must this fair flower be cropped to stick up in a piece of rascally earthen-ware? I must speak to her. Puppy, stand out of my way.

Clo. Ha, ha! ay, now for't.

Lewis. (To Ang.) Ah—ah—ah! madam—I pity you; you're a lovely young creature, and ought to have a handsome man yoked to you; one of understanding, too. I am sorry to say it, but this fellow's skull's extremely thick; and if he should have a thing shaped like a child, you can make nothing of it but a tailor.

Clo. Ods me! why, you are testy, my dear uncle.

Lewis. Will nobody take that troublesome dog out of my sight? I can't stay where he is. I'll go see my poor boy Carlos. I've disturbed you, madam; your humble servant.

Ant. You'll come again, and drink the bride's health, brother?

Lewis. That lady's health, I may; and, if she'll give me leave, perhaps, sit by her at table, too.

Clo. Ha, ha! b'ye, nuncle.

Lewis. Puppy, good b'ye. [Exit.]

Ang. An odd-humoured gentleman.

Ant. Very odd, indeed, child; I suppose, in pure spite, he'll make my son Carlos his heir.

Ang. Methinks I would not have a light head, nor one laden with too much learning, as my father says Carlos is; sure, there's something hid in that gentleman's concern for him, that speaks him not so mere a log.

Ant. Come, shall we go and seal, brother? The priest stays for us. When Carlos has signed the conveyance, as he shall presently, we'll then to the wedding, and so to dinner.

Cha. With all my heart, sir.

Clo. Allons, ma chère princesse. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Study.

CARLOS, DON LEWIS, and SANCHO, discovered.

Lewis. Nay, you are undone.

Car. Then, I must study, sir, to bear my fortune.

Lewis. Have you no greater feeling?

San. You were sensible of the great book, sir, when it fell upon your head; and won't the ruin of your fortune stir you?

Car. Will he have my books, too?

Lewis. No, no; he has a book, a fine one, too.

called the Gentleman's Recreation; or, the Secret Art of getting Sons and Daughters: such a creature! a beauty in folio! Would thou hadst her in thy study, Carlos, though it were but to new-clasp

San. He has seen her, sir.

[her.

Lewis. Well, and—and—

San. He flung away his book, sir.

Lewis. Did he, faith? Would he had flung away his humour, too, and spoken to her.

Car. Must my brother, then, have all?

Lewis. All, all.

San. All that your father has, sir.

Car. And that fair creature, too?

San. Ay, sir.

Lewis. Eh!

Car. He has enough, then. (Sighing.)

Lewis. He have her, Carlos! Why, would—would—that is—eh?

Car. May not I see her, sometimes, and call her sister? I'll do her no wrong.

Lewis. I can't bear this. Sheart! I could cry for madness! Flesh and fire! do but speak to her, man.

Car. I cannot, sir, her look requires something of that distant awe, words of that soft respect, and yet such force and meaning, too, that I should stand confounded to approach her, and yet, I long to wish her joy. Oh! were I born to give it, too!

Lewis. Why, thou shalt wish her joy, boy; faith! she is a good-humoured creature, she'll take it

Car. Do you think so, uncle?

[kindly.

Lewis. I'll to her, and tell you.

Car. Do, sir. Stay, uncle; will she not think me rude? I would not for the world offend her.

Lewis. 'Fend a fiddle-stick! Let me alone; I'll

Car. Nay, but, sir—dear uncle!

[—I'll—

Lewis. A hum, a hum!

[Exit.

Enter DON ANTONIO and Lawyer with a writing.

Ant. Where's my son?

San. There, sir, casting a figure what chopping children his brother shall have, and where he shall find a new father for himself.

Ant. I shall find a stick for you, rogue, I shall. Carlos, how dost thou do? Come hither, boy.

Car. Your pleasure, sir?

Ant. Nay, no great matter, child; only to put your name here a little, to this bit of parchment. I think you write a reasonable good hand, Carlos.

Car. Pray, sir, to what use may it be?

Ant. Only to pass your title in the land I have, to your brother Clodio.

Car. Is it no more, sir?

Law. That's all, sir.

Ant. No, no, 'tis nothing else. Look you, you shall be provided for, you shall have what books you please, and your means shall come in without your care, and you always shall have a servant to wait on you.

Car. Sir, I thank you; but, if you please, I had rather sign it before the good company below; it being, sir, so frank a gift, 'twill be some small compliment to have it done before the lady, too: there I shall sign it cheerfully, and wish my brother fortune.

[thing to me.

Ant. With all my heart, child; it's the same

Car. You'll excuse me, sir, if I make no great stay with you.

Ant. Do as thou wilt, thou shalt do anything thou hast a mind to. [Exit with Car. and Lawyer.

San. Now has he undone himself for ever. Ods-heart! I'll down into the cellar, and be stark drunk for anger. [Exit.

SCENE IV.—A Dining-room.

Enter DON CHARINO with ANGELINA, CLODIO, DON LEWIS, Ladies, and Priest.

Cha. Come, let him bring his son's hand, and all's done. Are you ready, sir?

Priest. Sir, I shall despatch them presently, immediately; for, in truth, I am hungry.

Clo. Egad! I warrant you, the priest and I could both fall to without saying grace. Ha! you little rogue! what, you think it long, too?

Ang. I find no fault, sir; better things were well done, than done too hastily. Sir, you look melancholy. (To Don L.)

Lewis. Sweet swelling blossom! Ah! that I had the gathering of thee; I would stick thee in the bosom of a pretty young fellow. Ah! thou hast missed a man (but that he is so bewitched to his study, and knows no other mistress than his mind) so far above this feather-headed puppy—

Ant. Can he talk, sir?

[to a woman.

Lewis. Like an angel—to himself; the devil a word

Ang. But a little conversation, methinks—

Lewis. Why, so I think, too; but the boy's bewitched, and the devil can't bring him to't: shall I try if I can get him to wish you joy?

Ang. I shall receive it as becomes his sister, sir.

Clo. Look, look! old testy will fall in love by-and-by; he's hard at it, split me!

Cha. Let him alone, she'll fetch him about, I warrant you!

Clo. So, here my father comes? Eh! my brother, too! that's a wonder: broke like a spirit from his cell.

Enter DON ANTONIO, CARLOS, and the Lawyer.

Lewis. Odso! here he is; that's he; a little inclining to the lean or so, but his understanding's the fatter for't.

Ant. Come, Carlos, 'twas your desire to see my fair daughter and the good company, and to seal before them all, and give your brother joy.

Cha. He does well; I shall think the better of him as long as I live.

Car. Is this the lady, sir?

Ant. Ay, that's your sister, Carlos.

Car. Forbid it, love! (Aside.) Do you not think she'll grace our family?

Ant. No doubt on't, sir.

[grace?

Car. Should I not thank her for so unmerited a

Ant. Ay, and welcome, Carlos.

Lewis. Now, my boy; give her a gentle twist by the finger; lay your lips softly, softly, close and plump to her. (Apart to Car.)

Car. Pardon a stranger's freedom, lady. (Salutes Ang.) Dissolving softness! Oh! the drowning joy! Happy, happy he that sips eternally such nectar down. But you, fair creature, share by far the higher joy; if, as I've read, (nay, now am sure) the sole delight of love lies only in the power to give.

Ang. How near his thoughts agree with mine! this the mere scholar I was told of! (Aside.) I find, sir, you have experienced love; you seem acquainted with the passion.

Car. I've had, indeed, a dead pale glimpse in theory, but never saw the enlivening light before.

Ang. Ha! before! (Aside.)

Ant. Well, these are very fine compliments, Carlos; but you say nothing to your brother yet.

Car. Oh! yes, and wish him, sir, with any other beauty, (if possible,) more lasting joy than I could taste with her.

Ang. He speaks unhappily.

Clo. Ha! What do you say, brother?

Ant. Nay, for my part, I don't understand him.

Cha. Nor I.

Lewis. Stand clear, I do; and that sweet creature, too, I hope.

Ang. Too well, I fear.

Ant. Come, come, to the writing, Carlos; pr'y-thee, leave thy studying, man.

Car. I leave my life first; I study now to be a man; before, what man was, was but my argument; I am now on the proof; I find, I feel myself a man—

Lewis. He has it, he has it! my boy's in for't.

Clo. Come, come, will you—

Lewis. Stand out of the way, puppy.

Car. Whence is it, fair, that while I offer speech to you, my thoughts want words, my words their free and honest utterance? Why is it thus I tremble at your touch, and fear your frown? Yet should my dearest friend or brother dare to check my vain deluded wishes, oh! I should turn and tear him like an offended lion.

Clo. Come, come, will you sign, brother?

Lewis. Time enough, puppy.

Clo. I say, will you sign, brother?

Car. Away, I have no time for trifles! Room for an elder brother.

Lewis. Why, did not I bid thee stand out of the way now?

Ant. Ay, but this is trifling, Carlos. Come, come, your hand, man.

Car. Your pardon, sir, I cannot seal yet; had you only shewn me land, I had resigned it free, and proud to have bestowed it to your pleasure; but you have opened to me such a treasure, such unimagined mines of solid joy, that I perceive my temper stubborn now, even to a churlish avarice of love.

Ant. And so you won't part with your title, sir?

Car. Sooner with my soul of reason, be a plant, a beast, a fish, a fly, than yield one foot of land—if she be tied to't.

Lewis. Ah! Carlos. What say you to the scholar now, chicken?

Ang. A wonder! Is this gentleman your brother, sir? (To Clodio.)

Clo. Eh! No, my—madam, not quite—that is, he is a little akin by the—Plague on him! would he were buried! I can't tell what to say to him, split

Ant. Positively, you will not seal then, eh? [me!]

Car. Neither: I should not blindly say I will not seal. Let me entreat a moment's pause; for, even yet, perhaps, I may. (Sighing.)

Ang. Forbid it, fortune!

Ant. Oh! may you so, sir?

Clo. Ay, sir, eh! What, you are come to yourself, I find, 'sheart!

Cha. Ay, ay, give him a little time; he'll think better on't, I warrant you.

Car. Perhaps, fair creature, I have done you wrong, whose plighted love and hope went hand in hand together; but, I conjure you, think my life were hateful after so base, so barbarous an act as parting them: I have no land, no fortune, life, or being, while your necessity of peace requires them.

Cha. Why, ay, there's some civility in this.

Clo. The fellow really talks very prettily.

Car. But if in bare compliance to a father's will, you now but suffer marriage, or what's worse, give it as an extorted bond, imposed on the simplicity of your youth, and dare confess you wish some honest friend would save, or free you from its hard conditions; I then again have land, have life, and resolution, waiting still upon your happier fortune.

Clo. Ha, ha! pert enough, that. Egad! I long to see what this will come to!

Priest. In truth, unless somebody is married presently, the dinner will be spoiled; and, then, nobody will be able to eat it.

Car. Consider, fair one, now's the very crisis of our fate: you cannot have it, sure, to ask, if honour be the parent of my love. If you can love for love, and think your heart rewarded there—

Ang. Need I then speak? To say, I am far from hating you—I would say more, but there is nothing fit for me to say.

Cha. I'll bear it no longer.

Ang. On this you may depend, I cannot like that marriage was proposed me.

Car. How shall my soul requite this goodness?

Cha. Beyond patience! This is downright insolence, roguery, villany, treachery! Part them!

Ang. Part them!

Clo. Ay, ay; part them, part them!

Lewis. Doll, dum, dum! (Sings, and draws in their defence.)

Cha. Call an officer! I'll have them forced asunder.

Ang. Nay, then, I'm reduced to take protection here. (Goes to Carlos.)

Car. Oh! ecstasy of heart! transporting joy!

Lewis. Lorro, dorrol, loll! (Sings and dances.)

Cha. A plot! a plot against my honour! Murder, treason, gunpowder! I'll be revenged. [Exit.]

Ant. Carlos, I say, forego the lady.

Car. Never, while I have sense of being, life, or motion.

Clo. You won't! Gadso! What, then, I find I must lug out upon this business. Allons! the lady, sir.

Lewis. Lorro, dorrol, loll! (Presenting his point to Clodio.)

Car. Hold, uncle! Come, brother, sheath your anger. I'll do my best to satisfy you all: but, first, I would entreat a blessing here.

Ant. Out of my doors! thou art no son of mine.

[Exit.]

Car. I am sorry I have lost a father, sir. For you, brother, since once you had a seeming hope, in lieu of what you've lost, half of my birthright—

Clo. No halves; no halves, sir; the whole lady.

Car. Why, then, the whole, if you like the terms. [quick.]

Clo. What terms? what terms? Come, quick,

Car. The first is this: (snatches Don L.'s sword) win her, and wear her; for, on my soul, unless my body fail, my mind shall never yield thee up a thought in love.

Lewis. Gramercy! Carlos, to him, boy! Egad! this love has made a man of him.

Car. This is the first good sword I ever poised in anger yet; 'tis sharp, I'm sure; if it but hold my putting home, I shall so hunt your insolence! I feel the fire of ten strong spirits in me: wert thou a native fencer, in so fair a cause, I thus should hold thee at the worst defiance.

Clo. Look you! brother, take care of yourself, I shall certainly be in you the first thrust; but if you had rather, dy'e see, we'll talk a little calmly about this business. [a coward, too.]

Car. Away, trisler! I would be loth to prove thee

Clo. Coward! why then really, sir, if you please, midriff's the word, brother; you are a son of a w—. Allons! (They fight, and Clodio is disarmed.)

Car. There, sir, take your life, and mend it.

Ang. Are you wounded, sir?

Car. Only in my fears for you; how shall we bestow us, uncle?

Lewis. Positively, we are not safe here, this lady being an heiress. Follow me.

Car. Good angels guard us. [Exeunt with Angelina.]

Clo. Gadso! I never fenced so ill in all my life; never in my life, split me!

Enter MONSIEUR.

Mons. Sire, here be de trompette, de hauteboy, de musique, de maiter danser, dat deseer to know if you sal be please to have de masque begin.

Clo. Ha! What does this puppy say now?

Mons. Sire, de musique.

Clo. Why ay—that's true—but tell them—plague on them, tell them, they are not ready tuned.

Mons. Sire, dare is all tune, all prepare.

Clo. Ay! Why then, tell them that my brother's wise again, and has spoiled all, and I am bubbled, and so I sha'n't be married till next time: but I have fought with him, and he has disarmed me; and so he won't release the land, nor give me my mistress again; and I—I am done, that's all.

[Exeunt.]

Enter DON CHARINO, DON ANTONIO, Officers, and Servants.

Cha. Officer, do your duty: I say, seize them all.

Ant. Carry them this minute before a —. How now! What all fled?

Cha. Ha! my girl! my child! my heiress! I am abused! I am cheated! I am robbed! I am ravished, murdered, and flung into a ditch!

Ant. Who let them out? Which way went they, villains?

Serv. Sir, we had no order to stop them; but they went out at the door not six minutes ago.

Cha. I'll pursue them with bills, warrants, actions, writs, and malice: I'm a lawyer, sir; they shall find I understand ruin.

Ant. Nay, they shall be found, sir. Run you to the port, sirrah, see if any ships are going off, and bring us notice immediately.

[Exeunt Officers and Servants.]

Enter SANCHO, drunk.

San. Ban, ban, Ca-caliban. (Sings.)

Ant. Here comes a rogue, I'll warrant, knows the bottom of all! Where's my son, villain?

San. Son, sir!

Cha. Where's my daughter, sirrah?

San. Daughter, sir!

Cha. Ay, my daughter, rascal!

San. Why, sir, they told me just now, sir—that she's—she's run away.

Ant. Dog, where's your master?

San. My master! why, they say he is—

Ant. Where, sirrah?

San. Why, he is—he is—gone along with her.

Ant. Death! you dog, discover him, or—

San. Sir, I will—I will.

Ant. Where is he, villain?

San. Where, sir? Why, to be sure he is—he is—upon my soul, I don't know, sir.

Ant. No more trifling, rascal!

San. If I do, sir, I wish this may be my poison. (Drinks.)

Ant. Death! you dog, get out of my house, or I'll.—So sir, have you found him?

Re-enter Servant with CLODIO, and MONSIEUR.

Clo. Ay, sir, have you found them?

Serv. Yes, sir, I had a sight of them; but they were just got on board a small vessel before I could overtake them.

Cha. Death and furies!

Ant. Whither were they bound, sirrah?

Serv. Sir, I could not discover that: but they were full before the wind, with a very smart gale.

Ant. What shall we do, brother? [them.]

Clo. Be as smart as they, sir; follow them, follow

Cha. Send to the port this moment, and secure a ship; I'll pursue them through all the elements.

Clo. I'll follow you by the northern star.

Ant. Run to the port again, rogue; hire a ship, and tell them they must hoist sail immediately.

[Exit Servant.]

Clo. And you rogue, run to my chamber, fill up my snuff-box—cram it hard, you dog, and be here again before you get thither. [Exit Monsieur.]

Ant. What, will you take nothing else, boy?

Clo. Nothing, sir, but snuff and opportunity—we're in haste. Allons! hey! Je vole. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.—SCENE I.—Lisbon.

Enter ELVIRA, DON DUART, and Governor.

Elv. Dear brother, let me entreat you, stay; why will you provoke your danger?

Duart. Madam, my honour must be satisfied.

Elv. That's done already, by the degrading blow you gave him.

Gov. Pray, niece, what is it has incensed him?

Elv. Nothing but a needless quarrel.

Gov. I am sorry for him. To whom is all this fury, nephew? [pose me.]

Duart. To you, sir, or any man that dares op-

Gov. Come, you are too boisterous, sir; and this vain opinion of your courage, taken on your late success in duelling, makes you daily shunned by men of civil conversation. For shame, leave off these senseless brawls; if you are valiant, as you would be thought, turn out your courage to the wars; let your king and country be the better for't.

Duart. Yes, so I might be a general. Sir, no man living shall command me.

Gov. Sir, you shall find that here in Lisbon I will: I'm every hour followed with complaints of your behaviour from men of almost all conditions; and my authority, which you presume will bear you out, because you are my nephew, no longer shall protect you now: expect your next disorder to be punished with as much severity as his, that is a stranger to my blood.

Duart. Punish me! You, nor your office, dare not do't. Fire and furies! I'm tutored here like a mere school-boy! Women shall judge of injuries in honour. For you, sir—I was born free, and will not curb my spirit, nor is it for your authority to tempt it: give me the usage of a man of honour, or 'tis not your government shall protect you. [Exit.]

Gov. I am sorry to see this, niece, for your sake.

Elv. 'Would he were not my brother. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Street.

Enter DON MANUEL, ANGELINA, and Sailors.

Man. Divide the spoil amongst you: this fair captive I only challenge for myself.

Sail. Sir, she's your's; you fought, and well deserve her. [Exeunt Sailors.]

Enter Governor.

Gov. Noble Don Manuel! welcome to Lisbon. I see you are fortunate: for I presume that's some uncommon prize.

Man. She is, indeed, lord governor: these ten years I have known the seas, and many rough engagements there; but never saw so small a bark so long defended with such incredible valour; and by two men scarcely armed too.

Gov. Is't possible!

Man. Nay, and scarcely had we secured our hard-won prize, before an Algerine grappled us; when the same two, dreading to see this lovely creature made a prize to infidels, gallantly boarded her; but instantly—

Ang. Alas!

Gov. What then, sir?

Man. She quitted us, and crowding all the sail she could, escaped our slower vessel.

Gov. And carried those brave gentlemen away—

Man. No, my lord; for as they stood upon the deck disarmed and ready to be fettered, on a sudden (the younger taking first from this fair maid a farewell only with his eyes) both leaped into the sea.

Gov. 'Tis wonderful, indeed.

Man. Had not our own safety hindered (at that time another ship pursuing us) I would have taken them up, and with their lives they should have had their liberty.

Ang. Too late, alas! they're lost! I am now friendless, miserable, and a slave.

Man. Take comfort, fair one; perhaps you yet again may see them; they were not quite a league from shore, and with such strength and courage broke through the rolling waves, they could not fail of life and safety.

Ang. In that last hope, I brook a wretched being; but if they're dead, my woes will find so many doors to let out life, I shall not long survive them; but—

Gov. Alas! poor lady! misery but weeps the more when she is gazed on.—I leave you—your servant, sir.— [Exit.]

Man. Now, my fair captive, though I confess you beautiful, yet give me leave to own my heart has long been in another's keeping; therefore, the favour I am about to ask, you may at least hear with safety.

Ang. This has engaged me, sir, to hear.

Man. These three years have I honourably loved a noble lady; her name Louisa, the beauteous niece of great Ferrara's Duke: sole mistress of herself and me, who long have languished in a hopeless constancy. Now, I would a while entreat your leave to recommend you, as her companion, to this lady's favour; and (as I'm sure you'll soon be near her closest thoughts) if you can think upon the honest courtesies I hitherto have shewn your modesty, and, in your happy talk, but name with any mark of favour, me, or my unwearied love, 'twould be a generous act would fix me ever grateful to its memory.

Ang. Such poor assistance, sir, as one distressed like me can give, shall willingly be paid.

Man. I'll study to deserve this goodness: for the present, think my poor house your own; at night I'll wait upon you to the lady, till when I am your guard.

Ang. You have bound me to your service.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Church.—The Vespers supposed to be just ended, several walking out, CARLOS and DON LEWIS rising near LOUISA and HONORIA. Louisa observing Carlos.

Hon. Come, madam, shall we walk out? The crowd's pretty well over now.

Lou. But then that melancholy softness in his look! (Aside.)

Hon. Cousin! Donna Louisa!

Lou. Even in his devotions too, such graceful adorations—so sweet a—(Aside.)

Hon. Cousin, will you go?

Lou. Psha! time enough. Pr'ythee, let's walk a little this way.

Car. To what are we reserved?

Lewis. For no good, I'm afraid. My ill luck don't use to give over when her hand's in. One misfortune generally comes galloping in upon the back of another. Drowning we have escaped miraculously; would the fear of hanging were over too; our being so strangely saved from one, smells d—y rank of the other. Though I am obliged to thee, Carlos, for what life I have, and I'll thank thee for't, if ever I set foot upon my estate again: 'faith, I were just gone; if thou hadst not taken me upon thy back the last hundred yards, by this time I had been food for herrings and mackerel. But 'tis pretty well as it is; for there is not much difference between starving and drowning.

Car. These are light wants to me. Oh! I could wish the fate that saved us from the ocean's fury, in kinder pity of our love's distress, had buried us in one wave embracing.

Lou. How tenderly he talks! This were indeed a lover! I'll have him dogged. Jaques! (Whispers Jaques.)

Lewis. A most unhappy loss, indeed! But come, don't despair, boys; the ship that took us was a Portuguese, of Lisbon too, I believe; who knows but some way or other we may hear of her yet?

Car. Have I not cause? Were not my force of faith superior to my hopeless reason, I could not bear the insults of my fortune.

Lewis. Why, now, would not this make any one weep, to hear a young man talk so finely, when he is almost famished?

Lou. Did you observe those strangers that have walked by us!

Hon. Not much; but what of them?

Lou. Did you hear nothing of their talk?

Hon. I think I did; one of them, the younger, seemed concerned for a lost mistress.

Lou. Ay, but so near, so tenderly concerned; his looks as well as words, speaking an inward grief, that could not flow from every common passion. I must know more of him.

Hon. What do you mean?

Lou. Must speak to him.

Hon. By no means.

Lou. Why, you see they are strangers, I believe in some necessity.

Hon. Consider.

Lou. I hate it—sir—sir—

Lewis. Would you speak with me, madam?

Lou. If you please, with your friend—not to in-

Car. Your pleasure, lady? [interrupt you, sir.

Lou. You seem a stranger, sir.

Car. A most unfortunate one.

Lou. If I am not deceived, in want: pardon my freedom. If I have erred, as freely tell me so; if not, as earnest of your better fortune, this trifle sues for your acceptance. (Gives him money.)

Lewis. Take it, boy.

Car. A bounty so unmerited, and from a hand unknown, fills me with surprise and wonder. But give me leave, in honesty, to warn you, lady, of a too heedless purchase; for if you mean it as a bribe to any evil you would have me practice, be not offended, if I dare not take it.

Lou. You are too scrupulous; I have no hard designs upon your honesty—only thus: be wise and cautious, if you should follow me; I am observed; farewell. Jaques! Will you walk, cousin?

[Exit with Honoria.]

Lewis. Let's see:—Odsheart! follow her, man. Why, 'tis all gold!

Car. Dispose it as you please.

Lewis. I'll first have a better title to't—no, 'tis all thine, boy. I hold a hundred pistoles she's some great fortune in love with you. I say, follow her; since you have lost one wife before you had her, I'd have you make sure of another before you lose her.

Car. Fortune, indeed, has dispossessed her of my person; but her firm title to my heart, not all the subtle arts or laws of love can shake or violate.

Lewis. Pr'ythee, follow her now; methinks I'd fain see thee in bed with somebody before I die.

Car. Be not so poor in thought; let me entreat you rather to employ them, sir, with mine, in search of Angelina's fortune.

Lewis. Well, dear Charles, don't chide me now; I do love thee, and will follow thee. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—The Street.

Enter DON ANTONIO and DON CHARINO.

Ant. You heard what the sailor said, brother; such a ship has put in here, and such persons were taken in it. Therefore, my advice is, immediately to get a warrant from the government, to search and take them up, wherever we can find them.

Cha. Sir, you must not tell me—I won't be choused out of my daughter; I shall expect her sir; if not, I'll take my course; I know the law—(Walks about.)

Ant. You really have a great deal of dark wit, brother; but if you know any course better than a warrant to search for her, in the name of wisdom, take it; if not, here's my oath, and your's, and—how now, where's Clody? Oh! here he comes—

Enter CLODIO, searching his pockets.

How now? what's the matter, boy?

Clo. Ay, it's gone, split me!

Ant. What's the matter? (Louder.)

Clo. The best joint in Christendom.

Ant. Clody!

Clo. Sir, I have lost my snuff-box.

Ant. Psha! a trifle; get thee another, man.

Clo. Sir, 'tis not to be had—besides, I dare not shew my face at Paris without it. What do you think her grace will say to me?

Cha. Well, upon second thoughts, I am content to search.

Clo. I have searched all my pockets fifty times over, to no purpose.

Cha. Pockets!

Clo. It's impossible to fellow it, but in Paris: I'll go to Paris, split me! (Aside.)

Cha. Paris! Why, you don't suppose my daughter's there, sir?

Clo. I don't know but she may, sir: but I am sure they make the best joints in Europe there.

Cha. Joints! My son-in-law, that should have been, seems strangely altered for the worse. But come, let's to the governor.

Ant. Come along, Clody. [Exit with Charino.]

Clo. Sir, I must look a little; I'll follow you presently. My poor, pretty box! Ah! plague o' my sea voyage!

Enter a Page hastily, with a flambeau.

Page. By your leave, sir, my master's coming; pray, sir, clear the way.

Clo. Ha! why, thou art pert, my love; pr'ythee, who is thy master, child?

Clo. Well, child; and what, does he eat every man he meets?

Page. No, sir; but he challenges every man that takes the wall of him, and always sends me before to clear the way.

Clo. Ha! a pretty harmless humour that! Is this he, child? You may look as terrible as you please; I must banter you, split me! (Aside.)

Enter DON DUART, stalking up to Clodio.

Duart. Do you know me, sir?

Clo. Heigho! (Looks carelessly on him.)

Duart. Do you know me, sir?

Clo. You did not see my snuff-box, sir, did you?

Duart. Sir, in Lisbon, no man asks me a question covered. (Strikes off Clodio's hat.) Now, you know me.

Clo. Perfectly well, sir—Hi, hi! I like you mightily.—You are not a bully, sir?

Duart. You are saucy, friend.

Clo. Ay, it's a way I have, after I'm affronted. Thou art really the most extraordinary—humph!—that ever I met with. Now, sir, do you know me? split me!

Duart. Know thee! take that, peasant! (Strikes him, and both draw.)

Clo. I can't, upon my soul, sir. Allons! now we shall come to a right understanding. (They fight.)

Allons! to our better acquaintance, sir—Ha, ha! (Don D. falls.) he has it! never pushed better in my life, never in my life, split me!

Clo. Eh! why, faith, child, that's very true, as thou sayest; and so, the devil take the hindmost. [Exit.]

Enter Officers.

1 Off. How now! Who's that cries murder?

Page. Oh! my master's murdered! some of you follow me: this way he took; let's after him. Help! murder! help! [Exit.]

2 Off. 'Tis Don Duarte.

1 Off. So, pride has got a fall; he has paid for't now; you have met with your match, 'faith, sir. Come, let's carry the body to the surgeon's: you pursue the murderer; I'll warrant him some civil gentleman. Ye need not make too much haste; for if he does escape, 'tis no great matter. Come along. [Exeunt with the body.]

Enter CARLOS and DON LEWIS.

Lewis. Come along, Carlos; I'm sure 'tis she, by their description; and if that brawny dog, the captain has played her no foul play, she sha'n't want ransom, if all my estate can purchase it.

Car. Now, fortune guide us! [Exeunt.]

Enter JACQUES and Bravoes.

Jacques. That's he, the tallest: be sure you spare his person; only force him into this chair, and carry him as directed.

1 Brav. What must be done with the old fellow?

Jacques. We must have him too, lest he should dog the other, and be troublesome. If he won't come quietly, bring him any how. Follow softly; we shall snap them as they turn the corner. [Exeunt.]

Enter CLODIO, hastily.

Clo. Ah, pox of their noses! the dogs have smelt me out! What shall I do? If they take me, I shall be hanged, split me. Ha! a door open! 'faith I'll in at a venture. [Exit.]

Re-enter Bravoes, with CARLOS in a chair; some hauling in DON LEWIS.

Lewis. Oh, my poor boy, Carlos! Carlos! help! murder! [used.]

1 Brav. Hold your peace, fool, if you'd be well

Lewis. Sir, I will not hold my peace. Dogs, rogues, villains, help, murder!

1 Brav. Nay, then, by your leave, old gentleman. So, bring him along.

Lewis. Aw, aw, aw! (They gag him.) [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A Chamber.—ELVIRA and ISABELLA.

Elv. Is not my brother come home yet?

Isa. I have not seen him, madam.

Elv. Go, send and seek him; go all of ye every where: I'll not rest till your return; take away your lights too; for my devotions are written in my heart, and I shall read them without a taper. [Exit Isabella.]

Enter CLODIO, stealing in.

Clo. Ah, poor Clody! what will become of thee? Thy condition, I'm afraid, is but very indifferent. Followed behind, stopped before, and beset on both sides! Ah, pox o' my wit! I must be bantering, must I? But let me see—where am I? An odd sort of a house, this; all the doors open, and nobody in't; no noise, no whisper, no dog stirring!

Elv. Who's that?

Clo. Ha! a woman's voice! [Julia!]

Elv. Who are you? Who waits there? Stephano!

Clo. Gadso! 'tis the lady of the house: she can't see my unfortunate face, however. 'Faith, I'll e'en make a grave speech, tell her my case, and beg her protection.

Elv. Speak! what are you?

Clo. Madam, a most unfortunate young gentleman.

Elv. I am sure you are a man of most ill manners, to press thus boldly to my private chamber. Whither would you? What want you?

Clo. Gracious madam, hear me; I am a stranger most unfortunate, and my distress has made me rudely press for your protection: if you refuse it, madam, I am undone for ever, by—I say, madam, I am utterly undone—'Twas coming, 'faith! (Aside.)

Elv. Alas! his fear confounds him. What is't pursues you, sir?

Clo. An outcry of officers; the law's at my heels, madam, though justice I'm not afraid of.

Elv. How could you offend the one and not the other?

Clo. Being provoked, madam, by the insolence of my enemy, in my own defence, I just now left him dead in the street. I am a very young man, madam, and I would not willingly be hanged in a strange country, methinks; which I certainly shall be, unless your tender charity protects me. Egad! I have a rare tongue! I have a rare tongue, 'faith! (Aside.)

Elv. Poor wretch, I pity him!

Clo. Madam, your house is now my only sanctuary, my altar; therefore, I beg you, upon my knees, madam, take pity of a poor bleeding victim.

Elv. Are you a Castilian?

Clo. No, madam, I was born in—in—in—what d'ye call 'um—in—

Elv. Nay, I ask not with purpose to betray you; were you ten thousand times a Spaniard, the nation we Portuguese most hate, in such distress, I yet would give you my protection.

Clo. May I depend upon you, madam? Am I safe?

Elv. Safe as my power, my word, or vow can make you. Enter that door, which leads you to a closet; should the officers come, as you expect, they owe such reverence to my lodgings, they'll search no further than my leave invites them.

Clo. D'ye think, madam, you can persuade them?

Elv. Fear not; I'll warrant you; away!

Clo. The breath of gods, and eloquence of angels, go along with you. (Retires.)

Elv. Alas! who knows but that the charity I afford this stranger, perhaps, my brother, elsewhere, may stand in need of? How he trembles! I hear his breath come short, hither. Be of comfort, sir, once more I give you my solemn promise for your safety.

Enter Officers, ISABELLA, Page, and PEDRO.

Page. Oh! madam, madam! my master's killed.

Elv. What sayest thou?

Pedro. Your brother, madam, my master, young Don Duart's dead; he just now quarrelled with a gentleman, who unfortunately killed him in the

Elv. Ah, me! [street.]

1 Off. We are informed, madam, that the murderer was seen to enter this house, which made us press into it, to apprehend him.

Clo. Eh! Why, what the devil! Am I safer than I would be now? Exactly: I have nicked the house to a hair: just so I did at Paris, too, when I took a lodging at a bailiff's, that had three writs against me. This d—d closet, too, has ne'er a chimney to creep out at. Ah, poor Clody! (Retires.)

Elv. Oh, my unhappy brother! such an end as this, thy haughty mind did long since prophecy; and to increase my misery, thy wretched sister wilfully must make a breach of what she has vowed, or thou wilt fall unrevenged. (Aside.)

Enter Governor and Servants.

Gov. Where's my unhappy niece? Alas! your brother lies at a surgeon's yonder, past all recovery. Reproof comes now too late—he's dead! he's dead!

Elv. It shall be so; I'll take the lighter evil of the two, and keep the solemn vow to which just heaven was witness: the wounds of perjury never can be cured; but justice may again overtake the murderer, when no rash vows protect him. (Aside.)

Gov. Take comfort, niece.

Elv. Oh, forbear! Search for the murderer, and take order for my brother's funeral, while I shut out the offensive day, and here in solitude indulge my sorrow; therefore, I beg my nearest friends, and you, my lord, for some few days, to spare your charitable visits.

Gov. I grieve for your misfortune, niece; but since you'll have it so, we take our leave. Farewell. [Exit with Servants, &c.]

Clo. Eh! what, are they gone away without me; and by her contrivance too? Gadso!

Elv. Whoever thou art, to whom I've given means of life, to let thee see with what religion I have kept my vow, come fearless forth, while night's thy friend, and pass unknown.

Clo. If this is not love, the devil's in't! (Aside.)

Elv. Fly with the utmost speed, where I may never see thee more.

Clo. Ay, that's her modesty. (Aside.)

Elv. And let that charitable faith thou hast found in me, persuade thee to atone thy crime by penitence.

Clo. Poor soul! I may find a better way to thank thee for't.

Elv. You are at the door now; farewell for ever. [Exit.]

Clo. Which is as much as to say, what would I give to see you again. All in good time, child. [Exit.]

ACT IV.—SCENE I.—Louisa's House.

Enter LOUISA and JAKUES.

Lou. Were they both seized?

Jaq. Both, madam, and will be here immediately. I ran before, to give your ladyship notice.

Lou. You know my orders; when they are entered, bar all the doors; and, on your lives, let every one be mute, as I directed. I must retire a while. [Exit.]

Enter Bravoes, who let CARLOS out of the chair, while others throw down DON LEWIS, gagged and bound.

Car. So, gentlemen, you find I've not resisted you; but now, pray, let me know my crime? Why have you brought me hither? Where am I? if in prison, look in my face, perhaps you have mistaken me for another. [Jakes holds up his lanthorn, nods, and exit with the rest.] You seem not to know me, sir. All dumb, and vanished! My fortune's humorous; she sports with me.

Lewis. Aw, aw! [you?]

Car. What's here? a fellow prisoner! Who are

Lewis. Aw, aw!

Car. Do you speak no other language?

Lewis. Aw, aw, aw! (Louder.)

Car. Nay, that's the same.

Lewis. Oh! (Sighing.)

Car. Poor wretch! I am afraid he would speak if he could.—[Enter JAKUES, who releases DON LEWIS.—Sure they think I walk in my sleep, and won't speak, for fear of waking me.

Lewis. Sir, your humble servant; and now my tongue's at liberty, pray, will you do me the favour to shew me the way home again? What a plague, are you all dumb? [Exit JAKUES.] Well, sir, and pray what are—Carlos! ah! my dear boy!

Car. My uncle! Nay then my fortune has not quite forsaken me! How came you hither, sir?

Lewis. Faith, like a corpse into a church, boy, with my heels foremost; but, pr'ythee, how didst thou come?

Car. You saw the man that seized us: they forced me into a chair, and brought me.

Lewis. Well, but what is all this for? What would they have? [formed of.]

Car. That we must wait their pleasure to be in-

Lewis. The sons of w— won't speak neither. Heyday! what's to be done now?

Enter JAKUES and Servants, with a banquet.

Car. More riddles yet; I dream, sure. (Jakes invites Don Lewis to take his chair.)

Lewis. For me? Sir, your most humble servant. (Sits.) Carlos, sit down, boy. Ha, ha, ha! a parcel of silly dumb dogs! Is this all the business? Puppies! did they think I would not come to supper, without being brought neck and heels to't.

Car. Amazement all! What can it end in?

Lewis. Never trouble thy head, pr'ythee: fall to, man. Delicate food, truly. Here—Dumb! pr'ythee, give us a glass of wine, to wet the way a little. Come, Carlos, here's, here's—honest Dumb's health to thee. (Drinks.) Dumb's a very honest fellow, 'faith.

Car. What harmony's this? (A flourish.)

Lewis. Rare music indeed; let's eat and hear it. Mighty fine, truly—I have not made a heartier meal a great while. (Jakes offers a night-cap and gown to Don Lewis.) Well, and what's to do now, lad? For me, boy? Odso! we lie, here, do we?—mighty well that again, 'faith; (for I was just thinking to go home, but that I had ne'er a lodging;) nay, I always said honest Dumb knew how to make his friends welcome. Well, but it's time enough yet; sha'n't we crack a bottle first? Carlos is melancholy. (Jakes shakes his head.) What, that's as much as to say, If I won't go, I shall be carried. Sir, your humble servant. (Puts on the gown.) Well, Carlos, good night, since they won't let me have a mind to stay any longer. I'll give a pistole, though, to know what this will come to! Dumb, come along. [Exit with Jaques.]

Car. I'm buried in amazement. (Music is heard.) Ha! more music! (DON LEWIS appears above.)

Lewis. So, at last, I have groped out a window, that will let me into the secret; now if any foul play should happen, I am pretty near the street too, and can bawl out murder! to the watch. But, mum, the door opens.—[Enter LOUISA.]—Eh! ah! what dull rogues were we not to suspect this before? Dumb's a sly dog: 'tis she, 'faith—tum, dum, dum. Here will be fine work presently! toll, dum, di, dum. Now I shall see what mettle my boy's made of; tum, dum, dum.

Lou. You seem amazed, sir.

Car. Your pardon, lady, if I confess it raises much my wonder, why a stranger, friendless, and unknown, should meet, unmerited, such floods of courtesy: for, if I mistake not, once this day before, I've tasted of your beauty. [you, sir.]

Lou. I have forgotten that; but I confess I saw

Car. Why then was I forced hither? If you relieve me only from a soft compassion of my fortune, you could not think but such humanity might, on the slightest hint, have drawn me to be grateful.

Lou. I own I could not trust you to my fortune; I knew not but some other might have seen you—besides, methought you spoke less kind to me before.

Car. If my poor thanks were offered in too plain a dress, (as I confess I'm little practised in the rules of graced behaviour,) rather think me ignorant than rude, and pity what you cannot pardon.

Lou. How could you charge yourself with such a thought? I scarce can think 'tis in your nature to be rude—at least to our sex.

Car. 'Twere more unpardonable there.

Lou. Nay, now you are too strict on the other side; for there may happen times, when what the world calls rudeness, a woman might be brought to pardon; seasons, when even modesty were ignorance—Pray be seated, sir; nay, I'll have it so. Suppose yourself the man so loved, where could you find, at such a time, excuses for your modesty?

Car. If I could love again, my eyes would tell her; if not, I would not seem to understand her.

Lou. Alas! you have too poor a sense of woman's love. Think you we have no invention? You would not understand her! how would you avoid it? When even her slightest look would speak too plain for that excuse; if not, she'd press you still with plainer, stronger proofs; her life, her fortune, should be your's: for where a woman loves, such gifts as these are trifles. (Gives him jewels.)

Car. Is't possible! can there be such a woman?

Lou. Fie, I could chide you now; you would not sure be thought so slow of apprehension.

Car. I would not willingly be thought so vain, or so uncharitable, to suppose there could be such an one.

Lou. Nay, now you force me to forsake my sex, and tell you plain—I cannot speak it—yet you must know, I am this creature so reduced for you.

Car. Monstrous! (Aside, and rising.)

Lou. What is't you start at?

Car. Not for your beauty; though I confess you fair to a perfection; but when that beauty fades, (as time leaves none unvisited) what charm shall then secure my love? Your riches? No, an honest mind's above the bribes of fortune: for though distressed, a stranger, and in want, I thus return them thankless. Be modest, and be virtuous, I'll admire you; all good men will adore you, and when your beauty and your fortune are no more, will still deliver down your name revered to ages.

Lou. Oh! say you will be mine, and make your own conditions. If you suspect my temper, bind me by the most sacred tie, and let my love, my person, and my fortune, lawfully be your's.

Car. Madam, I'll be at once sincere, and tell you, 'tis impossible that we should ever meet in love.

Lou. Impossible! Oh! why?

Car. Because my love, my vows, my faith, are given to another: therefore, since you find I dare be honest, be early wise, and now release me to my

Lou. I cannot part with you. [fortune.]

Car. You must! I cannot with my reason.

Lou. Ungrateful! Will you go? Take heed! for you have proved I am not mistress of my temper.

Car. I see it, and am sorry, but needed not this threat to drive me; for still I dare be just, and force myself away. [Exit.]

Lou. Oh, torture! left! refused! despised! Have I thrown off my pride for this! Oh, insupportable! If I am not revenged, may all the—well.

Lewis. What a plague, are all these fine things come to nothing, then! Poor soul! she's in great heat truly. Ah, silly rogue! Now could I find in my heart to put her into good humour again; I have a great mind, 'faith—Od! she's a hummer. A strange mind, I haven't had such a mind a great while—Eh!—ay; I'll do't, faith—if she does but stay now; ah! if she does but stay! (As he is getting from the balcony, Louisa is speaking to Jaques.)

Lou. Who waits there?—[Enter JAQUES.]—Where's the stranger?

Jaq. Madam, I met him just now walking hastily about the gallery.

Lou. Are all the doors fast?

Jaq. All barred, madam.

Lou. Put out all your lights too, and on your lives let no one ask or answer him any question: but be you still near to observe him. [Exit Jaques.] Ah! (Don Lewis drops down.)

Lewis. Odso, my back!

Lou. Bless me, who's this? what are you?

Lewis. Not above fifty, madam.

Lou. Whence come you? what's your business?

Lewis. Finishing.

Lou. Who shewed, who brought you hither?

Lewis. Dumb, honest Dumb. [away.]

Lou. Will you begone, sir? I have no time to fool

Lewis. Yes, but you have! what, don't I know?

Lou. Pray, sir, who? What is't you take me for?

Lewis. A delicate piece of work, truly, but not finished; you understand me.

Lou. You are mad, sir!

Lewis. I say, don't you be so modest; for there are times, do you see, when even modesty is ignorance. Pray be seated, madam—nay, I'll have it so.—Ah! (Mimics her behaviour to Carlos.)

Lou. Confusion! have I exposed myself to this wretch, too!—had witness to my folly—nay, I deserve it.

Lewis. So, so, I shall bring her to terms presently. (Aside.) You have a world of pretty jewels here, madam; but where a woman loves, such gifts as these are trifles. (Mimics again.)

Lou. Insupportable! within there!

Enter Bravoes and JAQUES.

Lewis. Eh! (Rising.)

Jaq. Did your ladyship call, madam?

Lewis. I don't like her looks, 'faith. (Aside.)

Lou. Here, take this fool, let him be gagged, tied neck and heels, and locked into a garret; away with him!

Lewis. Dumb, Dumb! Help, Dumb, Dumb! stand by me, Dumb! A pox of my finishing, aw, aw! (They gag him, and carry him off.)

Lou. The insolence of this fool was more provoking than the other's scorn; but I shall yet find ways to measure my revenge. [Exit.]

Enter CARLOS in the dark.

Car. What can this woman mean? The doors all barred; the lights put out; the servants mute: would the worst would shew itself. Ha! yonder's a light; I'll follow it, and provoke my fortune. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Room.

Enter ANGELINA, with a light.

Ang. I cannot like this house; for now, as going to my rest, my ears were alarmed with the cries of one that called for help; I've seen strange faces too, that carry guilt and terror in their looks; and yet the officer that placed me here, appeared of honest thought. What can this mean? No matter what, since nothing but the loss of him I love, can worse befall me! Hark, what noise? Is the door fast? Ah! (Going to shut the door.)

Enter CARLOS and JAQUES, listening.

Car. Ha, another lady! and alone!

Ang. Ha, that voice! My Carlos—Oh!

Car. 'Tis she! my long lost love, my living Angelina! (Embraces her.)

Jaq. Say you so, sir? this shall to my lady. [Exit.]

Ang. Oh! let me hold you ever thus, lest fate again should part us.

Car. 'Twere death indeed to part; but from so hard a separation, thus again to meet, is life restored.

Ang. Oh! I were happy, blessed above my sex, could but my plain simplicity of love deserve your kind endearments.

Enter JAQUES and LOUISA at a distance.

Jaq. They are there.

Lou. Leave me. [Exit Jaques, and Louisa listens.]

Ang. I cannot bear to see you thus: for my sake don't despond: for while you seem in hope, I shall easily be cheerful.

Car. Oh! thou engaging softness! thy courage has revived me; no, we'll not despair; the guardian power that hitherto has saved us, may now protect and fix us happy.

Lou. Ha! so near acquainted. (Aside.)

Car. And yet our safety bids us part this moment. How came you hither?

Ang. The officer, that made me captive, proved a worthy man, and placed me here, as a companion to the lady of this dwelling.

Car. Ha! to what end?

Ang. He said, to be the advocate of his successful love; for he confessed he wooed her honourably. [tale.]

Car. Is't possible? Oh! I could tell thee such a

Ang. You amaze me; pray what is it?

Car. This is no time: let it suffice, the doors are barred against me; this moment I am a prisoner to her fury; if thou canst help me to any means of safety, or escape, ask me no questions, but be quick, and tell me.

Ang. Now you frighten me; but here, through my apartment, leads a passage to the garden, at the lower end you'll find a mount; if you dare drop from thence, I'll shew you; but can't you say when I may hope again to see you?

Car. About an hour hence walking in the garden, ready for your escape; for if I live, I'll come provided with the means to make it sure.

Ang. You will not fail.

Car. If I survive, depend on me; till when, may heaven support thy innocence!

Ang. Follow me. [Exeunt hastily.]

Lou. Are you so nimble, sir? Who waits there?—
[Enter JAQUES.—Run, take help, and stop the stranger; he is now making his escape through the garden;—fly.—Exit Jaques.—Revenge, like a viper, gnaws upon my quiet, and I must change its food, or leave my being; no, if I forego a second time that dear support, my pride, may I become as miserable as that wretch, that destined fool he dotes on. Ha! she is returned; yonder she passes; with what assured contentment in her looks!—

Re-enter JAQUES.

Now, have you brought him?

Jaq. Madam, we made what haste we could, but the gentleman reached the mount before us, and escaped over the garden wall.

Lou. Escaped, villain! Durst thou tell me so?

Jaq. If your ladyship had called me a little sooner, we had taken him. Who the devil is this stranger? (Aside.)

Lou. Fool that I am, I betray myself to my own servants! Well, 'tis no matter; go. [Exit Jaques. He has not left me hopeless yet; an hour hence he promised to be here again; and if he keep his word, he yet, at least in my revenge, shall prove me woman. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

Enter DON DUART, disguised, with a Servant.

Duart. Where did you find him?

Serv. Hard by, sir, at a house of entertainment; he's now coming forth; that's he.

Enter CLODIO.

Duart. I scarce remember him; I would not willingly mistake. I'll observe him.

Clo. So! now if I can but pick up an honest fellow, to crack one bottle, I think I shall finish the day as smartly as the Grand Signior—Hold! let me see, what has my hasty refreshment cost me here;—umb—umb—umb—(Counts his money.) Seven pistoles, by Jupiter.

Duart. 'Tis the same. Leave me. [Exit Servant.] Your servant, sir.

Clo. Sir, your humble servant.

Duart. Pardon a stranger's freedom, sir; but when you know my business—

Clo. Sir, if you'll take a bottle, I shall be proud of your acquaintance; and if I don't do your business before we part, I'll knock under the table.

Duart. Sir, I shall be glad to drink with you; but at present, am incapable of sitting to it.

Clo. Why then, sir, you shall only drink as long as you can stand; we'll have a bottle here, sir. Hey, Madona! (Calls.)

Duart. A very frank humoured gentleman; I'll know him farther. (Aside.) I presume, sir, you are not of Portugal?

Clo. No, sir; I am a kind of a—what d'ye call'em—a sort of a here—and—there; I am a stranger no where.

Duart. Have you travelled far, sir?

Clo. My tour of Europe, or so, sir; I came this summer from Rome.—[Enter a Servant with wine.]—So, so! here's the wine! Come, sir, to our better acquaintance. 'Faith, I like you mightily. Allons!

Duart. I find, sir, you have taken a taste of all the countries you have travelled through; but I presume your chief amusement has lain among the ladies. You fared well in France, I hope?

Clo. Yes, 'faith, as far as my pocket would go: but no money, no mademoiselle; no ducat, no dutchess; no pistole, no princess. By the way, let me tell you, your Lisbonites are held up at a pretty smart rate, too.

Duart. But, pray, sir, among all your adventures, has no particular lady's merit encouraged you to advance your own fortune by marriage?

Clo. Sir, I have been so near marriage, that my wedding-day has been come, but it was never over yet; split me!

Duart. How so, sir?

Clo. Why, the priest, the bride, and the dinner, were all ready dressed, 'faith; but before I could fall to, my elder brother, sir, comes me in, with a d—d long stride, and a sharp stomach, says a short grace, and whipped her up like an oyster.

Duart. You had ill fortune, sir.

Clo. Sir, fortune is not much in my debt; for you must know, sir, though I lost my wife, I have escaped hanging here in Lisbon. [sir.]

Duart. That I know you have; be not amazed,

Clo. Eh! what the devil! have I been all this while treating an officer, that has a warrant against me. Pray, sir, if it be no offence—may I beg the favour to know who you are?

Duart. Let it suffice, I own myself your friend: I am your debtor, sir. You fought a gentleman they call Don Duart—I knew him well; he was a proud insulting fellow, and my mortal foe: but you killed him, and I thank you; nay, I saw you do it fairly too; and for the action, I desire you will command my sword or fortune.

Clo. Pray, sir, is there no joke in all this?

Duart. Sir, you may trust to my sincerity; I ask for no return, but to be informed how I may do you service. (Offers him a purse.)

Clo. Sir, your health; I take your word, though I decline your money. I'll give you information presently. (Drinks.) Pray, sir, do you know the gentleman's sister that I fought with? That is, do you know what reputation, what fortune she has?

Duart. I know her fortune to be worth above twelve thousand pistoles; her reputation yet unsullied; but, pray sir, why may you ask this?

Clo. Now, I'll tell you, sir—twelve thousand pistoles, you say?

Duart. I speak the least, sir.

Clo. Why, this very lady, after I had killed her brother, gave me the protection of her house; hid me in her closet, while the officers came to search for me; and, as soon as their backs were turned, poor soul! hurried me out at a private door, with tears in her eyes, 'faith! Now, sir, what think you? Is not this hint broad enough for a man to make love upon?

Duart. Confusion! (Aside.)

Clo. Look you, sir, now, if you dare, give me a proof of your friendship; will you do me the favour to carry a letter to her?

Duart. Let me consider, sir—Death and fire! is all her height of sorrow but dissembled then? but this requires my farther search. (Aside.) May I depend on this for truth, sir?

Clo. Why, sir, you don't suppose I banter a lady of her quality!

Duart. D—n! (Aside.) Well, sir, I'll take your letter; but first let me be well acquainted with my errand.

Clo. Sir, I'll write this moment; if you please, we'll step into this house here, and finish the business over another bottle.

Duart. With all my heart.

Clo. Allons! Entrez. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.—SCENE I.—Louisa's House.

LOUISA and JAKUES discovered.

Lou. Is the lady seized?

Jaqu. Yes, madam, and half dead with the fright.

Lou. Let them be ready to produce her, as I directed. When the stranger's taken, bring me immediate notice: 'tis near his time: away! [Exit Jaques.] Had he not loved another, methinks I could have borne this usage—Hark, what noise! they have him sure! How now!

Enter JAKUES.

Jaqu. Madam, the gentleman is taken.

Lou. Bring him in. Revenge, I thank thee now.— [Enter CARLOS.]—So, sir, you are returned, it seems; you can love, then! You have a heart, I find, though not for me! Perhaps you came to seek a worthier mistress here; 'twould be uncharitable to disappoint your love. I'll help your search: if she be here, be sure she's safe. Open that door there. (Door opens, and discovers two Bravoes with ANGELINA; a handkerchief on her neck, which they hold ready to strangle her.) Now, sir, is this

Car. My Angelina! [the lady?]

Lou. If you approach, she dies.

Ang. Oh, miserable meeting!

Lou. Now let me see you smile, and rudely throw me from your arms; now scorn my love, my passion, and my fortune. [innocence.]

Car. Oh, cruelty of fate! that could betray such

Lou. What, not a word to soften yet thy obstinate aversion! thou wretched fool! thus to provoke thy ruin. End her. (To the Bravoes.)

Car. Oh, hold! for pity hold, and hear me.

Lou. I've learned from you to use my pity. On one condition yet she lives an hour, but if refused—

Car. Name not a refusal, be it danger, death, or tortures, anything that life can do to save her.

Lou. Presuming fool! were I inclined to save her life, (which, by my hopes of peace, I do not mean,) canst thou believe this insolent concern for her to my face would not provoke my vengeance?

Car. Yet hold! if revenge alone can save your fury, at least misplace it not; mine was the offence, be mine the punishment.

Lou. How he disarms my anger! But must my rival triumph then?

Ang. Charge me not with such abhorred ingratitude: be witness, heaven, I'll for ever serve you, court you, and confess you my preserver.

Car. For pity, yet resolve, and force your temper to a moment's pause. See at your feet my humbled scorn imploring, crushed, and prostrate, like a vile slave, that falls below your last contempt, and trembling begs for mercy.

Lou. He buries my revenge in blushes. Release the lady—go. [Exeunt Bravoes.] And now farewell my follies, and my mistaken love: love long and happily; forgive my follies past, and you have overpaid me. (Joins their hands.)

Car. My Angelina! do I then live to hold thee thus? But first let's kneel and pay our thanks to heaven, and this our kind preserver.

Lou. Nay, now you give me a confusion. (Raises them.) But if you dare trust me with the story of your love's distress, as far as my fortune can, command it freely, to supply your present wants, or any future means proposed to give you lasting happiness.

Car. Eternal rounds of never ending peace reward your wondrous bounty! But I have been too busy in my joy; I almost had forgot my friendly uncle, the ancient gentleman that first came hither with me; how have you disposed of him?

Lou. I think he's here, and safe. Who waits there?—[Enter JAKUES.]—Release the gentleman above, and tell him that his friends desire him. [Exit Jaques.] You'll pardon, sir, the treatment I have shewn him; he made a little too merry with my folly, which, I confess, at that time, something too far incensed me.

Car. He's old and cheerful, apt to be free; but he'll be sorry when his humour gives offence.

Enter DON LEWIS, JAKUES bowing to him.

Lewis. Pr'ythee, honest Dumb, don't be so ceremonious! I tell thee it's very well as it is—only my jaws ache a little: but as long as we're all friends, it's no great matter. My dear Carlos, I must buss thee, 'faith! Madam, your humble servant. I beg your pardon, d'ye see: you understand me. [Exit Jaques.]

Lou. I hope we are all friends, sir.

Lewis. I hope we are, madam: I am an honest old fellow, 'faith; though now and then I am a little odd, too.

Car. Here's a stranger, uncle.

Lewis. What, my little blossom! my gilliflower! my rose! my pink! my tulip! 'faith, I must smell thee. (Salutes Angelina.) Od! she's a delicate nosegay! Well, 'faith, I am heartily joyed to see thee, child.

Ang. I thank you, sir; and wish I may deserve your love: our fortune, once again, is kind; but how it comes about—

Lewis. Does not signify three-pence; when fortune pays me a visit, I seldom trouble myself to know which way she came. I tell you, I am glad to see you.
Enter JAQUES.

Jaq. Madam, here's the lord governor come to wait upon your ladyship.

Lou. At this late hour! What can his business be? Desire his lordship to walk in.

Enter Governor.

Gov. Pardon, madam, this unreasonable visit.

Lou. Your lordship does me honour.

Gov. At least, I hope, my business will excuse it. Some strangers, here below, upon their offered oaths, demanded my authority to search your house for a lost young lady, to whom the one of them affirms himself the father: but the respect I owe your ladyship, made me refuse their search, till I had spoken with you.

Ang. It must be they. Now, madam, your protection, or we yet are lost.

Lou. Be not concerned. Would you avoid them?

Car. No, we must be found: let them have entrance. We have an honest cause, and would provoke its trial.

Lou. Conduct the gentlemen without. [Exit Jaques.] My lord, I'll answer for their honesty; and, as they are strangers, where the law's severe, must beg you'd favour and assist them.

Gov. You may command me, madam; though there's no great fear; for having heard the most that they could urge against them, I found in their complaints more spleen and humour, than any just appearance of a real injury.

Enter DON CHARINO, DON ANTONIO, and CLODIO.

Cha. I'll have justice.

Ant. Don't be too hot, brother.

Cha. I demand justice.

Gov. That's the lady, sir, I told you of.

Clo. Ay, that's she, my lord, I am witness.

Car. My father! Sir, your pardon and your blessing.

Ant. Why, truly, Charles, I begin to be a little reconciled to the matter: I wish you well, though I can't join you together; for my friend and brother here, is very obstinate, and will admit of no satisfaction; but, however, heaven will bless you in spite of his teeth.

Cha. This is all contrivance—roguery! I am abused! I say, deliver my daughter! she is an heiress, sir; and to detain her is a rape in law, sir, and I'll have you all hanged; therefore, no more delays, sir; for I tell you beforehand, I am a wise man, and 'tis impossible to trick me.

Ant. I say, you are too positive, brother; and when you learn more wisdom, you'll have some.

Cha. I say, brother, this is mere malice, when you know, in your own conscience, I have ten times your understanding; for you see I am quite of another opinion; and so, once more, my lord, I demand justice against that ravisher. [violence?]

Gov. Does your daughter, sir, complain of any

Cha. Your lordship knows young girls never complain when the violence is over: he has taught her better, I suppose.

Ang. (To Cha. kneeling.) Sir, you are my father, who bred me, cherished me, gave me my affections, taught me to keep them hitherto within the bounds of honour and of virtue, let me conjure you, by the chaste love my mother bore you, when she preferred, to her mistaken parents' choice, her being your's without a dower, not to bestow my person where those affections ne'er can follow: I cannot love that gentleman more than a sister ought.

Clo. No! that's very odd.

Ang. But here my heart's subdued, even to the last compliance with my fortune: he, sir, has nobly wooed and won me, and I am only his, or miserable.

Cha. Get up again.

Gov. Come, sir, be persuaded; your daughter has made an honourable and happy choice: this severity will but expose yourself and her.

Cha. My lord, I don't want advice: I'll consider with myself, and resolve upon my own opinion.

Enter JAQUES.

Jaq. My lord, here's a stranger without inquires for your lordship, and for a gentleman that calls himself Clodio.

Clo. Hey! Ah! mon cher ami.—[Enter DON DUART, disguised.]—Well, what news, my dear? Has she answered my letter?

Duart. There, sir—This to your lordship. (Gives him a letter, and whispers.)

Gov. Married to-night! and to this gentleman, sayest thou? I'm amazed.

Duart. Here is her choice, my lord.

Clo. (Reading the letter.) Um—um—charms—irresistible—excuse—so soon—passion—blushes—consent—provision—children—settlement—marriage. If this is not plain, the devil's in't.—Hold! here's more, 'faith. (Reads to himself.)

Gov. 'Tis very sudden—But give my service, I'll wait upon her.

Clo. Ha, ha, ha! poor soul! I'll be with her presently; and, 'faith, since I have made my own fortune, I'll e'en patch up my brother's too. Harkye! my dear dad that should have been—this business is all at an end; for, look you, I find your daughter's engaged; and, to tell you the truth, so am I, 'faith. If my brother has a mind to marry her, let him; for I shall not, split me! And now, gentlemen and ladies, if you will do me the honour to grace mine and the Lady Elvira's wedding, such homely entertainment as my poor house affords, you shall be all heartily welcome to.

Duart. Thy house! ha, ha! Well said, puppy.

Clo. Ha! old Testy!

Cha. What dost thou mean, man? (To Clo.)

Gov. 'Tis even so, I can assure you, sir; I have, myself, an invitation from the lady's own hand, that confirms it: I know her fortune well, and am surprised at it. [to reconcile us all.]

Ang. Blessed news! This seems a forward step

Cha. If this be true, my lord, I have been thinking to no purpose; my design is all broken to pieces.

Ant. Come, brother, we'll mend it as well as we can; and since that young rogue has rudely turned tail upon your daughter, I'll fill up the blank with Carlos's name, and let the rest of the settlement stand as it was.

Cha. Hold! I'll first see this wedding, and then give you my final resolution. [the way.]

Clo. Come, ladies, if you please, I will shew you

Lou. Sir, we wait upon you.

Cha. This wedding's an odd thing.

Duart. Ha, ha! if it should be a lie, now! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Elvira's Apartment.

Enter ELVIRA and Servant.

Elv. Are the officers ready? [ders.]

Serv. Yes, madam, and know your ladyship's or-

Elv. Now justice shall uncloud my fame, and see my brother's death revenged.

Enter CLODIO, Governor, DON ANTONIO, ANGELINA, CARLOS, DON CHARINO, and DON LEWIS.

Clo. Well, madam, you see I'm punctual—you've nicked your man, 'faith—I'm always critical—to a minute: you'll never stay for me. Ladies and gentlemen, I desire you'll do me the honour of being better acquainted here. My lord—

Gov. Give you joy, madam.

Clo. Nay, madam, I have brought you some near relations of my own, too—this Don Antonio, who will shortly have the honour to call you daughter.

Ant. The young rogue has made a pretty choice, 'faith.

Clo. This Don Charino, who was very near having the honour of calling me son; this my wife that should have been; this my elder brother; and this my noble uncle, Don Cholerio Snapshorto de Testy.

Lewis. Puppy!

Clo. Peevish.

Lewis. Madam, I wish you joy with all my heart; but, truly, I can't much advise you to marry this gentleman; because, in a day or two, you'll really find him extremely shocking: those that know him, generally give him the title of Don Dismallo Thickskullo de Halfwitto.

Clo. Well said, nuncle. Ha, ha!

Enter a Servant and DON DUART, as a Priest.

Serv. Madam, the priest is come.

Elv. Let him wait, we have no occasion yet.

Gov. You have surprised us, madam, by this sudden marriage.

Elv. I may yet surprise you more, my lord.

Gov. Sir, don't you think your bride looks melancholy?

Clo. Ay, poor fool, she's modest; but I have a cure for that.—Well, my princess, why that demure look, now?

Elv. I was thinking, sir—

Clo. I know what you think of—you don't think at all—you don't know what to think—you neither see, hear, feel, smell, nor taste: you haven't the right use of one of your senses—in short, you have it. Now, my princess, have not I nicked it?

Elv. I am sorry, sir, you know so little of yourself, or me. Within there! Seize him! (Several Officers rush in, who seize Clodio, and bind him.)

Duart. Ha!

Gov. What can this mean? [already?]

Clo. Gad me! what, is my deary in her frolics

Elv. And now, my lord, your justice on that mur-

Gov. How, madam! [derer.

Clo. That b—, my fortune!

Lewis. Madam, upon my knees, I beg you don't carry the jest too far; but if there be any real hopes of his having a halter, let's know it in three words, that I may be sure at once for ever, that no earthly thing but a reprieve can save him. (Aside to Elv.)

Ant. Pray, madam, who accuses him?

Elv. His own confession, sir.

Cha. Of murder, say you, madam?

Elv. The murder of my brother.

Duart. She is innocent, and well has disappointed my revenge. (Aside.)

Lewis. So, now I am a little easy; the puppy will be hanged.

Gov. Give me leave, madam, to ask you yet some farther questions.

Clo. Ay, I shall be hanged, I believe.

Cha. Nay, then, 'tis time to take care of my daughter; for I am convinced that my friend Clody is disposed of; and so, without compliment, do you see, children, heaven bless you together. (Joins Carlos and Angelina's hands.) [ought.

Car. This, sir, is a time unfit to thank you as we

Ant. Well, brother, I thank you, however. Carlos is an honest lad, and well deserves her; but poor Clody's ill fortune I could never have suspected.

Lewis. Why, you would be positive, though you know, brother, I always told you Dismal would be hanged.—(Aside.) I must plague him a little, because the dog has been pert with me.—Clody, how dost thou do? Ha! why you are tied!

Clo. I hate this old fellow, split me! (Aside.)

Lewis. Thou hast really made a sad blunder here, child, to invite so many people to a marriage-knot; and instead of that, it is like to be one under the left ear.

Clo. I'd fain him die. (Aside.)

Lewis. Well, my dear, I'll provide for thy going off, however. Let me see; you'll only have occasion for a nosegay, a pair of white gloves, and a coffin. Look you; take you no care about the surgeons; you shall not be anatomized: I'll get the body off with a wet finger—(aside) though, methinks, I'd fain see the inside of the puppy, too.

Clo. Oh! rot him! I can't bear this. (Aside.)

Lewis. Well, I won't trouble you any more now, child; if I am not engaged, I don't know but I may come to the tree, and sing a stave or two with thee; nay, I'll rise on purpose—though you will hardly suffer before twelve o'clock, neither—ay, just about twelve—about twelve you'll be turned off.

Clo. Oh! curses consume him! (Aside.)

Gov. I am convinced, madam, the fact appears too plain.

Lewis. Yes, yes; he'll suffer.

Gov. What says the gentleman? Do you confess the fact, sir!

Clo. Will it do me any good, my lord?

Gov. Perhaps it may, if you can prove it was not done in malice.

Clo. Why, then, to confess the truth, my lord, I did pink him, and am sorry for't; but it was none of my fault, split me!

Elv. Now, my lord, your justice.

Duart. Hold, madam! that remains in me to give; for know, your brother lives, and happy in the proof of such a sister's virtue. (Discovers himself.)

Elv. My brother! Oh! let my wonder speak my joy. (Clodio and his friends seem surprised.)

Gov. Don Duart living and well! How came this strange recovery?

Duart. My body's health the surgeon has restored; but here's the true physician of my mind: the hot distempered blood, which lately rendered me offensive to mankind, his just, resenting sword let forth, which gave me leisure to reflect upon my follies past; and, by reflection, to reform.

Elv. This is indeed a happy change!

Gov. Release the gentleman. [this a little.

Clo. Here, Testy, pr'ythee, do so much as untie

Lewis. Why, so I will, sirrah! I find thou hast done a mettled thing; and I don't know whether it's worth my while to be shocked at thee any longer.

Elv. I ask your pardon for the wrong I have done you, sir; and blush to think how much I owe you, for a brother thus restored.

Clo. Madam, your very humble servant; it is mighty well as it is.

Duart. We are, indeed, his debtors both; and, sister, there's but one way now of being grateful: for my sake, give him such returns of love as he may yet think fit to ask, or you with modesty can answer.

Clo. Sir, I thank you; and when you don't think it impudence in me to wish myself well with your sister, I shall beg leave to make use of your friendship.

Duart. This modesty commends you, sir.

Ant. Sir, you have proposed like a man of honour; and if the lady can but like of it, she shall find those among us, that will make up a fortune to deserve her.

Car. I wish my brother well; and as I once offered him to divide my birth-right, I'm ready still to put my words into performance.

Lewis. Nay, then, since I find the rogue's no longer like to be an enemy to Carlos, as far as a few acres go, I'll be his friend too.

Duart. Sister!

Elv. This is no trifle, brother: allow me a convenient time to think, and if the gentleman continues to deserve your friendship, he shall not much complain I am his enemy.

Lewis. So, now it will be a wedding again, 'faith!

Car. Come, my Angelina,

Our bark, at length, has found a quiet harbour,

And the distressful voyage of our loves

Ends not alone in safety, but reward.

Now we unlade our freight of happiness,

Of which, from thee alone my share's deriv'd;

For all my former search in deep philosophy,

Not knowing thee, was a mere dream of life:

But love, in one soft moment, taught me more

Than all the volumes of the learn'd could reach;

Gave me the proof, when nature's birth began,

To what great end th' Eternal form'd a man. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.—SCENE I.—Urganda's Palace.

Enter MERLIN and URGANDA.

Urg. But hear me, Merlin; I beseech you, hear me.

Mer. Hear you! I have heard you; for years have heard your vows, your protestations. Have you not allured my affections by every female art? and when I thought that my unalterable passion was to be rewarded for its constancy, what have you done? Why, like mere mortal woman, in the true spirit of frailty, have given up me and my hopes—for what? a boy! an idiot.

Urg. Even this I can bear from Merlin.

Mer. You have injured me, and must bear more.

Urg. I'll repair that injury.

Mer. Then send back your favourite Cymon to his disconsolate friends.

Urg. How can you imagine that such a poor, ignorant object as Cymon is, can have any charms for me?

Mer. Ignorance, no more than profligacy, is excluded from female favour; of this the success of rakes and fools is proof sufficient.

Urg. You mistake me, Merlin; pity for Cymon's state of mind, and friendship for his father, have induced me to endeavour at his cure.

Mer. False, prevaricating Urganda! love was your inducement. Have you not stolen the prince from his royal father, and detained him here by your power, while a hundred knights are in search after him? Does not everything about you prove the consequence of your want of honour and faith to me? You were placed on this happy spot, to be the guardian of its peace and innocence; but now, at last, by your example, the once happy lives of the Arcadians are embittered with envy, passion, vanity, selfishness, and inconstancy: and whom are they to curse for this change? Urganda; the lost Urganda.

Urg. I beseech you, Merlin, spare me.

Mer. Yes; I'll converse with you no more, because I will be no more deceived. I cannot hate you, though I shun you; yet, in my misery, I have this consolation, that the pangs of my jealousy are at least equalled by the torments of your fruitless passion.

Still wish and sigh, and wish again;
Love is dethron'd; revenge shall reign!
Still shall my pow'r your vile arts confound,
And Cymon's cure shall be Urganda's wound.

[Exit.

Urg. "And Cymon's cure shall be Urganda's wound!" What mystery is couched in these words? What can he mean?

Enter FATIMA, looking after Merlin.

Fat. I'll tell you, madam, when he is out of hearing. He means mischief, and terrible mischief, too; no less, I believe, than ravishing you, and cutting my tongue out. I wish we were out of his clutches.

Urg. Don't fear, Fatima.

Fat. I can't help it; he has great power, and is mischievously angry.

Urg. Here is your protection. (Shews her wand.) My power is at least equal to his. (Muses.) "And Cymon's cure shall be Urganda's wound!"

Fat. Don't trouble your head with these odd ends of verses, which were spoken in a passion; or, perhaps, for the rhyme's sake. Think a little to clear us from this old mischief-making conjurer. What will you do, madam?

Urg. What can I do, Fatima?

Fat. You might very easily settle matters with him, if you could as easily settle them with yourself.

Urg. Tell me how?

Fat. Marry Merlin, and send away the young fellow. (Urganda shakes her head.) I thought so; but before matters grow worse, give me leave to reason a little with you, madam.

Urg. I am in love, Fatima. (Sighs.)

Fat. And poor reason may stay at home: me exactly! Ay, ay, we are all alike; but with this difference, madam, your passion is surely a strange one; you have stolen away this young man, who, bating his youth and figure, has not one circumstance to create affection about him. He is half an idiot, madam, which is no great compliment to your wisdom, your beauty, or your power.

Urg. I despise them all; for they can neither relieve my passion, nor awaken his.

Fat. Cymon is incapable of being touched with anything; nothing gives him pleasure, but twirling his cap, and hunting butterflies: he'll make a sad lover, indeed, madam.

Urg. I can wait with patience for the recovery of his understanding; it begins to dawn already.

Fat. Where, pray?

Urg. In his eyes.

Fat. Eyes! Ha, ha, ha; Love has none, madam; the heart only sees, on these occasions. Cymon was born a fool, and his eyes will never look as you would have them, take my word for it.

Urg. Don't make me despair, Fatima.

Fat. Don't lose your time, then; 'tis the business of beauty to make fools, and not cure them. Even I, poor I, could have made twenty fools of wise men, in half the time that you have been endeavouring to make your fool sensible. Oh! 'tis a sad way of spending one's time.

Urg. Silence, Fatima! my passion is too serious to be jested with.

Fat. Far gone, indeed, madam; and yonder goes the precious object of it.

Urg. He seems melancholy: what's the matter with him?

Fat. He's a fool, or he might make himself very merry among us. I'll leave you to make the most of him. (Going.)

Urg. Stay, Fatima, and help me to divert him.

Fat. A sad time, when a lady must call in help to divert her gallant! but I'm at your service.

Enter CYMON, melancholy.

Cymon. Heigho! (Sighs.)

Fat. What's the matter, young gentleman?

Cymon. Heigho!

Urg. Are you not well, Cymon?

Cymon. Yes, I am very well.

Urg. Why do you sigh, then?

Cymon. Eh! (Looks foolish.)

Fat. Do you see it in his eyes now, madam?

Urg. Pr'ythee, be quiet. What is it you want? tell me, Cymon; tell me your wishes, and you shall Cymon. Shall I?

[have them.]

Urg. Yes, indeed, Cymon.

Fat. Now for it.

Cymon. I wish—heigho!

Urg. These sighs must mean something. (Aside to Fatima.)

Fat. I wish you joy, then; find it out, madam. (Apart.)

Urg. What do you sigh for? (To Cymon.)

Cymon. I want—(Sighs.)

Urg. What, what, my sweet creature? (Eagerly.)

Cymon. To go away.

Fat. Oh, la! the meaning's out.

Urg. Where would you go?

Cymon. Anywhere.

Urg. Had you rather go anywhere, than stay with me? [anybody.]

Cymon. I had rather go anywhere than stay with

Urg. Will you love me if I let you go?

Cymon. Anything, if you'll let me go; pray, let me go.

Fat. I'm out of all patience! what the deuce would you have, young gentleman? Had you one grain of understanding, or a spark of sensibility in you, you would know and feel yourself to be the happiest of mortals.

Cymon. I had rather go, for all that.

Fat. The picture of the whole sex! Oh! madam, fondness will never do: a little coquetry is the thing: I bait my hook with nothing else; and I always catch fish. (Aside to Urg.)

Urg. I will shew him my power, and captivate his heart through his senses.

Fat. You'll throw away your powder and shot.

INCANTATION.—URGANDA.

Hither, spirits, that aid me, hither!

Whither stays my love? ah! whither?

Alas! this heart must faithful prove,

Though still he flies Urganda's love.

(Urganda waves her wand, and the scene changes to a magnificent Garden. Cupid and the Loves descend. Ballet by Loves and Zephyrs. During the dance, Cymon stares vacantly, grows inattentive, and at last, falls asleep.)

Urg. Look, Fatima, nothing can affect his insensibility; and yet, what a beautiful simplicity!

Fat. Turn him out among the sheep, madam, and think of him no more; 'tis all labour in vain, as the song says, I assure you.

Urg. Cymon, Cymon! what, are you dead to these entertainments?

Cymon. Dead! I hope not. (Starts.)

Urg. How can you be so unmoved?

Cymon. They tired me so, that I wished them a good night, and went to sleep. But where are they?

Urg. They are gone, Cymon.

Cymon. Then let me go too. (Gets up.)

Fat. The old story!

Urg. Whither would you go? Tell me, and I'll go with you, my sweet youth.

Cymon. No, I'll go by myself.

Urg. And so you shall; but where?

Cymon. Into the fields.

Urg. But is not this garden pleasanter than the fields, my palace than cottages, and my company more agreeable to you than the shepherds?

Cymon. Why, how can I tell till I try? you won't let me choose.

AIR.—CYMON.

You gave me, last week, a young linnet,

Shut up in a fine golden cage;

Yet how sad the poor thing was within it,

Oh! how it did flutter and rage!

Then he mop'd, and he pin'd,

That his wings were confin'd,

Till I open'd the door of his den;

Then so merry was he,

And because he was free,

He came to his cage back again.

And so should I too, if you would let me go.

Urg. And would you return to me again? [to.]

Cymon. Yes, I would; I've no where else to go

Fat. Let him have his humour; when he is not confined, and is seemingly disregarded, you may have him, and mould him as you please. 'Tis a receipt for the whole sex.

Urg. I'll follow your advice. [Exit Fatima.] Well, Cymon, you shall go wherever you please, and for as long as you please.

Cymon. And shall I let my linnet out, too?

Urg. And take this, Cymon, wear it for my sake, and don't forget me. (Gives him a nosegay.) Go, Cymon, take your companion, and be happier than I can make you.

AIR.—URGANDA.

One adieu before you leave me,

One sigh, although that sigh deceive me;

Oh! let me think you true!

Cruel! thus Urganda flying;

Cruel! this fond heart denying;

One sigh, one last adieu.

Though my ardent vows be slighted,

Though my love be unrequited,

Oh! hide it from my view!

Let me feel not I'm forsaken;

Rather let me die mistaken,

Than breathe one last adieu.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A rural Prospect.Enter PHOEBE and DAPHNE.

Phoebe. What, to be left and forsaken! and see the false fellow make the same vows to another, almost before my face! I can't bear it, and I won't. Oh! that I had the power of our enchantress yonder.—I would play the devil with them all.

Daph. And yet, to do justice to Sylvia, who makes all this disturbance among you, she does not in the least encourage the shepherds, and she can't help their falling in love with her.

Phoebe. May be so; nor can I help hating and detesting her, because they do fall in love with her.

Linco. (Singing without.) "Care flies from the lad that is merry."

Daph. Here comes the merry Linco, who never knew care, or felt sorrow. If you can bear his laughing at your griefs, or singing away his own, you may get some information from him.

Enter LINCO, singing.

Linco. What, my girls of ten thousand! I was this moment defying love and all his mischief, and you are sent in the nick by him, to try my courage; but I'm above temptation, or below it; I duck down, and all his arrows fly over me.

AIR.—LINCO.

Care flies from the lad that is merry,Whose heart is as soundAnd cheeks are as round,As round and as red as a cherry.Phoebe. What, are you always thus?

Linco. Ay, or heaven help me! What, would you have me do as you do? walking with your arms across, thus—heighoing by the brook-side among the willows. Oh! fie for shame, lasses! young and handsome, and sighing after one fellow a-piece, when you should have a hundred in a drove, following you like—like—you shall have the simile another time.

Daph. No; pr'ythee, Linco, give it us now.

Linco. You shall have it; or what's better, I'll tell you what you are not like—you are not like our shepherdess Sylvia; she's so cold, and so coy, that she flies from her lovers, but is never without a score of them; you are always running after the fellows, and yet are always alone; a very great difference, let me tell you; frost and fire, that's all.

Daph. Don't imagine that I am in the pining condition my poor sister is. I am as happy as she is miserable.

Linco. Good lack! I'm sorry for it.Daph. What, sorry that I am happy?Linco. Oh! no, prodigious glad.Phoebe. That I am miserable?

Linco. No, no; prodigious sorry for that, and prodigious glad of the other.

Phoebe. Pr'ythee, be serious a little.

Linco. No; heaven forbid! If I am serious, 'tis all over with me. I must laugh at something; shall I be merry with you?

Daph. The happy shepherdess can bear to be laughed at. [without a sigh.]

Linco. Then Sylvia might take your shepherd*Daph.* My shepherd! what does the fool mean?

Phoebe. Her shepherd! Pray, tell us, Linco. (Eagerly.)

Linco. 'Tis no secret, I suppose. I only met her Damon and Sylvia together just now, walking to—

Daph. What, my Damon?

Linco. Your Damon that was, and that would be Sylvia's Damon, if she would put up with him.

Daph. Her Damon! I'll make her to know—a wicked slut! a vile fellow! Come, sister, I'm ready to go with you—we'll be revenged. If our old governor continues to cast a sheep's eye at me, I'll have her turned out of Arcadia, I warrant you; a base, mischievous— [Exit.]

Phoebe. This is some comfort, however—ha, ha, ha! in seeing one's sister as miserable as one's self. [Exit.]

Linco. Ha, ha, ha! Oh! how the pretty, sweet-tempered creatures are ruffled.

AIR.—LINCO.

This love puts 'em all in commotion;For preach what you will,They cannot be still,No more than the wind or the ocean. [Exit.]ACT II.—SCENE I.—A rural Prospect.SYLVIA discovered lying upon a bank. Enter MERLIN.

Mer. My art succeeds, which hither has conveyed,

To catch the eye of Cymon, this sweet maid.

Her charms shall clear the mists which cloud his mind,

And make him warm, and sensible, and kind;
Her yet cold heart, with passion's sighs shall move,
Melt as he melts, and give him love for love.

This magic touch shall to these flowers impart

(Touches a nosegay in her hand.)

A power when beauty gains, to fix the heart. [Exit.]

Enter CYMON, with his bird.

Cymon. Away, prisoner, and make yourself merry. (Bird flies.) Ay, ay, I knew how it would be with you; much good may it do you, Bob. What a sweet place this is! Hills and greens, and rocks, and trees, and water, and sun, and birds! Dear me! 'tis just as if I had never seen it before. (Whistles about till he sees Sylvia, then stops and sinks his whistling by degrees, with a look and attitude of astonishment.) Oh, la! what's here? 'Tis something dropped from the heavens, sure; and yet, 'tis like a woman, too! Bless me! is it alive? (Sighs.) It can't be dead, for its cheek is as red as a rose, and it moves about the heart of it. I don't know what's the matter with me. I wish it would wake, that I might see its eyes. If it should look gentle, and smile upon me, I should be glad to play with it. Ay, ay, there's something now in my breast that they told me of. It feels oddly to me; and yet I don't dislike it.

AIR.—CYMON.

All amaze!Wonder, praise!Here for ever could I gaze!A little nearer to—What is't I do?Fie, for shame! I am possess'd;Something creeping in my breastWill not let me stay or go.Shall I wake it? No, no, no!

I am glad I came abroad! I have not been so pleased ever since I can remember. But, perhaps, it may be angry with me. I can't help it, if it is. I had rather see her angry with me than Urganda smile upon me. Stay, stay! (Sylvia stirs.) La! what a pretty foot it has! (Retires. Sylvia raises herself from the bank.)

AIR.—SYLVIA.

Yet awhile, sweet sleep, deceive me,Fold me in thy downy arms,Let not care awake to grieve me,Lull it with thy potent charms.I, a turtle, doom'd to stray,Quitting young the parent's nest,Find each bird a bird of prey;Sorrow knows not where to rest.

(Sylvia sees Cymon with emotion, while he gazes strongly on her, and retires, pulling off his cap.)

Syl. Who's that? (Speaks gently and confused.)Cymon. 'Tis I. (Bows and hesitates.)Syl. What's your name?Cymon. Cymon.Syl. What do you want, young man?Cymon. Nothing, young woman.Syl. What are you doing there?

Cymon. Looking at you there. What eyes it has! (Aside.)

Syl. You don't intend me any harm?

Cymon. Not I, indeed! I wish you don't do me some. Art thou a fairy, pray?

Syl. No; I am a poor harmless shepherdess.

Cymon. I don't know that: you have bewitched me, I believe. I wish you'd speak to me, and look at me, as Urganda does.

Syl. What, the enchantress? Do you belong to her?

Cymon. I had rather belong to you; I would not desire to go abroad, if I did.

Syl. Does Urganda love you?

Cymon. So she says. If I were to stay here always, I should not be called the simple Cymon.

Syl. Nor I the hard-hearted Sylvia.

Cymon. Sylvia, Sylvia! what a sweet name! I could sound it for ever!

Syl. I shall never see you again. I wish I had not seen you now.

Cymon. If you did but wish as I do, all the enchantresses in the world could not hinder us from seeing one another. (Kneels and kisses her hand.)

Syl. We shall be seen, and separated for ever. I must go.

Cymon. When shall I see you again? In half an hour?

Syl. Half an hour! that will be too soon. No, no; it must be three quarters of an hour.

Cymon. And where, my sweet Sylvia?

Syl. Anywhere, my sweet Cymon!

Cymon. In the grove, by the river there.

Syl. And you shall take this to remember it. (Gives him the nosegay enchanted by Merlin.) I wish it were a kingdom, I would give it you, and a queen along with it.

Cymon. And here is one for you, too; which is of no value to me, unless you will receive it; take it, my sweet Sylvia! (Gives her Urganda's nosegay.)

DUETT.—SYLVIA and CYMON.

Syl. Take this nosegay, gentle youth!

Cymon. And you, sweet maid, take mine:

Syl. Unlike these flowers be thy fair truth;

Cymon. Unlike these flowers be thine.

These changing soon,

Will soon decay,

Be sweet till noon,

Then pass away.

Fair, for a time, their transient charms appear;

But truth, unchang'd, shall bloom for ever here.

[Each pressing their hearts. Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Before Urganda's Palace.

Enter URGANDA.

Urg. With what anxiety I watch his return! And how mean is that anxiety for an object so insensible! Oh, love! is it not enough to make thy votaries despicable in others' eyes! Must we also despise ourselves?

Enter FATIMA.

Well, Fatima, is he returned?

Fat. He has no feelings but those of hunger; when that pinches him he'll return to be fed, like other animals.

Urg. Indeed, Fatima, his insensibility and ingratitude astonish and distract me. Yet am I only a greater slave to my weakness, and more incapable of relief.

Fat. Why, then, I may as well hold my tongue; but before I would waste all the prime of my womanhood in playing such a losing game, I would—but I see you don't mind me, madam; and, therefore, I'll say no more. I know the consequence, and must submit.

Urg. What can I do in my situation? But see where Cymon approaches! he seems transported. Look, look, Fatima! he is kissing and embracing my nosegay; it has had the desired effect, and I am happy: we'll be invisible, that I may observe his transports. (Waves her wand, and retires with Fatima.)

Enter CYMON, hugging a nosegay.

Cymon. Oh! my dear, sweet, charming nosegay! To see thee, to smell thee, and to taste thee, (kisses it) will make Urganda and her garden delightful to me. (Kisses it.)

Fat. What does he say? (Apart.)

Urg. Hush, hush! all transport, and about me. What a change is this! (Apart.)

Cymon. With this I can want for nothing. I possess everything with this. Oh! the dear, dear nosegay! and the dear, dear giver of it!

Urg. The dear, dear giver! Mind that, Fatima! What heavenly eloquence! Here's a change of heart and mind! Heigho! (Apart.)

Fat. I'm all amazement! in a dream! But is that your nosegay? (Apart.)

Urg. Mine! How can you doubt it? (Apart.)

Fat. Nay, I'm near-sighted. (Apart.)

Cymon. She has not a beauty that is not brought to mind by these flowers. Oh! I shall lose my wits with pleasure!

Fat. 'Tis pity to lose them the moment you have found them. (Apart.)

Urg. Oh! Fatima, I never was proud of my power till this transporting moment! (Apart.)

Cymon. Where shall I put it? Where shall I conceal it from everybody? I'll keep it in my bosom, next my heart, all the day; and at night, I will put it upon my pillow, and talk to it, and sigh to it, and swear to it, and sleep by it, and kiss it for ever and ever.

AIR.—CYMON.

What exquisite pleasure!

This sweet treasure,

From me they shall never

Sever.

In thee, in thee,

My charmer I see;

I'll sigh, and caress thee,

I'll kiss thee, and press thee,

Thus, thus, to my bosom for ever and ever.

(Urganda and Fatima come forward. Cymon puts the nosegay in his bosom, and looks confused and astonished.)

Urg. Pray, what is that you would kiss and press to your bosom for ever and ever? (Smiles.)

Cymon. Nothing but—but—nothing.

Urg. What were you talking to?

Cymon. Myself, to be sure; I had nothing else to talk to.

Urg. Yes, but you have, Cymon. There is something in your bosom, next your heart.

Cymon. Yes, so there is.

Urg. What is it, Cymon? (Smiles.)

Fat. Now his modesty is giving way; we shall have it at last. (Aside.)

Cymon. Nothing but a nosegay.

Urg. That which I gave you? Let me see it.

Cymon. What, give a thing, and take it away again?

Urg. I would not take it away for the world.

Cymon. Nor would I give it you for a hundred worlds.

Fat. See it, by all means, madam. I have my reasons. (Aside to Urganda.)

Urg. I must see it, Cymon; and, therefore, no delay. I will see it, or shut you up for ever.

Cymon. What a stir is here about nothing! Now are you satisfied? (Holds the nosegay at a distance. Urganda and Fatima look at one another with surprise.)

Fat. I was right.

Urg. And I am miserable!

Cymon. Have you seen it enough?

Urg. That is not mine, Cymon.

Cymon. No; 'tis mine.

Urg. Who gave it you?

Cymon. A person.

Urg. What person—male or female?

Cymon. La! how can I tell?

Fat. Finely improved, indeed! a genius! (Aside.)

Urg. I must dissemble. (Aside.) Lookye! Cymon, I did but sport with you; the nosegay was your own, and you had a right to give it away, or throw it away.

Cymon. Indeed, but I did not, I only gave it for this; which, as it is so much finer and sweeter, I thought would not vex you.

Urg. Heigho! (Aside.)

Fat. Vex her! Oh! not in the least. But you should not have given away her present to a vulgar creature.

Cymon. How dare you talk to me so? I would have you to know she is neither ugly nor vulgar. No, she is—

Fat. Oh! she! your humble servant, young Simplicity! La! how can you tell whether it is male or female? (Cymon appears confused.)

Urg. Don't mind her impertinence, Cymon: I give you leave to follow your own inclinations. I'll have him watched; this office be your's, my faithful Fatima. (Apart to Fatima) [Exit Fatima.

Cymon. Then I am happy, indeed.

Urg. Cymon, I would that you could love with constancy like mine; but this you never can.

Cymon. Oh! yes, I can love. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—Dorcas's Cottage.

SYLVIA at the door, with Cymon's nosegay in her hand.

Syl. The more I look upon this nosegay, the more I feel Cymon in my heart and mind. Ever since I have seen him, I wander without knowing where, I speak without knowing to whom, and I look without knowing at what. Now I dread to lose him, and now again I think him mine for ever!

AIR.—SYLVIA.

*Oh! why should we sorrow, who never knew sin?
Let smiles of content shew our rapture within:
This love has so rais'd me, I now tread in air!
He's sure sent from heav'n to lighten my care!
Each shepherdess views me with scorn and disdain;
Each shepherd pursues me, but all is in vain:
No more will I sorrow, no longer despair,
He's sure sent from heaven to lighten my care!*
(Linco is seen listening.)

Enter LINCO.

Linco. If you were as wicked, shepherdess, as you are innocent, that voice of your's would corrupt justice herself, unless she were deaf, as well as blind.

Syl. I hope you did not overhear me, Linco?

Linco. Oh! but I did though; and, notwithstanding I come as the deputy of a deputy governor, to bring you before my principal, for some complaints made against you by a certain shepherdess, I will stand your friend, though I lose my place for it: there are not many such friends, shepherdess.

Syl. What have I done to the shepherdesses, that they persecute me so?

Linco. You are much too handsome, which is a crime the best of 'em can't forgive you.

Syl. I'll trust myself with you, and face my enemies. (As they are going, Dorcas calls from the cottage.)

Dor. Where are you going, child? Who is that with you, Sylvia?

Linco. Now shall we be stopped by this good old woman, who will know all, and can scarce hear anything.

Dor. I'll see who you have with you.

Enter DORCAS, from the house.

Lin. 'Tis I, dame; your kinsman Linco. (Speaks loud in her ear.)

Dor. Oh! is it you, honest Linco? (Takes his hand.) Well, what's to do now?

Linco. The governor desires to speak with Sylvia; a friendly inquiry that's all. (Loud.)

Dor. For what? for what? Tell me that. I have nothing to do with his desires, nor she neither. He is grown very inquisitive of late about shepherdesses. Fine doings, indeed! No such doings when I was young. If he wants to examine anybody, why don't he examine me! I'll give him an answer, for him to be as inquisitive as he pleases.

Linco. But I am your kinsman, dame; and you dare trust me, sure. (Speaks loud in her ear.)

Dor. Thou art the best of 'em, that I'll say for thee; but the best of you are bad when a young woman is in the case. I have gone through great difficulties myself, I can assure you, in better times than these. Why must not I go too?

Linco. We shall return to you again—before you can get there. (Loud.)

Syl. You may trust us, mother: my own innocence, and Linco's goodness, will be guard enough

Dor. Eh! what? [for me.

Linco. She says you may trust me with her innocence. (Loud.)

Dor. Well, well, I will then. Thou art a sweet creature, and I love thee better than even I did my own child. (Kisses Sylvia.) When thou art fetched away by him that brought thee, 'twill be a woe-ful day for me. Well, well, go thy ways with Linco. I dare trust thee any where. I'll prepare thy dinner at thy return; and bring my honest kinsman along with you, Linco. We will be with you before you can make the pot boil.

Dor. Before what?

Linco. We will be with you before you can make the pot boil.

[Speaks very loud, and goes off with Sylvia.

Dor. Heaven shield thee, for the sweetest, best creature that ever blessed old age! What a comfort she is to me! All I have to wish for in this world, is to know who thou art, who brought thee to me, and then to see thee as happy as thou hast made poor Dorcas. What can the governor want with her? I wish I had gone too. I'd have talked to him, and to the purpose. We had no such doings when I was a young woman; they never made such a fuss with me.

AIR.—DORCAS.

*When I were young, though now I'm old,
The men were kind and true;
But now they're grown up so false and bold,
What can a woman do?
Now what can a woman do?
For men are truly
So unruly,
I tremble at seventy-two!*

*When I were fair, though now so so,
No hearts were given to rove;
Our pulses beat nor fast nor slow,
But all was faith and love.
Now what can a woman do?
For men are truly
So unruly,
I tremble at seventy-two.* [Exit.

SCENE IV.—The Magistrate's House.

Enter DORUS and DAPHNE.

Dorus. This way, this way, damsel. Now we are alone, I can hear your grievances; and will redress them, that I will. You have my good liking, damsel, and favour follows of course.

Daph. I want words, your honour and worship, to thank you fitly.

Dorus. Smile upon me, damsel; smile and command me. Your hand is whiter than ever, I protest. You must indulge me with a chaste salute. (Kisses her hand.)

Daph. La! your honour. (Courtesies.)

Dorus. You have charmed me, damsel, and I can deny you nothing. Another chaste salute; 'tis a perfect cordial. (Kisses her hand.) Well, what shall I do with this Sylvia, this stranger, this baggage, that has affronted thee? I'll send her where she shall never vex thee again—an impudent wicked—(Kisses her hand.) I'll send her packing this very day; this hand, this lily hand, has signed her fate. (Kisses it.)

Enter LINCO.

Linco. No bribery and corruption, I beg of your honour.

Dorus. You are too bold, Linco. Do your duty, and know your distance. Where is this vagrant, this Sylvia?

Linco. In the justice-chamber, waiting for your honour's commands.

Dorus. Why did not you tell me so?

Linco. I thought your honour better engaged, and that it was too much for you to try two female causes at one time.

Dorus. You thought! I won't have you think, but obey. Deputies must not think for their superiors.

Linco. Must not they? What will become of our poor country! (Going.)

Dorus. No more impertinence, but bring the culprit hither.

Linco. In the twinkling of your honour's eye. [Exit.]

Daph. I leave my griefs in your worship's hands.

Dorus. You leave 'em in my heart, damsel; they soon shall be changed into pleasures. Wait for me in the next room. Smile, damsel, smile upon me, and edge the sword of justice.

Re-enter LINCO, with SYLVIA.

Daph. Here she comes. See how like an innocent she looks—But I'll begone. I trust in your worship. I hate the sight of her; I could tear her eyes out. [Aside, and exit.]

Dorus. (Gazes at Sylvia.) Hem, hem! I am told, young woman—hem, hem! that—She does not look so mischievous as I expected. (Aside, and turning from her.)

Linco. Bear up, sweet shepherdess! your beauty and innocence will put injustice out of countenance. (Apart to Sylvia.)

Syl. The shame of being suspected confounds me, and I can't speak. (Apart.)

Dorus. Where is the old woman, Dorcas, they told me of? Did not I order you to bring her before me?

Linco. The good old woman is so deaf, and your reverence a little thick of hearing, I thought the business would be sooner and better done by the young woman.

Dorus. What, at your thinking again! Young shepherdess, I hear—I hear—hem! Her modesty pleases me. (Aside.) What is the reason, I say—hem! that—that I hear—She has very fine features. I protest she disarms my anger. (Aside, and turning from her.)

Linco. Now is your time; speak to his reverence. (Apart to Sylvia.)

Dorus. Don't whisper the prisoner.

Syl. Prisoner! Am I a prisoner, then?

Dorus. No, not absolutely a prisoner; but you are charged, damsel—hem, hem! charged, damsel—I don't know what to say to her. (Aside.)

Syl. With what, your honour?

Linco. If he begins to damsel us, we have him sure. (Aside.)

Syl. What is my crime?

Linco. A little too handsome, that's all.

Dorus. Hold your peace. Why don't you look up in my face, if you are innocent? (Sylvia looks at Dorus with great modesty.) I can't stand it; she has turned my anger, my justice, and my whole scheme, topsy-turvy. (Aside.) Reach me a chair, Linco.

Linco. One sweet song, Sylvia, before his reverence gives sentence. (Reaches a chair for Dorus.)

AIR.—SYLVIA.

*From duty if the shepherd stray,
And leave his flocks to feed,
The wolf will seize the harmless prey,
And innocence will bleed.* (Kneels.)

Dorus. I'll guard thee, and fold thee too, my lambkin; and they sha'n't hurt thee. This is a melting ditty, indeed! Rise, rise, my Sylvia. (Embraces her.)

Re-enter DAPHNE. Dorus and she start at seeing each other.

Daph. Is your reverence taking leave of her before you drive her out of the country?

Dorus. How now! What presumption is this, to break in upon us so, and interrupt the course of Daph. May I be permitted— [justice?]

Dorus. No, you may not be permitted. I'll come to you presently.

Daph. I knew the wheedling slut would spoil all. [Aside, and exit.]

Dorus. I'm glad she's gone. Linco, you must send her away; I won't see her now.

Linco. And shall I take Sylvia to prison?

Dorus. No, no, no; to prison! mercy forbid! What a sin should I have committed to please that envious, jealous-pated shepherdess! Linco, comfort the damsel. Dry your eyes, Sylvia. I will call upon you myself, and examine Dorcas myself, and protect you myself, and do everything myself. I profess she has bewitched me—I am all agitation. (Aside.) I'll call upon you to-morrow, perhaps to-night, perhaps in half-an-hour. Take care of her, Linco. She has bewitched me; and I shall lose my wits, if I look on her any longer. Oh! the sweet, lovely, delightful creature! [Aside, and exit.]

Linco. Don't whimper now, my sweet Sylvia. Justice has taken up the sword and scales again, and your rivals shall cry their eyes out. The day's our own, so come along.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Another part of the Country.

Enter FATIMA.

Fat. Truly, a very pretty mischievous errand I am sent upon. I am to follow this foolish young fellow all about to find out his haunts: not so foolish neither, for he is so much improved of late, we shrewdly suspect that he must have some female to sharpen his intellects; for love, among many other strange things, can make fools of wits, and wits of fools. I saw our young partridge run before me, and take cover hereabouts; I must make no noise, for fear of alarming him; besides, I hate to disturb the poor things in pairing time. (Looks through the bushes.)

Enter MERLIN, unperceived.

Mer. I shall spoil your peeping, thou evil counsellor of a faithless mistress. I must torment her a little for her good. (Aside.)

Fat. There they are; our fool has made no bad choice. Upon my word, a very pretty couple, and will make my poor lady's heart ache.

Mer. I shall twinge your's a little before we part. (Aside.)

Fat. Well said, Cymon! upon your knees to her! Now for my pocket-book, that I may exactly describe this rival of ours; she is much too handsome to live long; she will be either burnt alive, thrown to wild beasts, or shut up in the black tower; the greatest mercy she can have will be to let her take her choice. (Takes out a pocket-book.)

Mer. May be so; but we will prevent the prophecy if we can. (Aside.)

Fat. (Writes.) "She is of a good height, about my size, a fine shape, delicate features, charming hair, heavenly eyes, not unlike my own; with such a sweet smile!" She must be burnt alive! yes, yes, she must be burnt alive. (Merlin taps her upon the shoulder with his wand.) Who's there? bless me! nobody. I protest it startled me. I must finish my picture. (Writes, and Merlin waves his wand over her head.) Now let me see what I have written. Bless me, what's here? all the letters are as red as blood—my eyes fail me! sure I am bewitched. (Reads and trembles.) "Urganda has a shameful passion for Cymon; Cymon a most virtuous one for Sylvia: as for Fatima, wild beasts, the black tower, and burning alive, are too good for her." (Drops the book.) I have not power to stir a step. I knew what would come of affronting that devil, Merlin. (Merlin becomes visible to her.)

Mer. True, Fatima, and I am here at your call.

Fat. Oh, most magnanimous Merlin! don't set your wit to a poor, foolish, weak woman.

Mer. Why then will a foolish weak woman set her wit to me? but we will be better friends for the future. Mark me, Fatima—(Holds up his wand.)

Fat. No conjuration, I beseech your worship, and you shall do anything with me.

Mer. I want nothing of you but to hold your tongue.

Fat. Will nothing else content your fury?

Mer. Silence, babbler!

Fat. (Finds great difficulty in speaking at first.) I am your own for ever, most merciful Merlin! I am your own for ever. Oh! my poor tongue, I thought I never should have wagged thee again. What a dreadful thing it would be to be dumb.

Mer. You see it is not in the power of Urganda to protect you, or to injure Cymon and Sylvia. I will be their protector against all her arts, though she has leagued herself with the demons of revenge; we have no power but what results from our virtue.

Fat. I had rather lose anything than my speech.

Mer. As you profess yourself my friend (for, with all my art, I cannot see into a woman's mind,) I will shew my gratitude, and my power, by giving your tongue an additional accomplishment.

Fat. What, shall I talk more than ever?

Mer. (Smiles.) That would be no accomplishment, Fatima: no, I mean that you should talk less. When you return to Urganda, she will be very inquisitive, and you very ready to tell her all you know.

Fat. And may I, without offence to your worship?

Mer. Silence, and mark me well—observe me truly and punctually. Every answer you give to Urganda's questions must be confined to two words, yes and no. I have done you a great favour, and you don't perceive it.

Fat. Not very clearly indeed. (Aside.)

Mer. Beware of encroaching a single monosyllable upon my injunction; the moment another word escapes you, you are dumb for ever.

Fat. Heaven preserve me! what will become of me?

Mer. Remember what I say; as you obey or neglect me, you will be punished or rewarded. Farewell. (Bows.) Remember me, Fatima. [Exit.]

Fat. What a polite devil it is; and what a woe!ful plight am I in! this confining my tongue to two words is much worse than being quite dumb; I had rather be stunted in anything than in my speech. Heigho! there never sure was a tax upon the tongue before. [Exit.]

SCENE II.

Enter CYMON.

Cymon. Shall I rejoice or grieve at the change my heart feels? thou hast given me eyes, ears, and understanding; and till they forsake me, I must be Sylvia's. Are the new pains, or the strange delights that agitate me, the greater? Oh! love, it is thy work.

Enter SYLVIA.

She is here; but pensive! Oh! my Sylvia, why this drooping mien? Has not Merlin discovered all that was unknown to us? Has he not promised us his protection? What can Sylvia want, when Cymon is completely blessed?

Syl. Thy wishes are fulfilled then; take my hand, and with it a heart which, till you had touched, never knew, nor could even imagine, what was love.

Cymon. Transporting maid! (Kisses her hand.)

AIR.—SYLVIA.

*This cold flinty heart it is you who have warm'd;
You waken'd my passions, my senses have charm'd;
In vain against merit and Cymon I strove;
What's life without passion—sweet passion of love?*

*The spring should be warm, the young season be gay,
Her birds and her flowrets make blithsome sweet
May;*

*Love blesses the cottage, and sings through the grove,
What's life without passion—sweet passion of love?*

Cymon. Thus then I seize my treasure, will protect it with my life, and will never resign it but to heaven, who gave it to me. (Embraces her.)

Enter DAMON and DORILAS on one side, and DORUS and his followers on the other, who start at seeing CYMON and SYLVIA.

Damon. Here they are!

Syl. Ha! bless me! (Starts.)

Dorus. Fine doings, indeed! (Cymon and Sylvia stand amazed and ashamed.)

Doril. Your humble servant, modest madam Sylvia! [tutor!]

Damon. You are much improved by your new

Dorus. But I'll send her and her tutor where they shall learn better. I am confounded at their assurance! Why don't you speak, culprits?

Cymon. We may be ashamed without guilt; ashamed for those who have watched and surprised us. [dent varlet?]

Dorus. Did you ever hear or see such an impu-

Damon. Shall we seize them, your worship, and drag 'em to Urganda?

Dorus. Let me first speak with that damsel. (As he approaches, Cymon puts her behind him.)

Cymon. That damsel is not to be spoken with.

Dorus. Here's impudence in perfection! Do you know who I am, stripling?

Cymon. I know you to be one stationed by the laws to cherish innocence; but having passions that disgrace both your age and place, you neither observe the one, nor protect the other.

Dorus. I am astonished! What, are you the foolish young fellow I have heard so much of?

Cymon. As sure as you are the wicked old fellow I have heard so much of.

Dorus. Seize them both this instant.

Cymon. That is sooner said than done, governor. (As they approach on both sides to separate them, he snatches a staff from one of the Shepherds, and beats them back.)

Dorus. Fall on him, but don't kill him; for I must make an example of him.

Cymon. In this cause I am myself an army; see how the wretches stare, and cannot stir.

AIR.—CYMON.

Come on, come on,

A thousand to one;

I dare you to come on.

Though unpractis'd and young,

Love has made me stout and strong,

Has given me a charm,

Will not suffer me to fall;

Has steel'd my heart, and nerv'd my arm,

*To guard my precious all. (Looks at Sylvia.)*

Come on, come on, &c.

(Cymon drives off the party of Shepherds on one side. Dorus and his party surround Sylvia.)

Dorus. Away with her, away with her!

Syl. Protect me, Merlin! Cymon! Cymon! where art thou, Cymon?

Dorus. Your fool Cymon is too fond of fighting to mind his mistress; away with her to Urganda, away with her. (They hurry her off.)

Enter Shepherds, running across, disordered and beaten by Cymon.

Damon. 'Tis the devil of a fellow! how he has laid about him! [Looking back. Exit.]

Doril. There is no way but this to avoid him. [Exit.]

Re-enter CYMON, in confusion and out of breath.

Cymon. I have conquered, my Sylvia! Where art thou? my life, my love, my valour, my all? What, gone? torn from me? then I am conquered, indeed! (He runs off, and returns several times during the symphony of the following song.)

AIR.—CYMON.

Torn from me, torn from me: which way did they take her?

*To death they shall bear me,
To pieces shall tear me,
Before I'll forsake her!*

*Though fast bound in a spell,
By Urganda and hell,
I'll burst through their charms,
Seize my fair in my arms;
Then my valour shall prove,
No magic like virtue, like virtue and love!*

SCENE III.—A Palace.

Enter URGANDA and FATIMA.

Urg. Yes! No! Forbear this mockery. What can it mean? I will not bear this trifling with my passion! Why don't you speak? (Fatima shakes her head.) Won't you speak!

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Go on then.

Fat. No.

Urg. Will you say nothing but no?

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Distracting, treacherous Fatima! Have you seen my rival?

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Thanks, dear Fatima! Well, now go on.

Fat. No.

Urg. This is not to be borne. Was Cymon with [her?

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Are they in love with each other?

Fat. Yes. (Sighs.)

Urg. Where did you see my rival? (Fatima shakes her head.) Are you afraid of anybody?

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Are you not afraid of me too?

Fat. No.

Urg. Insolence! Is my rival handsome? tell me [that.]

Fat. Yes.

Urg. Very handsome?

Fat. Yes, yes.

Urg. How handsome? handsomer than I, or you?

Fat. Yes—No—(Hesitating.)

Urg. I shall go distracted! Leave me.

Fat. Yes.

Urg. She has a spell upon her, or she could not do thus. Merlin's power has prevailed—he has enchanted her, and my love and my revenge are equally disappointed. This is the completion of my misery! Bravura, Urganda! Despair and shame confound me.

Enter DORUS.

Dorus. May I presume to intrude upon my sovereign's contemplations?

Urg. Dare not to approach my misery, or thou shalt share it.

Dorus. I am gone; and Sylvia shall go too. (Going.)

Urg. Sylvia, said you? where is she? where is she? Speak, speak; and give me life or death.

Dorus. She is without, and attends your mighty will.

Urg. Then I am a queen again! Forgive me, Dorus, I knew not what I said; but now I am raised again! Sylvia is safe?

Dorus. Yes, and I am safe too; which is no small comfort to me, considering where I have been.

Urg. And Cymon—has he escaped?

Dorus. Yes, he has escaped from us; and, what is better, we have escaped from him.

Urg. Where is he?

Dorus. Breaking the bones of every shepherd he meets.

Urg. Well, no matter; I am in possession of the present object of my passion, and I will indulge it to the height of luxury. Let 'em prepare my victim instantly for death.

Dorus. For death! Is not that going too far?

Urg. Nothing is too far; she makes me suffer ten thousand deaths, and nothing but hers can appease me. (Dorus going.) Stay, Dorus—I have a richer revenge: she shall be shut up in the black tower till her beauties are destroyed, and then I will present her to this ungrateful Cymon. Let her be brought before me, and I will feast my eyes, and ease my heart, with this devoted Sylvia. No reply; but obey.

Dorus. It is done. This is going too far. (Aside.)
[Exit, shrugging up his shoulders.]

Re-enter DORUS, with SYLVIA.

Urg. Are you the wretch, the unhappy maid, who has dared to be the rival of Urganda?

Syl. I am the happy maid who possess the affections of Cymon.

Urg. Thou vain rash creature! I will make thee fear my power, and hope for my mercy. (Waves her wand, and the Scene changes to the Black Rocks.)

Syl. I am still unmoved. (Smiles.)

Urg. Thou art on the very brink of perdition, and in a moment will be closed in a tower, where thou shalt never see Cymon, or any human being more.

Syl. While I have Cymon in my heart, I bear a charm about me, to scorn your power, or, what is more, your cruelty. (Music. Urganda waves her wand, and the Black Tower appears.)

Urg. Open the gates, and enclose her insolence for ever.

Furies enter, who seize Sylvia, and put her in the Tower.

Now let Merlin release you if he can. (It thunders; the Tower sinks, and Merlin appears in the place where the Tower sunk. All shriek, and run off, except Urganda, who is struck with terror.)

Mer. "Still shall my power your arts confound, And Cymon's cure shall be Urganda's wound."

(Urganda waves her wand.)

Wretched Urganda! your power is gone.

Urg. In vain I wave this wand, I feel my power is gone. Thus I destroy the small remains of my sovereignty.

Forgive my errors, and forget my name;

Oh! drive me hence with penitence and shame;

From Merlin, Cymon, Sylvia, let me fly,

Beholding them, my shame can never die. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A splendid Amphitheatre.

A grand entrée of the Knights of different Orders of Chivalry.

CHORUS.

Happy Arcadia still shall be,

Ever happy, while virtuous and free.

[Exeunt.]

A FARCE, IN TWO ACTS.—BY DAVID GARRICK.

Act II.—Scene 2.

CHARACTERS.

LORD MINIKIN
SIR JOHN TROTLEY
COLONEL TIVY

JESSAMY
DAVY

LADY MINIKIN
MISS TITTUP
GYMP

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Lord Minikin's.

Enter LADY MINIKIN and MISS TITTUP.

Lady M. It is not, my dear, that I have the least regard for my lord; I had no love for him before I married him, and you know, matrimony is no breeder of affection; but it hurts my pride, that he should neglect me, and run after other women.

Miss T. But pray, have you made any new discoveries of my lord's gallantry?

Lady M. New discoveries! why, I saw him myself yesterday morning in a hackney-coach, with a minx in a pink cardinal; you shall absolutely burn your's, Tittup, for I shall never bear to see one of that colour again.

Miss T. Sure she does not suspect me. (Aside.) And where was your ladyship, pray, when you saw him?

Lady M. Taking the air with Colonel Tivy in his [carriage.

Miss T. But, my dear Lady Minikin, how can you be so angry that my lord was hurting your pride, as you call it, in the hackney-coach, when you had him so much in your power, in the Colonel's carriage?

Lady M. What, with my lord's friend, and my friend's lover! (Takes her by the hand.) Oh, fie, Tittup!

Miss T. Pooh, pooh! love and friendship are very fine names, to be sure, but they are mere visiting acquaintances: we know their names, indeed; talk of 'em sometimes, and let 'em knock at our doors; but we never let 'em in, you know.

Lady M. I vow, Tittup, you are extremely polite.

Miss T. I am extremely indifferent in these affairs, thanks to my education. We must marry, you know, because other people of fashion marry; but I should think very meanly of myself, if after I were married, I should feel the least concern at all about my husband.

Lady M. I hate to praise myself, and yet I may with truth aver, that no woman of quality ever had, can have, or will have, so consummate a contempt for her lord, as I have for my most honourable and puissant Earl of Minikin, Viscount Perriwinkle, and Baron Titmouse. Ha, ha, ha!

Miss T. But, is it not strange, Lady Minikin, that merely his being your husband should create such indifference? for certainly, in every other eye, his lordship has great accomplishments.

Lady M. Accomplishments! thy head is certainly turned: if you know any of 'em, pray let's have 'em; they are a novelty, and will amuse me.

Miss T. Imprimis, he is a man of quality.

Lady M. Which, to be sure, includes all the cardinal virtues. Poor girl! go on!

Miss T. He is a very handsome man.

Lady M. He has a very bad constitution.

Miss T. He has wit.

Lady M. He is a lord, and a little goes a great [way.

Miss T. He has great good nature.

Lady M. No wonder—he's a fool.

Miss T. And then his fortune, you'll allow—

Lady M. Was a great one—but he games, and, if fairly, he's undone; if not, he deserves to be hanged; and so, exit my Lord Minikin. And now, let your wise uncle, and my good cousin Sir John Trotley, Baronet, enter; where is he, pray?

Miss T. In his own room, I suppose, reading pamphlets and newspapers against the enormities of the times; if he stays here a week longer, notwithstanding my expectations from him, I shall certainly affront him.

Lady M. I am a great favourite; but it is impossible much longer to act up to his very righteous idea of things. Is it not pleasant to hear him abuse everybody, and everything, and yet always finishing with a "You'll excuse me, cousin!" Ha, ha, ha!

Miss T. What do you think the Goth said to me yesterday? One of the knots of his tie hanging down his left shoulder, and his fringed cravat nicely twisted down his breast, and thrust through his gold button-hole, which looked exactly like my little Barbet's head in his gold collar:—"Niece Tittup," cries he, drawing himself up, "I protest against this manner of conducting yourself both at home and abroad."—"What are your objections, Sir John?" answered I, a little pertly.—"Various and manifold," replied he; "I have no time to enumerate particulars now, but I will venture to prophecy, if you keep whirling round the vortex of pantheons, operas, festinos, coteries, masquerades, and all the devilades in this town, your head will be giddy, down you will fall, lose the name of Lucretia, and be called nothing but Tittup ever after. You'll excuse me, cousin!" and so he left me.

Lady M. Oh, the barbarian!

Enter GYMP.

Gymp. A card, your ladyship, from Mrs. Pewitt.

Lady M. Poor Pewitt! If she can but be seen at public places, with a woman of quality; she's the happiest of plebeians. (Reads the card.) "Mrs. Pewitt's respects to Lady Minikin, and Miss Tittup; hopes to have the pleasure of attending them to Lady Filligree's ball this evening. Lady Daisey sees masks." We'll certainly attend her. Gymp. put some message-cards upon my toilet, I'll send her an answer immediately; and tell one of my footmen, that he must make some visits for me to-day, again, and send me a list of those he made yesterday: he must be sure to call at Lady Pettitoes, and if she should unluckily be at home, he must say that he came to inquire after her sprained ancle.

[Exit Gymp.]

Miss T. Ay, ay, give our compliments to her sprained ancle.

Lady M. That woman's so fat, she'll never get well of it; and I am resolved not to call at her door myself, till I am sure of not finding her at home. I am horribly low spirited to-day. Do send your Colonel to play at chess with me: since he belonged to you, Titty, I have taken a kind of liking to him; I like everything that loves my Titty.

Miss T. I know you do, my dear lady.

Lady M. That sneer I don't like; if she suspects, I shall hate her. (Aside.) Well, dear Titty, I'll go and write my cards, and dress for the masquerade, and if that won't raise my spirits, you must assist me to plague my lord a little. [Exit.]

Miss T. Yes, and I'll plague my lady a little, or I am much mistaken. My lord shall know every tittle that has passed. What a poor, blind, half-witted, self-conceited creature this dear friend and relation of mine is! and what a fine, spirited, gallant soldier my Colonel is! My Lady Minikin likes him, he likes my fortune; my lord likes me, and I like my lord; however, not so much as he imagines, or to play the fool so rashly as he may expect. What a great revolution in this family, in the space of fifteen months! We went out of England, a very awkward, regular, good English family; but half-a-year in France, and a winter passed in the warmer climate of Italy, have ripened our minds to every refinement of ease, dissipation, and pleasure.

Enter COLONEL TIVY.

Col. T. May I hope, madam, that your humble servant had some share in your last reverie?

Miss T. How is it possible to have the least knowledge of Colonel Tivy, and not make him the principal object of one's reflections?

Col. T. That man must have very little feeling and taste, who is not proud of a place in the thoughts of the finest woman in Europe.

Miss T. Oh fie, Colonel!

[say.]

Col. T. By my honour, madam, I mean what I

Miss T. By your honour, Colonel! why will you pass off your counters to me? Don't I know that you fine gentlemen regard no honour but that which is given at the gaming table? and which indeed ought to be the only honour you should make free with.

Col. T. How can you, miss, treat me so cruelly? Have I not absolutely foresworn dice, mistress, everything, since I dared to offer myself to you?

Miss T. Yes, Colonel: and when I dare to receive you, you may return to everything again, and not violate the laws of the present happy matrimonial establishment.

Col. T. Give me but your consent, madam, and your life to come—

Miss T. Do you get my consent, Colonel, and I'll take care of my life to come.

Col. T. How shall I get your consent?

Miss T. By getting me in the humour.

Col. T. But how to get you in the humour?

Miss T. Oh! there are several ways; I am very good-natured.

Col. T. Are you in the humour now?

Miss T. Try me.

Col. T. How shall I?

Miss T. How shall I?—you a soldier, and not know the art military? How shall I?—I'll tell you how: when you have a subtle, treacherous, polite enemy to deal with, never stand shilly-shally, and lose your time in treaties and parlies, but cock your hat, draw your sword; march, beat drum,—dub, dub, a-dub—present, fire, puff puff,—'tis done! they fly, they yield—Victoria! Victoria! (Running off.)

Col. T. Stay, stay, my dear, dear angel! (Bringing her back.)

Miss T. No, no, no; I have no time to be killed now: besides, Lady Minikin is in the vapours, and wants you at chess, and my lord is low-spirited, and wants me at picquet; my uncle is in an ill-humour, and wants me to discard you, and go with him into the country.

Col. T. And will you, miss?

Miss T. Will I!—no, I never do as I am bid: but you ought; so go to my lady.

Col. T. Nay, but, miss—

Miss T. Nay, but, Colonel, if you won't obey your commanding officer, you should be broke, and then my maid won't accept of you; so march, Colonel!—lookye, sir! I will command before marriage, and do what I please afterwards, or I have been well educated to very little purpose. [Exit.]

Col. T. What a mad devil it is! Now, if I had the least affection for the girl, I should be d—ly vexed at this! But she has a fine fortune, and I must have her if I can. Tol, lol, lol, &c. [Exit.]

Enter SIR JOHN TROTLEY and DAVY.

Sir J. Hold your tongue, Davy; you talk like a fool.

Davy. It is a fine place, your honour, and I would live here for ever.

Sir J. More shame for you. Live here for ever! What, among thieves and pickpockets? What a revolution since my time! the more I see, the more I've cause for lamentation! what a dreadful change has time brought about in twenty years! I should not have known the place again, nor the people. All the signs, that made so noble an appearance, are all taken down; not a bob or a tie-wig to be seen; all the degrees, from the Parade in St. James's Park, to the stool and brush at the corner of every street, have their hair tied up—and that's the reason so many heads are tied up every month.

Davy. I shall have my head tied up to-morrow; Mr. Wisp will do it for me; your honour and I look like Philistines among them.

Sir J. And I shall break your head if it is tied up; I hate innovations; all confusion, and no distinction! The streets now are as smooth as a turn-pike-road! no ratling and exercise in the hackney-coaches; those who ride in them are all fast asleep; and they have strings in their hands, that the coachman must pull to wake them when they are to be set down: what luxury and abomination!

Davy. Is it so, your honour; 'feckins, I like it hugely.

Sir J. But you must hate and detest London.

Davy. How can I manage that, your honour, when there is everything to delight my eye, and cherish my heart?

Sir J. 'Tis all deceit and delusion.

Davy. Such crowding, coaching, carting, and squeezing; such a power of fine sights: fine shops full of fine things; and then such fine illuminations all of a row! and such fine dainty ladies in the streets, so civil and so graceless: they talk of country girls; these here look more healthy and rosy by half.

Sir J. Sirrah! they are prostitutes: and are civil to delude and destroy you.

Davy. Bless us, bless us! How does your honour know all this? Were they as bad in your time?

Sir J. Not by half, Davy: in my time, there was a sort of decency in the worst of women; but the harlots now watch like tigers for their prey; and drag you to their dens of infamy.—See, Davy, how they have torn my neckcloth. (Shews his neckcloth.)

Davy. If you had gone civilly, your honour, they would not have hurt you.

Sir J. Well, we'll get away as fast as we can.

Davy. Not this month, I hope; for I have not had half my bellyful yet.

Sir J. I'll knock you down, Davy, if you grow profligate; you sha'n't go out again to night, and to-morrow keep in my room, and stay till I can look over my things, and see they don't cheat you.

Davy. Your honour then won't keep your word with me?

Sir J. Why, what did I promise you?

Davy. That I should take sixpen'oth at one of the theatres to-night, and a shilling place at the other to-morrow. [piece, Davy?]

Sir J. Well, well, so I did. Is it a moral

Davy. Oh! yes, and written by a clergyman; it is called the "Rival Cannanites; or the Tragedy of Braggadocia."

Sir J. Be a good lad, and I won't be worse than my word; there's money for you. (Gives him money.) But come straight home, for I shall want to go to bed.

Davy. To be sure, your honour—as I am to go so soon, I'll make a night of it. [Aside, and exit.]

Sir J. This fellow would turn rake and macaroni if he were to stay here a week longer. Bless me, what dangers are in this town at every step! My niece, Lucretia, is so be-fashioned and be-devilled, that nothing, I fear, can save her; however, to ease my conscience, I must try; but what can be expected from the young women of these times, but sallow looks, wild schemes, saucy words, and loose morals! They lie a-bed all day, sit up all night; if they are silent, they are gaming, and if they talk, 'tis either scandal or infidelity; and that they may look what they are, their heads are all feather, and round their necks are twisted rattle-snake tippets. O tempora, O mores! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Lord Minikin's Dressing-room.

LORD MINIKIN discovered in his dressing-gown, with JESSAMY and MIGNON.

Lord M. Pr'ythee, Mignon, don't plague me any more; dost think that a nobleman's head has nothing to do but be tortured all day under thy infernal fingers? Give me my clothes.

Mignon. Ven you lose your money, my lor, you no goot humour; the devil may dress your cheveu for me! [Exit.]

Lord M. That fellow's an impudent rascal; but he's a genius, so I must bear with him. Oh, my head!—a chair, Jessamy! I must absolutely change my wine-merchant; I can't taste his champagne without disordering myself for a week. Heigho!

Enter MISS TITTUP.

Miss T. What makes you sigh, my lord?

Lord M. Because you were so near me, child.

Miss T. Indeed! I should rather have thought my lady had been with you. By your looks, my lord, I am afraid Fortune jilted you last night.

Lord M. No, faith; our champagne was not good yesterday, and I am vapoured like our English November; but one glance of my Tittup can dispel vapours like—like—

Miss T. Like something very fine, to be sure: but pray keep your simile for the next time; and harkye! a little prudence will not be amiss; Mr. Jessamy will think you mad, and me worse. (Half aside.)

Jes. Oh! pray don't mind me, madam.

Lord M. Gadso! Jessamy, look out my domino, and I'll ring the bell when I want you.

Jes. I shall, my lord. Miss thinks that everybody is blind in the house but herself.

[Aside, and exit.]

Miss T. Upon my word, my lord, you must be a little more prudent, or we shall become the town-talk.

Lord M. And so I will, my dear; and therefore, to prevent surprise, I'll lock the door.

Miss T. What do you mean, my lord?

Lord M. Prudence, child, prudence; I keep all my jewels under lock and key.

Miss T. You are not in possession yet, my lord. I cannot stay two minutes; I only came to tell you that Lady Minikin saw us yesterday, in the hackney-coach: she did not know me, I believe; she pretends to be greatly uneasy at your neglect of her; she certainly has some mischief in her head.

Lord M. No intentions, I hope, of being fond of me?

Miss T. No, no, make yourself easy; she hates you most unalterably.

Lord M. You have given me spirits again.

Miss T. Her pride is alarmed, that you should prefer any of the sex to her.

Lord M. Her pride, then, has been alarmed ever since I had the honour of knowing her.

Miss T. But, dear my lord, let us be merry and wise; should she ever be convinced that we have a tendre for each other, she certainly would proclaim it, and then—

Lord M. We should be envied, and she would be laughed at, my sweet cousin.

Miss T. Nay, I would have her mortified too; for though I love her ladyship sincerely, I cannot say but I love a little mischief as sincerely; but, then, if my uncle Trotley should know of our affairs, he is so old-fashioned, prudish, and out-of-the-way, he would either strike me out of his will, or insist upon my quitting the house.

Lord M. My good cousin is a queer mortal, that's certain; I wish we could get him handsomely into the country again. He has a fine fortune to leave behind him.

Miss T. But then he lives so regularly, and never makes use of a physician, that he may live these twenty years.

Lord M. What can we do with the barbarian?

Miss T. I don't know what's the matter with me, but I am really in fear of him; I suppose, reading his formal books when I was in the country with him, and going so constantly to church, with my elbows stuck to my hips, and my toes turned in, have given me these foolish prejudices.

Lord M. Then you must affront him, or you'll never get the better of him.

Sir J. (Knocking without.) My lord, my lord, are you busy? [uncle!]

Miss T. Heavens! 'tis that detestable brute, my Lord M. That horrid dog, my cousin!

Miss T. What shall we do, my lord?

Sir J. Nay, my lord, my lord, I heard you; pray let me speak with you.

Lord M. Oh! Sir John, is it you? I beg your pardon, I'll put up my papers, and open the door.

Miss T. Stay, stay, my lord; I would not meet him now for the world; if he sees me here alone with you, he'll rave like a madman: put me up the chimney; any where.

Lord M. (Aloud.) I'm coming, Sir John! Here, here! get behind my great chair; he sha'n't see you, and you may see all; I'll be short and pleasant with him. (Puts her behind the chair, and opens the door.)

Enter SIR JOHN.—(During this scene Lord Minkin turns the chair, as Sir John moves, to conceal Miss T.)

Sir J. You'll excuse me, my lord, that I have broken in upon you: I heard you talking pretty loud. What have you nobody with you? what were you about, cousin? (Looking about.)

Lord M. A particular affair, Sir John: I always lock myself up to study my speeches, and speak them aloud for the sake of the tone and action.

Sir J. (Sits down.) Ay, ay, 'tis the best way. I am sorry I disturbed you; you'll excuse me, cousin!

Lord M. I am rather obliged to you, Sir John; intense application to these things ruins my health; but one must do it for the sake of the nation.

Sir J. May be so: I hope the nation will be the better for't—you'll excuse me!

Lord M. Excuse me, Sir John: I love your frankness. But why won't you be franker still? we have always something for dinner, and you will never dine at home.

Sir J. You must know, my lord, that I love to know what I eat;—I hate to travel, where I don't know my way: and since you have brought in foreign fashions and figaries, everything and everybody are in masquerade: your men and manners, too, are as much frittered and fricasied, as your beef and mutton; I love a plain dish, my lord. But to the point; I came, my lord, to open my mind to you about my niece Tittup; shall I do it freely?

Lord M. The freer the better; Tittup's a fine girl, cousin, and deserves all the kindness you can shew her. (Lord M. and Miss T. make signs at each other.)

Sir J. She must deserve it, though, before she shall have it; and I would have her begin with lengthening her petticoats, covering her shoulders, and wearing a cap upon her head.

Lord M. Don't you think a taper leg, falling shoulders, and fine hair, delightful objects, Sir John?

Sir J. And therefore ought to be concealed; 'tis their interest to conceal them; when you take from the men the pleasure of imagination, there will be a scarcity of husbands; and then taper legs, falling shoulders, and fine hair, may be had for nothing.

Lord M. Well said, Sir John. Ha, ha!—your niece shall wear a horseman's coat and jack-boots to please you. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir J. You may sneer, my lord; but for all that, I think my niece in a bad way; she must leave me and the country, forsooth, to travel and see good company and fashions; I have seen them too, and wish from my heart that she is not much the worse for the journey—you'll excuse me.

Lord M. But why in a passion, Sir John? Don't you think that my lady and I shall be able and willing to put her into the road?

Sir J. Zounds! my lord, you are out of it yourself. This comes of your travelling; all the town know how you and my lady live together; and I must tell you—you'll excuse me,—that my niece suffers by the bargain; prudence, my lord, is a very fine thing.

Lord M. So is a long neckcloth nicely twisted into a button-hole; but I don't choose to wear one—you'll excuse me!

Sir J. I wish that he who first changed long neckcloths for such things as you wear, had the wearing of a twisted neckcloth that I would give him. (Rises.)

Lord M. Pr'ythee, baronet, don't be so horridly out-of-the-way; prudence is a very vulgar virtue, and so incompatible with our present ease and refinement, that a prudent man of fashion is now as great a miracle as a pale woman of quality; we got rid of our mauvais honte, at the same time that we imported our neighbour's rouge and their morals.

Sir J. Did you ever hear the like! I am not surprised, my lord, that you think so lightly, and talk so vainly, who are so polite a husband: your lady, my cousin, is a fine woman, and brought you a fine fortune, and deserves better usage.

Lord M. Will you have her, Sir John? she is much at your service.

Sir J. Profligate! What did you marry her for, my lord?

Lord M. Convenience. Marriage is not, now-a-days, an affair of inclination, but convenience; and they who marry for love, and such old-fashioned stuff, are to me as ridiculous as those that advertise for an agreeable companion in a post-chaise.

Sir J. I have done, my lord; Miss Tittup shall either return with me into the country, or not a penny shall she have from Sir John Trotley, Baronet. (Whistles and walks about.) Pray, my lord, what husband is this you have provided for her?

Lord M. A friend of mine; a man of wit, and a fine gentleman.

Sir J. May be so, and yet make a d—d bad husband for all that. You'll excuse me! What estate has he, pray?

Lord M. He's a colonel; his elder brother, Sir Tan Tivy, will certainly break his neck, and then my friend will be a happy man.

Sir J. Here's morals! a happy man when his brother has broken his neck! A happy man! Mercy on me!

Lord M. Why, he'll have six thousand a year, Sir John—

Sir J. I don't care what he'll have, nor I don't care what he is, nor who my niece marries; she is a fine lady, and let her have a fine gentleman; I sha'n't hinder her. I'll away into the country to-morrow, and leave you to your fine doings; I have no relish for them, not I; I can't live among you, nor game with you; I hate cards and dice; I will neither rob nor be robbed; I am contented with what I have, and am very happy, my lord, though my brother has not broken his neck—you'll excuse me! [Exit.]

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha! Come, fox, come out of your hole! Ha, ha, ha!

Miss T. Indeed, my lord, you have undone me; not a foot shall I have of Trotley Manor, that's positive! But no matter, there's no danger of his breaking his neck, so I'll e'en make myself happy with what I have, and behave to him for the future, as if he were a poor relation.

Lord M. (Kneeling and kissing her hand.) I must kneel and adore you for your spirit, my sweet, heavenly Lucretia!

Re-enter SIR JOHN.

Sir J. (Starts.) One thing I had forgot—

Miss T. Ha! he's here again!

Sir J. Why, what the devil!—Heigho! my niece Lucretia, and my virtuous lord, studying speeches for the good of the nation. Yes, yes, you have been making fine speeches, indeed, my lord; and your arguments have prevailed, I see. I beg your pardon, I did not mean to interrupt your studies—you'll excuse me, my lord!

Lord M. (Smiling and mocking him.) You'll excuse me, Sir John!

Sir J. Oh! yes, my lord; but I'm afraid the devil won't excuse you at the proper time. Miss Lucretia, how do you, child? You are to be married soon: I wish the gentleman joy, Miss Lucretia; he is a happy man to be sure, and will want nothing but the breaking of his brother's neck to be completely so.

Miss T. Upon my word, uncle, you are always putting bad constructions upon things; my lord has been soliciting me to marry his friend—and having that moment—extorted a consent from me—he was thanking—and—and—wishing me joy—in his foolish manner. (Hesitating.)

Sir J. Is that all! But how came you here, child? Did you fly down from the chimney, or in at the window? for I don't remember seeing you when I was here before.

Miss T. How can you talk so, Sir John? You really confound me with your suspicions; and then you ask so many questions, and I have so many things to do, that—that—upon my word, if I don't make haste, I sha'n't get my dress ready for the ball, so I must run. You'll excuse me, uncle!

[Exit, running.]

Sir J. A fine hopeful young lady that, my lord.

Lord M. She's well bred, and has wit.

Sir J. She has wit and breeding enough to laugh at her relations, and bestow favours on your lordship; but I must tell you plainly, my lord, you'll excuse me, that your marrying your lady, my cousin, to use her ill, and sending for my niece, your cousin, to debauch her—

Lord M. You're warm, Sir John, and don't know the world; and I never contend with ignorance and passion. Live with me some time, and you'll be satisfied of my honour and good intentions to you and your family; in the meantime, command my house. I must away immediately to Lady Filligree's; and I am sorry you won't make one with us. Here, Jessamy, give me my domino, and call a chair; and don't let my uncle want for anything. You'll excuse me, Sir John. Tol, lol, de rol, &c.

[Exit, singing.]

Sir J. The world's at an end! Here's fine work! here are precious doings! This lord is a pillar of the state, too! no wonder that the building is in danger with such rotten supporters. Heigho! And then, my poor Lady Minikin, what a friend and husband she is blessed with! Let me consider—should I tell the good woman of these pranks, I may only make more mischief, and, mayhap, go near to kill her, for she's as tender as she's virtuous. Poor lady! I'll e'en go and comfort her directly, and endeavour to draw her from the wickedness of this town into the country, where she shall have reading, fowling, and fishing, to keep up her spirits; and when I die, I will leave her that part of my fortune with which I intended to reward the virtues of Miss Lucretia Tittup, with a plague to her!

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—Lady Minikin's Apartment.

LADY MINIKIN and COLONEL TIVY discovered.

Lady M. Don't urge it, Colonel; I can't think of coming home from the masquerade this evening; though I should pass for my niece, it would make an uproar among the servants; and, perhaps, from the mistake, break off your match with Tittup.

Col. T. My dear Lady Minikin, you know my marriage with your niece is only a secondary consideration; my first and principal object is you—you, madam: therefore, my dear lady, give me your promise to leave the ball with me. You must, Lady Minikin; a bold young fellow and a soldier, as I am, ought not to be kept from plunder when the town has capitulated.

Lady M. But it has not capitulated, and, perhaps, never will; however, Colonel, since you are so furious, I must come to terms, I think. Keep your eyes upon me at the ball; I think I may expect that; and when I drop my handkerchief, 'tis your signal for pursuing. I shall get home as fast as I can, you may follow me as fast as you can: Gyp will let us in the back way—No, no! my heart misgives me!

Col. T. Then I am miserable!

Lady M. Nay, rather than you should be miserable, Colonel, I will indulge your martial spirit: meet me in the field; there's my gauntlet. (Throws down her glove.)

Col. T. (Seizing her.) Thus I accept your sweet challenge; and, if I fail you, may I hereafter, both in love and war, be branded with the name of coward. (Kneels, and kisses her hand.)

Enter SIR JOHN TROTLEY.

Sir J. May I presume, cousin—

Lady M. Ha! (Squalls.)

Sir J. Mercy upon us! what are we at now?

Lady M. How can you be so rude, Sir John, to come into a lady's room without first knocking at the door? You have frightened me out of my wits.

Sir J. I am sure you have frightened me out of mine.

Col. T. Such rudeness deserves death.

Sir J. Death, indeed! for I never shall recover myself again. All pigs of the same sty! all studying for the good of the nation! (Aside.)

Lady M. We must soothe him, and not provoke him. (Apart to the Colonel.)

Col. T. I would cut his throat, if you'd permit me. (Apart to Lady M.)

Sir J. The devil has got his hoof in the house, and has corrupted the whole family; I'll get out of it as fast as I can, lest he should lay hold of me, too. (Going.)

Lady M. Sir John, I must insist upon your not going away in a mistake.

Sir J. No mistake, my lady; I am thoroughly convinced. Mercy on me!

Lady M. I must beg you, Sir John, not to make any wrong constructions upon this accident. You must know, that the moment you was at the door, I had promised the Colonel no longer to be his enemy in his designs upon Miss Tittup; this threw him into such a rapture, that upon my promising my interest with you, and wishing him joy, he fell upon his knees, and—and—(laughing)—ha, ha, ha!

Col. T. Ha, ha, ha! Yes, yes, I fell upon my knees, and—and—

Sir J. Ay, ay; fell upon your knees, and—and—ha, ha! A very good joke, 'faith! and the best of it is, that they are wishing joy all over the house upon the same occasion: and my lord is wishing joy; and I wish him joy, and you, with all my heart.

Lady M. Upon my word, Sir John, your cruel suspicions affect me strongly; and though my resentment is curbed by my regard, my tears cannot be restrained; 'tis the only resource my innocence has left. [Exit.]

Col. T. I reverence you, sir, as a relation to that lady; but, as her slanderer, I detest you. Her tears must be dried, and my honour satisfied: you know what I mean; take your choice—time, place, sword, or pistol; consider it calmly, and determine as you please. I am a soldier, Sir John. [Exit.]

Sir J. Very fine, truly! and so, between the crocodile and the bully, my throat is to be cut: they are guilty of all sorts of iniquity, and when they are discovered, no humility, no repentance! The ladies have recourse to their tongues or their tears, and the gallants to their swords. That I may not be drawn in by the one, or drawn upon by the other, I'll hurry into the country while I retain my senses, and can sleep in a whole skin. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Lord Minikin's.

Enter SIR JOHN TROTLEY and JESSAMY.

Sir J. There is no bearing this! what a land are we in! Upon my word, Mr. Jessamy, you should look well to the house; there are certainly rogues about it: for I did but cross the way just now to the pamphlet-shop, to buy a Touch at the Times, and they had a pluck at my watch; but I heard of their tricks, and had it sewed to my pocket.

Jes. Don't be alarmed, Sir John, 'tis a very common thing; and if you walk the streets without convoy, you will be picked up by privateers of all kinds. Ha, ha!

Sir J. Not be alarmed when I am robbed! Why, they might have cut my throat. I sha'n't sleep a wink all night; so, pray, lend me some weapon of defence; for I am sure, if they attack me in the open street, they'll be with me at night again.

Jes. I'll lend you my duelling-pistols, Sir John. Be assured there's no danger; there's robbing and murder cried every night under my window; but it no more disturbs me, than the ticking of my watch at my bed's head.

Sir J. Well, well; be that as it will, I must be upon guard. What a dreadful place this is! but 'tis all owing to the corruption of the times; the great folks game, and the poor folks rob; no wonder that murder ensues. Sad, sad, sad! Well, let me but get over to-night, and I'll leave this den of thieves to-morrow. How long will your lord and lady stay at this masking and mummery before they come home?

Jes. 'Tis impossible to say the time, sir; that merely depends upon the spirits of the company, and the nature of the entertainment; for my own part, I generally make it myself till four or five in the morning.

Sir J. Why, what the devil, do you make one at these masqueradings?

Jes. I seldom miss, sir; I may venture to say that nobody knows the trim and small talk of the place better than I do: I was always reckoned an incomparable mask.

Sir J. Thou art an incomparable coxcomb, I am sure. (Aside.)

Jes. An odd, ridiculous accident happened to me at a masquerade three years ago; I was in tip-top spirits, and had drunk a little too freely of the champagne, I believe—

Sir J. You'll be hanged, I believe. (Aside.)

Jes. Wit flew about—in short, I was in spirits: at last, from drinking and rattling, to vary the pleasure, we went to dancing; and who do you think I danced a minuet with? He, he, he! Pray, guess, Sir John.

Sir J. Danced a minuet with! (Aside.)

Jes. My own lady, that's all. The eyes of the whole assembly were upon us; my lady dances well, and I believe I am pretty tolerable: after the dance I was running into a little coquetry and small talk with her.

Sir J. With your lady? Chaos is come again! (Aside.)

Jes. With my lady. But, upon my turning my hand thus, (conceitedly) egad! she caught me; whispered me who I was. I would fain have laughed her out of it, but it would not do: "No, no, Jessamy," says she, "I am not to be deceived: pray, wear gloves for the future; for you may as well go barefaced, as shew that hand and diamond ring."

Sir J. What a sink of iniquity! Prostitution on all sides, from the lord to the pickpocket. (Aside.) Pray, Mr. Jessamy, among your other virtues, I suppose you game a little, eh! Mr. Jessamy?

Jes. A little whist or so: but I am tied up from the dice; I must never touch a box again.

Sir J. I wish you were tied up somewhere else. (Aside.) I shall go to my room: and let my lord and lady, and my niece Tittup know, that I beg they will excuse ceremony; that I must be up and gone before they go to bed; that I have a most profound respect and love for them, and—and that I hope we shall never see one another again as long as we live.

Jes. I shall certainly obey your commands. What poor ignorant wretches these country gentlemen are! (Aside, and exit.)

Sir J. If I stay in this place another day, it would throw me into a fever. Oh! I wish it were morning! This comes of visiting my relations! [Enter DAVY, drunk.] So, you wicked wretch, you! where have you been, and what have you been doing?

Davy. Merry-making, your honour. London for ever.

Sir J. And did I not order you not to make a jackanapes of yourself and tie your hair up like a monkey?

Davy. And, therefore, I did it: no pleasing the ladies without this. My lord's servants call you an old out-of-fashioned codger, and have taught me what's what.

Sir J. Here's an imp of the devil! He is undone, and will poison the whole country. Sirrah, get everything ready; I'll be going directly.

Davy. To bed, sir? I want to go to bed myself, sir. [sirrah!]

Sir J. Why, how now! you are drunk, too,

Davy. I am a little, your honour; because I have been drinking.

Sir J. That is not all: but you have been in bad company, sirrah!

Davy. Indeed, your honour's mistaken; I never kept such good company in all my life.

Sir J. The fellow does not understand me. Where have you been, you drunkard?

Davy. Drinking, to be sure, if I am a drunkard; and if you had been drinking, too, as I have been, you would not be in such a passion with a body; it makes one so good-natured.

Sir J. There is another addition to my misfortunes! I shall have this fellow carry into the country as many vices as will corrupt the whole parish. [ship.]

Davy. I'll take what I can, to be sure, your wor-

Sir J. Get away, you beast, you! and sleep off the debanchery you have contracted this fortnight, or I shall leave you behind, as a proper person to make one of his lordship's family.

Davy. So much the better: give me more wages, less work, and the key of the ale-cellar, and I am your servant; if not, provide yourself with another. (Struts about.)

Sir J. Here's a reprobate! This is the completion of my misery! But, harkye, villain! go to bed, and sleep off your iniquity, and then pack up the things, or I'll pack you off to Newgate, and transport you for life, you rascal, you! [Exit.]

Davy. That for you, old codger! (Snapping his fingers.) I know the law better than to be frightened with moonshine. I wish that I were to live here all my days. This is life, indeed! a servant lives up to his eyes in clover; they have wages, and board wages, and nothing to do, but to grow fat and saucy: they are as happy as their master; they play for ever at cards, swear like emperors, drink like fishes, and go a-wenching with as much ease and tranquillity, as if they were going to a sermon. Oh! 'tis a fine life! [Exit, reeling.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber in Lord Minikin's house.

Enter LORD MINIKIN and MISS TITTUP, in masquerade dresses, lighted by JESSAMY.

Lord M. Set down the candles, Jessamy; and should your lady come home, let me know. Be sure you are not out of the way.

Jes. I have lived too long with your lordship to need the caution. Who the devil have we got now? but that's my lord's business, and not mine. [Exit.]

Miss T. (Pulling off her mask.) Upon my word, my lord, this coming home so soon from the masquerade is very imprudent, and will certainly be observed. I am most inconceivably frightened, I can assure you. My uncle Trotley has a light in his room; the accident this morning will certainly keep him upon the watch. Pray, my lord, let us defer our meetings till he goes into the country. I find that my English heart, though it has ventured so far, grows fearful, and awkward to practise the freedoms of warmer climes. (Lord M. takes her by the hand.) If you will not desist, my lord, we are separated for ever. The sight of the precipice turns my head; I have been giddy with it too long, and must turn from it while I can. Pray, be quiet, my lord, I will meet you to-morrow.

Lord M. To-morrow! 'tis an age in my situation. Let the weak, bashful, coyish winner be intimidated with these faint alarms; but let the bold experienced lover kindle at the danger, and, like the eagle in the midst of storms, thus pounce upon his prey. (Takes hold of her.)

Miss T. Dear Mr. Eagle, be merciful; pray, let the poor pigeon fly for this once.

Lord M. If I do, my dove, may I be cursed to have my wife as fond of me, as I am now of thee. (Offers to kiss her.)

Jes. (Without, knocking.) My lord, my lord!

Miss T. (Screams.) Ah!

Lord M. Who's there?

Jes. (Peeping.) 'Tis I, my lord; may I come in?

Lord M. D—n the fellow! What's the matter?

Jes. Nay, not much, my lord; only my lady's come home.

Miss T. Then I'm undone! What shall I do? I'll run into my own room.

Lord M. Then she may meet you.

Jes. There's a dark deep closet, my lord. Miss may hide herself there.

Miss T. For heaven's sake! put me into it; and when her ladyship's safe, let me know, my lord. What an escape have I had! (Goes into the closet.)

Lord M. The moment her evil spirit is laid, I'll let my angel out. Lock the door on the inside. Come softly to my room, Jessamy.

Jes. If a board creaks, your lordship shall never be liberal to me again. [Exeunt, on tiptoe.]

Enter GYMP, lighting in LADY MINIKIN and COLONEL TIVY, in masquerade dresses.

Gymp. Pray, my lady, go no farther with the Colonel; I know you mean nothing but innocence; but I'm sure there will be bloodshed, for my lord is certainly in the house. I'll take my affidavit that I heard—

Col. T. It can't be, I tell you; we left him this moment at the masquerade: I spoke to him before I came out.

Lady M. He's too busy, and too well employed to think of home. But don't tremble so, Gymp. There is no harm, I assure you. The Colonel is to marry my niece, and it is proper to settle some matters relating to it—they are left to us.

Gymp. Yes, yes, madam, to be sure, it is proper that you talk together. I know you mean nothing but innocence; but, indeed, there will be bloodshed.

Col. T. The girl's a fool. I have no sword by my side.

Gymp. But my lord has, and you may kill one another with that. I know you mean nothing but innocence; but I certainly heard him go up the back-stairs into his own room, talking with Jessamy.

Lady M. 'Tis impossible but the girl must have fancied this. Can't you ask Whisp, or Mignon, if their master is come in?

Gymp. Lud! my lady, they are always drunk before this, and asleep in the kitchen.

Lady M. This frightened fool has made me as ridiculous as herself. Hark! Colonel, I'll swear there is something upon the stairs. Now I am in the field I find I am a coward.

Gymp. There will certainly be bloodshed.

Col. T. I'll slip down with Gymp this back way, then. (Going.)

Gymp. Oh, dear! my lady, there is something coming up them, too.

Col. T. Zounds! I've got between two fires!

Lady M. Run into the closet.

Col. T. (Runs to the closet.) There's no retreat; the door is locked.

Lady M. Behind the chimney-board, Gymp.

Col. T. I shall certainly be taken prisoner. (Gets behind the chimney-board.) You'll let me know when the enemy's decamped.

Lady M. Leave that to me. Do you, Gymp, go down the back-stairs, and leave me to face my lord; I think I can match him at hypocrisy. (Sits down.)

Enter LORD MINIKIN.

Lord M. What, is your ladyship so soon returned from Lady Fillagree's?

Lady M. I am sure, my lord, I ought to be more surprised at your being here so soon, when I saw you so well entertained in a tête-à-tête with a lady in crimson: such sights, my lord, will always drive me from my most favourite amusements.

Lord M. (Seated.) You find, at least, that the lady, whoever she was, could not engage me to stay, when I found your ladyship had left the ball.

Lady M. Your lordship's sneering upon my unhappy temper may be a proof of your wit, but it is none of your humanity; and this behaviour is as great an insult upon me, as even your falsehood itself. (Pretends to weep.)

Lord M. Nay, my dear Lady Minikin, if you are resolved to play tragedy, I shall roar away too, and pull out my cambric handkerchief.

Lady M. I think, my lord, we had better retire to our apartments; my weakness and your brutality will only expose us to the servants. Where is Tittup, pray?

Lord M. I left her with the Colonel; a masquerade to young folks upon the point of matrimony, is as delightful as it is disgusting to those who are happily married, and are wise enough to love home, and the company of their wives. (Takes hold of her hand.)

Lady M. False man! I had as lieve a toad touched me. (Aside.)

Lord M. She gives me the frisoone. I must propose to stay, or I shall never get rid of her. (Aside.) I am aguish to-night. He, he! Do, my dear, let us make a little fire here, and have a family tête-à-tête, by way of novelty. (Rings.)

Enter JESSAMY.

Let them take away that chimney-board, and light a fire here immediately.

Lady M. What shall I do? (Aside, and greatly alarmed.) Here, Jessamy, there is no occasion; I am going to my own chamber, and my lord won't stay here by himself. [Exit Jes.]

Lord M. How cruel it is, Lady Minikin, to deprive me of the pleasure of a domestic duetto. A good escape, faith! (Aside.)

Lady M. I have too much regard for Lord Minikin to agree to anything that would afford him so little pleasure. I shall retire to my own apartment.

Lord M. Well, if your ladyship will be cruel, I must still, like the miser, starve and sigh, though possessed of the greatest treasure. (Bows.) I wish your ladyship a good night. (He takes one candle, and Lady Minikin the other.) May I presume—(Salutes her.)

Lady M. Your lordship is too obliging. Nasty man! (Aside.)

Lord M. Disagreeable woman! (Aside.)

[They wipe their lips, and exeunt.]

Miss T. (Peeping out of the closet.) All's silent now, and quite dark; what has been doing here, I cannot guess: I long to be relieved; I wish my lord were come—but I hear a noise. (Shuts the door.)

Col. T. (Peeping over the chimney-board.) I wonder my lady does not come. I would not have Miss Tittup know of this; 'twould be ten thousand pounds out of my way, and I can't afford to give so much for a little gallantry.

Miss T. (Comes forward.) What would my Colonel say, to find his bride that is to be, in this critical situation?

Enter LORD MINIKIN, in the dark.

Lord M. Now to release my prisoner. (Comes forward.)

Enter LADY MINIKIN.

Lady M. My poor Colonel will be as miserable, as if he were besieged in garrison: I must release him. (Going towards the chimney.)

Lord M. Hist, hist!

Miss T. }

Lord M. } Here, here!

Col. T. }

Lord M. This way.

Lady M. Softly. (Lord M. lays hold of Lady M. and the Colonel of Miss T.)

Sir J. (Without.) Lights this way, I say; get a blunderbuss.

Enter SIR JOHN TROTLEY, in his night-cap, and sword drawn, with JESSAMY.

Jes. Indeed, you dreamt it, there is nobody but the family. (All stand and stare.)

Sir J. Give me the candle, I'll ferret them out, I warrant. Bring a blunderbuss, I say: they have been skipping about that gallery in the dark this half-hour; there must be mischief. I have watched them into this room. Ho, ho! are you there? If you stir, you are dead men; (they retire) and (seeing the Ladies) women, too! Egad—eh! What's this? the same party again! and two couple they are of as choice mortals as ever were hatched in this righteous town! you'll excuse me, cousins.

Lord M. In the name of wonder, how comes all this about?

Sir J. Well, but, harkye! my dear cousins, have you not got wrong partners? Here has been some mistake in the dark; I am mightily glad that I have brought you a candle to set all to rights again: you'll excuse me gentlemen and ladies.

Enter GYMP, with a light.

Gymp. What in the name of mercy is the matter?

Sir J. Why the old matter, and the old game, Mrs. Gymp; and I'll match my cousins here at it against all the world, and I say done first.

Lord M. What is the meaning, Sir John, of all this tumult and consternation? May not Lady Minikin and I, and the Colonel and your niece, be seen in my house together without your raising the family, and making this uproar and confusion?

Sir J. Come, come, good folks, I see you are all confounded; I'll settle this matter in a moment. As for you, Colonel, though you have not deserved plain dealing from me, I will now be serious: you imagine this young lady has an independent fortune, besides expectations from me: 'tis a mistake, she has no expectations from me, if she marry you; and if I don't consent to her marriage, she will have no fortune at all.

Col. T. Plain dealing is a jewel; and to shew you, Sir John, that I can pay you in kind, I am most sincerely obliged to you for your intelligence; and I am, ladies, your most obedient, humble servant. I shall see you, my lord, at the club to-morrow? [Exit.]

Lord M. Sans doute, mon cher Colonel! I'll meet you there without fail.

Sir J. Mylord, you'll have something else to do.

Lord M. Indeed! what is that, good Sir John?

Sir J. You must meet your lawyers and creditors to-morrow, and be told what you have always turned a deaf ear to—that the dissipation of your fortune and morals must be followed by years of parsimony and repentance; as you are fond of going abroad, you may indulge that inclination without having it in your power to indulge any other.

Lord M. The bumpkin is no fool, and is d—d satirical. (Aside.)

Sir J. You are silent, ladies. If repentance has subdued your tongues, I shall have hopes of you. A little country air might, perhaps, do as well: as you are distressed, I am at your service. What say you, my lady?

Lady M. However appearances have condemned me, give me leave to disavow the substance of those appearances. My mind has been tainted, but not profligate; your kindness and example may restore me to my former natural English constitution.

Sir J. Will you resign your lady to me, my lord, for a time? [murmur.]

Lord M. For ever, dear Sir John, without a

Sir J. Well, miss, and what say you?

Miss T. Guilty, uncle. (Curtsying.)

Sir J. Guilty! the devil you are! of what?

Miss T. Of consenting to marry one whom my heart does not approve, and coquetting with another, which friendship, duty, honour, morals, and everything but fashion, ought to have forbidden.

Sir J. Thus, then, with the wife of one under this arm, and the mistress of another under this, I sally forth a knight-errant, to rescue distressed damsels from those monsters, foreign vices and bon ton, as they call it; and I trust that every English hand and heart here will assist me in so desperate an undertaking. You'll excuse me, sirs! [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A high Road; a town at a distance. A small inn on one side the road, and a cottage on the other.

The Landlord of the inn leads AGATHA FRIBURG by the hand out of his house.

Land. No, no; no room for you any longer. It is the fair to-day in the next village; as great a fair as any in the German dominions. The country people, with their wives and children, take up every corner we have.

Agatha. You will turn a poor sick woman out of doors, who has spent her last farthing in your house?

Land. For that very reason; because she has spent her last farthing.

Agatha. I can work.

Land. You can hardly move your hands.

Agatha. My strength will come again.

Land. Then you may come again.

Agatha. What am I to do? where shall I go?

Land. It is fine weather, you may go anywhere.

Agatha. Who will give me a morsel of bread to satisfy my hunger?

Land. Sick people eat but little.

Agatha. Hard, unfeeling man, have pity.

Land. When times are hard, pity is too expensive for a poor man. Ask alms of the different people that go by.

Agatha. Beg! I would rather starve.

Land. You may beg, and starve, too. What a fine lady you are! Many an honest woman has been obliged to beg: why should not you? (Agatha sits down upon a large stone, under a tree.) For instance: here comes somebody; and I will teach you how to begin. (A Countryman, with working tools, crosses the road.) Good day, neighbour Nicholas!

Countr. Good day! (Stops.)

Land. Won't you give a trifle to this poor woman? (Countryman takes no notice, but walks off.) That would not do; the poor man has nothing himself but what he gets by hard labour. Here comes a rich farmer; perhaps he will give you something.

Enter Farmer.

Good morning to you, sir! Under yon tree sits a poor woman in distress, who is in need of your charity.

Far. Is she not ashamed of herself? Why don't she work?

Land. She has had a fever. If you would but pay for one dinner—

Far. The harvest has been but indifferent, and my cattle and sheep have suffered by a distemper.

[Exit.

Land. My fat, smiling face was not made for begging: you'll have more luck with your thin, sour one; so, I'll leave you to yourself. [Exit.

Agatha. (Rises and comes forward.) Oh, Providence! thou hast till this hour protected me, and hast given me fortitude not to despair. Receive my humble thanks, and restore me to health, for the sake of my poor son, the innocent cause of my sufferings, and yet my only comfort. (Kneeling.) Oh! grant that I may see him once more! See him improved in strength of mind and body; and that, by thy gracious mercy, he may never be visited with afflictions great as mine. (After a pause.) Protect his father, too, merciful Providence, and pardon his crime of perjury to me! Here, in the face of heaven, (supposing my end approaching, and that I can but a few days longer struggle with want and sorrow,) here, I solemnly forgive my seducer for all the ills, the accumulated evils, which his allurements, his deceit and cruelty, have for twenty years past drawn upon me.

Enter a country Girl, with a basket.

Agatha. (Near fainting.) My dear child, if you could spare me a trifle—

Girl. I have not a farthing in the world: but I am going to market to sell my eggs, and as I come back I'll give you threepence. And I'll be back as soon as ever I can. [Exit.]

Agatha. There was a time when I was as happy as this country girl, and as willing to assist the poor in distress. (Retires to the tree, and sits down.)

Enter FREDERICK, dressed in a German soldier's uniform, with a knapsack on his shoulders; he appears in high spirits, and stops at the door of the inn.

Fred. Halt! stand at ease! It is a very hot day. A draught of good wine will not be amiss. But first, let me consult my purse. (Takes out a couple of pieces of money, which he turns about in his hand.) This will do for a breakfast; the other remains for my dinner; and in the evening, I shall be at home. (Calls out.) Ah! hallo, landlord! (Takes notice of Agatha, who is leaning against the tree.) Who is that? A poor sick woman! She don't beg; but her appearance makes me think she is in want. Must one always wait to give till one is asked? Shall I go without my breakfast now, or lose my dinner? The first, I think, is the best. Ay, I don't want a breakfast, for dinner-time will soon be here. To do good satisfies both hunger and thirst. (Going towards her with the money in his hand.) Take this, good woman. (She stretches her hand for the gift, looks steadfastly at him, and cries out with astonishment and joy.)

Agatha. Frederick!

Fred. Mother! (With amazement and grief.) Mother! for God's sake, what is this? how is this? and why do I find my mother thus? Speak!

Agatha. I cannot speak, dear son! (Rising, and embracing him.) My dear Frederick! the joy is too great: I was not prepared—

Fred. Dear mother, compose yourself: (leans her head against his breast) now, then, be comforted. How she trembles! she is fainting.

Agatha. I am so weak, and my head so giddy: I had nothing to eat all yesterday.

Fred. Good heavens! Here is my little money, take it all. Oh! mother, mother! (Runs to the inn.) Landlord, landlord! (Knocking violently at the door.)

Enter Landlord.

Land. What is the matter?

Fred. A bottle of wine; quick, quick!

Land. (Surprised.) A bottle of wine! for who?

Fred. For me. Why do you ask? Why don't you make haste?

Land. Well, well, Mr. Soldier; but can you pay for it?

Fred. Here is money; make haste, or I'll break every window in your house.

Land. Patience, patience! [Exit.]

Fred. You were hungry yesterday, when I sat down to a comfortable dinner. You were hungry, when I partook of a good supper. Oh! why is so much bitter mixed with the joy of my return?

Agatha. Be patient, my dear Frederick. Since I see you, I am well; but I have been very ill: so ill that I despaired of ever beholding you again.

Fred. Ill, and I were not with you? I will, now, never leave you more. Look, mother, how tall and strong I am grown. These arms can now afford you support. They can, and shall, procure you subsistence.

Enter Landlord, from the house, with a small pitcher.

Land. Here is wine; a most delicious nectar. It is only Rhenish; but it will pass for the best old hock. (Aside.)

Fred. (Impatiently snatching the pitcher.) Give it me.

Land. No, no; the money first. One shilling and two-pence, if you please. (Fred. gives him the money.)

Fred. This is all I have. Here, here, mother! (While she drinks, Landlord counts the money.)

Land. Three halfpence too short! However, one must be charitable. [Exit.]

Agatha. I thank you, my dear Frederick! Wine revives me: wine, from the hand of my son, gives me almost a new life.

Fred. Don't speak too much, mother. Take your time.

Agatha. Tell me, dear child, how you have passed the five years since you left me.

Fred. Both good and bad, mother. To-day plenty, to-morrow not so much; and, sometimes, nothing at all.

Agatha. You have not written to me this long while.

Fred. Dear mother, consider the great distance I was from you! and then, in the time of war, how often letters miscarry! Besides—

Agatha. No matter, now I see you. But have you obtained your discharge?

Fred. Oh! no, mother. I have leave of absence only for two months; and that for a particular reason. But I will not quit you so soon, now I find you are in want of my assistance.

Agatha. No, no, Frederick; your visit will make me so well, that I shall, in a very short time, recover strength to work again; and you must return to your regiment, when your furlough is expired. But you told me leave of absence was granted you for a particular reason—what reason?

Fred. When I left you, five years ago, you gave me everything you could afford, and all you thought would be necessary for me. But one trifle you forgot, which was, the certificate of my birth from the church-book. You know, in this country, there is nothing to be done without it. At the time of parting from you, I little thought it could be of that consequence to me, which, I have since found, it would have been. Once I became tired of a soldier's life, and in the hope I should obtain my discharge, offered myself to a master to learn a profession; but his question was, "Where is your certificate from the church-book of the parish in which you were born?" It vexed me that I had not it to produce, for my comrades laughed at my disappointment. My captain behaved kinder, for he gave me leave to come home to fetch it; and you see, mother, here I am. (During this speech Agatha is confused and agitated.)

Agatha. So, you are come for the purpose of fetching your certificate from the church-book?

Fred. Yes, mother.

Agatha. Oh, oh!

Fred. What is the matter? (She bursts into tears.) For heaven's sake, mother, tell me what's the matter?

Agatha. You have no certificate.

Fred. No!

Agatha. No. The laws of Germany excluded you from being registered at your birth, for—you are a natural son.

Fred. (Starts. After a pause.) So! And who is my father?

Agatha. Oh! Frederick, your wild looks are daggers to my heart. Another time.

Fred. (Endeavouring to conceal his emotion.) No, no; I am still your son, and you are still my mother. Only tell me, who is my father?

Agatha. When we parted, five years ago, you were too young to be intrusted with a secret of so much importance; but the time is come, when I can, in confidence, open my heart, and unload that burthen with which it has long been oppressed. And yet, to reveal my errors to my child, and sue for his mild judgment on my conduct—

Fred. You have nothing to sue for; only explain this mystery.

Agatha. I will, I will. But my tongue is locked with remorse and shame. You must not look at me.

Fred. Not look at you! Cursed be that son who could find his mother guilty, although the world should call her so.

Agatha. Then listen to me, and take notice of that village, (pointing) of that castle, and of that church. In that village I was born; in that church I was baptized. My parents were poor, but reputable farmers. The lady of that castle and estate requested them to let me live with her, and she would provide for me through life. They resigned me; and, at the age of fourteen, I went to my patroness. She took pleasure to instruct me in all kinds of female literature and accomplishments, and three happy years had passed under her protection, when her only son, who was an officer in the Saxon service, obtained permission to come home: I had never seen him before; he was a handsome young man—in my eyes, a prodigy: for he talked of love, and promised me marriage. He was the first man who had ever spoken to me on such a subject. His flattery made me vain, and his repeated vows—Don't look at me, dear Frederick! I can say no more. (Frederick, with his eyes cast down, takes her hand, and puts it to his heart.) Oh, oh! my son! I was intoxicated by the fervent caresses of a young, inexperienced, capricious man; and did not recover from the delirium till it was too late.

Fred. (After a pause.) Go on. Let me know more of my father.

Agatha. When the time drew near that I could no longer conceal my guilt and shame, my seducer prevailed on me not to expose him to the resentment of his mother. He renewed his former promises of marriage at her death: on which relying, I gave him my word to be secret; and I have, to this hour, buried his name deep in my heart.

Fred. Proceed, proceed! give me full information: I will have courage to hear it all. (Greatly agitated.)

Agatha. His leave of absence expired, he returned to his regiment, depending on my promise, and well assured of my esteem. As soon as my situation became known, I was questioned, and received many severe reproaches; but I refused to confess who was my undoer; and for that obstinacy was turned from the castle. I went to my parents; but their door was shut against me. My mother, indeed, wept as she bade me quit her sight for ever; but my father wished increased affliction might befall me.

Fred. (Weeping.) Be quick with your narrative, or you'll break my heart.

Agatha. I now sought protection from the old clergyman of the parish. He received me with compassion. On my knees I begged forgiveness for the scandal I had caused to his parishioners; promised amendment; and he said he did not doubt me. Through his recommendation I went to town, and, hid in humble lodgings, procured the means of subsistence by teaching to the neighbouring children what I had learnt under the tuition of my benefactress. To instruct you, my Frederick, was my care and my delight; and, in return for your filial love, I would not thwart your wishes when they led to a soldier's life; but I saw you go from me with an aching heart. Soon after, my health declined, I was compelled to give up my employment; and, by degrees, became the object you now see me. But, let me add, before I close my calamitous story, that—when I left the good old clergyman, taking along with me his kind advice and his blessing, I left him with a firm determination to fulfil the vow I had made of repentance and amendment; I have fulfilled it—and now, Frederick, you may look at me again. (Fred. embraces her.)

Fred. But my father all this time? (Mournfully.) I apprehend he died.

Agatha. No: he married.

Fred. Married!

Agatha. A woman of virtue; of noble birth and immense fortune. Yet, (weeps) I had written to him many times; had described your infant innocence and wants; had glanced obliquely at former promises—

Fred. (Rapidly.) No answer to those letters?

Agatha. Not a word. But, in the time of war, you know, letters miscarry.

Fred. Nor did he ever return to this estate?

Agatha. No: since the death of his mother, this castle has only been inhabited by servants; for he settled as far off as Alsace, upon the estate of his wife.

Fred. I will carry you in my arms to Alsace. No: why should I ever know my father, if he is a villain. My heart is satisfied with a mother. No, I will not go to him; I will not disturb his peace; I leave that task to his conscience. What say you, mother, can't we do without him? (Struggling between his tears and his pride.) We don't want him. I will write directly to my captain. Let the consequence be what it will, leave you again I cannot. Should I be able to get my discharge, I will work all day at the plough, and all the night with my pen. It will do, mother, it will do. Heaven's goodness will assist me; it will prosper the endeavours of a dutiful son for the sake of a helpless mother.

Agatha. (Presses him to her breast.) Where could be found such another son?

Fred. But tell me my father's name, that I may know how to shun him.

Agatha. Baron Wildenhaim.

Fred. Baron Wildenhaim! I shall never forget it. Oh! you are nearly fainting. Your eyes are cast down. What's the matter? speak, mother!

Agatha. Nothing particular: only fatigued with talking. I wish to take a little rest.

Fred. I did not consider that we have been all this time in the open road. (Goes to the inn, and knocks at the door.) Here, landlord!

Enter Landlord.

Land. Well, what is the matter now?

Fred. Make haste, and get a bed ready for this good woman.

Land. (With a sneer.) A bed for this good woman! Ha, ha, ha! She slept, last night, in that pent-house; so she may to-night.

[Exit, shutting the door.]

Fred. You are an infamous—(Goes back to his mother.) Oh! my poor mother! (Runs to the cottage at a little distance, and knocks.) Ah! hallo! Who is there?

Enter Cottager.

Cot. Good day, young soldier! What is it you want?

Fred. Good friend, look at that poor woman. She is perishing in the public road. It is my mother. Will you give her a small corner in your hut? I beg for mercy's sake! heaven will reward you.

Cot. Can't you speak quietly? I understand you very well. (Calls at the door of the hut.) Wife, shake up our bed; here is a poor sick woman wants it.

Enter Wife.

Why could not you say all this in fewer words? Why such a long preamble? Why for mercy's sake, and heaven's reward? Why talk about reward for such trifles as these? Come, let us lead her in; and welcome she shall be to a bed, as good as I can give her, and to our homely fare.

Fred. Ten thousand thanks and blessings on you!

Wife. Thanks and blessings! Here's a piece of work, indeed, about nothing! Good sick lady, lean on my shoulder. (To Fred.) Thanks and reward, indeed! Do you think husband and I have lived to these years, and don't know our duty? Lean on my shoulder.

[Exeunt into the cottage.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in the cottage.

AGATHA, Cottager, his Wife, and FREDERICK, discovered. Agatha reclining upon a wooden bench; Frederick leaning over her.

Fred. Good people, have you nothing to give her? Nothing that's nourishing?

Wife. Run, husband, run, and fetch a bottle of wine from the landlord of the inn.

Fred. No, no; his wine is as bad as his heart: she has drunk some of it, which, I am afraid, has turned to poison.

Cot. Suppose, wife, you look for a new-laid egg?

Wife. Or a drop of brandy, husband: that mostly cures me.

Fred. Do you hear, mother? will you, mother? (Agatha makes a sign with her hand as if she could not take anything.) She will not. Is there no doctor in this neighbourhood?

Wife. At the end of the village, there lives a horse-doctor. I have never heard of any other.

Fred. What shall I do? She is dying: my mother is dying. Pray for her, good people.

Agatha. Make yourself easy, dear Frederick; I am well, only weak: some wholesome nourishment—

Fred. Yes, mother, directly—directly. (Aside.) Oh! where shall I—no money—not a farthing left.

Wife. Oh, dear me! Had you not paid the rent yesterday, husband—

Cot. I then should know what to do. But, as I hope for mercy, I have not a penny in my house.

Fred. Then I must—(Aside.) Yes, I will go and beg. But should I be refused—I will then—I leave my mother in your care, good people. Do all you can for her, I beseech you! I shall soon be with you again. [Exit in haste and confusion.]

Cot. If he should go to our parson, I am sure he would give him something.

Agatha. (Having revived by degrees, rises.) Is that good old man still living who was minister here some time ago?

Wife. No: it pleased Providence to take that worthy man to heaven two years ago. We have lost in him both a friend and a father. We shall never get such another.

Cot. Wife, wife, our present rector is likewise a very good man.

Wife. Yes, but he is so very young.

Cot. Our late parson was once young, too.

Wife. (To Agatha.) This young man being tutor in our Baron's family, he is very much beloved by them all; and so the Baron gave him this living in consequence.

Cot. And well he deserved it for his pious instructions to our young lady; who is, in consequence, good and friendly to everybody.

Agatha. What young lady do you mean?

Cot. Our Baron's daughter.

Agatha. Is she here?

Wife. Dear me! don't you know that? I thought everybody had known that. It is almost five weeks since the Baron and all his family arrived at the castle.

Agatha. Baron Wildenhaim?

Wife. Yes, Baron Wildenhaim.

Agatha. And his lady?

Cot. His lady died in France, many miles from hence; and her death, I suppose, was the cause of his coming to this estate; for the Baron has not been here till within these five weeks ever since he was married. We regretted his absence much, and his arrival has caused great joy.

Wife. (To Agatha.) By all accounts, the Baroness was very haughty, and very whimsical.

Cot. Wife, wife, never speak ill of the dead. Say what you please against the living, but not a word against the dead.

Wife. And yet, husband, I believe the dead care the least what is said against them; and so, if you please, I'll tell my story. The late Baroness was, they say, haughty and proud; and they do say, the Baron was not so happy as he might have been; but he, bless him, our good Baron is still the same as when a boy. Soon after madam had closed her eyes, he left France, and came to Wildenhaim, his native country.

Cot. Many times has he joined in our village dances. Afterwards, when he became an officer, he was rather wild, as most young men are.

Wife. Yes, I remember when he fell in love with poor Agatha, Friburg's daughter: what a piece of work that was! It did not do him much credit. That was a wicked thing.

Cot. Have done: no more of this. It is not well to stir up old grievances.

Wife. Why, you said I might speak ill of the living. 'Tis very hard, indeed, if one must not speak ill of one's neighbours, dead nor alive.

Cot. Who knows whether he was the father of Agatha's child? She never said he was.

Wife. Nobody but him, that I am sure. I would lay a wager—no, no, husband, you must not take his part; it was very wicked. Who knows what is now become of that poor creature? She has not been heard of this many a year. May be, she is starving for hunger. Her father might have lived longer, too, if that misfortune had not happened. (Agatha faints)

Cot. See here! help! she is fainting: take hold.

Wife. Oh, poor woman!

Cot. Let us take her into the next room.

Wife. Oh, poor woman! I am afraid she will not live. Come, cheer up, cheer up! You are with those who feel for you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment in the castle.

A table spread for breakfast. Several Servants in livery disposing the equipage. Enter BARON WILDENHAIN, attended by a Gentleman in waiting.

Baron W. Has not Count Cassel left his chamber yet?

Gent. No, my lord; he has but now rung for his valet.

Baron W. The whole castle smells of his perfumery. Go, call my daughter hither. [Exit Gent.] And am I, after all, to have an ape for a son-in-law? No, I shall not be in a hurry: I love my daughter too well. We must be better acquainted before I give her to him. I shall not sacrifice my Amelia to the will of others, as I myself was sacrificed. The poor girl might, in thoughtlessness, say yes, and afterwards be miserable. What a pity she is not a boy! The name of Wildenhaim will die with me. My fine estates, my good peasants, all will fall into the hands of strangers. Oh! why were not my Amelia a boy?

Enter AMELIA WILDENHAIM.

Amelia. (Kissing the Baron's hand.) Good morning, dear my lord!

Baron W. Good morning, Amelia! Have you slept well?

Amelia. Oh! yes, papa. I always sleep well.

Baron W. Not a little restless last night?

Amelia. No.

Baron W. Amelia, you know you have a father, who loves you; and, I believe, you know you have a suitor, who is come to ask permission to love you. Tell me candidly how you like Count Cassel.

Amelia. Very well.

Baron W. Do not you blush when I talk of him?

Amelia. No.

Baron W. No! I am sorry for that. (Aside.) Have you dreamt of him?

Amelia. No.

Baron W. Have you not dreamt at all to-night?

Amelia. Oh! yes; I have dreamt of our chaplain, Mr. Anhalt.

Baron W. Ha, ha! As if he stood before you and the Count to ask for the ring.

Amelia. No, not that. I dreamt we were all still in France; and he, my tutor, just going to take his leave of us for ever. I awoke with the fright, and found my eyes full of tears.

Baron W. Psha! I want to know if you can love the Count. You saw him at the last ball we were at in France; when he capered round you; when he danced minuets; when he—but I cannot say what his conversation was.

Amelia. Nor I either. I do not remember a syllable of it.

Baron W. No! Then I do not think you like him.

Amelia. I believe not.

Baron W. But I think proper to acquaint you, he is rich, and of great consequence:—rich, and of consequence; do you hear?

Amelia. Yes, dear papa. But my tutor has always told me, that birth and fortune are inconsiderable things, and cannot give happiness.

Baron W. There he is right. But if it happens that birth and fortune are joined with sense and virtue—

Amelia. But is it so with Count Cassel?

Baron W. Hem, hem! (Aside.) I will ask you a few questions on this subject; but be sure to answer me honestly. Speak the truth.

Amelia. I never told an untruth in my life.

Baron W. Nor ever conceal the truth from me, I command you.

Amelia. (Earnestly.) Indeed, my lord, I never will.

Baron W. I take you at your word. And now reply to me truly: do you like to hear the Count spoken of?

Amelia. Good or bad?

Baron W. Good—good.

Amelia. Oh! yes; I like to hear good of everybody.

Baron W. But do not you feel a little fluttered when he is talked of?

Amelia. No. (Shaking her head.)

Baron W. Are not you a little embarrassed?

Amelia. No.

Baron W. Don't you wish sometimes to speak to him, and have not the courage to begin?

Amelia. No.

Baron W. Do not you wish to take his part, when his companions laugh at him?

Amelia. No: I love to laugh at him myself.

Baron W. Provoking! (Aside.) Are not you afraid of him when he comes near you?

Amelia. No, not at all. Oh! yes; once. (Recollecting herself.)

Baron W. Ah! now it comes!

Amelia. Once at a ball he trod on my foot; and I was so afraid he should tread on me again.

Baron W. You put me out of patience. Hear me, Amelia! to see you happy is my wish. But matrimony, without concord, is like a duetto badly performed; for that reason, nature, the great composer of all harmony, has ordained, that when bodies are allied, hearts should be in perfect unison. However, I will send Mr. Anhalt to you—

Amelia. Do, papa.

Baron W. He shall explain to you my sentiments. (Rings.) A clergyman can do this better than—

Enter Servant.

Go directly to Mr. Anhalt, tell him I shall be glad to see him for a quarter of an hour, if he is not engaged. [Exit Servant.]

Amelia. (Calls after him.) Wish him a good morning from me.

Baron W. (Looking at his watch.) The Count is a tedious time dressing. Have you breakfasted, Amelia?

Amelia. No, papa. (They sit down to breakfast.)

Baron W. How is the weather? Have you walked this morning?

Amelia. Oh! yes: I was in the garden at five o'clock; it is very fine.

Baron W. Then I'll go out shooting. I do not know in what other way to amuse my guest.

Enter COUNT CASSEL.

Count C. Ah! my dear Colonel! Miss Wildenhaim, I kiss your hand.

Baron W. Good morning, good morning! though it is late in the day, Count. In the country, we should rise earlier. (Amelia offers the Count a cup of tea.)

Count C. It is Hebe herself, or Venus, or—

Amelia. Ha, ha, ha! Who can help laughing at his nonsense?

Baron W. (Rather angry.) Neither Venus, nor Hebe, but Amelia Wildenhaim, if you please.

Count C. (Sitting down to breakfast.) You are beautiful, Miss Wildenhaim. Upon my honour, I think so! I have travelled, and seen much of the world, and yet I positively admire you.

Amelia. I am sorry I have not seen the world.

Count C. Wherefore?

Amelia. Because I might then, perhaps, admire you.

Count C. True; for I am an epitome of the world. In my travels, I learnt delicacy in Italy; hauteur in Spain; in France, enterprise; in Russia, prudence; in England, sincerity; in Scotland, frugality; and in the wilds of America, I learnt love.

Amelia. Is there any country where love is taught?

Count C. In all barbarous countries. But the whole system is exploded in places that are civilized.

Amelia. And what is substituted in its stead?

Count C. Intrigue.

Amelia. What a poor, uncomfortable substitute!

Count C. There are other things: song, dance, the opera, and war. (Since the entrance of the Count, the Baron has removed to a table at a little distance.)

Baron W. What are you talking of there?

Count C. Of war, Colonel.

Baron W. (Rising.) Ay, we like to talk on what we don't understand.

Count C. (Rising.) Therefore, to a lady, I always speak of politics; and to her father, on love.

Baron W. I believe, Count, notwithstanding your sneer, I am still as much of a proficient in that art as yourself.

Count C. I do not doubt it, my dear Colonel, for you are a soldier; and, since the days of Alexander, whoever conquers men, is certain to overcome women.

Baron W. An achievement to animate a poltroon.

Count C. And, I verily believe, gains more recruits than the king's pay.

Baron W. Now we are on the subject of arms, should you like to go out a shooting with me for an hour before dinner?

Count C. Bravo, Colonel! A charming thought! This will give me an opportunity to use my elegant gun: the butt is inlaid with mother-of-pearl. You cannot find better work, or better taste. Even my coat-of-arms is engraved.

Baron W. But can you shoot?

Count C. That I have never tried—except with my eyes, at a fine woman.

Baron W. I am not particular what game I pursue. I have an old gun; it does not look fine; but I can always bring down my bird.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Mr. Anhalt begs leave—

Baron W. Tell him to come in. I shall be ready in a moment. [Exit Servant.]

Count C. Who is Mr. Anhalt?

Amelia. Oh! a very good man. (With warmth.)

Count C. A good man! In Italy, that means a religious man; in France, it means a cheerful man; in Spain, it means a wise man; and in England, it means a rich man. Which good man of all these is Mr. Anhalt?

Amelia. A good man in every country except England.

Count C. And give me the English good man before that of any other nation.

Baron W. And of what nation would you prefer your good woman to be, Count?

Count C. Of Germany. (Bowing to Amelia.)

Amelia. In compliment to me?

Count C. In justice to my own judgment.

Baron W. Certainly. For have we not an instance of one German woman, who possesses every virtue that ornaments the whole sex; whether as a woman of illustrious rank, or in the more exalted character of a wife and a mother?

Enter MR. ANHALT.

Anhalt. I come by your command, Baron—

Baron W. Quick, Count; get your elegant gun.

I pass your apartments, and will soon call for you.

Count C. I fly. Beautiful Amelia, it is a sacrifice I make to your father, that I leave for a few hours his amiable daughter. [Exit.]

Baron W. My dear Amelia, I think it scarcely necessary to speak to Mr. Anhalt, or that he should speak to you, on the subject of the Count; but as he is here, leave us alone.

Amelia. Good morning, Mr. Anhalt. I hope you are very well. [Exit.]

Baron W. I'll tell you in a few words why I sent for you. Count Cassel is here, and wishes to marry my daughter.

Anhalt. (Much concerned.) Really!

Baron W. He is—he—in a word, I don't like him.

Anhalt. (With emotion.) And Miss Wildenhaim—

Baron W. I shall not command, neither persuade her to the marriage. I know too well the fatal influence of parents on such a subject. Objections, to be sure, if they could be removed—but when you find a man's head without brains, and his bosom without a heart, these are important articles to supply. Young as you are, Anhalt, I know no one so able to restore, or to bestow, those blessings on his fellow-creatures, as you. (Anhalt bows.) The Count wants a little of my daughter's simplicity and sensibility. Take him under your care while he is here, and make him something like yourself. You have succeeded to my wish in the education of my daughter. Form the Count after your own manner; I shall then have what I have sighed for all my life—a son.

Anhalt. With your permission, Baron, I will ask one question. What remains to interest you in favour of a man whose head and heart are good for nothing?

Baron W. Birth and fortune. Yet, if I thought my daughter absolutely disliked him, or that she loved another, I would not thwart a first affection; no, for the world I would not. (Sighing.) But that her affections are already bestowed is not probable.

Anhalt. Are you of opinion that she will never fall in love?

Baron W. Oh, no! I am of opinion that no woman ever arrived at the age of twenty without that misfortune. But this is another subject. Go to Amelia; explain to her the duties of a wife, and of a mother: if she comprehends them as she ought, then ask her if she thinks she could fulfil those duties as the wife of Count Cassel.

Anhalt. I will—but—I—Miss Wildenhaim—(confused)—I—I shall—I—I shall obey your commands.

Baron W. Do so. (Sighs.) Ah! so far this weight is removed; but there lies still a heavier next my heart. You understand me. How is it, Mr. Anhalt—have you not yet been able to make any discoveries on that unfortunate subject?

Anhalt. I have taken infinite pains; but in vain. No such person is to be found.

Baron W. Believe me, this burthen presses on my thoughts so much, that many nights I go without sleep. A man is sometimes tempted to commit such depravity when young! Oh! Anhalt, had I, in my youth, had you for a tutor—but I had no instructor but my passions; no governor but my own will. [Exit.]

Anhalt. This commission of the Baron's, in respect to his daughter, I am—(Looks about.) If I should meet her now, I cannot—I must recover myself first, and then prepare. A walk in the fields, and a fervent prayer—after these, I trust, I shall return as a man, whose views are solely placed on a future world; all hopes in this, with fortitude resigned. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—An open Field.

FREDERICK, alone, with a few pieces of money, which he turns about in his hands.

Fred. To return with this trifle, for which I have stooped to beg! return to see my mother dying! I would rather fly to the world's end. (Looking at the money.) What can I buy with this? It is hardly enough to pay for the nails that will be wanted for her coffin. My great anxiety will drive me to distraction. However, let the consequence of our affliction be what it may, all will fall upon my father's head; and may he pant for heaven's forgiveness as my poor mother—(At a distance is heard the firing of a gun, then the cry of 'hallo, hallo!' Gamekeepers and Sportsmen run across the stage. Fred. looks about.) Here they come! a nobleman, I suppose, or a man of fortune. Yes, yes; and I will once more beg for my mother. May heaven send relief!

Enter BARON WILDENHAIM, followed slowly by COUNT CASSEL.

Baron W. Quick, quick, Count! Ay, ay, that was a blunder, indeed! Don't you see the dogs? There they run; they have lost the scent. [Exit.]

Count C. So much the better, Colonel, for I must take a little breath. (Leans on his gun. Fred. goes up to him with great modesty.)

Fred. Gentleman, I beg you will bestow from your superfluous wants, something to relieve the pain, and nourish the weak frame of an expiring woman.

Re-enter BARON WILDENHAIM.

Count C. What police is here! that a nobleman's amusements should be interrupted by the attack of vagrants.

Fred. (To the Baron.) Have pity, noble sir, and relieve the distress of an unfortunate son, who supplicates for his dying mother.

Baron W. (Taking out his purse.) I think, young soldier, it would be better if you were with your regiment on duty, instead of begging.

Fred. I would with all my heart; but at this present moment my sorrows are too great. (Baron W. gives something.) I entreat your pardon. What you have been so good as to give me is not enough.

Baron W. (Surprised.) Not enough!

Fred. No, it is not enough.

Count C. The most singular beggar I ever met in all my travels.

Fred. If you have a charitable heart, give me one dollar.

Baron W. This is the first time I was ever dictated by a beggar what to give him.

Fred. With one dollar you will save a distracted man.

Baron W. I don't choose to give any more. Count, go on. [Exit Count: as the Baron follows, Frederick seizes him by the breast, and draws his sword.]

Fred. Your purse, or your life!

Baron W. (Calling.) Here, here! seize and secure him. (Some of the Gamekeepers enter, lay hold of Frederick, and disarm him.)

Fred. What have I done?

Baron W. Take him to the castle, and confine him in one of the towers. I shall follow you immediately.

Fred. One favour I have to beg, one favour only. I know that I am guilty, and am ready to receive the punishment my crime deserves. But I have a mother who is expiring for want—pity her, if you cannot pity me; bestow on her relief. If you will send to yonder hut, you will find that I do not impose on you a falsehood. For her it was I drew my sword; for her I am ready to die.

Baron W. Take him away, and imprison him where I told you.

Fred. Woe to that man to whom I owe my birth! [Exit.]

Baron W. (Calls another Gamekeeper.) Here, Frank, run directly to yonder hamlet, inquire in the first, second, and third cottage, for a poor, sick woman; and, if you really find such a person, give her this purse. [Exit Gamekeeper.] A most extraordinary event! and what a well-looking youth! something in his countenance and address which struck me inconceivably! If it is true, that he begged for his mother—but, if he did, for the attempt upon my life he must die. Vice is never half so dangerous as when it assumes the garb of morality. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in the castle.

AMELIA WILDENHAIM discovered.

Amelia. Why am I so uneasy, so peevish? who has offended me? I did not mean to come into this room. In the garden I intended to go. (Going, turns back.) No, I will not—yes, I will, just go and look if my auriculas are still in blossom, and if the apple-tree is grown which Mr. Anhalt planted. I feel very low-spirited; something must be the matter. Why do I cry? Am I not well?

Enter MR. ANHALT.

Ah! good morning, my dear sir!—Mr. Anhalt, I meant to say. I beg pardon.

Anhalt. Never mind, Miss Wildenheim; I don't dislike to hear you call me as you did.

Amelia. In earnest?

Anhalt. Really. You have been crying. May I know the reason? The loss of your mother still!

Amelia. No; I have left off crying for her.

Anhalt. I beg pardon if I have come at an improper hour; but I wait upon you by the commands of your father.

Amelia. You are welcome at all hours. My father has more than once told me, that he who forms my mind, I should always consider as my greatest benefactor. And my heart tells me the same.

Anhalt. I think myself amply rewarded by the good opinion you have of me.

Amelia. When I remember what trouble I have sometimes given you, I cannot be too grateful.

Anhalt. (Aside.) Oh, heavens! (To Amelia.) I—I come from your father with a commission. If you please we will sit down. (Places chairs, and they sit.) Count Cassel is arrived.

Amelia. Yes, I know.

Anhalt. And do you know for what reason?

Amelia. He wishes to marry me.

Anhalt. Does he? (Hastily.) But, believe me, the Baron will not persuade you. No, I am sure he will not.

Amelia. I know that.

Anhalt. He wishes that I should ascertain whether you have an inclination—

Amelia. For the Count, or for matrimony, do you mean?

Anhalt. For matrimony.

Amelia. All things that I don't know, and don't understand, are quite indifferent to me.

Anhalt. For that very reason I am sent to you to explain the good and the bad of which matrimony is composed.

Amelia. Then I beg first to be acquainted with the good.

Anhalt. When two sympathetic hearts meet in the marriage state, matrimony may be called a happy life. When such a wedded pair find thorns in their path, each will be eager, for the sake of the other, to tear them from the root. Where they have to mount hills, or wind a labyrinth, the most experienced will lead the way, and be a guide to his companion. Patience and love will accompany them in their journey, while melancholy and discord they leave far behind. Hand in hand they pass on from morning till evening, through their summer's day, till the night of age draws on, and the sleep of death overtakes the one. The other, weeping and mourning, yet looks forward to the bright region, where he shall meet his still surviving partner among trees and flowers, which themselves have planted in the fields of eternal verdure.

Amelia. (Rising.) You may tell my father I'll marry.

Anhalt. (Rising.) This picture is pleasing; but I must beg you not to forget that there is another on the same subject. When convenience and fair appearance, joined to folly and ill humour, forge the fetters of matrimony, they gall with their weight the married pair. Discontented with each other, at variance in their opinions, their mutual aversion increases with the years they live together. They contend most where they should most unite; torment where they should most soothe. In this rugged way, choked with the weeds of suspicion, jealousy, anger, and hatred, they take their daily journey till one of these also sleep in death. The other then lifts up his dejected head, and calls out in acclamations of joy, "Oh! liberty, dear liberty!"

Amelia. I will not marry.

Anhalt. You mean to say you will not fall in love.

Amelia. Oh! no. I am in love.

Anhalt. Are in love! (Starting.) And with the Count?

Amelia. I wish I were.

Anhalt. Why so?

Amelia. Because he would, perhaps, love me again.

Anhalt. (Warmly.) Who is there that would not?

Amelia. Would you?

Anhalt. I—I—me—I—I am out of the question.

Amelia. No; you are the very person to whom I have put the question.

Anhalt. What do you mean?

Amelia. I am glad you don't understand me. I was afraid I had spoken too plain. (Confused.)

Anhalt. Understand you! As to that, I am not dull.

Amelia. I know you are not. And as you have for a long time instructed me, why should not I now begin to teach you?

Anhalt. Teach me what?

Amelia. Whatever I know and you don't.

Anhalt. There are some things I had rather never know.

Amelia. So, you may remember, I said when you began to teach me mathematics. I said I had rather not know it: but now I have learnt it, it gives me a great deal of pleasure; and (hesitating) perhaps, who can tell but that I might teach something as pleasant to you as resolving a problem is to me?

Anhalt. Woman herself is a problem.

Amelia. And I'll teach you to make her out.

Anhalt. You teach?

Amelia. Why not? None but a woman can teach the science of herself: and though I own I am very young, a young woman may be as agreeable for a tutoress as an old one. I am sure I always learnt faster from you than from the old clergyman who taught me before you came.

Anhalt. This is nothing to the subject.

Amelia. What is the subject?

Anhalt. Love.

Amelia. (Going up to him.) Come, then, teach it me; teach it me as you taught me geography, languages, and other important things.

Anhalt. (Turning from her.) Psha!

Amelia. Ah! you won't. You know you have already taught me that, and you won't begin again.

Anhalt. You misconstrue—you misconceive everything I say or do. The subject I came to you upon was marriage.

Amelia. A very proper subject for the man who has taught me love, and I accept the proposal. (Courtesying.)

Anhalt. Again you misconceive and confound me.

Amelia. Ay, I see how it is: you have no inclination to experience with me "the good part of matrimony:" I am not the female with whom you would like to go "hand in hand uphill, and through labyrinths;" with whom you would like to "root up thorns;" and with whom you would delight to "plant lilies and roses." No; you had rather call out, "Oh! liberty, dear liberty!"

Anhalt. Why do you force from me what it is villanous to own? I love you more than life. Oh! Amelia, had we lived in those golden times which the poets picture, no one but you—but, as the world is changed, your birth and fortune make—our union is impossible. To preserve the character and, more, the feelings of an honest man, I would not marry you without the consent of your father. And could I, dare I, propose it to him?

Amelia. He has commanded me never to conceal or disguise the truth. I will propose it to him. The subject of the Count will force me to speak plainly, and this will be the most proper time, while he can compare the merit of you both.

Anhalt. I conjure you not to think of exposing yourself and me to his resentment.

Amelia. It is my father's will that I should marry. It is my father's wish to see me happy. If, then, you love me as you say, I will marry, and will be happy—but only with you. I will tell him this. At first he will start; then grow angry; then be in a passion: in his passion he will call me "undutiful;" but he will soon recollect himself, and resume his usual smiles, saying, "Well, well, if he love you, and you love him, in the name of heaven, let it be." Then I shall hug him round the neck, kiss his hands, run away from him, and fly to you; it will soon be known that I am your bride, the whole village will come to wish me joy, and heaven's blessing will follow.

Enter VERDUN.

(Discontented.) Ah! is it you?

Ver. Without vanity, I have taken the liberty to enter this apartment the moment the good news reached my ears.

Amelia. What news?

Ver. Pardon an old servant, your father's old butler, gracious lady, who has had the honour to carry the Baron in his arms; and afterwards, with humble submission, to receive many a box o' the ear from you—if he thinks it his duty to make his congratulations with due reverence on this happy day, and to join with the muses in harmonious tunes on the lyre.

Amelia. Oh! my good butler, I am not in a humour to listen to the muses and your lyre.

Ver. There has never been a birth-day, nor wedding-day, nor christening-day, celebrated in your family, in which I have not joined with the muses in full chorus. In forty-six years, three hundred and ninety-seven congratulations on different occasions have dropped from my pen. To-day, the three hundred and ninety-eighth is coming forth; for heaven has protected our noble master, who has been in great danger.

Amelia. Danger! My father in danger! What do you mean?

Ver. One of the gamekeepers has returned to inform the whole castle of a base and knavish trick, of which the world will talk, and my poetry hand down to posterity.

Amelia. What, what is all this?

Ver. The Baron, my lord and master, in company with the strange Count, had not been gone a mile beyond the lawn, when one of them—

Amelia. What happened? Speak, for heaven's sake!

Ver. My verse shall tell you.

Amelia. No, no; tell us in prose.

Anhalt. Yes, in prose.

Ver. Ah! you have neither of you ever been in love, or you would prefer poetry to prose. But excuse (pulls out a paper) the haste in which it was written. I heard the news in the fields; always have paper and a pencil about me, and composed the whole forty lines crossing the meadows and the park in my way home. (Reads.)

*Oh! muse, ascend the forked mount,
And lofty strains prepare,
About a Baron and a Count
Who went to hunt the hare.*

*The hare she ran with utmost speed,
And sad and anxious looks,
Because the furious hounds, indeed,
Were near to her, gadzooks!*

*At length, the Count and Baron bold
Their footsteps homeward bended;
For why, because, as you were told,
The hunting it was ended.*

*Before them straight a youth appears,
Who made a piteous pother,
And told a tale, with many tears,
About his dying mother.*

*The youth was in severe distress,
And seem'd as he had spent all;
He look'd a soldier by his dress,
For that was regimental.*

*The Baron's heart was full of ruth,
And from his eye fell brine, oh!
And soon he gave the mournful youth
A little ready rhino.*

*He gave a shilling, as I live,
Which, sure, was mighty well;
But to some people if you give
An inch—they'll take an ell.*

*The youth then drew his martial knife,
And seiz'd the Baron's collar;
He swore he'd have the Baron's life,
Or else another dollar.*

*Then did the Baron, in a fume,
Soon raise a mighty din,
Whereon came butler, huntsman, groom,
And eke the whipper-in.*

*Maugre this young man's warlike coat,
They bore him off to prison;
And held so strongly by his throat,
And almost stopp'd his whizzen.*

*Soon may a neckcloth, call'd a rope,
Of robbing cure this elf;
If so, I'll write, without a trope,
His dying speech myself.*

*And had the Baron chanc'd to die,
Oh! grief to all the nation!
I must have made an elegy,
And not this fine narration.*

MORAL.

*Henceforth, let those who all have spent,
And would by begging live,
Take warning here, and be content
With what folks choose to give.*

Amelia. Your muse, Mr. Butler, is in a very inventive humour this morning.

Anhalt. And your tale too improbable even for fiction.

Ver. Improbable! It's a real fact.

Amelia. What, a robber in our grounds at noon-day? Very likely, indeed!

Ver. I don't say it was likely: I only say it is true

Anhalt. No, no, Mr. Verdun; we find no fault with your poetry; but don't attempt to impose it upon us for truth.

Amelia. Poets are allowed to speak falsehood, and we forgive your's.

Ver. I won't be forgiven, for I speak truth; and here the robber comes, in custody, to prove my words. "I'll write his dying speech myself."

[Exit.]

Amelia. Look! as I live, so he does. They come nearer: he's a young man, and has something interesting in his figure. An honest countenance, with grief and sorrow in his face. No, he is no robber. I pity him! Oh! look how the keepers drag him unmercifully into the tower. Now they lock it. Oh! how that poor unfortunate man must feel!

Anhalt. (Aside.) Hardly worse than I do.

Enter BARON WILDENHAIM.

Amelia. A thousand congratulations, my dear papa.

Baron W. For heaven's sake, spare your congratulations. The old butler, in coming up stairs, has already overwhelmed me with them.

Anhalt. Then, it is true, my lord? I could hardly believe the old man.

Amelia. And the young prisoner, with all his honest looks, is a robber?

Baron W. He is: but I verily believe, for the first and last time. A most extraordinary event, Mr. Anhalt. This young man begged; then drew his sword upon me; but he trembled so when he seized me by the breast, a child might have overpowered him. I almost wish he had made his escape; this adventure may cost him his life, and I might have preserved it with one dollar; but now to save him would set a bad example.

Amelia. Oh! no, my lord, have pity on him! Plead for him, Mr. Anhalt.

Baron W. Amelia, have you had any conversation with Mr. Anhalt?

Amelia. Yes, my lord.

Baron W. Respecting matrimony?

Amelia. Yes; and I have told him—

Anhalt. (Very hastily.) According to your commands, Baron—

Amelia. But he has conjured me—

Anhalt. I have endeavoured, my lord, to find out—

Amelia. Yet, I am sure, dear papa, your affection for me—

Anhalt. You wish to say something to me in your closet, my lord?

Baron W. What the devil is all this conversation? You will not let one another speak; I don't understand either of you.

Amelia. Dear father, have you not promised you will not thwart my affections when I marry, but suffer me to follow their dictates?

Baron W. Certainly.

Amelia. Do you hear, Mr. Anhalt?

Anhalt. I beg pardon; I have a person who is waiting for me; I am obliged to retire. [Exit.]

Baron W. (Calls after him.) I shall expect you in my closet. I am going there immediately. (Retiring towards the opposite door.)

Amelia. Pray, my lord, stop a few minutes longer: I have something of great importance to say to you.

Baron W. Something of importance; to plead for the young man, I suppose. But that's a subject I must not listen to. [Exit.]

Amelia. I wish to plead for two young men. For one, that he may be let out of prison; for the other, that he may be made a prisoner for life. (Looks out.) The tower is still locked. How dismal it must be to be shut up in such a place; and perhaps—(Calls) Butler! Butler! come this way. I wish to speak to you. This young soldier has risked his life for his mother, and that accounts for the interest I take in his misfortunes.

Enter VERDUN.

Pray, have you carried anything to the prisoner to eat?

Ver. Yes.

Amelia. What was it?

Ver. Some fine black bread, and water as clear as crystal.

Amelia. Are you not ashamed? Even my father pities him. Go directly down to the kitchen, and desire the cook to give you something good and comfortable; and then go into the cellar for a bottle of wine.

Ver. Good and comfortable, indeed!

Amelia. And carry them both to the tower.

Ver. I am willing at any time, dear lady, to obey your orders; but, on this occasion, the prisoner's food must remain bread and water. It is the Baron's particular command.

Amelia. Ah! My father was in the height of passion when he gave it.

Ver. Whatsoever his passion might be, it is the duty of a true and honest dependant to obey his lord's mandates. I will not suffer a servant in this house, nor will I myself give the young man anything except bread and water. But I'll tell you what I'll do; I'll read my verses to him.

Amelia. Give me the key of the cellar; I'll go myself.

Ver. (Gives the key.) And there's my verses; carry them with you, they may comfort him as much as the wine. [Amelia throws them down, and exit] Not take them! Refuse to take them!

"I must have made an elegy,
And not this fine narration."

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Prison in one of the towers of the castle.

FREDERICK discovered.

Fred. How a few moments destroy the happiness of man. When I, this morning, set out from my inn, and saw the sun rise, I sung with joy. Flattered with the hope of seeing my mother, I formed a scheme how I would with joy surprise her. But, farewell all pleasant prospects: I return to my native country, and the first object I behold is my dying parent; my first lodging a prison; and my next walk will perhaps be—Oh! merciful Providence! have I deserved all this?

Enter AMELIA, with a basket, speaking as she enters.

Amelia. Wait there, Francis, I shall soon be back.

Fred. (Hearing the door open, and turning round.) Who's there?

Amelia. You must be both hungry and thirsty, I fear.

Fred. Oh, no! neither.

Amelia. Here's a bottle of wine, and something to eat. I have often heard my father say that wine is quite a cordial to the heart.

Fred. A thousand thanks, dear stranger. Ah! could I prevail on you to have it sent to my mother, who is upon her death-bed, under the roof of an honest peasant called Hubert. Take it hence, my kind benefactress, and save my mother.

Amelia. But first assure me that you did not intend to murder my father.

Fred. Your father! heaven forbid. I meant but to preserve her life who gave me mine. Murder your father! No, no; I hope not.

Amelia. And I thought not; or, if you had murdered any one, you had better have killed the Count; nobody would have missed him.

Fred. Who, may I inquire were those gentlemen whom I hoped to frighten into charity?

Amelia. Ay, if you only intended to frighten them, the Count was the very person for your purpose. But you caught hold of the other gentleman: and could you hope to intimidate Baron Wildenhaim?

Fred. Baron Wildenhaim! Almighty powers!

Amelia. What's the matter?

Fred. The man to whose breast I held my sword—(Trembling.)

Amelia. Was Baron Wildenhaim—the owner of this estate; my father.

Fred. (With emotion.) My father!

Amelia. Good heaven, how he looks! I am afraid he's mad. Here, Francis, Francis! [Exit.]

Fred. (Agitated.) My father! Eternal Judge! thou dost not slumber. The man against whom I drew my sword this day, was my father. One moment longer, and provoked, I might have been the murderer of my father! My hair stands on end! My eyes are clouded! I cannot see anything before me! (Sinks down into a chair.) If Providence had ordained that I should give the fatal blow, who would have been most in fault? I dare not pronounce—(After a pause.) That benevolent young female who left me just now, is then, my sister; and I suppose the fop who accompanied my father—

Enter MR. ANHALT.

Welcome, sir! By your dress, you are of the church, and consequently a messenger of comfort. You are most welcome, sir.

Anhalt. I wish to bring comfort, and avoid up-braidings; for your own conscience will reproach you more than the voice of a preacher. From the sensibility of your countenance, together with a language and address superior to the vulgar, it appears, young man, you have had an education which should have preserved you from a state like this.

Fred. My education I owe to my mother. Filial love, in return, has plunged me into the state you see. A civil magistrate will condemn according to the law: a priest, in judgment, is not to consider the act itself, but the impulse which led to the act.

Anhalt. I shall judge with all the lenity my religion dictates: and you are the prisoner of a nobleman who compassionates you for the affection which you bear towards your mother; for he has sent to the village where you directed him, and has found the account you gave relating to her true. With this impression in your favour, it is my advice, that you endeavour to see and supplicate the Baron for your release from prison, and all the peril of his justice.

Fred. (Starting.) I—I see the Baron!—I supplicate for my deliverance! Will you favour me with his name? Is it not Baron—

Anhalt. Baron Wildenhaim.

Fred. Baron Wildenhaim! He lived formerly in Alsace?

Anhalt. The same. About a year after the death of his wife, he left Alsace; and arrived here a few weeks ago, to take possession of this his paternal estate.

Fred. So! his wife is dead; and that generous young lady who came to my prison just now is his daughter?

Anhalt. Miss Wildenhaim, his daughter.

Fred. And that young gentleman I saw with him this morning is his son?

Anhalt. He has no son.

Fred. (Hastily.) Oh! yes, he has—(Recollecting himself.)—I mean him that was out shooting to-day.

Anhalt. He is not his son.

Fred. (To himself.) Thank heaven!

Anhalt. He is only a visitor.

Fred. I thank you for this information; and if you will undertake to procure me a private interview with Baron Wildenhaim—

Anhalt. Why private? However, I will venture to take you for a short time from this place, and introduce you; depending on your innocence, or your repentance; on his conviction in your favour, or his mercy towards your guilt. Follow me. [Exit.]

Fred. I have beheld an affectionate parent in deep adversity.—Why should I tremble thus? Why doubt my fortitude in the presence of an unnatural parent in prosperity? [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in the Castle.

Enter BARON WILDENHAIM and AMELIA WILDENHAIM.

Baron W. I hope you judge more favourably of Count Cassel's understanding since the private interview you have had with him. Confess to me the exact effect of the long conference between you.

Amelia. To make me hate him.

Baron W. What has he done?

Amelia. Oh! told me of such barbarous deeds he has committed.

Baron W. What deeds?

Amelia. Made vows of love to so many women, that, on his marriage with me, a hundred female hearts will at least be broken.

Baron W. Psha! do you believe him?

Amelia. Suppose I do not; is it to his honour that I believe he tells a falsehood?

Baron W. He is mistaken merely.

Amelia. Indeed, my lord, in one respect I am sure he speaks truth. For our old butler told my waiting-maid of a poor young creature who has been deceived, undone; and she and her whole family involved in shame and sorrow by his perfidy.

Baron W. Are you sure the butler said this?

Amelia. See him, and ask him. He knows the whole story, indeed he does; the names of the persons, and every circumstance.

Baron W. Desire he may be sent to me.

Amelia. (Calls.) Order old Verdun to come to the Baron directly.

Baron W. I know tale-bearers are apt to be erroneous. I'll hear from himself the account you speak of.

Amelia. I believe it is in verse.

Baron W. In verse!

Amelia. But, then, indeed, it's true.

Enter VERDUN.

Verdun, pray have you not some true poetry?

Ver. All my poetry is true—and, so far, better than some people's prose.

Baron W. But I want prose on this occasion, and command you to give me nothing else. (Verdun bows.) Have you heard of an engagement which Count Cassel is under to any other woman than my daughter?

Ver. I am to tell your honour in prose?

Baron W. Certainly. (Verdun appears uneasy and loth to speak.) Amelia, he does not like to divulge what he knows in the presence of a third person: leave the room. [Exit Amelia.]

Ver. No, no; that did not cause my reluctance to speak.

Baron W. What then?

Ver. Your not allowing me to speak in verse; for here is the poetic poem. (Holding up a paper.)

Baron W. How dare you pretend to contend with my will? Tell me, in plain language, all you know of the subject I have named.

Ver. Well then, my lord, if you must have the account in quiet prose, thus it was: Phœbus, one morning, rose in the east, and having handed in the long-expected day, he called up his brother Hy-men—

Baron W. Have done with your rhapsody.

Ver. Ay; I knew you'd like it best in verse:

*There liv'd a lady in this land,
Whose charms the heart made tingle;
At church she had not given her hand,
And therefore still was single.*

Baron W. Keep to prose.

Ver. I will, my lord; but I have repeated it so often in verse, I scarcely know how. Count Cassel, influenced by the designs of Cupid in his very worst humour,

*Count Cassel woo'd this maid so rare,
And in her eye found grace;
And if his purpose was not fair—*

Baron W. No verse.

Ver. It probably was base.

I beg your pardon, my lord; but the verse will intrude, in spite of my efforts to forget it. 'Tis as difficult for me at times to forget, as 'tis for other men at times to remember. But in plain truth, my lord, the Count was treacherous, cruel, forsworn.

Baron W. I am astonished!

Ver. And would be more so, if you would listen to the whole poem. Pray, my lord, listen to it.

Baron W. You know the family? All the parties?

Ver. I will bring the father of the damsel to prove the veracity of my muse. His name is Baden. Poor old man!

*The sire consents to bless the pair,
And names the nuptial day,
When, lo! the bridegroom was not there,
Because he was away.*

Baron W. But tell me: had the father his daughter's innocence to deplore?

Ver. Ah! my lord, ah! and you must hear that part in rhyme. Loss of innocence never sounds well except in verse.

*For, ah! the very night before,
No prudent guard upon her,
The Count he gave her oaths a score,
And took in change her honour.*

MORAL.

*Then you, who now lead single lives,
From this sad tale beware;
And do not act as you were wives,
Before you really are.*

Enter COUNT CASSEL.

Baron W. (To Verdun.) Leave the room instantly.

Count C. Yes, good Mr. Family Poet, leave the room, and take your doggerels with you.

Ver. Don't affront my poem, your honour; for I am indebted to you for the plot.

"*The Count he gave her oaths a score,
And took in change her honour.*" [Exit.]

Baron W. Count, you see me agitated.

Count C. What can be the cause?

Baron W. I'll not keep you in doubt a moment. You are accused, young man, of being engaged to another woman, while you offer marriage to my child.

Count C. To only one other woman?

Baron W. What do you mean?

Count C. My meaning is, that when a man is young and rich, has travelled, and is no personal object of disapprobation; to have made vows but to one woman, is an absolute slight upon the rest of the sex.

Baron W. Without evasion, sir, do you know the name of Baden? Was there ever a promise of marriage made by you to his daughter? Answer me plainly; or must I take a journey to inquire of the father.

Count C. No; I dare say, he can tell you no more than you already know; and which I shall not contradict.

Baron W. Amazing insensibility! And can you hold your head erect while you acknowledge perfidy?

Count C. My dear Baron, if every man who deserves to have a charge such as this brought against him, was not permitted to look up, it is a doubt whom we might not meet crawling on all fours. (He accidentally taps Baron W. on the shoulder.)

Baron W. (Starts.) Yet—nevertheless—the act is so atrocious—

Count C. But nothing new.

Baron W. (Faintly.) Yes—I hope—I hope it is new.

Count C. What, did you never meet with such a thing before?

Baron W. (Agitated.) If I have, I pronounced the man who so offended—a villain.

Count C. You are singularly scrupulous. I question if the man thought himself so.

Baron W. Yes he did.

Count C. How do you know?

Baron W. (Hesitating.) I have heard him say so.

Count C. But he ate, drunk, and slept, I suppose?

Baron W. (Confused.) Perhaps he did.

Count C. And was merry with his friends; and his friends as fond of him as ever?

Baron W. Perhaps—perhaps they were.

Count C. And perhaps he now and then took upon him to lecture young men for their gallantries?

Baron W. Perhaps he did.

Count C. Why, then, after all, Baron, your villain is a mighty good, prudent, honest fellow; and I have no objection to your giving me that name.

Baron W. But do you not think of some atonement to the unfortunate girl?

Count C. Did your villain atone?

Baron W. No: when his reason was matured, he wished to make some recompense: but his endeavours were too late.

Count C. I will follow his example, and wait till my reason is matured, before I think myself competent to determine what to do.

Baron W. And till that time, I defer your marriage with my daughter.

Count C. Would you delay her happiness so long? Why, my dear Baron, considering the fashionable life I lead, it may be these ten years before my judgment arrives to its necessary standard.

Baron W. I have the head-ach, Count. These tidings have discomposed, disordered me. I beg your absence for a few minutes.

Count C. I obey.—And let me assure you, my lord, that although, from the extreme delicacy of your honour, you have ever through life shuddered at seduction, yet there are constitutions, and there are circumstances, in which it can be palliated.

Baron W. (Violently.) Never!

Count C. Not in a grave, serious, reflecting man, such as you, I grant; but in a gay, lively, inconsiderate, flimsy, frivolous coxcomb, such as myself, it is excusable: for me to keep my word to a woman, would be deceit: 'tis not expected of me. It is in my character to break oaths in love; as it is in your nature, my lord, never to have spoken anything but wisdom and truth. [Exit.]

Baron W. Could I have thought a creature so insignificant as that, had power to excite sensations such as I feel at present! I am, indeed, worse than he is, as much as the crimes of a man exceed those of an idiot.

Enter AMELIA WILDENHAIM.

Amelia. I heard the Count leave you, my lord, and so I am come to inquire—

Baron W. (Sitting down, and trying to compose himself.) You are not to marry Count Cassel; and now mention his name to me no more.

Amelia. I won't; indeed I won't; for I hate his name.—But thank you, my dear father, for this good news. (Sits on the opposite side of the table.—After a pause.) And who am I to marry?

Baron W. I can't tell.

Amelia. I never liked the Count.

Baron W. No more did I.

Amelia. (After a pause.) I think love comes just as it pleases, without being asked.

Baron W. It does so.

Amelia. And there are instances, where, perhaps, the object of love makes the passion meritorious.

Baron W. To be sure there are.

Amelia. For example; my affection for Mr. Anhalt as my tutor.

Baron W. Right.

Amelia. (Sighing.) I should like to marry.

Baron W. So you shall. It is proper for every body to marry.

Amelia. Why, then, does not Mr. Anhalt marry?

Baron W. You must ask him that question yourself.

Amelia. I have.

Baron W. And what did he say?

Amelia. Will you give me leave to tell you what he said?

Baron W. Certainly.

Amelia. And what I said to him?

Baron W. Certainly.

Amelia. And won't you be angry?

Baron W. Undoubtedly not.

Amelia. Why, then—you know you commanded me never to disguise or conceal the truth.

Baron W. I did so.

Amelia. Why, then, he said—

Baron W. What did he say?

Amelia. He said—he would not marry me without your consent for the world.

Baron W. (Starting.) And, pray, how came this the subject of your conversation?

Amelia. (Rising.) I brought it up.

Baron W. And what did you say?

Amelia. I said, that birth and fortune were such old-fashioned things to me, I cared nothing about either: and that I had once heard my father declare he should consult my happiness in marrying me beyond any other consideration.

Baron W. I will once more repeat to you my sentiments.—It is the custom in this country for the children of nobility to marry only with their equals; but as my daughter's content is more dear to me than an ancient custom, I would bestow you on the first man I thought calculated to make you happy: by this I do not mean to say that I should not be severely nice in the character of the man to whom I gave you; and Mr. Anhalt, from his obligations to me, and his high sense of honour, thinks too nobly—

Amelia. Would it not be noble to make the daughter of his benefactor happy?

Baron W. But when that daughter is a child, and thinks like a child—

Amelia. No, indeed, papa, I begin to think very like a woman: ask him if I don't.

Baron W. Ask him! You feel gratitude for the instructions you have received from him, and you fancy it love.

Amelia. Are there two gratitudes?

Baron W. What do you mean?

Amelia. Because I feel gratitude to you; but that is very unlike the gratitude I feel towards him.

Baron W. Indeed!

Amelia. Yes; and then he feels another gratitude towards me. What's that?

Baron W. Has he told you so?

Amelia. Yes.

Baron W. That was not right of him.

Amelia. Oh! if you did but know how I surprised him!

Baron W. Surprised him!

Amelia. He came to me by your command, to examine my heart respecting Count Cassel. I told him that I would never marry the Count.

Baron W. But him?

Amelia. Yes, him.

Baron W. Very fine, indeed! And what was his answer?

Amelia. He talked of my rank in life; of my aunts and cousins; of my grandfather, and great grandfather; of his duty to you; and endeavoured to persuade me to think no more of him.

Baron W. He acted honestly.

Amelia. But not politely.

Baron W. No matter.

Amelia. Dear father, I shall never be able to love another; never be happy with any one else. (Throwing herself on her knees.)

Baron W. Rise, I command you.

Enter MR. ANHALT.

Anhalt. My lord, forgive me! I have ventured, on the privilege of my office, as a minister of holy charity, to bring the poor soldier, whom your justice has arrested, into the adjoining room; and I presume to entreat you will admit him to your presence, and hear his apology or supplication.

Baron W. Anhalt, you have done wrong. I pity the unhappy boy; but you know I cannot, must not forgive him.

Anhalt. I beseech you, then, my lord, to tell him so yourself: from your lips he may receive his doom with resignation.

Amelia. Oh! father, see him, and take pity on him; his sorrows have made him frantic.

Baron W. Leave the room, Amelia. (On her attempting to speak, he raises his voice.) Instantly! [Exit Amelia.]

Anhalt. He asked a private audience: perhaps he has some confession to make that may relieve his mind, and may be requisite for you to hear.

Baron W. Well, bring him in; and do you wait in the adjoining room till our conference is over: I must, then, sir, have a conference with you.

Anhalt. I shall obey your commands. (He goes to the door, and re-enters with FREDERICK.—Exit.)

Baron W. I know, young man, you plead your mother's wants in excuse for an act of desperation; but powerful as this plea might be in palliation of a fault, it cannot extenuate a crime like your's.

Fred. I have a plea for my conduct even more powerful than a mother's wants.

Baron W. What's that?

Fred. My father's cruelty.

Baron W. You have a father, then?

Fred. I have, and a rich one: nay, one that's reputed virtuous and honourable: a great man, possessing estates and patronage in abundance; much esteemed at court, and beloved by his tenants; kind, benevolent, honest, generous—

Baron W. And with all those great qualities abandons you?

Fred. He does, with all the qualities I mention.

Baron W. Your father may do right; a dissipated, desperate youth, whom kindness cannot draw from vicious habits, severity may.

Fred. You are mistaken. My father does not discard me for my vices: he does not know me; has never seen me. He abandoned me, even before I were born.

Baron W. What do you say?

Fred. The tears of my mother are all that I inherit from my father. Never has he protected or supported me—never protected her.

Baron W. Why don't you apply to his relations?

Fred. They disown me, too. I am, they say, related to no one. All the world disclaim me, except my mother; and there again I have to thank my father.

Baron W. How so?

Fred. Because I am an illegitimate son. My seduced mother has brought me up in patient misery. Industry enabled her to give me an education; but the days of my youth commenced with hardship, sorrow, and danger. My companions lived happy around me, and had a pleasing prospect in their view, while bread and water only were my food, and no hopes joined to sweeten it.—But my father felt not that!—

Baron W. (Aside.) He touches my heart.

Fred. After five years' absence from my mother, I returned this very day, and found her dying in the streets for want: not even a hut to shelter her, or a pallet of straw.—But my father feels not that! He lives in a palace, sleeps on the softest down, enjoys all the luxuries of the great; and, when he dies, a funeral sermon will praise his great benevolence, his Christian charities.—

Baron W. (Greatly agitated.) What is your father's name?

Fred. He took advantage of an innocent young woman; gained her affection by flattery and false promises; gave life to an unfortunate being, who was on the point of murdering his father.

Baron W. Who is he?

Fred. Baron Wildenhaim.—(Baron W. expresses surprise.)—In this house did you rob my mother of her honour; and in this house I am a sacrifice for the crime.—I am your prisoner. I will not be free: I am a robber; I give myself up. You shall deliver me into the hands of justice. You shall accompany me to the spot of public execution: you shall hear in vain the chaplain's consolation and injunctions: you shall find how I, in despair, will, to the last moment, call for retribution on my father.—

Baron W. Stop! Be pacified—

Fred. And when you turn your head from my extended corse, you will behold my weeping mother—need I paint how her eyes will greet you?

Baron W. Desist, barbarian, savage, stop!

Enter MR. ANHALT.

Anhalt. What do I hear? What is this? Young man, I hope you have not made a second attempt?

Fred. Yes; I have done what it was your place to do; I have made a sinner tremble.

[Points to Baron W. and exit.]

Anhalt. What can this mean? I do not comprehend—

Baron W. He is my son! he is my son! Go, Anhalt—advise me—help me—Go to the poor woman, his mother. He can shew you the way. Make haste—speed to protect her—

Anhalt. But what am I to—

Baron W. Go—your heart will tell you how to act. [Exit Anhalt.] Who am I? what am I? Mad—raving—no—I have a son, a son! The bravest—I will—I must—oh!—(With tenderness.) Why have I not embraced him yet? why not pressed him to my heart? Ah! see—(Looking after him.) He flies from the castle!—Who's there? Where are my attendants?

Enter Servants.

Follow him—bring the prisoner back. But observe my command: treat him with respect; treat him as my son, and your master. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Inside of the Cottage.

AGATHA FRIBURG, Cottager and his Wife, discovered.

Agatha. Pray, look and see if he is coming.

Cot. It is of no use. I have been in the road; have looked up and down; but neither see nor hear anything of him.

Wife. Have a little patience.

Agatha. I wish you would step out once more: I think he cannot be far off.

Cot. I will; I will go. [Exit.]

Wife. If your son knew what heaven had sent you, he would be here very soon.

Agatha. I feel so anxious—

Wife. But why? I should think a purse of gold, such as you have received, would make anybody easy.

Agatha. Where can he be so long? He has been gone four hours. Some ill must have befallen him.

Wife. It is still broad day-light: don't think of any danger. This evening we must all be merry: I'll prepare the supper. What a good gentleman our Baron must be! I am sorry I ever spoke a word against him.

Agatha. How did he know I was here?

Wife. Heaven only can tell. The servant that brought the money was very secret.

Agatha. (Aside.) I am astonished! I wonder! Oh! surely, he has been informed; why else should he have sent so much money?

Re-enter Cottager.

Well, not yet?

Cot. I might look till I am blind for him; but I saw our new rector coming along the road; he calls in sometimes: may be, he will this evening.

Wife. He is a very good gentleman; pays great attention to his parishioners; and where he can assist the poor, he is always ready.

Enter MR. ANHALT.

Anhalt. Good evening, friends.

Both. Thank you, reverend sir. (They run to fetch a chair.)

Anhalt. I thank you, good people.—I see you have a stranger here.

Cot. Yes, your reverence; it is a poor sick woman, whom I took in doors.

Anhalt. You will be rewarded for it.—(To Agatha.) May I beg leave to ask your name?

Agatha. Ah! if we were alone—

Anhalt. Good neighbours, will you leave us alone for a few minutes? I have something to say to this poor woman.

Cot. Wife, do you hear? come along with me.

[Exeunt Cottager and his Wife.]

Anhalt. Now—

Agatha. Before I tell who I am, what I am, and what I was, I must beg to ask, are you of this country?

Anhalt. No; I was born in Alsace.

Agatha. Did you know the late rector personally, whom you have succeeded?

Anhalt. No.

Agatha. Then you are not acquainted with my narrative?

Anhalt. Should I find you to be the person whom I have long been in search of, your history is not altogether unknown to me.

Agatha. That you have been in search of! Who gave you such a commission?

Anhalt. A man, who, if it so prove, is much concerned for your misfortunes.

Agatha. How? Oh! sir, tell me quickly—whom do you think to find in me?

Anhalt. Agatha Friburg.

Agatha. Yes, I am that unfortunate woman; and the man who pretends to take concern in my misfortunes is—Baron Wildenhaim: he who betrayed me, abandoned me and my child, and killed my parents. He would now repair our sufferings with this purse of gold. (Takes out the purse.) Whatever may be your errand, sir, whether to humble or to protect me, it is alike indifferent; I, therefore, request you to take this money to him who sent it: tell him my honour has never been saleable; tell him, destitute as I am, even indigence will not tempt me to accept charity from my seducer. He despised my heart, I despise his gold; he has trampled on me, I trample on his representative. (Throws the purse on the ground.)

Anhalt. Be patient: I give you my word, that when the Baron sent this present to an unfortunate woman, for whom her son had supplicated, he did not know that woman was Agatha.

Agatha. My son! what of my son?

Anhalt. Do not be alarmed: the Baron met with an affectionate son, who begged for his sick mother, and it affected him.

Agatha. Begged of the Baron? of his father?

Anhalt. Yes; but they did not know each other; and the mother received the present on the son's account.

Agatha. Did not know each other? Where is my son?

Anhalt. At the castle.

Agatha. And still unknown?

Anhalt. Now he is known: an explanation has taken place; and I am sent here by the Baron, not to a stranger, but to Agatha Friburg; not with gold! his commission was, "do what your heart directs you."

Agatha. How is my Frederick? How did the Baron receive him?

Anhalt. I left him just in the moment the discovery was made. By this time your son is, perhaps, in the arms of his father.

Agatha. Oh! is it possible, that a man, who has been twenty years deaf to the voice of nature, should change so suddenly?

Anhalt. I do not mean to justify the Baron; but he has loved you; and fear of his noble kindred alone, caused his breach of faith to you.

Agatha. But to desert me wholly, and wed another—

Anhalt. War called him away: wounded in the field, he was taken to the adjacent seat of a nobleman, whose only daughter, by anxious attention to his recovery, won his gratitude; and, influenced by the will of his worldly friends, he married. But no sooner was I received into the family, and admitted to his confidence, than he related to me your story; and, at times, would exclaim in anguish, "The proud, imperious Baroness avenges the wrongs of my deserted Agatha." Again, when he presented me with this living, and I left France to take possession of it, his last words, before we parted, were, "The moment you arrive at Wildenheim, make all inquiries to find out my poor Agatha." Every letter I afterwards received from him contained, "Still, still no tidings of my Agatha." And fate ordained it should be so till this fortunate day.

Agatha. What you have said has made my heart overflow. Where will this end?

Anhalt. I know not yet the Baron's intentions; but your sufferings demand immediate remedy; and one way only is left. Come with me to the castle. Do not start: you shall be concealed in my apartments till you are called for.

Agatha. I go to the Baron's!—No.

Anhalt. Go for the sake of your son. Reflect, that his fortune may depend upon your presence.

Agatha. And he is the only branch on which my hope still blossoms; the rest are withered. I will forget my wrongs as a woman, if the Baron will atone to the mother; he shall have the woman's pardon, if he will merit the mother's thanks.—(After a struggle.)—I will go to the castle; for the sake of my Frederick, go even to his father. But where are my good host and hostess, that I may take leave, and thank them for their kindness?

Anhalt. (Taking up the purse which Agatha had thrown down.) Here, good friend! Good woman!

Enter the Cottager and his Wife.

Wife. Yes, yes, here am I.

Anhalt. Good people, I will take your guest with me. You have acted an honest part; and, therefore, receive this reward for your trouble. (He offers the purse to the Cottager, who puts it by, and turns away.—To the Wife.) Do you take it.

Wife. I always obey my pastor. (Taking it.)

Agatha. Good b'ye. For your hospitality to me, may ye enjoy continued happiness.

Cot. Fare you well, fare you well.

Wife. If you find friends and get health, we won't trouble you to call on us again: but if you should fall sick, or be in poverty, we shall take it very unkind if we don't see you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in the Castle.

BARON WILDENHAIM and FREDERICK discovered.

Baron W. Been in battle, too! I am glad to hear it. You have known hard services; but now they are over, and joy and happiness will succeed. The reproach of your birth shall be removed; for I will acknowledge you my son and heir to my estate.

Fred. And my mother—

Baron W. She shall live in peace and affluence. Do you think I would leave your mother unprotected? No; about a mile from this castle, I have an estate, called Weldendorf; there she shall live, and call her own whatever it produces: there she shall reign, and be sole mistress of the little paradise: there her past sufferings shall be changed to peace and tranquillity. On a summer's morning, we, my son, will ride to visit her; pass a day, a week with her; and, in this social intercourse, time will glide pleasantly.

Fred. And pray, my lord, under what name is my mother to live, then?

Baron W. (Confused.) How?

Fred. In what capacity? As your domestic, or as—

Baron W. That we will settle afterwards.

Fred. Will you allow me, sir, to leave the room a little while, that you may have leisure to consider now?

Baron W. I do not know how to explain myself in respect to your mother, more than I have done already.

Fred. My fate, whatever it may be, shall never part me from her: this is my firm resolution, upon which I call heaven to witness. My lord, it must be Frederick of Wildenheim, and Agatha of Wildenheim; or Agatha Friburg, and Frederick Friburg. [Exit.]

Baron W. Young man! Frederick! (Calling after him.) Hasty, indeed! would make conditions with his father! No, no; that must not be. I just now thought how well I had arranged my plans—had relieved my heart of every burden, when, a second time, he throws a mountain upon it. Stop, friend conscience, why do you take his part? For twenty years thus you have used me, and been my torture.

Enter Mr. ANHALT.

Ah! Anhalt, I am glad you are come. My conscience and myself are at variance.

Anhalt. Your conscience is in the right.

Baron W. You don't know yet what the quarrel is.

Anhalt. Conscience is always right—because it never speaks unless it is so.

Baron W. Ay, a man of your order can more easily attend to its whispers, than an old warrior. The sound of cannon has made him hard of hearing. I have found my son again, Mr. Anhalt, a fine brave young man; I mean to make him my heir; am I in the right?

Anhalt. Perfectly.

Baron W. And his mother shall live in happiness. My estate, Weldendorf, shall be her's; I'll give it to her, and she shall make it her residence. Don't I do right?

Anhalt. No.

Baron W. (Surprised.) No! And what else should I do?

Anhalt. Marry her.

Baron W. (Starting.) I marry her!

Anhalt. Baron Wildenheim is a man who will not act inconsistently; as this is my opinion, I expect your reasons if you do not.

Baron W. Would you have me marry a beggar?

Anhalt. (After a pause.) Is that your only objection?

Baron W. I have more—many more.

Anhalt. May I beg to know them likewise?

Baron W. My birth.

Anhalt. Go on.

Baron W. My relations would despise me.

Anhalt. Go on.

Baron W. 'Sdeath! are not these reasons enough I know no other.

Anhalt. Now, then, it is my turn to state mine for the advice I have given you. But first I presume to ask a few questions. Did Agatha, through artful insinuation, gain your affection? or did she give you cause to suppose her inconstant?

Baron W. Neither. But for me she were always virtuous and good.

Anhalt. Did it cost you trouble and earnest entreaty to make her otherwise?

Baron W. Yes.

Anhalt. You pledged your honour?

Baron W. (Confused.) Yes.

Anhalt. Called God to witness?

Baron W. Yes.

Anhalt. The witness you called at that time was the Being who sees you now. What you gave in pledge was your honour, which you must redeem; therefore, thank heaven that it is in your power to redeem it. By marrying Agatha the ransom's made: and she brings a dower greater than any princess can bestow—peace to your conscience. If you then esteem the value of this portion, you will not hesitate a moment to exclaim,—Friends, wish me joy, I will marry Agatha! (Baron W. in great agitation, walks backwards and forwards, then takes Anhalt by the hand.)

Baron W. Friend, wish me joy—I will marry Agatha.

Anhalt. I do wish you joy.

Baron W. Where is she?

Anhalt. In the castle—in my apartments here. I conducted her through the garden to avoid curiosity.

Baron W. Well, then, this is the wedding-day. This very evening you shall give us your blessing.

Anhalt. Not so soon, not so private. The whole village was witness of Agatha's shame; the whole village must be witness of Agatha's re-established honour. Do you consent to this?

Baron W. I do.

Anhalt. Now the quarrel is decided. Now is your conscience quiet?

Baron W. As quiet as an infant's. I only wish the first interview was over.

Anhalt. Compose yourself. Agatha's heart is to be your judge.

Enter AMELIA WILDENHAIM.

Baron W. Amelia, you have a brother.

Amelia. I have just heard so, my lord; and rejoice to find the news confirmed by you.

Baron W. I know, my dear Amelia, I can repay you for the loss of Count Cassel; but what return can I make to you for the loss of half your fortune?

Amelia. My brother's love will be ample recompense.

Baron W. I will reward you better. Mr. Anhalt, the battle I have just fought, I owe to myself: the victory I gained I owe to you. A man of your principles, at once a teacher and an example of virtue, exalts his rank in life to a level with the noblest family; and I shall be proud to receive you as my son.

Anhalt. (Falling on his knees, and taking Baron W.'s hand.) My lord, you overwhelm me with confusion, as well as with joy.

Baron W. My obligations to you are infinite; Amelia shall pay the debt. (Gives her to him.)

Amelia. Oh! my dear father! (Embracing Baron W.) what blessings have you bestowed on me in one day! (To Anhalt.) I will be your scholar still, and use more diligence than ever to please my master.

Anhalt. His present happiness admits of no addition.

Baron W. Nor does mine. And there is yet another task to perform that will require more fortitude, more courage than this has done! A trial that—(Bursts into tears.)—I cannot prevent them—Let me—let me—A few minutes will bring me to myself. Where is Agatha?

Anhalt. I will go and fetch her. [Exit.]

Baron W. Stop! Let me first recover a little. (Walks up and down, looks at the door through which Anhalt left the room.) That door she will come from: that was once the dressing-room of my mother.—From that door I have seen her come many times—have been delighted with her lovely smiles. How shall I behold her altered looks! Frederick must be my mediator. Where is he? Where is my son? Now I am ready; my heart is prepared to receive her. Haste! haste! Bring her in. (He looks steadfastly at the door. MR. ANHALT leads in AGATHA FRIBURG; Baron W. runs and clasps her in his arms; supported by him, she sinks into a chair; Baron W. kneels by her side, holding her hand.)

Baron W. Agatha, Agatha, do you know this voice?

Agatha. Wildenhaim.

Baron W. Can you forgive me?

Agatha. Forgive you! (Embracing him.)

Enter FREDERICK.

Fred. (As he enters.) I hear the voice of my mother! Ha!—Mother! Father!

[Frederick throws himself on his knees by his mother; she clasps him in her arms. Amelia is placed by the side of her father, attentively viewing Agatha; Anhalt stands on the side of Frederick, with his hands gratefully raised to heaven.—Exeunt.]

ACT I.—SCENE I.—An Anti-room in an inn.

PAUL PEERY discovered, in a chair, asleep; bar-bell ringing violently. Enter MRS. PEERY.

Mrs. P. Why, Paul! why, husband!

Paul. Eh! what? (Waking.)

Mrs. P. For shame, for shame, Mr. Peery! The bar-bell has been ringing this half-hour; and here you sleep like the rusty clapper of it, and scarce stir when you are pulled: and when you are, you only waddle about a little bit, and then stand still till you are pulled again.

Paul. Pr'ythee, wife, be quiet: you know, I was always famous for giving satisfaction.

Mrs. P. Were you! I wish I could find it out.

Paul. But what's the matter?

Mrs. P. Packets are the matter; diligences are the matter. Sea and land-cargoes and carriages. Four sea-sick gentlemen, from Calais; and four ladies, just stepped out of the mail-coach, from Canterbury. The men, I believe, are making inquiries for the machine to London.

Paul. Are they? Then shew 'em all into one room. I pity the poor gentlemen. Nothing is so dreadful as sea-sickness: so, put 'em all together; and they'll only be sick of one another, you know. (Bells rings.) Enter Waiter.

Wait. Two gentlemen in a post-chaise, with a servant, from London, sir. [Exit.]

Mrs. P. Run, Mr. Peery!

Paul. Ay, ay! You take care of the stage-coaches, and let me alone for the post-chaise gentry. Here, Lewis, John, William! shew a room, here, to the gentlemen, there. [Exit, bawling.]

Enter Waiter, shewing in one French and three English passengers, from the packet.

Wait. Walk in, gentlemen.

Mrs. P. Walk in, gentlemen, if you please. Welcome to England! welcome to Dover, gentlemen!

1 Pas. So! just six o'clock in the morning; becalmed at sea; not a wink all night—the devil take this packet, say I! I'm rumbled, and tumbled, and jumbled—

Mrs. P. I'm extremely sorry for it, sir; but—

Fr. Pas. Now, begar! it do me goot.

Mrs. P. I'm vastly happy to hear it: do you choose any refreshment, sir? [in all my life.]

Fr. Pas. Vous avez raison: I never vas so refresh

Mrs. P. I am very glad, indeed, sir.

2 Pas. I'm d—d sick.

Mrs. P. I'm very sorry, I assure you, sir.

Fr. Pas. Ma foi, madame have beaucoup de politesse.

2 Pas. Get me a glass of brandy—ti, tol, lol! I feel confounded qualmish, but—tol, lol, lol, la!—I don't like to own a sea-sickness; and—"Britons ever rule the waves." (Singing.)

Fr. Pas. Briton rule de vave! I tink de vave rule you, ma foi. Ha, ha!

2 Pas. Right, mounseer! in the present case, I grant you. Packet-sailing—mere plain water agrees best with your folks; but, when there is occasion to mix a little of our British spirit with it, why, it's always too much for a French stomach. Now that's the time when an Englishman never feels qualmish at all.

Enter Waiter, shewing in four Women.

Mrs. P. Servant, ladies.

1 Wom. Lard! this mail-coach is the worst conveyance in the world. It squeezes four people together, like two double letters.

Mrs. P. Disagreeable, to be sure, ma'am.

1 Pas. And that infernal packet!

Mrs. P. Nothing can be half so bad, sir.

2 Pas. But, then, the cabin—

Mrs. P. Except the cabin, your honour!

2 Wom. And riding backward in a coach!

Mrs. P. I can't conceive anything so shocking,

Fr. Pas. Voila la politesse encore! [ma'am.]

Mrs. P. Beg pardon, ladies and gentlemen. But our house is so full at present, we have but one room to spare; the cloth is laid in it for breakfast, and it will be ready directly: hope you will excuse the—

I Pas. Oh! certainly, hostess: travellers, you know—if you'll give me leave, madam.

I Wom. Sir, you are very obliging. (The Men hand the Women.)

Mrs. P. Here, William, wait on the company.

Fr. Pas. Ah! c'est drole! pair and pair! two by two! [Exeunt Men, handing out the Women.]

Mrs. P. Shew 'em into Noah's ark, William, d'ye hear? (Bell rings.) Coming! Here, John, Lewis!—Coming! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in the inn.

Enter PAUL PEERY, with RANDOM and SCRUPLE.

Paul. This way, your honours, this way; one step at the door, if you please.

Rand. Step on, sir, if you please: pay the post-boy, and send in the servant (Peery going) and, harkye! landlord, what's the name of your house?

Paul. The Ship, your honour. The oldest and best established house in the town, sir.

Rand. Very well; then give us a better room, and get us some breakfast.

Paul. It shall be done, sir. I suppose, gentlemen, you mean to cross to Calais?

Scru. Psha!

Paul. You intend to take water, gentlemen?

Rand. No, sir; but we intend to take your wine. We may stay here some days, perhaps.

Paul. Thank your honours! everything shall be had to your satisfaction; and as far as a cellar and larder can go, I think, I—vastly obliged to your honours. Here, Lewis, William! breakfast for two in the Lion, there! [Exit.]

Rand. Well said, my thorough, clumsy, talkative inkeeper! And now, my dear Scruple, after our night's journey, welcome to Dover. Here we are, you see, not with the old, stale intention of taking a voyage to the continent; but a voyage to the island of love.

Scru. But suppose we should find neither wind nor tide in our favour?

Rand. Why, then, we shall be love-bound here a little, that's all. But, hang it! why anticipate evils? If we are to be unlucky, the less we think of it the better: confound all thinking, say I!

Scru. Confound thinking, Mr. Random! I'm sure it's high time to think, and that very seriously.

Rand. Heyday! Moralizing! "Confound thinking, Mr. Random!" Yes, sir, confound thinking! I'm sure, thinking would confound us; and most confoundedly, too, Mr. Scruple, at present.

Scru. Yet one can't help having one's doubts.

Rand. Poh! pr'ythee, don't doubt at all; doubting is mean and mechanical; and never entered the head or heart of a gentleman. Why, now, if you observe from our own daily experience, the people that doubted most were either our tailors, or tavern-keepers, or shoe-makers; or some such pitiful puppies. Zounds! man, don't be faint-hearted now; we shall never win our fair ladies at this rate; besides, haven't we all the reasonable hopes in the world? [believe.]

Scru. Why, we are sure of their good wishes, I

Rand. Certainly: and as to any trifling obstacles, such as father and mother, or so, chance must direct us. [mention—]

Scru. But may not those trifling obstacles you

Rand. Psha! doubting again! why, you are more of a mandarin, on a chimney-piece, than a man; there's no touching you but your head begins shaking. Consider, we attacked them at Bath, where they were, three weeks ago, on a visit to a female friend, without impertinent relations about them to give them advice, and made, I think, no inconsiderable progress.

Scru. Granted: but they were then suddenly called home to their father's, the baronet's, near Dover, here; who hinted, in his letter, at no very distant match for both of them.

Rand. Oh! never fear, if the girls are averse to it; and they, at our parting, like simple damsels in romance, bewailed their cruel fate; while we, like true knights-errant, promised to rescue them from confinement. But you had more opportunities with your flame than I: why did not you marry her at

Scru. Because I loved her. [once?]

Rand. Well, that's some reason, too: you would have made a d—d unfashionable figure, I confess.

Scru. You mistake me: I had too much honour to impose on my Harriet's amiable simplicity, and have the utmost detestation for marrying merely to make a fortune. In these interested cases, if we keep up appearances, after marriage, the wife becomes a clog and incumbrance; if we throw off the mask, we are making a worthy woman, perhaps, miserable, who has afforded the only means of making her husband easy.

Rand. Mighty romantic, truly! and charming policy for a fellow without a guinea!

Scru. My policy was chosen from the proverb, Random; I thought honesty the best. I confessed to her my embarrassed circumstances—

Rand. Charming!

Scru. Told her I had nothing to boast of but my family; whom my imprudence had disobliged—

Rand. Excellent!

Scru. And thus, by candidly acknowledging myself unworthy her affections, I, undesignedly, insured them.

Rand. Pooh! this may do well enough for the grave, sentimental, elder sister; but Kitty's the girl for my taste; young, wild, frank, and ready to run into my arms, without the trouble of dying or sighing. Her mind full of fun, her eyes full of fire, her head full of novels, and her heart full of love—ay, and her pocket full of money, my boy!

Scru. Well, we must now find means to introduce ourselves to the family; I dread encountering the old folks, too; people in the country, here, are apt to be suspicious; they ask queer questions sometimes.

Rand. Oh! the mere effect of their situation; where they get more health than polish.

Scru. And yet, old country families—

Rand. Are like old country bacon—d—d fat and very rusty, Scruple. But come, let's to breakfast, and settle our plan over a cup of coffee. But where the devil's our scoundrel? we only hired him overnight, and have scarce set eyes on him since.

Scru. What, our joint lacquey? that we engaged for the expedition, to avoid inquiries; to wait on us both, dress us both, and fly on both our errands, like a shuttlecock between two battledores?

Rand. Yes; or like another Atlas, with all our world upon his shoulders. Only look at him, Scruple!

Enter TIPTOE, with a small portmanteau.

Tip. Gentlemen, shall I put down the luggage?

Scru. Ay, on this table.

Tip. (Putting it down.) Whew! It's enough to make a man faint to look at it.

Rand. Why, you scoundrel, it's all you have to bring in; and we have contrived, on purpose to make it easy, to put both our clothes in one portmanteau.

Tip. That's the very reason I complain, sir. You don't know how fatiguing it is to carry double.

Rand. A shrewd fellow this. He may be of use to us. (Apart to Scru.)—And now we have to inquire, pray, sir, what may your name be?

Tip. Tiptoe—Tiptoe, gentlemen, at your service. I have seen better days, no offence to your honours: honest Tiptoe once stood above the world; but now all the world stands upon Tiptoe.

Scru. And pray, sir, what were you formerly?

Tip. A decent young man, sir, that could dress wigs, write a running-hand, and preferred a sober, steady family. I shaved my old master, bottled off his wine, copied his papers, and kept the key of his cabinet and cellar; in short, sir, I was his prime minister.

Scru. How came you to leave him, sir?

Tip. Ruined by party, sir; some of his papers were missing, and as I kept the key, I—

Rand. Began to be suspected; eh! honest Tiptoe?

Tip. Why, I can't tell how it was, sir; but the cabinet was against me; the whole house opposed me; and poor Tiptoe, like other great men—

Rand. Was turned out, I take it?

Tip. Oh, fie! no, sir; I resigned. I then fairly advertised my abilities—"Wants a place—can turn his hand to everything:" you, gentlemen, bid most for me; here I am, and I hope you'll have no cause to complain of my qualifications.

Scru. He'll make no bad ambassador for us, at least, Random; and now to breakfast, and our plan of operations. If they fail, farewell, dear, dear, little England! and yet I am wedded to thee—

Rand. Like modern husbands to their wives, Scruple: it's almost impossible to be seen in one another's company any longer. [Exit with Scruple.]

Tip. Very fine company I seem to have got into! hired, in one instant, by two men I had not heard of three moments; set out on a journey at four in the morning; and it had scarce struck five, when I began to suspect they were all sixes and sevens.— [Enter French Waiter.—Well, friend!

Fr. Wait. Serviteur, monsieur!

Tip. Friend! Oh, lord! no; it's the enemy. French waiters creep into shabby Dover inns, like French footmen into large London families. French footmen! more shame for their employers! who starve their own poor countrymen, to feed a set of skinny scoundrels, whose looks give the lie to their living, and prove their master's head in much nicer order than his heart. What, you come to carry up the portmanteau, I suppose?

Fr. Wait. Oui, de portmanteau, dat belong to—

Tip. Well, take it; and take care of it, too, monsieur; none of your old tricks of running away.

Fr. Wait. Never you fear; laissez moi faire. "Oh! de roast beef of old England!" [Exit, singing.]

Tip. There go all the worldly goods of my two poor masters; and here comes our inquisitive puppy of a landlord. Deuce take the fellow! he asked me more questions at the bar of the inn, than if I had been brought to the bar of the Old Bailey!

Enter PAUL PEERY.

Paul. Ah! my honest friend! sweet, honest Mr. Tiptoe, your servant.

Tip. (Aside.) How did he pick up my name, now?

Paul. I hope the two worthy gentlemen, I have shewn above stairs, have everything to their satisfaction? Though I say it, that should not say it, Paul Peery, of the Ship, was ever famous for giving satisfaction. Which of the two do you serve, my

Tip. Humph! Serve! Why—a— [friend?]

Paul. His honour in grey? or—

Tip. Ay.

Paul. Or the worthy gentleman in green?

Tip. Yes.

Paul. Humph! Two sweet gentlemen, indeed; and happy is one of 'em in a servant. You seem to give double the attendance of an ordinary footman.

Tip. Why, though I say it, that shouldn't say it, Tim Tiptoe was ever famous for giving satisfaction.

Paul. A close fellow! (Aside.) Well, I wish 'em success with all my heart, Mr. Tiptoe. You have lived with 'em a long while, I imagine?

Tip. Why, I have lived with 'em long enough, for that matter, Mr. Peery.

Paul. They are of property, no doubt!

Tip. Of such property, master Peery, it's impossible to describe it.

Paul. Indeed! and where may their property lie at this time? [coast, at this time.]

Tip. I believe all their property lies on the sea—

Paul. Oh, oh! the sea-coast! What, in ships, I

Tip. Yes; it's all in the Ship. [imagine?]

Paul. So, so! merchants! rich rogues, I'll lay my life. (Aside.) Ah! warm, warm! Good men, Mr. Tiptoe; trusted by everybody, I warrant.

Tip. Trusted for a great while, too, I promise you.

Paul. I hope they find everything to their liking. Must be civil here. (Aside.) I hope the room suits their honours? I should be sorry to give any offence. I have given 'em a room I give to the best of company.

Tip. Oh! excellent! make no apologies: your room is as good as your company, master Peery.

Rand. (Without.) D—n your house! Here, Tiptoe! Tiptoe, you scoundrel!

Tip. Coming directly, sir. You are right; you were always famous for giving satisfaction.

Rand. (Without.) Tiptoe!

Paul. Hark! is it your master?

Tip. 'Faith! I do not know. It's either his honour in grey, or the worthy gentleman in green. Good b'ye, master Peery.

Rand. (Without.) Tiptoe!

Tip. Coming, sir.

[Exit.]

Paul. Why, what the devil can these merchants do at Dover? A bit of a smuggling business, perhaps. They must be rich fellows by the servant's being so saucy; and then, they call about 'em, and abuse the house so kindly! Oh! your abusive fellows are the best customers in the world; for none pay so well at an inn as those who are always d—ing the waiters for ill-treatment. (Bar-bellings.)

Enter Waiter.

Wait. Sir David Dunder, of Dunder Hall, sir, has had business in the town before breakfast, and stopt in, whilst his horses put-to, to go back. [Exit.]

Paul. Ods my life! a rich man, a good-natured gentleman, and lives but a mile off: the only great man, I know, whose situation never keeps me at a great distance. An odd fellow, too; and takes more money from my house than a tax-gatherer; I can never keep a guest for his cursed kind invitations. But he pays well while he stays. So, William! wife! hostler! rub down the horses, and shew up Sir David Dunder. [Exit.]

Re-enter PAUL PEERY with SIR DAVID DUNDER.

Sir D. Pooh! Paul, you're a blockhead—there's two of 'em you tell me?

Paul. Worth a plum a-piece, Sir David.

Sir D. Plums! figs! How's your wife, Paul, eh?

Paul. She's pretty—

Sir D. Be quiet; I know she is. And so, these two merchants are as rich as—

Paul. Anything, your honour.

Sir D. D—d good simile! very new, too. Have they taken care of the horses?

Paul. They're going to—

Sir D. Be quiet; I know it. Merchants! hazard! Vessels are lottery tickets; two blanks to a prize.

Paul. Right, your honour; and the sea—

Sir D. Is the worst wheel in the world for 'em, Paul; for when once they stick at the bottom, I would not give a farthing for the chance of their coming up. Where do they come from?

Paul. London: London merchants; and they—

Sir D. I know it, you blockhead—are respected all over the world. London merchants, Paul, are like London porter; a little heavy or so, sometimes; but stout, stiff, heady, old hogsheads, that keep up the vigour of a strong English constitution. Where are they going? [any intelligence—]

Paul. I can't tell, Sir David; but if you wish for

Sir D. You can't give it me. Tell 'em I wish to be introduced, d'ye hear? Sir David Dunder, Dunder Hall—you know the form—Bart: bloody hand, all that—wishes to—Who have we here?

Paul. The very men, Sir David; coming this way,

Sir D. Then do you get out on't. [too.]

Paul. So! two more guests going by his cursed invitations. [Exit.]

Sir D. (Looking out.) 'Gad! they are youngish men for merchants. Well, why the worse? They may be clever fellows, for all that. If so, the younger the better; and a man must be clever, indeed, when his enemies can throw nothing but his youth in his teeth.—[Enter RANDOM and SCRUPLE.]

Rand. Nay, pr'ythee, Scruple, one turn on the quay, and—who is he? Egad! the same queer fellow we observed just now under the window.

Scru. Right; giving orders to his coachman.

Sir D. Gentlemen, your servant.

Rand. & Scru. Sir, your very obedient!

Sir D. My landlord tells me—honest Paul, here—you've just left London. Good journey, I hope. Our town of Dover is but an odd, whimsical, sort of a—eh! and, after the city, you think it a d—d dirty, dingy kind of a—humph!

Scru. Why, sir, at present, we can't say we are tired of the exchange.

Sir D. The Exchange! Oh, oh! Paul's right! (Aside.) I know it. The Exchange, as you say, for people in your situation is much pleasanter.

Scru. Sir! Our situation!

Sir D. Be quiet; my host has let me into your characters. [anything of—

Rand. The devil he has! And how should he know

Sir D. Nay, don't be angry; no harm: mere inuendo—didn't tell plump—talked of your dealings.

Scru. Dealings! [sumed to—

Rand. Why, zounds! the scoundrel has not pre-

Sir D. Must be rich—d—d crusty! (Aside.) You're right, though, can't be too cautious. I would not wish to pry. Mean nothing but respect, upon my soul! How many clerks do you keep?

Rand. & Scru. Clerks!

Sir D. Can't do without them, you know. Fine folks, though, all you, eh! Props of the public; bulwarks of Britain. Always brought forward as an example to the world. Been in the stocks lately, Scru. Hell and the devil! [gentlemen?

Sir D. That's right, don't tell. I like you the better. You see what I know of you, and—

Rand. Sir, we suspect what you imagine, and—

Sir D. I know it. You wonder to see me so devilish distant. I live but a mile off: Lady Dunder, a sweet, fine, fat woman—my wife, by-the-by—will be happy to entertain gentlemen of—

Rand. How! Lady Dunder your wife? (Hastily.)

Scru. Is Lady Dunder your wife, sir? (Hastily.)

Sir D. Eh! my wife, my wife! Why, yes, I think so. She is not your's, is she?

Scru. Oh! you'll pardon us, sir; only we have heard the name of Sir David Dunder in this country, before. [known, I believe, everywhere.

Sir D. Like enough; the Dunders are pretty well

Rand. Certainly: indeed, you were the last person in our mouths, Sir David.

Sir D. Popped in apropos, eh! Never knew it otherwise. Just like Simon Spongy, our curate; never knocks but at dinner, and always comes in with the cloth. But we are notorious for hospitality to strangers of your stamp; and if you can spare a day or two at Dunder Hall—all in the family way, you know: Sir David, that's me; lady and two misses; two fine young women, upon my soul, as any in Kent; tall as hop-poles—will be happy to—eh!

Scru. Sir, you're particularly kind; but—

Rand. We'll attend you with pleasure, Sir David.

Sir D. Will you? that's right. It's close by; quite convenient. And if necessity obliges you to come to the coast here, why, 'tis but a mile. All in my power. I know your business, and we'll have the horses directly. We shall be at home time enough for a late breakfast. Here—eh! I'll step to coach myself; but don't, don't abuse honest Paul; meant no harm, upon my soul! mere inuendo—a slight sketch, but no profession specified. Paul is like other inn-keepers, blunders and talks: a d—d deal of the bull and mouth about him; but no more meaning than a split crow, or a spread eagle, egad! [Exit.

Rand. Give me your hand, my boy! the day's our own; the luckiest hit in the world!

Scru. Do you think so?

Rand. Think so! Zounds! what's the matter with you? Isn't the very man we have been following, the first man we have met? Hasn't he thrown open his doors to us, when we only hoped to get in at his window? Isn't he our father-in-law that is to be, and hasn't he given us an invitation?

Scru. Granted: and what then?

Rand. What then? Why, then, instead of reconnoitring the whole day round his wall, we have nothing to do but to walk in, whisk away with the girls, and be married immediately.

Scru. And is this to be our return, Mr. Random, for Sir David's kindness?

Rand. Why, how can you make a better, than by giving such a strong proof of your attachment to his family?

Scru. For shame, Random! basely endeavour to injure a man, whose hospitality has brought you under his roof! No, no; our reconnoitring plan, indeed! weak as you may think it, I should prefer going to his wall, as you say, I assure you.

Rand. Very likely; the weakest always go there. Remember, however, I scorn a mean action, as much as any man; but if a good marriage is the readiest road to the reconciliation with our friend, who can, if they choose, make us easy, I see no great injury offered to Sir David, nor his family.

Scru. Why, in that case, to be sure—

Rand. Ay, ay; no more of your cases now, good doctor; but follow my prescriptions, I entreat you. Besides, my father is expected from the south of France every day. He may arrive before we have brought matters to bear; and fathers are apt to spoil sport, you know. [Enter TIPTOE.]

Tip. The old gentleman, sir, with the old coach, is inquiring for you in the court-yard.

Scru. Oh! Sir David! allons! Follow us, sirrah. We haven't a moment to spare.

Rand. That's right, Scruple! stick close; for he seems so whimsical an old fellow, that he may get into his carriage, drive off, and forget he has ever given us an invitation. Come along, Tiptoe; quick, quick, you scoundrel! [Exit with Scruple.]

Tip. Quick! Zounds! I'm almost dead. All night, bumping down to Dover, on a ragged, raw-boned, post-horse, with a brace of pistols at my knees; and, as soon as we arrive, clapt up behind a queer, country coach, with a couple of leather straps in my hand, to be rattled back again. Ah! Tiptoe, Tiptoe! you must get into a sober family again, I see. My running-hand will be all I have left for it at last; for I shall be run off my feet, I find, in a fortnight. [Exit.]

ACT II.—SCENE I.—A Room in the Ship inn.

Enter ROUNDLEE and QUIRK.

Round. Why, I told you so, all along; but you have no more head than a smooth shilling.

Quirk. No, but I have a mouth, if you would let me open it.

Round. Yes, and then you'd shut it again; just as you do at my dinners; where you have been opening and shutting it, any time these ten years.

Quirk. What, and haven't I deserved it? haven't I filled more parchments for you than stomachs; more skins than bellies; and closed many an account before I could close my orifice? haven't I given you a character in the courts, good-humouredly establishing your reputation, before I regarded my own? Haven't I sworn for you, and roundly, too, Mr. Roundlee? [good swallow.

Round. Well, well, I always allowed you had a

Quirk. Wasn't I, when you were tottering, friend enough to take out a commission of bankruptcy against you? and didn't I kindly make myself a cruel creditor, and insist upon receiving three parts of your effects? [ruin with gratitude?

Round. And haven't I always acknowledged my Quirk. No, nor anything else. I have dangled after half the heirs in town, without an acknowledgment; making myself the imaginary friend of their imaginary wants, merely to introduce 'em to you, as a man of honour and secrecy.

Round. Ay, if required.

Quirk. Granted; it says so in the advertisement. And did not they come to you, when, if it was not for me, they would have been accommodated at a genteel end of the town? Instead of which, I trudged 'em through the Strand, towards the Bar, all winter long, with their boots and high collars, for fear of sore throats, to chew your tough chops in the back parlour. Then they'd clap you on the back, call you by your christian name, tell d—d lies, and swear you were an honest fellow, to make you come down with the ready. And who was the disinterested, moderate man, to settle a proper premium between the parties? Why, I, to be sure.

Round. And is there a worse security in the world than your fellows of fashion? Your snug man of business, when he puts his name to a note, is always punctual in his payment; or else we lock him in limbo; safe in the house of bondage. Now, your man of fashion always gets safe in another house; and if he can't duly pay, why he gets duly elected, and I have a false return for my money.

Quirk. That's not the case here, you know.

Round. No, but it's as bad. A pretty wild-goose chase we have had here! Rammed into a post-chaise, with more expense than speed; gaping at hops, through a cursed small-beer country, and after two youngsters, who, by this time, I take it, have hopped over to Calais. That's another genteel way of chousing an honest creditor. The coast of France is edged with English insolvents. Calais is a King's-bench, and Boulogne little more than a Marshalsea. A parcel of prodigal, web-footed spendthrifts come here, and take water like ducks—

Quirk. Yes, but they are lame ducks.

Round. While we, who have hatched 'em, like hens, in the shell of their dissipation, stand clucking complaints on the shore, without daring to follow.

Quirk. Come, come, accidents will happen.

Round. And who brought this accident about, but the dapper Mr. Quirk? with your plaguy politic pate! a thick Symond's-inn skull, only fit to peep through a pillory. You must be sending me your two fine St. James's gentlemen. D—e! there's more poor rogues, I believe, in that parish than in St. Giles's: all in a gang, too; knaves of clubs every one of them—and there my two youngsters, coaxed me over with a pretty refreshing story of friends in the country, and rich old fathers, with fine crazy constitutions; charming church-yard coughs, and pretty touches of the rheumatism; sweet bile, and delightful bad livers! It put one in spirits to hear them talk; and you, you booby, to back it.

Quirk. Why, I had it from the best authority. However, young Random's father is abroad for his health; and everybody says in a fine, fair way of dying; and then you'll be in a fair way of recovery. The report is current, my old lad.

Round. Yes, and the son got current cash for it; and now he must go abroad, too; with a cursed consumptive pocket, I warrant: and that other oily-tongued fellow, Mr. Scruple—

Quirk. But why call me in question? Could not you see for yourself? Didn't they ask you to dine with 'em? and weren't you foolish enough to drink, and grow open-hearted? and then, when Random told you he'd take you to Shooter's-hill in his phaë-

Round. Psha! no such thing. [ton—

Quirk. And introduce you to Peggy Pattens, who said you had fine eyes, if you did not squint, and a good walk, if you did not stoop—

Round. Hush!

Quirk. Didn't you chuckle, and whisper he was an honest fellow? and though I kept winking, and pulling your sleeve, did not you take notes which were due the day they set off, and give a draft for the three thousand?

Round. Zounds! it's enough to drive one mad to think on't! You got the warrant backed by the Sheriff of Canterbury?

Quirk. Yes, by the Sub; and all may be repaired at last. We have traced 'em truly to this house, and if the tide hasn't served, we may nab 'em yet. Come along, old Round. We'll pump the waiters, sound our host, and success, no doubt, will crown our inquiries. Come along! [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—An Apartment in Dunder Hall.
SIR DAVID DUNDER, LADY DUNDER, RANDOM, and SCRUPLE, discovered at breakfast.

Rand. We are only mortified, Sir David, as we have not had the pleasure of seeing the young ladies, that we are deprived of their company at breakfast.

Sir D. Psha! Nonsense! Mustn't mind that.—T'other cup, eh? (To Random.) Always the case with my girls.—Lump o' sugar? (To Scruple.)

Scru. Not any.

Lady D. They are taking their constant morning's round, gentlemen. They always breakfast before the rest of the family; and are generally breathing the air of the shrubbery, while Sir David and I are sipping our tea and chocolate.

Sir D. Be quiet, I know it. Picking posies, gathering daisies and daffy-down-dillies. Pretty pastoral girls, though, I assure you: very like mamma.

Lady D. Oh, Sir David!

Sir D. Hush! The very picture of my dear Lady Dunder. Not so plump, perhaps; but all in good time.—Bit more muffin?

Scru. The young ladies, Sir David, are happy in their resemblance of so accomplished a mother.

Sir D. Yes; like as three peas. My lady, indeed, has more of the marrow-fat. (All rise.)

Lady D. Why, people do flatter, I confess. None of our neighbours but are pretty partial to the Dunders. Not an assembly round, but my girls are first called out to move in a minuet; and always stand the head couples in a country-dance.

Rand. We make no doubt, madam. The charms which your ladyship's daughters must inherit—

Sir D. Be quiet. Asked everywhere, I promise you. Quite the delight of Dover. Acted all the tragedy parts, too, at my friend Thing-em-bob's. Harriet got great applause, upon my soul: but Kitty was so cursed comical!—did Desdemona one night; gets killed, you know, by a bolster.

Scru. An agreeable amusement! Gentlemen's playhouses are much to be wished for.

Sir D. Fine fun, isn't it? We had a touch of dramatics once ourselves, at the hall here; gutted a kitchen, and filled it with fly-flaps. All gentlemen-players, you know.

Rand. A kitchen! And how did your players perform? [flat as the dresser.

Sir D. Players! Pokers! Empty as pots; and as Lady D. Oh, fie! Sir David! You know, Sir Simon Squab came down from London on purpose; and everybody said his Romeo was charming.

Sir D. Eh! 'gad! that's true; forgot Squab. True, deary; fine, very fine, indeed, for a gentleman: his figure, to be sure, wasn't so cleverly cut out for the character. A fat, fubsy phiz, sunk between a couple of round shoulders, and, d—me! he croaked like a toad in a hole. What do you say to a hop in the garden, eh? Look at the lawn?

Rand. Why, at present, Sir David—

Sir D. I know it—rather not. That's right: no nonsense: I hate excuses. Looks like rain; cursed cloudy; and all that. No ceremony here.

Scru. A little rest after a journey is—

Sir D. Right. By-the-by, talking of that, after a journey, I met with Kit—D'ye know Kit Skurry?

Rand. Never heard of him.

Scru. Nor I.

Sir D. An odd, harum-scarum, absent, flighty fish. Old friend of ours; but a d—d quiz: got acquainted in the queerest way in the world.

Lady D. I've heard Sir David mention—

Sir D. Be quiet. Coming from Paul's one night, where I picked you up in an odd sort of a strange

Scru. Why it was rather— [style—

Sir D. Hush! Got into my coach; all alone, dull as hell, dark as the devil: so, to amuse myself, fell

Rand. Entertaining, indeed! [fast asleep.

Sir D. Very—I know it. When the carriage came to the hill, rubbed my eyes to wake, out of one corner, and saw Skurry stuck up in the other. I thought coachy had crammed in a corpse.

Rand. It looked rather suspicious.

Sir D. Took him for dead, as I hope to live.

Rand. How did you behave?

Sir D. Sat still: frightened out of my wits, till I got home; and John came out with a candle.

Scru. And how did he explain?

Sir D. Easy enough. Got drunk upon business; going to town; popped into my carriage for the mail-coach, to secure a good place before the rest of the passengers; and, as the hostler crossed the yard in the dark, bid him shut the door, and be d—d to him. Made us monstrous merry, didn't it,

Lady D. Extremely. [love?

Sir D. Yes, my lady laughed till she was ready to—Go to the farm, eh? Peep at the pigs?

Lady D. Lard! Sir David, how you tease gentlemen to walk, who have scarcely recovered from the rattle of the road: your friends have no relish for pigs now; besides, it's so late, we shall hardly have time to dress for dinner.

Sir D. Eh! 'gad! that's true. No dinner without dressing. Won't walk? Well, do as you like: I leave you here with my dear Lady Dunder. (To Lady D.) Talk to 'em, deary, do; give 'em a sketch of the county. Some Dover scandal and Canterbury tales; quite in your way, lovey. She knows Scru. Indeed! [all about you.

Sir D. Yes, I told all, just as I had it from Paul. Make her prattle to you, do you hear? Devilish deal of solid sense about her, I assure you.

Rand. That we are convinced of.

Sir D. I'll just take a turn, and abuse my people; see what's going on within and without; house and garden; farm and fire-side: look at the plate and the pantry; gape at the geese, and the ducks, and the dogs, and the hogs, and the logs. Must go—d—d sorry: must mind my little cutter of cabbages; an idle, eating, cheating dog! and would sooner be d—d than dig. He's of no more use in the garden than Adam: for he steals every apple he can find, and won't even take the pains of grafting a gooseberry-bush. [Exit.

Scru. I hope we don't detain your ladyship from walking?

Lady D. By no means: Sir David's horse-walks have given me a dislike to so fatiguing an exercise. I drive round the grounds in a whiskey, now and then; or a canter on a pony—

Rand. But, while Sir David is at his farm, your ladyship has probably your menagerie to attend. Is your ladyship fond of birds in that style?

Lady D. Oh! no, I prefer a little canary in my closet, to all the birds of the air in England.

Scru. No getting rid of her, I see. (Aside.) I wonder your ladyship has given up walking, too; the air of this garden is delightful.

Rand. Charming! And this lawn before the house here. (Walking up to the glass-door with Scruple.)

Enter KITTY, with flowers, HARRIET following.

Kitty. Oh! mamma, mamma! see what a big bundle of flowers I have got.

Lady D. Hush! Kitty—Consider!

Kitty. Eh! what, company? Oh, lud! Two Jemmies, I vow. Do, mamma, introduce us.

Lady D. For heaven's sake! girl—Gentlemen, give me leave to introduce—Kitty. La! mamma, you are so round about always. I'll go and give 'em one of my best curtsies. You'll see now: I'll do it in half the time. (Random and Scruple come forward. Kitty goes up to Random, begins curtsying, looks in his face, drops the flowers, and screams.) Oh!

Rand. Ah! the young lady's taken ill.

Lady D. Mercy on me! Why, girl! why, Kitty! What's the matter with you? (They put her in a chair.)

Kitty. Nothing, mamma—nothing—but something that— [I believe.

Rand. Something that was in the flowers, madam,

Kitty. Yes, yes; a great— [you dropt 'em.

Rand. A great wasp. I heard it buz by me, as

Kitty. Yes, a wasp: it was so. I declare it has so flurried me; seeing what I so little expected. (Looking at Random.)

Rand. How do you find yourself now, madam? A little flurried still, I'm afraid.

Lady D. And I to be without my smelling-bottle, too! Bless me! why, Harriet, you give no more assistance than—

Har. Excuse me, madam; but seeing my sister so suddenly taken ill—

Scru. Has quite affected Miss Harriet's spirits. One turn in the air will relieve them. If the young lady will give me leave to attend her into the garden.

Lady D. You're extremely kind, sir: go, my love. Poor, dear, sympathetic girl! The gentleman will assist you.

Scru. I'll take the tenderest care of her, be assured, madam. [Exit with Harriet.

Rand. If your ladyship would favour us with a little hartshorn—

Lady D. Lard! that I should be so stupid as to leave my salts on the dressing-table. I'll run for them myself in a minute. Sit still, Kitty, my dear; a little of Dalmahoy's pungent will relieve you presently, I warrant. [Exit.

Rand. And now, my dear Kitty!

Kitty. (Rising.) Hush, hush! Lud! you have frightened me out of my wits: I have hardly breath to ask you a question. Where did you come from? who brought you here? how long do you stay? and who do you go away with?

Rand. I came from London; brought here by your father; stay till to-night; and go away with you, my angel. So much for question and answer.

Kitty. With me! You might have asked my consent first, I think.

Rand. Nay, nay, we have no time for forms, now. Your mother will be back instantly, and we may want opportunities: your father knows nothing of me nor my friend; but picked us up at the inn with a common invitation: but delays might produce some cross accident to make our designs known, and defeat our plan. The family retires early, I find: we shall order a post-coach to the garden wall at eleven. Now, Kitty, if we could but find the outside of a certain chamber-door—

Kitty. Oh, gemini! you must not venture along the gallery. You and Mr. Scruple will be at the farther end of it. All the visitors will sleep there. Papa and mamma next to you, and Harriet and I beyond them. I would not venture out for the world.

Rand. No, but if Scruple and I were to venture.

Kitty. Oh! it would be to no purpose. We shall have nothing to do with it: you may creep about in the dark as much as you please, we won't assist you, I promise you. We won't—no, we won't even put a chair on the outside of the door, that you may know our room from the others.

Rand. Thanks, thanks! my dear, sweet, charming, bewitching, little—(Embracing her.)

Enter LADY DUNDER, hastily.

Lady D. Here are the salts,

Rand. That's right, madam; lean upon me: walking about will be of infinite service, I am certain.

Lady D. You're very good, indeed, Mr. Random. How are you now, Kitty?

Kitty. Recovered vastly. Much easier since you left us, mamma.

Lady D. Ay, ay, I knew it would be soon over. Foolish girl, to be in a flutter at such a trifle! but, come, we have troubled Mr. Random too much already: we'll take our leave, and dress for the day. To be alarmed at an insect, indeed!

Kitty. La! mamma, why not? [ship imagines.

Rand. Certainly, there's more in it than your lady-

Lady D. Well, well; you're very good—but—ha, ha, ha! Sir David will laugh finely at this: tottering in a chair, and—you won't forget to tell it at dinner, I dare say.

Kitty. Well, I deserve to be laughed at, I see: foolish enough, to be sure. Come, mamma. (Taking Lady D.'s arm, and looking archly at Random.) You won't forget the chair, I dare say, Mr. Random.

Rand. So! this even exceeds my warmest expectations. If Scruple follows Harriet up closely, our success is certain: but he is so shilly-shally. D—n it, if he lets her reflect, we are lost. Women were never born for reflection; and whenever they have any, it's generally used to turn all our schemes topsy-turvy. [Exit.

SCENE III.—A Garden belonging to Dunder Hall.

HARRIET and SCRUPLE discovered.

Scru. Why, Harriet, why torture me with these needless objections?

Har. Needless! Good heavens! how can I accept your proposals? the indelicacy, the consequences which may follow; the steps, too, your friend is taking with my younger sister—

Scru. My life on't, are guided by honour; and the emergency, the occasion, everything conspires in urging us to take advantage of the moment. The scheme I have proposed is—

Har. In your present situation rash, even to madness: time, too, without so hasty a proceeding, may produce circumstances in our favour. A little delay—

Scru. Will occasion, perhaps, an eternal separation: you know my situation; know that, with prudence, (a virtue, which, I confess, I have hitherto neglected,) it may be essentially altered for the better: but the anxieties I shall suffer by delay; the engagements, which the commands of a father may oblige you to subscribe to; all convince me, if your regard continues, you will favour my warmest wishes. This very evening, Harriet—

Har. Impossible! Press me no further, I beseech you. The peace of a family depends on my conduct. Parents have ties on me, Mr. Scruple, which I should shudder to violate. [for you—

Scru. Absurd! Have not they proposed a match

Har. A detested one, I own: but a thousand accidents may prevent its going forward; and, till I see the strongest necessity for securing my own happiness, I dare not risk the happiness of others, so very, very near to me.

Scru. Still, still, Harriet, this delay!—why take pleasure in tormenting me?

Har. It is not in my nature: bred up in the country, I have imbibed notions, which the refinement of a town education might term romantic; for I have preferred happiness to splendour; nor have I blushed to own to you, the affections of an honest, generous mind, have much more weight with me, than the allurements of pomp and fortune: apprised of these sentiments, tempt me no more, I beg, sir; nor strive to take advantage of a partiality, which would be ill-placed on one who would recommend to me so inconsiderate a behaviour.

Scru. Confusion! But I am to blame, madam; I have relied too much on that partiality, which I see cannot surmount the slightest obstacles. I see I have offended; I shall soon quit a house, madam, where I find my presence is disagreeable. (Going.)

Har. Unkind! ungenerous man! you, too, who read my heart; who see its tenderness, and what this struggle costs me: but prudence urges your departure; go, then; I cannot, dare not, follow you: my actions are not at my disposal. Ah! if they were, I'd share my fortunes with you to be happy.

Scru. Dear, sweet simplicity! Oh! Harriet, forgive my petulance; pardon a passion, whose warmth consumes all bonds. Yes, yes, I will be prudent for your sake, Harriet; and yet I must not lose you; but wish and wait for happier times.

Har. The time will come, assure yourself. My father may put off this match.

Scru. If he should hasten it? [ness.

Har. Why, then—Nay, nay, you know my weak-

Scru. Then I will be content; you must at last be mine. (Taking her hand.) Till then, I'll watch with anxious care about you; still cherish hopes, still curb them at your bidding. Prudence shall chasten passion; prudence, like this fan, my Harriet, tempers the bosom's heat, but never chills it.

Har. Then keep it: (giving the fan) keep it as an emblem of your conduct; and when I claim it, which one day, no doubt, I shall, be it from difficulties removed or yet increasing, or from whatever cause, when once I take it, account me all your own.

Scru. My lovely girl! Oh! may that day—

Sir D. (Without.) Hallo! girls! plague on't! why, where the deuce—[Enter SIR DAVID DUNDER.—Oh! here you are! aha! got acquainted already—that's right: he's as pretty a promising sprig of a—what's he talking of? somewhat sensible—mentioning me? [David?

Scru. We were just talking of you, indeed, Sir

Sir D. Like enough; what, you've got my young puss in a corner?

Scru. I was explaining to Miss Harriet, sir—

Sir D. I know it: isn't she an apt scholar? had it all from me; sticks to a point, keeps close to a subject: harkye! Hal, got news for you—a letter

Har. About me, papa? [from London.

Sir D. Every tittle. Full of flames, settlements, constancy, contracts, peace, and pin-money—made up the match; here it is, (shewing the letter) as neat a mixture of love and law! nothing but harmony and business: just like a drum—all music and parchment. You'll stay the wedding, won't you?

Scru. That I'm afraid will be out of my power.

Sir D. Pooh! pr'ythee, 'twon't be long; make us monstrous happy: Random and you now, eh? shall make no noise about it. Just a snug party. Only a few friends, a roasted ox, a blind fiddler, and a hop in the hall.

Scru. May I ask the gentleman's name?

Sir D. Lord Snolts. D'ye know him?

Scru. His person only; which is by no means in his favour: his lordship is somewhat gummy, extremely short, too, Sir David.

Sir D. Ah! no great hopes of his growing neither. My lord will be five-and-forty come Lammas, I take it. [love.

Scru. Rather an advanced age to begin making

Sir D. Right; we sha'n't lose a moment: he has been making money, however, this long time; rich as a Rabbi.

Scru. Money, I fear, Sir David, is not the only ingredient necessary in matrimony.

Sir D. No! what else?

Scru. The power of Cupid, sometimes.

Sir D. Curse Cupid! he has not a halfpenny to buy him breeches. A love match won't light you a candle, egad!

Scru. And yet a stupid, old, ugly husband, is—

Sir D. I know it: like a heavy old-fashioned piece of plate—always handsome when he's rich.

Har. (After reading the letter.) Be here tomorrow! Bless me, this is so sudden, so unexpected.

Sir D. Right! the best way in the world in these cases. All settled now, but the ceremony; that we'll finish as soon as possible. Marriage is a kind of cold bath, Hal! never stand trembling on the brink: dash away—one plunge, a slight shock, and business is over.

Har. But you know, papa, I have scarcely ever seen his lordship: it will be so hasty.

Sir D. Be quiet! I know it; married so myself,

Hal. Shouldn't have had my dear Lady Dunder, if I had not been hasty. All agreed on before we met; coupled in a quarter of an hour after I saw her; come together as people dance minnets; I bowed, she courtesied, and, egad! I had her by the left hand in a moment.

Scru. But the case here is different. Her ladyship had but little reason for wishing delay: if all husbands, indeed, had equal accomplishments—

Sir D. Eh! why something in that; men aren't all alike; everybody is not blessed with manner and style to—eh!—few such figures as I. But Hal, here, is grave, and studies the mind. My lord has told her his already, you know. So, as soon as he comes, why—

Har. Let me entreat you, sir, not to be so precipitate; let me take a little time to—

Sir D. Take time! Pooh, time steals too fast to be taken, now, Hal. My lord leaves London tomorrow; be here to dinner, to church, in the evening to—eh!—why, what ails you? Look as red, and as pale as—

[of the—
Har. The weather, sir; nothing more—the heat

Sir D. Odso, true; forgot that. Been broiling here in the sun, like a lot of negroes: we'll walk to the house, and—

Har. I attend you; but it has really so overcome me—I—I almost want strength to follow you. (Embarrassed.) I want—

Scru. Your fan, madam?

Sir D. Ay, right: a few flaps in the face would bring her about in a second.

Scru. This, madam, which you have just permitted me the honour of carrying for you?

Sir D. Eh! Did she? Give it her. Take it, Hal.

Har. Shall I, papa?

Sir D. To be sure. Can't well do without it, I think, at present. A mighty civil, dangling, well-bred sort of a—carries it on purpose for you, you see, to give you on all occasions.

Har. If then, on this occasion, the gentleman will return it—(Hesitating.) [dam.

Scru. With the utmost pleasure, believe me, ma-

Sir D. Well done, Dangle, egad! Flap away, Hal. Do you a deal of good.

Har. (Fanning.) How refreshing to the spirits!

Scru. Certainly; it is—it is a sign, Sir David.

Sir D. I know it. Women can't do without 'em. All their airs and graces depend upon it. The tap, flap, flirt, crack, peep, pat, and a hundred uses besides, which I have no notion of.

[had, papa.
Har. (Fanning.) It would not be proper if you

Sir D. Like enough: but let's in, and open our budget: quite delight my lady with the news: she'll be in a terrible pucker. A fine fuss with preparations to-morrow, I warrant: up to the neck in beef, gowns, ducks, jewels, ribands, and puff pastry. Come, Hal. (Going out.) Soon have your swain kissing your hand. (Scruple kisses it.) Come along: soon settle this. Kitty will be coupled next. Cares are all over; and I can now safely swear that most of my uneasiness is behind me. [Exeunt.

SCENE IV.—The Ship Inn.

Enter PAUL PEERY, meeting ROUNDLEE & QUIRK.

Paul. I hope, gentlemen, you have everything to your satisfaction.

Round. I wish we had, with all my heart.

Paul. I am very sorry anything should happen amiss. I do all for the best, your honours—for people in post-chaises. (Aside.)

Quirk. Well, and how goes your house? are you tolerably full at present, eh, landlord?

Paul. Um! Full enough in the larder, your honour. Plenty of fowls, ducks, geese, and pigeons; and butcher's meat in abundance: mutton chops, lamb chops—

[cram us with news.
Round. D—n chops: we don't want victuals:

Quirk. But what company have you? Anybody of note now? Anybody that makes a noise in your house?

Paul. Let me see—first, there's my wife—

Round. Psha! we have nothing to do with your wife, man; we want an acquaintance or two.

Quirk. Ay, haven't you two—two young gentlemen, for instance, above stairs?

[parlour.
Paul. Hum! there's a very old one in the back

Round. Oh, the devil!

Paul. Two young gentlemen indeed came down from London about seven this morning, and they—

Round. & Quirk. What? What?

Paul. Went away about eight, I believe.

Round. D—n! I thought so.

[or—
Quirk. But were they tall or short, or fat or lean,

Paul. Eh! One was in a grey coat, and the other in a green one. Very inquisitive. (Aside.)

Round. (To Quirk.) The very clothes we heard at the hotel they sat out in. What shall we do, Quirk? How shall we turn?

Quirk. Back.

Round. Let's inquire further, however. I suppose now, landlord, you'd like to see two such gentlemen again in your house?

[of your's, I imagine?
Paul. Certainly, your honour. They are friends

Quirk. Why, we should be glad to see 'em again, I promise you. Do you expect 'em back shortly?

Paul. Oh, yes; in a day or two, I make no doubt.

Round. Indeed! I am rejoiced to hear it.

Paul. Nay, perhaps sooner. I guess where they are gone; hardly out of sight of Dover.

Quirk. Ah! at Calais, no doubt; or at Boulogne, edging the coast, as you say, Mr. Roundlee.

Paul. And from what I could gather from the servant, I make no doubt, but their occasions will make them come quickly to our town again.

Round. Rare news, Quirk: you're a very clever, sensible, intelligent fellow, landlord; I am so happy at the thought of seeing my old friends again, egad! I—I begin to find my stomach returning; so you'll get us a chop, and half a pint of your best port.

Paul. It shall be done, sir. Stingy scoundrel! (Aside.) Here, Lewis.—[Enter Waiter.—Lay a cloth in the back room, up two pair of stairs, d'ye hear?

[into the harbour, sir.
Wait. Very well, sir. There's the packet just put

Paul. Ha! anybody particular?

Wait. Mr. Random and another gentleman are

Round. Eh! Who? [coming up the quay, sir.

Quirk. Random! Put back, by all that's lucky.

Paul. Odso! a rare customer! Run, Lewis. [Exit Waiter.] Your snack shall be ready presently, gentlemen, and—

Quirk. But stop and—[tlemen—and—

Paul. And everything to your satisfaction, gen-

Round. We want to—

Paul. Hot, and hot, gentlemen.

Round. Plague of your—

Paul. And I am your very humble servant, gentlemen.—Coming!

[Exit, bawling.
Round. Huzza! rare news, Quirk. The luckiest hit in the world. They are just come on shore, you see, and we shall come in for the cash, at least their persons, which is something towards it, directly. Come, come, we'll send for an officer whilst we are at dinner and drinking a merry meeting. Come, my dear Quirk, we'll soon settle the business, I warrant; and then, after our hot post-chaise scamper, and I've made sure of my money, we'll travel back slowly, at our ease, in the Dilly. [Exeunt.

ACT III.—SCENE I.—A Room in the Ship.

Enter OLD RANDOM, leaning on CARNEY.

Old R. Gently, gently, good Carney! The cursed sea breeze has got hold of my hip, and I can no more move, at first setting off, than a post-horse.

Car. There, there! gently—and now Mr. Random, many welcomes to England again. We have been feeding on French air, like chameleons, and you have grown as strong and as stout as a camel.

Old R. But I have a huge lump of cares on my back, notwithstanding.

Car. But health is the great thing to care about. Why you look as hale and as hearty as ever.

Old R. Indeed! do you think so, Carney?

Car. Think! I know it.

Old R. It has been of service. Before I went over I was as pale and as puffy—flesh without colour, and my face peeping through a parcel of wrappers—

Car. For all the world like a mummy.

Old R. How! why don't you see now—

Car. Oh! quite another thing, sir.

Old R. Another thing, sir! Why, you booby, I am as well as ever I was in my life, except a few pains, a gout, and a cough.

Car. Very true, sir.

Old R. Very true! Then why are you so very costive in your congratulations? Oh! the south of France is the best physician in the world; if it can't cure, it seldom kills, and that's more than most doctors can say for themselves. Then the pleasant time we have passed together; I nursing myself, and you keeping me company, in my room, all the while I was sick, in a fine, charming, warm climate.

Car. Ay, happy days, indeed, Mr. Random. The walks too I enjoyed, in imagination, looking out of your window.

Old R. And so you'd wish to have walked out, and be d—d to you! taking your amusements abroad, whilst poor I was taking physic at home. Here's friendship for you! and a pretty return for the pleasure I found in keeping you close to my bedside all the day long. Lord, lord! what few folks feel for anybody but themselves. [yourself.]

Car. Nay, I'm sure I suffered as much as you did

Old R. Well, well; you are the best of the bunch, I believe—the only man I can agree with. What can be the reason of it, Carney?

Car. The similarity of our dispositions, no doubt; for I talk, eat, drink, and think, exactly as you do, Mr. Random.

Old R. Something in that, I believe; but what a singular, cruel case mine is, that with so many connections and a family to boot, I find such few proofs of people liking me. Plagued with a profligate dog of a son, too; who, because I have indulged in a few trifling pleasures myself, thinks that he must be uninterrupted in his vagaries. Zounds! getting children is worse than getting a fever; they keep an incurable heat in one's blood, and cost a devilish deal of money into the bargain. [hope?]

Car. But there is some prospect of a cure here, I

Old R. No, no—past recovery, I promise you. The dog will be deucedly disappointed to see me so stout again, I fancy. (Coughing.) Eh, Carney?

Car. Impossible, Mr. Random: I can't think him so depraved. I dare say he'll be overjoyed to see you. I am sure, for my part—(pompously.)

Old R. Ay, ay, you are a good soul, Carney, and don't know what ingratitude means—at least I think you don't, for you are continually telling me so; but he—didn't I intend to make him my sole heir, and leave him everything, except my plate, and my pictures, and my houses, and my money? and see his ingratitude! You are talking to me from morning to night of regard and attachment; now he has never made half a dozen of those fine professions

Car. Where is he now? [in his life.]

Old R. Rattling all over the town, I suppose, with his friend Mr. Scruple, without a guinea in his pocket; living like other fashionable puppies, on what he has least of, his wits; laughing at every man who has sense enough not to act and dress like himself; and this is ton and fashion now-a-days. D—e, he's hardly fit for anything. What can I do with him, Carney?

Car. Um! Put him in the Guards, Mr. Random.

Enter PAUL PEERY.

Paul. I hope I see you well, sir? your honour looks charmingly, since I had the honour of seeing your honour.

Old R. See there! How the alteration strikes strangers. (To Carney.) And any news, master Peery? anything stirring lately?

Paul. Nothing; except since your honour arrived—

Old R. Well, and what happened then! Anybody inquiring after me? Who is it?

Paul. Two very inquisitive people.

Old R. Oh! custom-house officers, I imagine.

Paul. No; they came from London: they've asked a vast deal about your honour. Seem rejoiced to hear your honour's arrived.

Old R. Very civil of 'em. I see nothing particular in this, master Peery.

Paul. And I believe they have sent for a constable

Old R. For me, Mr. Peery? [for your honour.]

Car. Impossible! For what?

Paul. Um! perhaps they think his honour's a spy.

Car. Mercy on us! We shall be both apprehended for runners.

Old R. I apprehend that you are a blockhead! Runners! why I can hardly walk, and never spy anything without spectacles. Why, what's the meaning of all this?

Paul. I can guess at no other reason they can have for taking up you, who are just come from France—but perhaps your honour may remember some capital crime you have committed. I am sure, 'Squire Random, a gentleman of six thousand a year, can never want money. [Enter Bailiff and Follower.]

Bai. Is your name Random, sir?

Old R. Well, sir, suppose it is?

Bai. Then, sir, you are my prisoner.

Old R. The devil I am?

Bai. At the suit of Ralph Roundfee, money scrivener, of London, for three thousand pounds.

Paul. The 'squire arrested for debt! it can't be.

Car. I should sooner suspect myself.

Bai. And Mr. Scruple here for the same sum. (Slaps Carney's shoulder.)

Car. Scruple!—Who, I?

Old R. Scruple! Dick's crony, by Jupiter! and I and poor Carney arrested for the dog's debts as soon as we set foot in England: a profligate! a scoundrel! I'll—One moment, if you please: come here, Peery; you see this business?

Paul. Plain enough. [mentions?]

Old R. Do you know of any Mr. Scruple he

Paul. Odso! it's the two young merchants, as sure as a gun, that Sir David carried off in his carriage this morning.

Old R. Merchants! [riage this morning.]

Paul. Yes; and now I recollect, one called the other Scruple, sure enough.

Old R. Well, well, you see the mistake; you must be bail in this business.

Paul. Who, I! Lord, your honour!

Old R. Come, no words. Who is this Sir David you talk of? [lives hard by.]

Paul. Sir David Dunder, of Dunder Hall—

Old R. Order a post-chaise. I'll drive there immediately. [o'clock.]

Paul. But it's so late, your honour. Past ten

Old R. No matter: I'll raise the house. Zounds! I'll raise the dead, but I'll be at the bottom of all this directly: and if you are shy about bail, why—I'll leave honest Carney here in pawn, till I come back. [Mr. Random.]

Car. I'd rather keep your company, if you please,

Paul. Why, as it appears like a mistake, sir, and I have known you backwards and forwards so long, and your estate—and—

Old R. Well, trundle these fellows down stairs. You'll accept of his undertaking?

Bai. We desire no better.

Old R. As to this Mr. What's-his-name? Mr. Roundfee, who is in the house, not a word of it to him, till I return; for particular reasons.

Paul. Everything shall be done to your satisfaction, sir. Come, gentlemen, we'll proceed to the cellar, if you please; the best lock-up house in Christendom.

Car. Mercy on us! what an escape!

Old R. An escape! a scoundrel! an abandoned—What do you think now of all this, Carney?

Car. Think! Why, I—What do you think?

Old R. That you are a blockhead, not to see the meaning of all this: that my son's a blockhead to behave so; and that I'm a greater blockhead than anybody to suffer it. Zounds! I can hardly contain myself. I'll never see his face again. Come along, Carney: I'll be with him, and sooner than he suspects, I believe: I'll unkennel him, I warrant you: I'll disclaim him, I'll discard him, I'll undermine him, I'll undo him; d—e, I'll unget him,—that's, disinherit him: he shall rot in jail: rot me if he sha'n't; I'll teach him what it is to run in debt in person, and get arrested by proxy. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Gallery in Dunder-hall. Four chamber doors at equal distances: a chair placed against the farthest door on the right hand. RANDOM opens the second door on the left.

Rand. So! all quiet: not a soul stirring. (Comes forward.) Sir David, good man, thanks to early hours, is snoring away in the next room to me. I heard him, like a high wind, through the cracks of the old family wainscot. He little dreams of what's to happen before he wakes. Where can Scruple be all this while? He promised to be on the watch, as soon as everything was silent; but he's so cursed slow, and backward in this business. If I were not pretty sure that one woman is as much as any one can manage, I should be tempted to take his nymph away without waiting for him. It's so d—d dark too, that there's no being certain of his door. The chair was a lucky thought; we should have made some confounded mistake without it, I believe. How the plague now shall I make him hear, without disturbing any one else?

Scru. (Opens the farthest door on the left.) Hist!

Rand. Scruple!

Scru. Random, is it you? [as fast as a church.]

Rand. Yes! Softly! all's snug. The baronet's

Scru. And his wife?—

Rand. Pickling, I believe, below stairs in the store-room. The old woman's head is so full of this nonsensical match Sir David has told her of, that she'll be up with the housekeeper, I find, three parts of the night, to make preparations for the wedding. [never get out without her hearing us.]

Scru. 'Sdeath! we shall be discovered: we shall

Rand. Pooh! never have done with your doubts and objections? [weight.]

Scru. Surely, her being up is an objection of some Rand. Certainly, she's of great weight in the house; for which reason, she's gone quite to the bottom of it. She must have devilish good ears to hear us there; for we sha'n't come within a mile of her. But have you heard anything of Tiptoe?

Scru. No: do you expect him?

Rand. Yes: I sent him to Dover, with orders to bring the carriage and horses to the back gate of the garden. It's turned of eleven, too, I take it. Look what's o'clock, will you?

Scru. Look! why it requires the eyes of a cat. It's as dark as a dungeon.

Rand. Odso, I had forgot; but he'll be here presently: I have been obliged to let him into the secret: he has procured a key of the back-door, and will slide up to my chamber; which he has had an opportunity of marking, he tells me, in his own way, to give us intelligence.

Scru. Well, if he is but punctual—

Rand. Oh! you may depend on him: but, till he comes, we may as well prepare our fair companions. I'll try and find out the chair, which is against their dressing-room door, where they are in waiting. (Feeling about.) Their bed-chamber is beyond it; so I may enter without infringing the rules of etiquette, you know.

Scru. Hadn't I better go with you?

Rand. No, no; stay here as an outpost: I shall Scru. Gently, no mistakes now. [soon be back.]

Rand. Never fear. So, here's the chair.

Scru. Remember—caution's the word.

Rand. Ay, and expedition too. The house must divide, you know: so the sooner we clear the gallery the better. (Taps; door opens, and he enters the women's chamber.)

Scru. How awkward I feel in this business. It's the first time I ever entered into a scheme of this sort; and am now convinced that no man thinks of running away, without being cursedly frightened. (Tiptoe singing without—"So great a man, so great a man, I'll be!")—Hark! What's that? Ha! a light. How the devil now am I to find out my room again? It comes nearer and nearer. I must venture. I have three chances to one of doing no mischief; and I dare say my unlucky stars (or rather the want of any stars at all) will direct me to Sir David. So, here's somebody's chamber; I must in, at all hazards. (Goes into the same chamber.)

Enter TIPTOE, with a dark-lantern, drunk.

Tip. Here I am at last. What a plaguy parcel of turnings and windings, to get up to this old crazy gallery. Umph! It has made me as giddy as a goose. Now for my masters; d—n my masters! Scamper! scamper! scamper!—'Twon't do—No; never fit for me. Give me a regular, steady, sober family for my money. If it hadn't been for the lantern I begged of the old boy at the inn—I was forced to treat the drunken scoundrel before he would give it to me—I might have tumbled over the bannisters. Mr. Random, now I think on't, ordered me to come in the dark. Umph! Gentlemen think no more of servants' necks now-a-days—they think we've one to spare, like the Swan in Lad-lane, I believe. But, softly, softly! No noise. I must go to the chamber to tell him the carriage is ready. Let me see; it's the last door but one, at one end of the gallery; but whether it's to the right, or to the left, curse me if I recollect. Stay—(turning round, and counting the doors.) One, two, three. D—e, how the doors dance! I shall never find the right, if they take it in their heads to run round so confoundedly. I remember, (taking the chair, and drawing it along) when I lived with old Lady Hobble, she always sat still at Ranelagh to find out her company. Now, as these gentlemen here, (pointing to the doors,) choose to take a Ranelagh round, I think I had better sit quiet in the middle of 'em, till any old acquaintance comes by. (Pulls the chair against the next door, and sits down.) Zounds! how fast somebody sleeps; Sir David, perhaps. I wonder if baronets ever snore. What the devil am I to do now? Get my head broken for not calling my master; and my bones broken, if I should happen to call anybody else instead of him. As that is the case, I'll call nobody, egad! I'll e'en go back to the carriage, and wait till they come for me. So, gently, steady. [Exit, singing.]

Scru. (After a pause, opens the door.) Once more everything is quiet. I can't conceive who it could be so long with a light in the gallery. I had best give Random notice of what has happened; that in case we are watched, he may be upon his guard. Hereabouts the door must be—(going to the door Random entered.) Eh! no chair—'sdeath, this is Sir David's! A pretty blunder I should have made! (Goes to the next.) Oh, here it is at last. (Taps at the door.) What a number of accidents this little contrivance has prevented. I had better explain to him what has happened, in the inside of my chamber; for it's dangerous waiting on the outside a moment, I find. What the deuce keeps him so long now? (Taps again; SIR DAVID opens the door in his bed-gown and night-cap.)

Sir D. Well?

Scru. Hush! it's I.

Sir D. I!

Scru. Softly! softly! Zounds, you are so unguarded! Follow me. Quick, quick! Only follow me, and you shall hear all. [Exit into his own chamber]

Sir D. Follow me! D—d, if I do, though. Can't stir a step without running the risk of breaking my nose. Cursed queer! A fellow in the dark with no name, a rascal to rob the house, perhaps—egad, it has put me all in a twitter.

RANDOM comes out with a bundle.

Rand. Hist!

Sir D. Eh?

Rand. 'Tis I.

Sir D. So! here's t'other I. (Aside.)

Rand. Where are you? Here! hold this bundle. (Thrusting it into his hands.) Why, what makes you shake so? Are you cold here? [cry out. (Aside.)]

Sir D. Zounds, a thief! He'll cut my throat if I

Rand. For shame, flurried at such a trifle as this! But there's no knowing even one's friends till they're tried, I see.

Sir D. Like enough. Most of your friends have been tried, I dare say. (Aside.)

Rand. But we shall have a whole cargo to carry. Stay where you are now. Don't stir for your life, and I'll be back in an instant. We'll soon make an end, I warrant you. [Returns to the women's chamber.]

Sir D. That you will, a pretty public one too, I take it. Mercy on me! How shall I get away? The dog's given me a bundle here as big as a child. I shall be brought up for a new kind of burglary: cast for breaking into my own house, and hanged for robbing myself of property. My lady's locked up below, I suppose; bound back to back with the old house-keeper; or gagged and ravished, poor quiet soul, with the rest of the family females. If I could but contrive to—(Feeling about.)

Scru. (Putting out his head.) Hallo!

Sir D. Oh, the devil! There's one in every corner, a whole banditti playing at bo-peep. (Aside.)

Scru. Come, come, don't trifle now; I've something to say to you. [deceive him. (Aside.)]

Sir D. The fellow don't know me in the dark. I'll Scru. Nay, this delay will—

Sir D. Hush!

Scru. What's the matter? Anybody coming?

Sir D. Yes, yes.

Scru. Ha! we are discovered. In, in! [Goes in.]

Sir D. Now, if I could but crawl down this back stair-case—(Meets Random coming out.)

Rand. Now, my dear Scruple, all's ready.

Sir D. Zounds! it's the two merchants. (Aside.)

Rand. Our packing is all over.

Sir D. Indeed!

Rand. Our two fair ones both equipped for flight.

Sir D. My Harriet?

Rand. Yes, and my Kitty. They'll be in our arms in an instant, you rogue! and we've nothing to do but to lead them to the coach, and away as fast as love, money, and horses, can carry us. Didn't I tell you now, that your doubts were all nonsense? but, 'sdeath! you are so dull about it: your fears have so overcome you, that—Why a'n't you like me—all rapture, all passion?

Sir D. Hem! (Agitated.)

Rand. Ay, this is right, now! this is as it should be. But I'll go and bring them out. (Going, turns back.) Ha, ha, ha! I can't help laughing to think what a d-d clatter Sir David will make by-and-by. His fat fussy wife, too, cackling about the house, like an old hen that has lost her chickens.

Sir D. Old hen! D—e, I wish she had never sat to have brought such a brood. (Aside.)

Rand. And he, too. Did you ever see such a tedious booby in your life?—But I'll go and conduct our charge.—By-the-by, has Tiptoe been

Sir D. No. [here?]

Rand. Careless scoundrel! But we shall find him at the gate with the carriage, I suppose. Now for it. Now to deliver our damsels from the clutches of an obstinate fool of a father. A blockhead! to think to marry women to whom he pleases! No, no; whenever there's any forbidden fruit, it is not in human nature to rest easy till it is tasted. (Feeling for the door.)

Sir D. Liquorish dogs! (Aside.—Retires.)

Scru. (Coming out.) Why, what could he mean! There's no noise: all's quiet as can be. Random.

Rand. Well!

Scru. Are you ready? [coming.]

Rand. Yes, yes; didn't I tell you so? We're

Scru. Well, well! Tiptoe has not been here.

Rand. Psha! plague, I know it! you told me so

Scru. Did I? when? [already.]

Rand. Why, this instant. But you are in such a flutter, you can't remember a word you say. But you have taken care of the bundle, I hope?

Scru. Bundle! what bundle?

Rand. That which I gave you just now.

Scru. Just now! not you, indeed! Why, you're in a flutter yourself.

Rand. Pooh, pooh! I tell you the bundle I brought out of the room; the bundle that—

Scru. D—n the bundle! I never saw it nor felt it in all my life.

Rand. Now, how can you be so cursed obstinate? I put it into your own hands, and you shook as if you'd an ague.

Scru. Shook! your memory is shook, I believe.

Rand. Egad! I could have sworn I had given it to you. But we must not stand upon trifles, now: time's precious. (Opens the women's door, and HARRIET and KITTY come out.) This way, this way! Now, ladies, we attend you.

Kitty. Lud! it's as dark as pitch.

Rand. Never fear.

Har. Heavens! how I tremble.

Scru. Courage now, my Harriet, and we may soon defy every danger.

Rand. Well said, courage! well said, Caesar, egad! 'Sdeath, madam, if you draw back now, you spoil all. I'll bring you all through, I warrant you

Har. I fear I shall never bear up. The step I am taking, the weight on my spirits—

Rand. Vapours! vapours, from being in the dark; nothing else, believe me, madam.

Har. My mother, too—what will not she feel?

Scru. Nay, pursue this no further.

Kitty. Mamma will be in a sweet bustle, I warrant; rattling about Sir David's ears for bringing you into the house.

Sir D. (Behind.) Be quiet—I know it.

Kitty. Yes, that's exactly like him for all the world. Gemini, I shall never find my way!

Rand. Stay; take my arm. Come, madam. Scruple, arm in arm, all four, and then for our march.

Sir D. March! d—e, but I'll muster among ye, though—(Aside.—Sir David comes forward between them. All arm in arm, Sir David in the middle.)

Rand. So; thus linked, he must be a cunning and a bold fellow, too, that thinks of dividing us. (Going, a bell rings.)

Scru. Hark! somebody rings at the gate.

Har. Oh, mercy! we shall be seen.

Kitty. Lud! there's a light! Hide, hide us, for heaven's sake. It's mamma, as sure as I live.

Sir D. (Aloud.) No, no; stay where you are. Come along, my lady; a light will do us a deal of good.—[Enter LADY DUNDER, with a light.] Servant, ladies and gentlemen. [tlemen!]

Lady D. Mercy on me! Sir David—girls—gen-

Scru. Confusion!

Rand. Sir David!

Sir D. Yes, here we are—been frisking about like a parcel of rabbits: our burrows are all empty.

Lady D. Why, what's the meaning of—

Sir D. Be quiet—meaning? treachery—mean to bamboozle us. Dark night, rope ladders, garden gate, and Gretna-green, that's the meaning of it.

Lady D. How! and is this the return for—

Sir D. Hush! ay, is this the return for my open, hospitable, generous—I that put salt in your porridge, bread in your mouth, and steaks in your stomach; crammed everything into you, but gratitude.

Lady D. And come here on purpose, I suppose, with a trumped-up story of—

Sir D. Trump! d—e, this will be their last trump, I take it. And you, too! (to the women)—You! (to Harriet) you that I intended to link to a lord; to go and give up a peer for a pedler; a merchant; a fellow that lives like a lobster by salt-water; a culler of pepper and spice; a trader in train oil, Greenland blubber, and China pipkins; or a black dealer in devils to sell at American Scru. 'Sdeath! what is all this? [markets.

Rand. If you'll give us leave, sir, to—

Sir D. Give! egad, you'd take leave without asking: French leave, if I had not been here; have smuggled my goods in the dark, trotted over the Tweed, and been hammered together by a bare-breeched blacksmith. A fine Scotch union, egad! my two rich roses here tied to a pair of poor pitiful thistles!—But, zounds! I'll have satisfaction.

Lady D. For heaven's sake! my dear, cool your choler a little, Sir David.

Sir D. Be quiet. What! have I had a sword bobbing between my legs, at Dover hops and quiet country-meetings, for these twenty years, and now not rub off its rust in the oily guts of a couple of whale-catchers, for what I know to the contrary?

Old R. (Without.) Come along, Carney; late as it is, my gentleman can't escape now, I believe.—

Enter OLD RANDOM and CARNEY.

Heyday! the whole family collected. [of it.

Rand. (Aside.) A pretty business we have made

Old R. I beg pardon for this intrusion; but if Sir David Dunder is here, and sees the occasion—

Sir D. I know it: see it all already. Fine occasion, indeed! And you, too, (to Old R.) act as accomplice, do you? an old fellow—Sham! What, you've a wig, now, I warrant, like a young counsellor's; squeezed over a toupee, with a dapper tail peeping out between the ties.

Old R. How!

Car. My worthy old friend means, sir—

Sir D. Hush! he is an old one, is he? Means to run away with my wife, then, I suppose.

Lady D. I fancy he'd find it a difficult matter to carry me off.

Old R. Run away! not I. I came here after a couple of youngsters, that—

Sir D. Did you! There they are. Take them away with you: as pretty a pair as any in England: you can match them against all Europe, egad!

Old R. So, you are two pretty gentlemen, are not you? And how dare you, sir, look me in the face, after your profligate proceedings? (To Rand.) Not content, neither, in contracting debts, but you must have me, your poor father, you dog! arrested

Car. Yes, and me, too. [for them.

Rand. I am at a loss how to comprehend, sir—

Old R. But that rascal, that rogue, Roundfee, I think they call him, he can, I believe. Here have I and poor Carney just been taken into custody for you, at Dover; while you have been playing your pranks, at large, all over the country

Sir D. Eh! be quiet. Cursed ungenteel, though, in you, if you are his father. Zounds! you have used me worse than they! Get yourself locked up for your son here, with a plague to you! that he and his friend may have time to run off with my daughters.

Old R. I! I have withdrawn my countenance long ago, I promise you.

Sir D. Ah! family failing. The son would have withdrawn his countenance, too, if I'd let him.

Old R. How! what, attempt to—

Sir D. Be quiet! I am the injured party. Let

Lady D. No, Sir David, I'll— [me speak.

Scru. To end all confusion, I'll speak.

Rand. What the deuce can Doubtful say now, after all. (Aside.)

Scru. It is yourself, Sir David, who have been chiefly to blame.

Rand. He beats me all to nothing. (Aside.)

Scru. Your unguarded kindness to strangers might have been attended with much more disagreeable consequences. You took our characters from report, I see; characters which we never thought of assuming.

Sir D. Oh! d—n Paul!

Scru. Our invitation was unsought; and though our manner of requiting your favours appears unjustifiable, you may congratulate yourself, that instead of being practised upon by men, unworthy your countenance, you have met with gentlemen.

Sir D. Here's two fine fellows! come into my house, going to carry off half on't on their shoulders, and then—I have met with gentlemen.

Scru. Our conduct, Sir David, is not so culpable as you imagine. A chance, like your present invitation, threw us in your daughters' way at Bath, and our continued affection (I think I may answer for my friend) may prove our motives are unguided by interest: as a further proof of it, we disclaim all views of their fortune. Bestow but their hands, Sir David, and we shall be happy. [too.

Sir D. Eh! zounds! something noble in that,

Lady D. But to think of carrying away our two dear rosy girls here; handsomer than all the pale chits of the county.

Sir D. Hush! Handsomer! ay, and richer, too! with pockets full of money, housewives stuffed with bank-notes, and work-bags crammed with guineas.

Old R. Indeed, I begin to think Dick is not such a sad dog as I took him for. Eh! Carney?

Car. I am perfectly of your opinion, Mr. Random.

Lady D. And what has the other gentleman to say for himself? (To Random.) [neither.

Kitty. Indeed, mamma, we are not much to blame,

Rand. Love, madam, all powerful love, must plead my excuse; a passion which may once have influenced your ladyship's susceptible bosom.

Lady D. Well, I vow the young man pleads so prettily in his defence, that—

Rand. If your ladyship and my father could forget past occurrences, and join with me in my suit to Sir David for an union with his daughter, I hope my future conduct—

Old R. Um!—Why, as things are so, Sir David, and my connections are pretty considerable, my estate pretty well known—

Car. A good six thousand a year. I have known my good friend here some time, and have had his property under my eye for these five years.

Old R. And his friend, I am happy to tell you, is as well connected as he is.

Sir D. Is he?—Well, as matters are, and my lord might find a flaw here, (an ugly business not much to his liking,) I think we can but in honour be off; so, to prevent cursed country scandal, gabbling girls, ugly old maids, and all that, I think we may as well, my lady. [riet!

Lady D. As you think proper, Sir David.—Har-

Har. We are bound now, madam, both by inclination and duty, to follow your commands.

Kitty. Yes, mamma, we are both bound.

Sir D. Well, then—there there!—take one another—no words. [life.

Rand. And now, Kitty, I am your prisoner for Old R. Remember Roundfee, though; there you might have been a prisoner not much to your liking.

Sir D. What! an usurer? D—e, let's duck him.

Old R. Oh! he and his gentleman may be settled with at leisure. Their blunders have left them to our mercy, and they merit none, I promise you: fellows, whose business it is to prey upon the unthinking, extort from the needy, and live upon the distresses of mankind, deserve very little compassion, when they are distressed themselves.

Sir D. I know it. But here, however, they shall have no distresses to prey upon; no moping, melancholy looks now. All's well, I hope, at last, as it ought to be; and nothing ought to give any of us here so much pleasure as looking, to-night, on a set of very merry faces. [Exeunt.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Harvest-scene, at sun-rise, on the banks of the Hellespont.

Turkish Husbandmen and their Wives at work. A perspective view of the castle of Abydos, in Natolia, or the Lesser Asia: the Hellespont appearing to divide the two countries.

Enter SOLANO, SAFRINA, HERO, labouring Men and Women.

Chorus. *All hail the cheerful god of day,
Parent of ev'ry human bliss;
Who (ere he wings his heav'nly way)
Salutes his Thetis with a kiss.*

Saf. *See how creation smiles around!
What melody enchants the grove!*

Hero. *'Tis there the voice of nature's fount
Responsive to the note of love.*

Sol. Well done, my lads; the morning seems to low'r;

*In yonder cloud, methinks, I view a show'r:
Bind up the corn, harness all the cattle,
And let the women quit their idle prattle;
Those lazy sluts are constantly a-gadding;
'Tis such as you that set the fellows madding.*

Hero. *Behold Aurora, with a blushing ray
And rosy fingers, spreads the infant day!*

SONG.—HERO.

*Ere yet Aurora chase the dews,
The lark his matin song renews;
And seems to chide the swains' delay,
To lose so sweet a part of day.*

*See, from the ground his mate arise,
And seems to mock our wond'ring eyes;
Still as she soars, her notes decay,
Till the faint warblings die away.*

Sol. Well, Safrina, what's the matter now?

Saf. *There sits, alas! on gentle Hero's brow,
A settled grief.*

Sol. *Psha! I know the reason:
Hero's nineteen; and that, you know's the season
When females would be married, if they could.*

Saf. Well, what of that? are we not flesh and blood?

SONG.—SAFRINA.

*When I was young, I danc'd and sung,
My heart was lighter than a fly;
No care my youthful bosom stung,
At ev'ry rout, pray, who but I?*

*At length, the urchin bent his bow,
The vagrant arrow hit the mark;
But Hymen, 'solv'd his skill to shew,
Cur'd poor Safrina in the dark.*

Sol. Well done, Safrina! 'fore gad! we all can tell,

There was a time you bore away the bell.

[Thunder. Exeunt Saf. and Hero.

*Away, my lads—the storm is drawing near—
And save the produce of a fruitful year.*

(Thunder and lightning.)

*Well done, my boys! The clouds are all on fire;
A thunderbolt hath struck the village spire.*

(Thunder, lightning, rain, &c.)

*The hills are wrapt in stormy clouds on high,
And feel the dread convulsion of the sky;
Tempests arise, on fortune's ocean low'r,
And rolling billows lash th' affrighted shore.*

(A Man, standing on a rock, cries out—)

Man. A ship, a ship! 'twixt sea and wind she strives.

Sol. Fly all, fly all, and save the people's lives!

SONG.—SOLANO.

*Alas! how chang'd the face of things!
Hark, hark! the howling tempest sings;
Ah! now the rebel winds she feels,
Toss'd on the billows, how she reels!
She's now a wreck, behold on high
Exploded thunder rends the sky;
A dread convulsion moves the shore,
And rocks the deep, unmov'd before.*

The Crew now appear landing. LEANDER, disguised.

Welcome on shore, sir, whether friend or foe,
All are our brothers in this scene of woe. [you

Lean. Thanks to you, gentle friends; and, sir, to
Our constant prayers are ever, ever due;
May all the powers divine your labours bless,
And send you friends, if ever in distress! [youth;

Sol. What means that sigh? ah! tell me, gentle
You seem the child of honour and of truth:
Banish your cares, for see, the God of light
Dispels the gloom that wrapp'd the world in night.

Lean. Stern Boreas, frowning, now forsakes the
And smiling Nature visits us again; [plain,
Each tree its wonted foliage re-assumes,
And new-born zephyrs breathe around perfumes.
Where'er we turn to view our ravish'd eyes,
Luxuriant scenes of endless beauty rise.

SONG.—LEANDER.

*Transparent now, and all serene,
The gentle current flows;
While fancy draws the flatt'ring scene,
How fair the landscape shews!
But soon its transient charms decay,
When ruffling tempests blow;
The soft delusions fleet away,
And pleasure ends in woe.*

Sol. Tell me, gentle sir, from whence you came;
Declare your sovereign, country, and your name;
Are ye from Natolia's rebel coast?
If that be so, 'twere better you were lost.

(Trumpet without.)

The chief is rous'd: behold him, great in arms;
Let Hero now subdue him with her charms:
From yonder mountain's brow he saw your sails;
Dreadful he is—a bashaw of three tails.

(Music plays "See the conquering hero comes.")

Enter ABUDAH, on an elephant, with guards.

Abu. What's this I see? A set of rascal minions,
Hanging together, like a bunch of onions.
I'll hang ye all; ay, scoundrels, before night,
If, on the instant, you don't quit my sight.

Sol. Dread sir, we have got some prisoners here,
That seem half dead already with their fear;
Shipwreck'd upon our coast, we sav'd their lives,
And here they are—

Abu. Say, have they any wives?
The women all are mine; yes, if twenty:
Although, indeed, I've petticoats in plenty.

Sol. We found no female, sir, among the crew.
Shall we discharge the men? pray, what say you?

Abu. Let them all breakfast,
Each a loaf of bread;
And then, let ev'ry prisoner—
Lose his head.

CHORUS.—Prisoners.

*Have pity, great chief,
And send us relief;
We're all in a wretched condition.
Oh! spare our poor lives,
And we'll send you our wives:
Accept this our humble petition.*

(Abudah alights.)

Abu. Silence, rascals! I find you, then, can prate;
But, scoundrels, you shall know, my word is fate.
My sword shall treat the vultures with a feast;
Shall lay whole realms, nay, human nature, waste.

Sol. I told them, sir, how great you were in pow'r,
That with a single puff you'd rock a tow'r;
That you were ten feet high—Was not that right?

Abu. Ten feet, at least: five cubits—no, not Yet ev'ry inch is made of proper stuff, [quite:
Tho' idle nature cast me in the rough.

SONG.—ABUDAH.

*Stand all aloof, ye paltry judes;
And you, ye filthy knaves of spades!
How dare you look beyond those pales,
On me, who wear three thumping tails?
Don't you all know, that at a blow,
I'd send you to the shades below?
Begone, or else, I swear, odsbobs!
I'll send you home without your nob.*

Enter HERO.

*But Hero now her form displays,
And strives to charm a thousand ways;
From head to foot new modes of dress,
Her various arts to please express:
I find I'm caught within the snare,
So I'll enjoy the am'rous fair;
As I'm a soldier great and stout,
This girl has turn'd me inside out.*

Lean. (Aside.) It is, it is my love! Ye gods, be kind! [wind.

Hero. (Aside.) 'Tis he! I give my sorrows to the Abu. What does the fellow stare at? Speak, you
The rascal seems as stupid as a log. [dog!

Lean. Spare your reproaches, sir; I'm ill at ease,
My life is your's, do with me as you please.
See, tear succeeds to tear—a passage seeks, (aside)
And, bursting forth, bedews her lovely cheeks.

Abu. No grumbling, sirrah! Charmer, let's retire; (Takes Hero by the hand.)
The god of love shall fan the keen desire;

My body, blood, and soul, are all on fire. (Going.)

Lean. Monster, avaunt! Release the heavenly fair,
Or, by all the avenging powers, I swear—
(Seizes Abudah.)

Abu. Seize, seize the villain; drag him to the block;

Or toss him headlong from the steepest rock.
No; off with his head. As I'm a sinner,
I'll have his knob, before I eat my dinner.

Hero. Mercy! oh! mercy, sir, as you are great!
Oh! save the youth; at least, suspend his fate!

Abu. Who is the vagabond?

Lean. Why, caitiff, hear!

So shall thy savage nature shake with fear:
Know, then, ingrate, from Abydos I came;
Still more—know thou, Leander is my name.

(Throws off his disguise.)

Now slip thy blood-hounds; 'dudge the savage rout;
I stand unmov'd.

Abu. Oh! now the murder's out!

Thanks to thee, prophet; thanks to thee again!
Speak not in his behalf, you sue in vain;
This is the squire, that braves the Hellespont,
And steals, at night, to madam Hot-upon't.
Zounds! I'll souse him in a tub of pickle;
And as to miss, her toby I will tickle.
Drag him away.

Hero. Great chief, be not cruel, but good as you're brave,
Remember the hero but conquers to save.

Sol. Give life to the wretched, whose fate's in your hand;
'Tis humanity graces and blesses the land.

Lean. I sue not for mercy, I stand here unmov'd,
Protected by virtue, by beauty, and love.

All. Look down, oh! ye gods! and let mortals now prove,
The blessings that wait upon virtue and love.

Hero. Hear me, great sir! Oh! spare Leander's
Grant this request, and Hero is your wife. [life;

Sol. Say, will your actions with your words ac-

Hero. They will, indeed. [cord?

Sol. Then take her at her word.

Lean. I read my Hero's meaning in her eyes.
(Aside.)

Abu. It is all flummery. By heaven, he dies!

Hero. Pardon me, sir, my love for you prevails;
What girl can stand a bashaw with three tails?

SONG.—HERO.

*Oh! sir, be consenting, be kind, and relenting;
Release these poor creatures, and send them away;
Do but this, and you'll find
How good-natur'd and kind
I'll prove to my spousee, by night and by day.*

*Oh! come now, sweet lover, a passion discover;
A sly little Cupid now lurks in that smile:
Ev'ry maid must surrender
To such a commander:
You've found out a way my poor heart to beguile.*

*Behold, like Apollo, his ringlets of yellow!
Behold, how like Mars, at this moment he stands!
His breath, too, discloses
The perfume of roses!
How plump his round cheeks, and how taper his hands!*

Oh! come now, sweet lover, &c.

Abu. A pretty soul it is! Say, will you, miss,
Give your bashaw the earnest of a kiss?
(She kisses him.)

'Tis done, 'tis done! you're pardon'd, rascals: go,
I give you life, my love will have it so.
But if that poaching dog comes here again,
And braves my anger, as he braves the main,
I'll whip the rebel rascal till he's blind.
Be scarce, then, scoundrels, now you know my mind.

CHORUS.—Prisoners.

*Happy, happy, happy day!
Ev'ry heart its homage pay.*

CHORUS.—Turks.

*Wake to harmony the voice;
Rejoice, 'tis mercy calls, rejoice.*

(During this Chorus, Abudah mounts the elephant.)

CHORUS.—All.

*Happy, happy, happy day!
Ev'ry heart its homage pay.
Wake to harmony the voice;
Rejoice, 'tis mercy calls, rejoice. [Exeunt.*

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Grove.

Enter ABUDAH, SOLANO, SAFRINA, and HERO.

Abu. Come, come, Solano; methinks, we tarry;
I shall be all a-gog, until I marry.
The loves in council sit, and from above,
Venus now calls me to the Paphian grove.

Sol. What says my gentle Hero, will you go?

Saf. Her heart seems bursting with its grief.

Hero. Heigho!

Saf. Divide your sorrows, Hero, give me part.
Suppress that sigh, or else you'll break my heart.

SONG.—SAFRINA.

*Alas! I press'd, with growing love,
This darling to my breast;
Not the most favour'd, e'en above,
Was more completely bless'd.*

*Dear innocent! her lovely smiles
Delight me but to view;
And ev'ry pang my Hero feels,
Her mother feels it, too.*

Abu. I see she's coy, yet love is in her eye;
She'll know her bashaw better by-and-by;

*Come, Hero, I hope there's no repenting;
The gods, my pretty chicken, are consenting.*

SONG.—ABUDAH.

*Gentle Hero, take my hand,
Love and life's at thy command:
Joys surrounding,
Sorrows drowning,
Bliss shall gladden all the land.
But if you refuse me,
And think but to noose me
In love's silken fetters,
And sneer at your betters,
By the gods, now, I swear,
From your bosom I'll tear—
No, stop—I'll do more,
I'll deluge the shore
With blood;
Till nature looks wild,
And before I retire,
I'll kindle a fire,
That shall toast you,
And roast you,
Man, woman, and child.*

Saf. Oh! mercy on us! whither shall we fly?

Sol. He'll ravish you, perhaps.

Saf. No, first, I'll die. [Exit with Hero.

Enter DELAH and Soldiers.

Abu. What's the matter, Delah?

(Shouting heard.)

Del. Dread sir, attend:

We've seen a sail—I'm sure she's not a friend—
Hovering on our coast; she's full of people.
I saw her first, great sir, from yonder steeple.

Abu. Rally my forces; instant line the strand;
They're rebel rascals, from Natolia's land.

[Exit Delah. Huzza without.

Like Mars, I'll dart the javelin from my car,—
I scorn to wait, I'll meet the coming war.

(Going; trumpet sounds without.)

Sol. Fir'd by the sound, my genius bids me go,
To share the conflict, and repel the foe.

SONG.—SOLANO.

*Hark! the trumpet sounds afar,
The clam'rous harbinger of war;
Rouse, soldiers, rouse, to arms, to arms,
The call my beating bosom warms;
The foe insults our native shore,
And proudly mocks his conqueror.*

AIR.

*Oh! genius of this happy land,
Descend, and bless thy chosen band;
Give us to meet the daring foe,
'Tis liberty shall nerve the blow.*

*So, when the toils of war are o'er,
And meek-ey'd peace unlocks her store,
Each youthful hero then shall prove.
A sweet reward in faithful love.*

Enter DELAH.

Del. Dread sir, a prisoner we have taken.

Abu. Off with his head! I'll make the fellow bacon.

Del. If you unhead him, sir, he cannot speak.

Abu. What horrid fear sits trembling on thy cheek?

Del. I find, Leander, sir, comes here to-night,
To visit Hero, and secure her flight.

Abu. Death and the devil! this is news, indeed!
Oh! for Bellona's whip, to make him bleed!
He should be more than twenty months in dying,
'Twould make me smile, to see the rascal frying.

Sol. Suppose we seize him as he comes to-night,
Waylay the villain—nab him?

Abu. That is right.

You counsel well, Solano. Come away;
My soul's in arms, and eager for its prey. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—Night. The Hellespont in perspective. Leander is seen rowing himself over. A light appears in Hero's window, as a direction to her lover.

Enter ABUDAH, SOLANO, and Soldiers.

Sol. Behold him, sir! his fate, alas! draws nigh,
And forces e'en the tribute of a sigh.
Like the dread genius of the deep, he steers,
Nor shuns the labour, nor the danger fears.

SONG—SOLANO.

*Oh! see how he comes, how he moves thro' the gloom,
Conducted by fate, and by love, to his doom!
Oh! see the fond youth, to the shore now he bends,
And quits his companions, his country, and friends;
Regardless of danger, he darts through the wave,
'Tis nature commands him, and nature must save.*

Abu. The fellow's got on shore, he'll soon be
The light conducts him to my faithless fair. [here;
Oh! here he comes! be silent all as death,
Let not a creature speak above his breath.

Enter LEANDER.

Lean. Well, so far safe; I now must wait to see
The bright perfection of a deity.
Oh! do not, cruel love, my cares prolong!
I'll wake my gentle Hero with a song.

SONG.—LEANDER.

*Awake, my sweet Hero, my heart's dearest treasure,
Leander now calls you to love and delight;
'Tis Hymen shall sanctify love's softest pleasure,
Give our days all to joy, and to rapture the night.
Awake, then, my charmer, and share the sweet blessing,
The moments now fly me, alas! how distressing!
Oh! think of our joys, when caress'd and caressing,
Arise, my sweet Hero, love calls you away.*

Hero. (Opens the window.) Oh! my soul's joy!
thy cheering voice I hear,
Like notes from seraphs, rushing on my ear.

Lean. Oh! come, my Hero, bless again my arms;
My heart, still constant, beats with love's alarms.
Danger could work no change, nor time remove
The honest warmth of undissembled love.
Haste, then, sweet fair, thy lover's transport meet,
Fly to his arms, and make his bliss complete.

(Hero shuts the window.)

That heaven, from which no secret is conceal'd,
But ev'ry wish and thought must stand reveal'd,
Views not a love more pure, or truer mind,
Amongst the various race of human kind;
Where neither int'rest nor design have part,
But all the warmth is native from the heart.

Enter HERO. (Leander embraces her.)

Oh! bless'd event! let's fly to yonder shore;
We've met, my Hero, now, to part no more.
Hail, happy groves, retreats of peace and joy,
Where no black cares the mind's repose destroy.

Hero. Discharg'd from care, on unfrequented
We'll sing of rural joys in rural strains; [plains,
No false, corrupt delights our thoughts shall move,
But joys of friendship, tenderness, and love.

DUETT.—LEANDER and HERO.

Lean. Come now, my sweet love, to the grove,
The graces are waiting for you;
Thro' roses and woodbines we'll rove,
And kiss, as all true lovers do.

Hero. Oh! take both my hand and my heart,
My lover I know he is true;
Till death shall direct us to part,
We'll kiss, as all true lovers do.

Both. Adieu, then, to doubt, and despair,
Fair virtue our loves will pursue;
We'll know not a moment of care,
But kiss, as all true lovers do.

(They appear retiring to Leander's vessel, but are stopped by Abudah, Solano, Delah, and Soldiers.)

Abu. Bind the villain. Oh! sir, you're caught again!
Knock off his head, and let me have his brain;

Now that my anger's rous'd, my rage is full,
I'll make a punch-bowl of the rascal's skull.

MINERVA, in a cloud, attended by HYMEN, descends.

Lean. Oh! now farewell to hope! My love, adieu!
I die content, because I die for you. [care,

Hero. Oh! make his cause, ye Powers above, your
Let guilt shrink back, and innocence appear!
Support his soul, now death demands his prey,
And smooth his passage to the realms of day.

Lean. May heaven still guard her, with peculiar
And make her happy, as it made her fair! [care,
May calmest peace her future days attend,
And late may she to endless joys ascend!

Abu. Bring me a cauldron, hot as Alecto's kettle;
First Medusa's snaky whip shall try his mettle.
'Sdeath! his blood I'll bottle, and in the dark pro-
I'll sprinkle libations, to the furies round. [found,
(Minerva and Hymen come forward.)

Min. Cease, hell-hound! infernal monster, cease!
I come, the blessed harbinger of peace,
To join in Hymen's bands this constant pair;
The youth deserving, and the virtuous fair;
Their constancy and truth deserve my care. }

(A flourish of trumpets; they kneel, and Hymen joins their hands.)

'Tis wisdom consecrates the sacred bands.

SONG.—HYMEN.

*Sweetest pleasures never ceasing,
Blessings, which the gods present,
Joys with length of years increasing,
Rosy health, and sweet content,
Await the fair, and deck the youth,
United in the bands of truth.*

*And when old Time, with solemn pace,
Shall call to tell them, both must die;
Touch'd, as he views their fond embrace,
He'll bless them first, then pass them by.
Sweetest pleasures, &c.*

Abu. What, then, is all my greatness come to this?
Am I, then, baffled by a paltry miss?
Your power, madam, certainly prevails;
Wisdom, I find, pays no respect to tails.

Lean. Oh! thanks, eternal thanks, to you be given,
Thou best and brightest ornament of heaven!

Min. Now strike the sprightly lyre; all care away,
To mirth and joy we dedicate the day;
I'll raise an altar to love's holy flame,
Inscrib'd with Hero's and Leander's name.

FINALE.

Lean. Joy and pleasure now go round,
Beauty's triumph is to-day;
Ev'ry voice in chorus sound,
This is Hymen's holyday.
Dress a garland for the fair,
Care and sorrow hither go;
Daffodillies,
Virgin lilies!

Hymen says he'll have it so.
Hero. Take my hand, you have my heart,
Indeed, you've had it long ago;
And now we'll never, never part:
Hymen says he'll have it so.

Chorus. Joy and pleasure, &c,
Saf. Cupid is a foolish boy,
Once he try'd on me his bow;
But I never felt a joy,
Till Hymen said he'd have it so.

Chorus. Joy and pleasure, &c.
Abu. Must I, then, give up the fair,
And see them laughing at my woe;
Live and lead a life of care?
The devil, sure, would have it so.

Chorus. Joy and pleasure, &c.
Sol. Observe, ye fair, the moral here:
Let virtue in your bosoms glow;
You then may bid adieu to fear:
Hymen says he'll have it so.

Chorus. Joy and pleasure, &c. [Exeunt.

THE GUARDIAN;

A COMEDY, IN TWO ACTS.—BY DAVID GARRICK.

Act II.—Scene I.

CHARACTERS.

SIR CHARLES CLACKIT
YOUNG CLACKIT

HEARTLY
SERVANT

HARRIET
LUCY

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Hall at Mr. Heartly's.

Enter SIR CHARLES CLACKIT, YOUNG CLACKIT, and Servant.

Sir C. Tell Mr. Heartly, his friend and neighbour, Sir Charles Clackit, would say three words to him.

Serv. I shall, sir. [Exit.

Sir C. Now, nephew, consider once again, before I open the matter to my neighbour Heartly, what I am going to undertake for you—Why don't you speak?

Young C. Is it proper and decent, uncle?

Sir C. Psha! don't be a fool, but answer me. Don't you flatter yourself.—What assurance have you that this young lady, my friend's ward, has a liking to you?

Young C. First, then, whenever I see her, she never looks at me; that's a sign of love: whenever I speak to her, she never answers me; another sign of love: and whenever I speak to anybody else, she seems to be perfectly easy; that's a certain sign of love.

Sir C. The devil it is!

Young C. When I am with her, she's always grave; and the moment I get up to leave her, then the poor thing begins—"Stay, you agreeable runaway! stay; I shall soon overcome the fears your presence gives me." I could say more, but a man of honour, uncle—

Sir C. What, and has she said all these things to you?

Young C. Oh! yes, and ten times more—with her eyes.

Sir C. With her eyes! Eyes are very equivocal,

Jack. However, if the young lady has any liking to you, Mr. Heartly is too much a man of the world, and too much my friend, to oppose the match; so do you walk into the garden, and I will open the matter to him.

Young C. Is there any objection to my staying, uncle? The business will soon be ended. You will propose the match, he will give his consent, I shall give mine, miss is sent for, and l'affaire est fait. (Snapping his fingers.)

Sir C. And so you think that a young, beautiful heiress, with forty thousand pounds, is to be had with a scrap of French, and a snap of your finger? Pr'ythee, get away, and don't provoke me.

Young C. Well, well, I am gone, uncle. When you come to the point, I shall be ready to make my appearance.—Bon voyage! [Exit.

Sir C. The devil's in these young fellows, I think; we send them abroad to cure their sheepishness, and they get above proof the other way,

Enter HEARTLY.

Good morrow to you, neighbour,

Heart. And to you, Sir Charles; I am glad to see you so strong and healthy.

Sir C. I can return you the compliment, my friend: without flattery, you don't look more than thirty-five; and between ourselves, you are on the wrong side of forty—But, mum for that.

Heart. Ease and tranquillity keep me as you see.

Sir C. Why don't you marry, neighbour? A good wife would do well for you.

Heart. For me? you are pleased to be merry, Sir Charles.

Sir C. No, faith, I am serious; and had I a daughter to recommend to you, you should say me nay more than once, I assure you, neighbour Heartly, before I would quit you.

Heart. I am much obliged to you.

Sir C. And now to my business.—You have no objection, I suppose, to tie up your ward, Miss Harriet, though you have slipped the collar yourself. Ha, ha, ha!

Heart. Quite the contrary, sir; I have taken her some time from the boarding-school, and brought her home in order to dispose of her worthily with her own inclination.

Sir C. Her father, I have heard you say, recommended that particular care to you, when she had reached a certain age.

Heart. He did so: and I am the more desirous to obey him scrupulously in this circumstance, as she will be a most valuable acquisition to the person who shall gain her; for, not to mention her fortune, which is the least consideration, her sentiments are worthy her birth; she is gentle, modest, and obliging. In a word, my friend, I never saw youth more amiable or discreet—but perhaps I am a little partial to her.

Sir C. No, no; she is a delicious creature, every body says so.—But I believe, neighbour, something has happened that you little think of.

Heart. What, pray, Sir Charles?

Sir C. My nephew, Mr. Heartly—

Re-enter YOUNG CLACKIT.

Young C. Here I am at your service, sir. My uncle is a little unhappy in his manner; but I'll clear the matter in a moment. Miss Harriet, sir, your ward—

Sir C. Get away, you puppy!

Young C. Miss Harriet, sir, your ward, a most accomplished young lady, to be sure—

Sir C. Thou art a most accomplished coxcomb, to be sure.

Heart. Pray, Sir Charles, let the young gentleman speak.

Young C. You'll excuse me, Mr. Heartly; my uncle does not set up for an orator: a little confused or so, sir. You see me what I am; but I ought to ask pardon for the young lady and myself. We are young, sir. I must confess we were wrong to conceal it from you; but my uncle, I see, is pleased to be angry; and, therefore, I shall say no more at present.

Sir C. If you don't leave the room this moment, and stay in the garden till I call you—

Young C. I am sorry I have displeased you—I did not think it was mal-à-propos; but you must have your way, uncle. You command, I submit: Mr. Heartly, your's. [Exit.]

Sir C. Puppy! (Aside)—My nephew's a little unthinking, Mr. Heartly, as you see; and, therefore, I have been a little cautious how I have proceeded in this affair: but, indeed, he has persuaded me, in a manner, that your ward and he are not ill together.

Heart. Indeed! This is the first notice I have had of it, and I cannot conceive why Miss Harriet should conceal it from me; for I have often assured her that I would never oppose her inclination, though I might endeavour to direct it.

Sir C. You are right, neighbour—But here she is.

Enter HARRIET and LUCY.

Har. He is with company; I'll speak to him another time. (Retires.)

Lucy. Young, handsome, and afraid of being seen.—You are very particular, miss. (Apart to Harriet.)

Heart. Miss Harriet, you must not go.—(Harriet returns)—Sir Charles, give me leave to introduce you to this young lady. (Introduces her.)—

You know, I suppose, the reason of this gentleman's visit to me?

Har. Sir! (Confused.)

Heart. Don't be disturbed, I shall not reproach you with anything but keeping your wishes a secret from me so long.

Har. Upon my word, sir—Lucy!

Lucy. Well, and Lucy! I'll lay my life 'tis a treaty of marriage. Is that such a dreadful thing? Oh! for shame, madam! Young ladies of fashion are not frightened at such things now-a-days.

Heart. (To Sir Charles.) We have gone too far, Sir Charles. We must excuse her delicacy, and give her time to recover: I had better talk with her alone; we will leave her now. Be persuaded, that no endeavours shall be wanting on my part to bring this affair to a happy and speedy conclusion.

Sir C. I shall be obliged to you, Mr. Heartly. Young lady, your servant.—What grace and modesty! She is a most engaging creature, and I shall be proud to make her one of my family. (To Heartly.)

Heart. You do us honour, Sir Charles.

[Exeunt Sir Charles and Heartly.]

Lucy. Indeed, Miss Harriet, you are very particular. You was tired of the boarding-school, and yet seem to have no inclination to be married. What can be the meaning of all this? That smirking old gentleman is uncle to Mr. Clackit; and, my life for it, he has made some proposals to your guardian.

Har. Pr'ythee, don't plague me about Mr. Clackit.

Lucy. But why not, miss? Though he is a little fantastical, loves to hear himself talk, and is somewhat self-sufficient, you must consider he is young, has been abroad, and keeps good company. The trade will soon be at an end, if young ladies and gentlemen grow over nice and exceptionous.

Har. But if I can find one without these faults, I may surely please myself.

Lucy. Without these faults! and is he young, miss?

Har. He is sensible, modest, polite, affable, and generous; and charms from the natural impulses of his own heart, as much as others disgust by their senseless airs and insolent affectation.

Lucy. Upon my word!—But why have you kept this a secret so long? Your guardian is kind to you beyond conception. What difficulties can you have to overcome?

Har. Why, the difficulty of declaring my sentiments.

Lucy. Leave that to me, miss.—But your spark, with all his accomplishments, must have very little penetration not to have discovered his good fortune in your eyes.

Har. I take care that my eyes don't tell too much; and he has too much delicacy to interpret looks to his advantage. Besides, he would certainly disapprove my passion; and if I should ever make the declaration, and meet with a denial, I should absolutely die with shame.

Lucy. I'll ensure your life for a silver thimble.—But what can possibly hinder your coming together.

Har. His excess of merit.

Lucy. His excess of a fiddlestick! But come, I'll put you in the way: you shall trust me with the secret; I'll entrust it again to half a dozen friends; they shall entrust it to half a dozen more; by which means, it will travel half the world over in a week's time: the gentleman will certainly hear of it, and then if he is not at your feet in the fetching of a sigh, I'll give up all my perquisites at your wedding. What is his name, miss?

Har. I cannot tell you his name; indeed, I cannot: I am afraid of being thought too singular. But why should I be ashamed of my passion? Is the impression which a virtuous character makes upon our hearts such a weakness that it may not be excused?

Lucy. By my faith, miss, I can't understand you: you are afraid of being thought singular, and you really are so. I would sooner renounce all the passions in the universe, than have one in my bosom beating and fluttering itself to pieces.

Re-enter HEARTLY.

Heart. Leave us, Lucy.

Lucy. There's something going forward; 'tis very hard I can't be of the party. [Aside, and exit.]

Heart. She certainly thinks, from the character of the young man, that I shall disapprove of her choice. [Aside.]

Har. What can I possibly say to him? I am as much ashamed to make the declaration, as he would be to understand it. [Aside.]

Heart. Don't imagine that I would know more of your thoughts than you desire I should; but the tender care which I have ever shewn, and the sincere friendship which I shall always have for you, give me a sort of right to inquire into everything that concerns you. Some friends have spoken to me in particular; but that is not all—I have lately found you thoughtful, absent, and disturbed. Be plain with me; has not somebody been happy enough to please you?

Har. I cannot deny it, sir; yes, somebody indeed has pleased me. But I must entreat you not to give credit to any idle stories, or inquire further into the particulars of my inclination; for I cannot possibly have resolution enough to say more to you.

Heart. But have you made a choice, my dear?

Har. I have, in my own mind, sir; and 'tis impossible to make a better; reason, honour, everything must approve it.

Heart. And how long have you conceived this passion?

Har. Ever since I left the country—to live with you. [Sighs.]

Heart. I see your confusion, and will relieve you from it immediately. I am informed of the whole—

Har. Sir!

Heart. Don't be uneasy; for I can, with pleasure, assure you that your passion is returned with equal tenderness. [happy.]

Har. If you are not deceived, I cannot be more

Heart. I think I am not deceived; but after the declaration you have made, and the assurances which I have given you, why will you conceal it any longer? Have I not deserved a little more confidence from you?

Har. You have, indeed, deserved it; and should certainly have it, were I not well assured that you would oppose my inclinations.

Heart. I oppose them! Am I, then, so unkind to you, my dear Harriet? Can you in the least doubt of my affection for you? I promise you that I have no will but your's.

Har. Since you desire it, then, I will endeavour to explain myself.

Heart. I am all attention; speak.

Har. And if I do, I feel I shall never be able to speak to you again.

Heart. I see your delicacy is hurt. But let me entreat you once more to confide in me. Tell me his name, and the next moment I will go to him, and assure him that my consent shall confirm both your happiness.

Har. You will easily find him; and when you have, pray tell him how improper it is for a young woman to speak first. Persuade him to spare my blushes, and to release me from so terrible a situation. I shall leave him with you; and hope that this declaration will make it impossible for you to mistake me any longer. [Going.]

Enter YOUNG CLACKIT. (Harriet remains on the stage.)

Heart. Are we not alone? What can she mean? [Aside.]

Young C. Apropos, 'faith! Here they are together.

Heart. I did not see him; but now the riddle's explained. [Aside.]

Har. What can he want now? This is the most spiteful interruption! [Aside.]

Young C. By your leave, Mr. Heartly. [Crosses him to go to Harriet.] Have I caught you at last, my divine Harriet? Well, Mr. Heartly, sans façon—But what's the matter? Things look a little gloomy here; one mutters to himself, and gives me no answer, and the other turns her head and winks at me. How the devil am I to interpret all this?

Har. I wink at you, sir? Did I, sir?

Young C. Yes, you, my angel! but, mum!—Mr. Heartly, for heaven's sake, what is all this? Speak, I conjure you, is it life or death with me?

Har. What a dreadful situation I am in!

Young C. Hope for the best; I'll bring matters about, I warrant you.

Heart. Miss Harriet's will is a law to me; and for you, sir, the friendship which I have ever professed for your uncle is too sincere not to exert some of it upon this occasion.

Har. I shall die with confusion! [Aside.]

Young C. I am alive again. Dear Mr. Heartly, thou art a most adorable creature! What a happiness it is to have to do with a man of sense, who has no foolish prejudices, and can see when a young fellow has something tolerable about him!

Heart. Sir, not to flatter you, I must declare, that it is from a knowledge of your friends and family, that I have hopes of seeing you and this young lady happy. I will go directly to your uncle, and assure him that everything goes on to our wishes. [Going.]

Har. Mr. Heartly—pray, sir—

Heart. Poor Harriet! I see your distress, and am sorry for it; but it must be got over, and the sooner the better. [Aside.] Mr. Clackit, my dear, will be glad of an opportunity to entertain you for the little time that I shall be absent? Poor Miss Harriet! [Exit.]

Young C. Allez, allez, monsieur! I'll answer for that. Well, ma'am, I think everything succeeds to our wishes. Be sincere, my adorable—Don't you think yourself a very happy young lady?

Har. I shall be most particularly obliged to you, sir, if you would inform me what is the meaning of all this.

Young C. Inform you, miss? The matter, I believe, is pretty clear: our friends have understanding—we have affections—and a marriage follows of course.

Har. Marriage, sir! Pray, what relation or particular connexion is there between you and me, sir?

Young C. I may be deceived, 'faith! but, upon my honour, I always supposed that there was a little smattering of inclination between us.

Har. And have you spoken to my guardian upon this supposition, sir?

Young C. And are you angry at it? I believe not.

Har. Indeed, sir, this behaviour of your's is most extraordinary.

Young C. Upon my soul, this is very droll. What! has not your guardian been here this moment, and expressed all imaginable pleasure at our intended union?

Har. He is in an error, sir; and had I not been too much astonished at your behaviour, I had undeceived him long before now.

Young C. (Hums a tune.) But, pray, miss, what can be your intention in raising all this confusion in the family, and opposing your own inclinations?

Har. Opposing my own inclinations, sir?

Young C. Ay, opposing your own inclinations, madam.

Har. Be assured, sir, I never in my life had the least thought about you.

Young C. Come, come, I know what I know.

Har. Don't make yourself ridiculous, Mr. Clackit.

Young C. Don't you make yourself miserable, Miss Harriet.

Har. I am only so when you persist to torment me.

Young C. And you really believe that you don't love me?

Har. Positively not.

Young C. And you are very sure, now, that you hate me? (Conceitedly.)

Har. Oh! most cordially!

Young C. Poor young lady! I do pity her from my soul.

Har. Then why don't you leave me?

Young C. "*She never told her love,
But let concealment, like a worm i' th' bud,
Feed on her damask cheek.*"

Take warning, miss; when you once begin to pine in thought, 'tis all over with you; and, be assured, since you are obstinately bent to give yourself airs, that if you once suffer me to leave this house in a pet—do you mind me?—not all your sighing, whining, fits, vapours, and hysterics, shall ever move me to take the least compassion on you. Coûte qu'il coûte.

Re-enter HEARTLY and SIR CHARLES CLACKIT.

Sir C. There they are, the pretty doves! That is the age, neighbour Heartly, for happiness and pleasure.

Heart. I am willing, you see, to lose no time, which may convince you, Sir Charles, how proud I am of this alliance in our families.

Sir C. 'Gad! I will send for the fiddles, and take a dance myself, and a fig for the gout and rheumatism. But, hold, hold! the lovers, methinks, are a little out of humour with each other. What is the matter, Jack? Not pouting, sure, before your time?

Young C. A trifle, sir; the lady will tell you. (Hums a tune.)

Heart. You seem to be troubled, Harriet! What can this mean?

Har. You have been in an error, sir, about me; I did not undeceive you, because I could not imagine that the consequences could have been so serious and so sudden; but I am now forced to tell you that you have misunderstood me—that you have distressed me.

Heart. How, my dear?

Sir C. What do you say, miss?

Young C. Mademoiselle is pleased to be out of humour; but I can't blame her; for, upon my honour, I think a little coquetry becomes her.

Sir C. Ay, ay, ay! oh, oh! is that all? These little squalls seldom upset the lover's boat, but drive it the faster to port. Ay, ay, ay!

Young C. Talk to her a little, Mr. Heartly. She is a fine lady, and has many virtues; but she does not know the world.

Heart. For heaven's sake, Miss Harriet, explain this riddle to me.

Har. I cannot, sir. I have discovered the weakness of my heart; I have discovered it to you, sir; but your unkind interpretations and reproachful looks convince me that I have already said but too much. [Exit.]

Sir C. Well, but harkye! nephew, this is going a little too far. What have you done to her?

Heart. I never saw her so agitated before.

Young C. Upon my soul, gentlemen, I am as much surprised at it as you can be. The little brouillerie between us, arose upon her persisting that there was no passion, no penchant between us.

Sir C. I'll tell you what, Jack; there is a certain kind of impudence about you, that I don't approve of.

Young C. But what can the lady object to? I have offered to marry her, is not that a proof sufficient I like her? A young fellow must have some affection that will go such lengths to indulge it. Ha, ha!

Sir C. Why, really, friend Heartly, I don't see how a young man can well do more, or a lady desire more. What say you, neighbour?

Heart. Upon my word, I am puzzled about it; my thoughts upon the matter are so various and so confused. Everything I see and hear is so contradictory—is so—She certainly cannot like anybody else!

Young C. No, no; I'll answer for that.

Heart. Or she may be fearful, then, that your passion for her is not sincere; or, like other young men of the times, you may grow careless upon marriage, and neglect her.

Young C. Ha! Egad! you have hit it; nothing but a little, natural, delicate sensibility. (Hums a tune.)

Heart. If so, perhaps the violence of her reproaches may proceed from the lukewarmness of your professions.

Young C. Je vous demande pardon. I have sworn to her, a hundred and a hundred times, that she should be the happiest of her sex: but there is nothing surprising in all this; it is the misery of an over-fond heart, to be always doubtful of its happiness.

Heart. And if she marries thee, I fear that she'll be kept in a state of doubt as long as she lives. (Aside.)

Re-enter LUCY.

Lucy. Pray, gentlemen, which of you has affronted my mistress? She is in a most prodigious taking yonder, and vows to return into the country again.

Young C. Poor thing!

Heart. I must inquire further into this; her behaviour is too particular for me not to be disturbed at it.

Lucy. She desires that when she has recovered herself, she may talk with you alone, sir. (To Heartly.)

Heart. I shall with pleasure attend her.

[Exit Lucy.]

Sir C. I would give, old as I am, a leg or an arm, to be beloved by that sweet creature as you are, Jack.

Young C. And throw your gout and rheumatism into the bargain, uncle? Ha, ha! Divine Bacchus! La, la, la, &c. (Sings.)

Sir C. I wonder what the devil is come to the young fellows of this age, neighbour Heartly? Why, a fine woman has no effect upon them. Is there no method to make them less fond of themselves, and more mindful of the ladies?

Heart. Lookye! Mr. Clackit; if Miss Harriet's affections declare for you, she must not be treated with neglect or disdain: nor could I bear it, sir. Any man must be proud of her partiality to him; and he must be fashionably insensible, indeed, who would not make it his darling care to defend from every inquietude the most delicate and tender of her sex.

Sir C. Most nobly and warmly said, Mr. Heartly. Go to her, nephew, directly; throw yourself at her feet, and swear how much her beauty and virtue have captivated you, and don't let her go till you have set her dear little heart at rest.

Young C. Would you have me say the same thing over and over again? I can't do it, positively: it is my turn to be piqued now.

Sir C. D—n your conceit, Jack, I can bear it no longer.

Heart. I am very sorry to find that any young lady, so near and dear to me, should bestow her heart where there is so little prospect of its being valued as it ought. However, I shall not oppose my authority to her inclinations; and so—Who waits there?

Enter a Servant.

Let the young lady know that I shall attend her commands in the library. [Exit Servant.] Will you excuse me, gentlemen?

Sir C. Ay, ay; we'll leave you to yourselves; and, pray, convince her that I and my nephew are most sincerely her very humble servants.

Young C. Oh! yes, you may depend upon me.

Heart. A very slender dependence, truly!

[Aside, and exit.]

Young C. We'll be with you again to know what your tête-à-tête produces; and, in the meantime, I am her's—and your's. Adieu! Come, uncle. Fal, la, la, la! (Sings.)

Sir C. I could knock him down with pleasure. (Aside.) [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Library.

HEARTLY and a Servant discovered.

Heart. Tell Miss Harriet that I am here: if she is indisposed, I will wait upon her in her own room. [Exit Servant.] However mysterious her conduct appears to me, yet still it is to be deciphered. This young gentleman has certainly touched her: there are some objections to him; and among so many young men of fashion that fall in her way, she certainly might have made a better choice: she has an understanding to be sensible of this; and, if I am not mistaken, it is a struggle between her reason and her passion that occasions all this confusion. But here she is.

Enter HARRIET.

Har. I hope you are not angry, sir, that I left you so abruptly, without making any apology?

Heart. I am angry that you think an apology necessary. The matter we were upon was of such a delicate nature, that I was more pleased with your confusion than I should have been with your excuses. You'll pardon me, my dear.

Har. I have reflected that the person for whom I have conceived a most tender regard, may, from the wisest motives, doubt of my passion; and, therefore, I would endeavour to answer all his objections, and convince him how deserving he is of my highest esteem.

Heart. I have not yet apprehended what kind of dispute could arise between you and Mr. Clackit: but I would advise you both to come to a reconciliation as soon as possible.

Har. He still continues in his error, and I cannot undeceive him. (Aside.)

Heart. Shall I take the liberty of telling you, my dear—(Takes her hand.) You tremble, Harriet! What is the matter with you?

Har. Nothing, sir. Pray, go on.

Heart. I guess whence proceeds all your uneasiness: you fear that the world will not be so readily convinced of this young gentleman's merit as you are; and, indeed, I could wish him more deserving of you; but your regard for him gives him a merit he otherwise would have wanted, and almost makes me blind to his failings.

Har. And would you advise me, sir, to make choice of this gentleman?

Heart. I would advise you, as I always have done, to consult your own heart upon such an occasion.

Har. If that is your advice, I will most religiously follow it; and, for the last time, I am resolved to discover my real sentiments; but as a confession of this kind will not become me, I have been thinking of some innocent stratagem to spare my blushes, and, in part, to relieve me from the shame of a declaration—Might I be permitted to write to him?

Heart. I think you may, my dear, without the least offence to your delicacy: and, indeed, you ought to explain yourself; your late misunderstanding makes it absolutely necessary.

Har. Will you be kind enough to assist me? Will you write it for me, sir?

Heart. Oh! most willingly: and as I am made a party, it will remove all objections.

Har. I will dictate to you in the best manner I am able. (Sighs.)

Heart. Here is pen, ink, and paper; and now, my dear, I am ready. He is certainly a man of family; and though he has some little faults, time and your virtues will correct them. Come, what shall I write? (Prepares to write.)

Har. Pray, give me a moment's thought;—tis a terrible task, Mr. Heartly.

Heart. I know it is. Don't hurry yourself; I shall wait with patience. Come, Miss Harriet.

Har. (Dictating.) "It is in vain for me to conceal from one of your understanding the secrets of my heart"—

Heart. (Writes.) "The secrets of my heart."

Har. "Though your humility and modesty will not suffer you to perceive it"—

Heart. Do you think that he is much troubled with those qualities?

Har. Pray, indulge me, sir.

Heart. I beg your pardon. "Your humility and modesty will not suffer you to perceive it." So!

Har. "Everything tells you that it is you that I love"—

Heart. Very well.

Har. Yes; "you that I love." Do you understand me?

Heart. Oh! yes, yes; I understand you—"that it is you that I love." This is very plain, my dear.

Har. I would have it so. "And though I am already bound in gratitude to you"—

Heart. In gratitude to Mr. Clackit?

Har. Pray, write, sir.

Heart. Well; "in gratitude to you." I must write what she would have me. (Aside.)

Har. "Yet my passion is a most disinterested one"—

Heart. "Most disinterested one."

Har. "And to convince you, that you owe much more to my affections"—

Heart. And then?

Har. "I could wish that I had not experienced"—

Heart. Stay, stay! "Had not experienced."

Har. "Your tender care of me in my infancy"—

Heart. What did you say? Did I hear right, or am I in a dream? (Aside.)

Har. Why have I declared myself? He'll hate me for my folly. (Aside.)

Heart. Harriet!

Har. Sir?

Heart. To whom do you write this letter?

Har. To—to—Mr. Clackit—is it not?

Heart. You must not mention then the care of your infancy: it would be ridiculous.

Har. It would, indeed! I own it; it is improper.

Heart. Then I'll only finish your letter with the usual compliment, and send it away.

Har. Yes—send it away—if you think I ought to send it.

Heart. (Troubled.) Ought to send it! Who's there?

Enter a Servant.

Carry this letter. (An action escapes from Harriet, as if to hinder the sending the letter.) Is it not for Mr. Clackit?

Har. (Peevishly.) Who can it be for?

Heart. (To the Servant.) Here, take this letter to Mr. Clackit. [Gives the letter; exit Servant.]

Har. He disapproves my passion, and I shall die with confusion. (Aside.)

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. The conversation is over, and I may appear. (Aside.) Sir Charles is without, sir, and is impatient to know your determination. May he be permitted to see you?

Heart. I must retire, to conceal my weakness. [Aside, and exit.]

Lucy. Upon my word, this is very whimsical. What is the reason, miss, that your guardian is gone away without giving me an answer?

Har. What a contempt he must have for me to behave in this manner! [Aside, and exit.]

Lucy. Extremely well this, and equally foolish on both sides! But what can be the meaning of it? What a shame it is that I don't know more of this matter; a wench of spirit as I am, a favourite of my mistress, and as inquisitive as I ought to be? It is an affront to my character, and I must have satisfaction immediately. (Going.) I will go directly to my young mistress, tease her to death till I am at the bottom of this; and if threatening, soothing, scolding, whispering, crying, and lying, will not prevail, I will e'en give her warning—and go upon the stage. [Exit.]

Re-enter HEARTLY.

Heart. The more I reflect upon what has passed, the more I am convinced that she did not intend writing to this young fellow. What am I to think of it, then? Had not my reason made a little stand against my presumption, I might have interpreted some of Harriet's words in my own favour; but can it be possible that so young a creature should even cast a thought of that kind upon me? Upon me! No, no; I will do her and myself the justice to acknowledge, that, for a very few slight appearances, there are a thousand reasons that destroy so ridiculous a supposition.

Enter SIR CHARLES CLACKIT.

Sir C. Well, Mr. Heartly, what are we to hope for?

Heart. Upon my word, sir, I am still in the dark; we puzzle about, indeed, but we don't get forward.

Sir C. What the devil is the meaning of all this? There never, sure, were lovers so difficult to bring together. But have you not been a little too rough with the lady? for as I passed by her but now, she seemed a little out of humour; and, upon my faith, not the less beautiful for a little pouting.

Heart. Upon my word, Sir Charles, what I can collect from her behaviour is, that your nephew is not so much in her good graces as he made you believe.

Sir C. Egad, like enough. But hold, hold! this must be looked a little into: if it is so, I would be glad to know why and wherefore I have been made so ridiculous. Eh! master Heartly, does he take me for his fool, his beast, his Merry Andrew? By the lord Harry—

Heart. He is of an age, Sir Charles—

Sir C. Ay, of an age to be very impertinent; but I shall desire him to be less free with his uncle for the future, I assure him.

Re-enter LUCY.

Lucy. I have it, I have it, gentlemen! you need not puzzle any more about the matter: I have got the secret. I know the knight-errant that has wounded our distressed lady.

Sir C. Well, and who, and what, child?

Lucy. What, has not she told you, sir? (To Heartly.)

Heart. Not directly.

Lucy. So much the better. What pleasure it is to discover a secret, and then tell it to all the world! I pressed her so much that she at last confessed.

Sir C. Well, what?

Lucy. That, in the first place, she did not like your nephew.

Sir C. And I told the puppy so.

Lucy. That she had a most mortal antipathy for the young men of this age; and that she had settled her affections upon one of riper years and riper understanding.

Sir C. Indeed!

Lucy. And that she expected from a lover in his autumn, more affection, more complaisance, more constancy, and more discretion, of course.

Heart. This is very particular.

Sir C. Ay, but it is very prudent for all that.

Lucy. In short, as she had openly declared against the nephew, I took upon me to speak of his uncle.

Sir C. Of me, child?

Lucy. Yes, of you, sir; and she did not say me nay; but cast such a look, and fetched such a sigh—that if ever I looked and sighed in my life, I know how it is with her.

Sir C. What the devil!—Why, surely—Eh, Lucy! You joke for certain—Mr. Heartly!—Eh!

Lucy. Indeed I do not, sir. 'Twas in vain for me to say that nothing could be so ridiculous as such a choice: nay, sir, I went a little further, (you'll excuse me,) and told her—"Good God, madam," said I, "why he is old and gouty, asthmatic, rheumatic, sciatic, spleen-atic,"—It signified nothing, she had determined.

Sir C. But you need not have told her all that. It can't be me: no, no; it can't be me.

Lucy. But I tell you it is, sir. You are the man.

Sir C. Say you so? Why, then, monsieur nephew, I shall have a little laugh with you. Ha, ha, ha!—Your betters must be served before you. But here he comes—Not a word, for your life. We'll laugh at him most triumphantly. Ha, ha! but mum, mum!

Enter YOUNG CLACKIT.

Young C. Meeting by accident with some artists of the string, and my particular friends, I have brought them to celebrate Miss Harriet's and my approaching happiness. (To Heartly.)

Sir C. Do you hear the puppy? (Apart to Lucy.)

Heart. It is time to clear up all mistakes.

Sir C. Now for it.

Heart. Miss Harriet, sir, was not destined for you.

Young C. What do you say, sir?

Heart. That the young lady has fixed her affections upon another.

Young C. Upon another?

Sir C. Yes, sir, another; that is English, sir; and you may translate it into French, if you like it better.

Young C. Very well, sir, extremely well.

Sir C. And that other, sir, is one to whom you owe great respect.

Young C. I am his most respectful humble servant.

Sir C. You are a fine youth, my sweet nephew, to tell me a story of a cock and a bull, of you and the young lady, when you have no more interest in her than the czar of Muscovy.

Young C. (Smiles.) But, my dear uncle, don't carry this jest too far; I shall begin to be uneasy: but whoever my precious rival is, he must prepare himself for a little humility; for, be he ever so mighty, my dear uncle, I have that in my pocket will lower his top-sails for him. (Searching his pocket.)

Sir C. Well, what's that?

Young C. A fourteen pounder only, my good uncle: a letter from the lady. (Takes it out of his pocket.)

Sir C. What! to you?

Young C. To me, sir: this moment received, and overflowing with the tenderest sentiments.

Sir C. To you?

Young C. Most undoubtedly. She reproaches me with my excessive modesty; there can be no mistake.

Sir C. What letter is this he chatters about? (To Heartly.)

Heart. One written by me, and dictated by the young lady.

Sir C. What! sent by her to him?

Heart. I believe so.

Sir C. Well, but, then—How the devil—Mrs. Lucy!—Eh!—What becomes of your fine story?

Lucy. I don't understand it.

Sir C. Nor I.

Heart. (Hesitating.) Nor—I—

Young C. But I do; and so you will all presently.

Re-enter HARRIET.

Har. Bless me, Mr. Heartly, what is all this music for in the next room?

Young C. I brought the gentleman of the string, mademoiselle, to convince you that I feel as I ought the honour you have done me. (Shewing the letter.) But, for heaven's sake, be sincere a little with these good folks; they tell me here that I am nobody, and there is another happier than myself.

Har. To hesitate any longer would be injurious to my guardian, his friend, this young gentleman, and my own character. You have all been in an error. My bashfulness may have deceived you; my heart never did.

Young C. C'est vrai.

Har. Therefore, before I declare my sentiments, it is proper that I disavow any engagement: but at the same time must confess—

Young C. Oh—ho!

Har. With fear and shame confess—

Young C. Courage, mademoiselle!

Har. That another, not you, sir, has gained a power over my heart. (To Young Clackit.)

Sir C. Another, not you; mind that Jack. Ha, ha!

Har. It is a power, indeed, which he despises. I cannot be deceived in his conduct. Modesty may tie the tongue of our sex, but silence in him could proceed only from contempt.

Sir C. How prettily she reproaches me! but I'll soon make it up with her. (Aside.)

Har. As to that letter, sir, your error there is excusable; and I own myself in that particular a little blameable. But it was not my fault that it was sent to you; and the contents must have told you, that it could not possibly be meant for you. (To Young Clackit.)

Sir C. Proof positive, Jack. Say no more. Now is my time to begin. Hem! hem!—Sweet young lady!—hem!—whose charms are so mighty, so far transcending everything that we read of in history or fable, how could you possibly think that my silence proceeded from contempt? Was it natural or prudent, think you, for a man of sixty-five, nay, just entering into his sixty-sixth year—

Young C. Oh, misericorde! what, is my uncle my rival? Nay, then, I burst, by Jupiter!—Ha, ha, ha!

Har. Don't imagine, sir, that to me your age is any fault.

Sir C. (Bowing.) You are very obliging, madam.

Har. Neither is it, sir, a merit of that extraordinary nature, that I should sacrifice to it an inclination which I have conceived for another.

Sir C. How is this?

Young C. Another! not you; mind that, uncle.

Lucy. What is the meaning of all this?

Young C. Proof positive, uncle; and very positive.

Sir C. I have been led into a mistake, madam, which I hope you will excuse; and I have made myself very ridiculous, which I hope I shall forget; and so, madam, I am your humble servant.

Heart. What I now see, and the remembrance of what is past, force me to break silence.

Young C. Ay, now for it.—Hear him, hear him!

Heart. Oh, my Harriet! I, too, must be disgraced in my turn. Can you think that I have seen and conversed with you unmoved? Indeed I have not. The more I was sensible of your merit, the stronger were my motives to stifle the ambition of my heart; but now I can no longer resist the violence of my passion, which casts me at your feet, the most unworthy, indeed, of all your admirers, but of all the most affectionate.

Har. I have refused my hand to Sir Charles and this young gentleman: the one accuses me of caprice, the other of singularity. Should I refuse my hand a third time, (smiling,) I might draw upon myself a more severe reproach; and, therefore, I accept your favour, sir, and will endeavour to deserve it.

Heart. And thus I seal my acknowledgments; and, from henceforth, devote my every thought, and all my services, to the author of my happiness. (Kisses her hand.)

Sir C. Well, my dear discreet nephew, are you satisfied with the fool's part you have given me, and played yourself in the farce?

Young C. What would you have me say, sir; I am too much a philosopher to fret.

Heart. I hope, Sir Charles, that we shall still continue to live as neighbours and friends. For you, my Harriet, words cannot express my wonder or my joy; my future conduct must tell you what a sense I have of my happiness, and how much I shall endeavour to deserve it.

For ev'ry charm that ever yet bless'd youth,

Accept compliance, tenderness, and truth;

My friendly care shall change to grateful love,

And the fond husband still the Guardian prove.

[Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Seraglio; the throne in manner of a couch, with a canopy, on the front of which is an escutcheon fixed, with the Ottoman arms crowned with feathers; in the back scenes, the Sultan's door is covered with a curtain.

Enter OSMYN and ELMIRA.

Osmyn. Tell me, what right have you to be discontented?

Elm. When first I came within these walls, I found myself a slave; and the thoughts of being shut up for ever here, terrified me to death: my tears flowed incessantly; Solyman was moved with them, and solemnly promised to restore me to liberty, my parents, and my country.

Osmyn. And yet, when the Sultan agreed to send you back to Georgia, you did not avail yourself of his generosity.

Elm. True; but his munificence, and, above all, the tenderness and love he expressed to me since, have reconciled me to this place, and I vainly thought my charms could have attached him to me.

Osmyn. Why, then, complain? you still possess his heart. Already, you have been twice honoured with the imperial handkerchief.

Elm. His heart! does not this place contain a hundred beauties who equally share his love? Tell the Sultan I'm determined, and ready to accept the first opportunity of returning to my friends and country.

Osmyn. I chall procure you an answer this morning—But, hark! the Sultan approaches.

[Exit Elmira.]

The curtain is drawn, and the SULTAN enters, preceded by Mutes, &c. A grand march played.

Sul. Osmyn.

Osmyn. The humblest of your slaves attends. (Bows to the ground.)

Sul. My friend, quit this style of servitude; I am weary of it.

Osmyn. And of the seraglio, too, sir?

Sul. It is even so: and yet, upon reflection, I cannot tell why, unless that, having been accustomed to the noise of camps and the business of war, I know not how to relish pleasures; which, though varied, appear insipid, through the ease and tranquillity with which they are attained. Your voice used to charm me.

AIR.—OSMYN.

*Behold yonder zephyr how lightly it blows,
And copying of lovers it ne'er seeks repose,
But flies to the pink, to the lily, the rose,
Caressing each flower of the garden and grove.*

*Then still let your pleasure variety crown,
'Mongst the different beauties that rove up and down;
Court the charms of the fair, of the black, of the brown,
They're the flowers that embellish the garden of love.*

Sul. I have often told you I am not touched with mere caressing machines, who are taught to love or fear by interest.

Osmyn. And yet your highness must confess, your servant has neglected nothing perfectly to content, particularly in one object he procured you.

Sul. Who is that?

Osmyn. The Circassian beauty—the Sultana Elmira.

Sul. And, truly, she possesses all the charms that can adorn her sex.

Osmyn. You thought so once.

Sul. Once! I think so still.

Osmyn. Indeed!

Sul. Positively, why should you doubt it?

Osmyn. Your word is my law. But, sir, there is matter I must acquaint you with: I cannot manage the seraglio; and, by the beard of Heli, I would rather quit the helm I can no longer guide. That English slave lately brought here, is quite ungovernable; she is sure to do everything she is forbid; she makes a joke of our threats, and answers our most serious admonitions with a laugh: besides, she is at variance with the rest of the women, and shews them such an example, that I cannot longer rule them.

Sul. That is your business: I will have them all agree. How do you call her?

Osmyn. Since she has been here, we have called her Roxalana. [reason.

Sul. Well, you must endeavour to bring her to Osmyn. Shall the Sultana Elmira throw herself at your highness's feet, then?

Sul. Let her come; and, do you hear, Osmyn? go to the apartment of that Persian slave you spoke of yesterday, (she that sings so well,) and send her hither.

Osmyn. I will, most sublime Sultan. [Exit.

Enter ELMIRA. She kneels.

Sul. I know, beforehand, that you come to upbraid me. We have not met so often lately as our natural inclinations would have made agreeable; but don't attribute that to coldness, which has been the unavoidable consequence of affairs. The business of the divan has taken up so much of my time.

Elm. I don't presume to complain; for your image is so imprinted on my heart, that you are always present to my mind.

Sul. Elmira, you love music; I have sent for the Persian slave, who I am told sings so well; if she answers the description, she will afford you entertainment.

Elm. I want none when you are present; your company suffices for everything.

Sul. Yonder comes our singer.

Enter ISMENA.

Ism. Your slave attends your pleasure. (Kneels. The Sultan makes signs to the Eunuchs, who bring two stools, and beckons Elmira to sit.)

Elm. This is an honour I did not expect. (Taking her seat.)

AIR.—ISMENA.

Bless'd hero, who, in peace and war,

Triumph alike, and raise our wonder;

In peace, the shafts of love you bear;

In war, the bolts of Jove's own thunder.

Sul. Beautiful Ismena, methought, that song did not so well express the effects of love. I never heard anything so charming; her voice is exquisite. What do you think of her? (To Elmira.)

Elm. If she hears all this, it will make her vain. I cannot bear all this; I am ready to burst with indignation and anger. [Aside, and exit.

Sul. There is something in this slave that interests me in her favour; she shall be received among the Sultana's attendants, and by that means, we shall have an opportunity of hearing her often. (Aside. Turning, perceives Elmira gone.) But, where's the Sultana? I did not perceive she had left us. Follow her, Ismena, and endeavour to amuse her. [Exit Ismena.

Re-enter OSMYN.

Osmyn. I come to tell your highness, there is no bearing that English slave; she says such things, and does such things, that—

Sul. Why, what is it she does? [too.

Osmyn. She mimics me; nay, and mimics you,

Sul. Pooh, pooh!

Osmyn. Advice is lost upon her; when I attempt to give it, she falls a singing and dancing. There is no enduring it, if you do not permit me to correct her.

Sul. You take these things in too serious a light. She seems, indeed, a singular character.

Osmyn. She has the impudence of the devil: but just now, I threatened to complain to you of her, she said she would complain of me; and here she comes.

Enter ROXALANA.

Sul. How now?

Rox. Well, heaven be praised, at least here is something like a human figure. You are, sir, I suppose, the sublime Sultan, whose slave I have the honour to be: if so, pray oblige me so far, as to drive from your presence, that horrid ugly creature there, for he shocks my sight; do you hear? go. (To Osmyn.)

Sul. (Gravely.) They complain, Roxalana, of your irreverent behaviour; you must learn to treat the officers of our seraglio, whom we have set over you, with more deference; all in this place honour their superiors, and obey in silence.

Rox. In silence! and obey! Is this a sample of your Turkish gallantry? you must be vastly loved, indeed, if you address women in that strain.

Sul. Consider, you are not now in your own country.

Rox. No, indeed; you make me feel the difference severely; there reigns ease, content, and liberty: every citizen is himself a king, where the king is himself a citizen.

Sul. Have a humour more gentle and pliable; I advise you to alter your behaviour, for very good reasons; and it is for your good; there are very rigorous laws in the seraglio for such as are refractory.

Rox. Upon my word, you have made a very delicate speech, and I admire the gravity with which it was uttered.

Sul. Roxalana, I am serious.

Osmyn. What does your highness think now? Did I tell you the truth? (Apart to the Sultan.)

Rox. Oh, whispering! What is it that monster says? That what-do-you-call-him, that good-for-nothing amphibious animal, who follows us like sheep here, and is for ever watching us with his frightful, glaring eyes, as if he would devour us. Is this the confidante of your pleasures, the guardian of our charity? I must do him the justice to confess, that, if you give him money for making himself hated, he certainly does not steal his wages. We can't step one step but he is after us; by-and-by, I suppose, he will weigh out air and measure out light to us; he won't let us walk in the gardens, lest it should rain men upon us; and, if it did, 'tis a blessing we've been long wishing for. [rate?

Osmyn. There now, don't she go on at a fine

Rox. Don't mind that ugly creature, but listen to me. If you follow my counsel, I shall make you an accomplished prince. I wish to make you beloved; let your window-bars be taken down; let the doors of the seraglio be thrown open; let inclination alone keep your women within it; and, instead of that ugly, odious creature there, send a handsome, smart, young officer to us every morning; one that will treat us like ladies, and lay out the pleasure of the day. (While she is speaking, the Sultan admires her.)

Sul. Did you ever see so expressive a countenance? (To Osmyn.) Have you any more to say? (To Roxalana.)

Rox. Yes, sir, this; to desire you will not mind him, but attend to me. Men were not born to advise; the thing is expressly the contrary; more women have certainly ten thousand times more sense. Men, indeed! Men were born for no other purpose under heaven, but to amuse us; and he who succeeds best, perfectly answers the end of his creation. Now, sir, farewell. If I find you profit by my first lesson, I may, perhaps, be tempted to give you another. [Exit.]

Osmyn. Did you ever hear the like, sir? Her insolence is not to be borne.

Sul. I think it amusing.

Osmyn. I shall certainly lose all my authority in the seraglio, if she is not corrected.

Sul. 'Tis a girl; a fool of a disposition, that chastisement would make worse. Go after her, Osmyn, bid her come back and drink sherbet with me.

Osmyn. Sherbet with you, sir? [Exit Osmyn.]

Sul. I have said it. (Goes on the throne, and takes a pipe.) Well, for my life, I can't get the better of my astonishment, at hearing a slave talk in so extraordinary a manner. (Smokes.) She's not handsome, that is, what is called a beauty; yet her little nose, cocked in the air, her laughing eyes, and the play of her features, have an effect altogether—yet, methinks, I have a mind to sift Roxalana's character; mere curiosity, and nothing else. It is the first time we have seen this place a spirit of caprice and independence: I'll try, at least, what she'll say to me further; there can be no harm to divert myself with her extravagance.

Re-enter OSMYN.

Osmyn. I have delivered your message.

Sul. Delivered my message! where's Roxalana?

Osmyn. In her chamber, where she has locked herself in.

Sul. No matter for her being in her chamber. What did she say?

Osmyn. "Treasure of light," said I, (through the key-hole,) "I come from the sublime Sultan to kiss the dust beneath your feet, and desire you will come and drink sherbet with him." She answered through the key-hole, "Go tell your master, I have no dust on my feet, and I don't like sherbet."

Sul. In effect, Osmyn, the fault is your's; you took your time ill, as you commonly do; you should have waited some time: don't you owe her respect? [come again?]

Osmyn. And, after this, would you have her

Sul. Perhaps I would.

Osmyn. Shall I fetch the Sultana Elmira too?

Sul. What's the meaning of this, Osmyn? I tell you once more, go and bring me Roxalana. (Curtain moves.) [curtain.]

Osmyn. Who is that meddles with the great

Sul. Who is it lifts that portal there?

Rox. 'Tis I. (Coming from behind.)

Sul. You! and how dare you take that liberty?

Osmyn. Ay, how dare you? Don't you know 'tis death for any to enter there but the Sultan, without being conducted?

Sul. Come, come; she's not acquainted with the customs of the seraglio; so let it pass. Roxalana, I beg your pardon; I am afraid he has disturbed you now.

Rox. Oh! it is only what I expected; you Turks are not reckoned very polite. In my country, a gallant waits upon a lady; but the custom is quite different here, I find. (Sultan offers her the pipe; she strikes it down.) What, do you think I smoke?

Sul. How's this? Does your insolence go so far?

Osmyn. What do you command, sir?

Sul. Silence!

Rox. What! angry before a woman? I'm quite ashamed of you.

Sul. This is not to be suffered, and yet there's something so foolish in it too. (Aside.) Come hither, Roxalana, I want to speak to you. [am.]

Rox. No, I thank you; I am very well where I

Sul. Tell me then, is it in this light manner women behave in England?

Rox. Pretty near it.

Sul. And suppose I would for once forget your national vivacity, would it make you more cautious for the future? Come, give me your hand; and you may imagine I have forgot all you have said to me.

Rox. So much the worse for you. I told you a great many good things; I see my frankness is disagreeable; but you must grow used to it. Don't you think yourself very happy to find a friend in a slave? one that will teach you how to love, too: for 'tis in my country, love is in its element. It is there all life and tenderness, because it is free; and yet, even there, a husband beloved is next to a prodigy. If it be then so difficult to love a husband, what must it be to love a master? I am your friend; I tell you truth: and do you know why you dislike to hear it? Because it is a language your ears are unaccustomed to: but I don't mind that; I shall make you well acquainted with it. Happy would it be for every prince, if he had a friend near him to tell him the truth.

Sul. But you must treat me with respect.

Rox. I treat you with respect? that would be worse still.

Sul. Indeed!

[rect you.]

Rox. Oh! your notions are horrid! I shall cor-

Sul. Correct me! In what, pray?

Rox. In what concerns you.

Sul. She is the strangest mortal, sure! But let's have no more of this.

Rox. Nay, though you don't take my lessons as patiently as I could wish, I hope you are not displeased with me. I should be sorry to offend you.

Sul. You may easily avoid it, then.

Rox. It will be nothing in time.

Sul. Why, won't you consider who I am, and who you are?

Rox. Who am I, and who you are! Yes, sir, I do consider very well that you are the grand Sultan; I am your slave; but I am also a free-born woman, prouder of that than all the pomp and splendour eastern monarchs can bestow.

Sul. As far as I can perceive, then, you would be very glad to get away from me.

Rox. You never were more right in your life.

Sul. Well, but if I endeavour to render the seraglio agreeable to you; if I study to make you happy, might you not, in your turn, try to deserve my favour?

Rox. No.

Sul. Do you speak that sincerely?

Rox. As I think it.

[me—]

Sul. And yet there is something that whispers

Rox. Don't believe it; I tell you it deceives you.

Sul. And must I never expect—

Rox. Never; caprice and fancy decide all.

Sul. In caprice and fancy then I rest my hopes; and, in the meantime, you shall sup with me.

Rox. No; I beg to be excused; I'd rather not.

Sul. Why so?—'tis an honour that you ought—

Rox. An honour that I ought! Sir, you ought to lay aside those humiliating phrases; for, while they teach us your superior greatness, they rob you of the pleasure of being agreeable. But to be in good humour, sir, I ought not to accept your proposals; for I know that suppers here tend to certain—things that I can't—indeed, sir.

Sul. Well, as you please.

Rox. That is very well said; you are my pupil, you know, and should give up every point to me; and since that is the case, instead of my supping with you, you shall dine with me.

Sul. With all my heart—be it so. Osmyn!

Enter OSMYN.

Rox. Osmyn, I say, hear my directions; (you know I am to speak;) go to the clerk of the kitchen, and desire him to provide a handsome entertainment in my apartment, as the Sultan dines with me.

Osmyn. Did your highness order—

Sul. What do you stand for? Do as she bids you. [Exit Osmyn, bowing.]

Rox. Are there not some females here that would enliven the conversation; for example, the beautiful Sultana Elmira, that accomplished favourite you love so well; her company must be agreeable; and the Persian slave Ismena, who, I am told, sings enchantingly, and whom you love

Sul. Yes—but— [a little.]

Rox. I understand, you will have her too.

Sul. It is not necessary; we will be alone.

Rox. Alone—a tête-à-tête would be a great pleasure, to be sure! oh, no!

Sul. I promise you, I expect it.

Enter OSMYN.

Osmyn. Madam, your orders are obeyed.

Sul. Go to Elmira's apartment, and tell her, I shall see her this evening. This evening, do you hear?

Rox. I don't like that whispering there. What's that you say? you know, I have often told you of that ugly trick.

Sul. Nothing—I'll come to her—go. [you.]

Rox. Stay, I say; I have some business with

Sul. Stay! Certainly, there never was anything half so pleasant as this creature. [Exit.]

Rox. Go, Osmyn, to the apartments of the Sultana Elmira, and to the chamber of the slave Ismena, and tell them to come and dine with the Sultan. If you neglect obeying my orders, your head shall answer for it. And, do you hear? don't let them know you came from me with this invitation. Take care of your head. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A royal Apartment, banquet, &c.

Enter ROXALANA.

Rox. Ay, let me alone, now I have got the reins in my own hands, there shall soon be a reformation in this place, I warrant. Heyday! what have we got here? Cushions! what, do they think we are going to prayers? Let me die but I believe it is their dinner. What, do they mean to make me sit squat like a baboon, and tear my meat with my fingers? Take away all this trumpery, and let us have tables and chairs, knives and forks, and dishes and plates, like Christians. And, d'ye hear? lest the best part of the entertainment should be wanting, get us some wine. (Mutes lift up their hands.) Mercy on us, what a wonder! I tell you, wine must be had. If there is none here, go to the mufti, he is a good fellow, and has some good wine, I warrant him; let the church alone to take care of themselves; they are too good judges of more solid things, not to be provided with them. (Things are removed, and table, &c. brought on.) Oh! here come some of my guests: I'll hide. (Goes aside.)

Enter ELMIRA and OSMYN.

Elm. It is impossible! A pretty thing, truly, she is to dispute the Sultan's heart with me!

Osmyn. I tell you her ascendancy over him is such, that it requires the greatest art and caution to counteract it.

Elm. Well, Osmyn, be my friend; and here, take this locket, Osmyn; and be sure speak ill of all my rivals, and all the good you possibly can of me. (Roxalana comes forward.)

Osmyn. Death and hell! we are deceived.

[Aside, and exit.]

Rox. Take this locket, Osmyn, and be sure you speak ill of all my rivals. Ha, ha, ha!

Elm. Insipid pleasantry! Know this, however, madam, I was the first possessor of the Sultan's heart; and, as such, will maintain my rights, and employ my power to keep it.

Rox. By a locket. Holloa! who waits there?

Enter OSMYN.

Go tell the grand Signior to come here.

Osmyn. I will, madam—I'll be your friend, you may depend on me.

Rox. Go. [Exit Osmyn.] Elmira, I don't intend to dispute the Sultan's heart with you; and, to prove it, you must know that it was I invited you to dine with him here; therefore, make the best use you can of the opportunity.

Elm. Is it possible?

Enter SULTAN, ISMENA, and OSMYN.

Rox. Slaves, bring the dinner.

Sul. What do I see? Ismena and Elmira, too!

Rox. What is the matter, sir?

Sul. I thought you would have been alone.

Rox. Not when good company is to be had. Come, salute the ladies. (He bows.) A little lower. (She stoops his head.) There now, ladies, my guest is a little awkward; but he'll improve.

Elm. Indeed, Roxalana, you go great lengths.

Sul. Let her alone; she knows it diverts me.

Rox. Well, let's be seated; I am to do the honours.

Sul. But what is all this? I never saw anything like it before.

Rox. Where should you? Come—[Enter Carver with a long knife.] Who is that? What does that horrid fellow want?

Osmyn. It is the grand carver.

Rox. The grand carver! I thought he came to cut off our heads. Pray, Mr. Carver, be so good as to carve yourself away. Come, Ismena, cut up that, and help the Sultan. The ladies of my country always carve.

Sul. Why, I think this custom is much better than ours. (To the Carver.) We shall have no occasion for you.

Rox. Come, some wine.

Sul. Wine!

Rox. Dinner is nothing without wine. Bring it here, Osmyn.

Osmyn. Must I touch the horrible potion! (Takes the bottle between the skirts of his robe.) There it is.

Rox. Well, Osmyn, as a reward for your services, you shall have the first of the bottle. Here, drink.

Osmyn. I drink the hellish beverage! I who am a true believer, a rigid mussulman!

Rox. Sir, he disobeys me. (To the Sultan.)

Sul. Drink, as you are ordered.

Osmyn. I must obey, and taste the horrible liquor. Oh! Mahomet, shut thy eyes! 'Tis done: I have obeyed.

Rox. Ismena, hold your glass there. Elmira, fill your's and the Sultan's glass.

Sul. Nay, pray, dispense with me.

Rox. Dispense with you, sir! why should we dispense with you? Oh! I understand you; perhaps you don't choose those gentlemen should see you: I will soon turn them off. Gentlemen, you may go: we shall have no occasion for you, I believe. Come, ladies, talk a little; if you don't talk, you must sing. Ismena oblige us with a song. (*Ismena sings.) Come, sir, I insist upon your drinking.

Sul. I must do as you bid me. (Drinks.)

Rox. That's clever.

Sul. How extraordinary is the conduct of this creature, endeavouring thus to display the accomplishments of her rivals! but in everything she is my superior. (Aside.) I can rest no longer. (Gives the handkerchief to Roxalana.)

Rox. To me! Oh! no; Ismena, 'tis your's; the Sultan gives it as a reward for the pleasure you have given him with your charming song. (Gives the handkerchief to Ismena.)

Elm. Oh! (Faints.)

Sul. Elmira! 'tis your's: look up, Elmira. (Snatching the handkerchief from Ismena, gives it to Elmira.)

* There is no song incidental to the piece; some popular air is generally introduced at the pleasure of the singer.

Elm. Oh! sir. (Recovering.)

Sul. For you, out of my sight, audacious! (To Roxalana.) Let her be taken away immediately, and degraded to the rank of the lowest slave. [Exit Roxalana, guarded.] But she shall be punished, madam, and you sufficiently revenged.

Elm. I do not wish it: in your love all my desires are accomplished.

Sul. If we chastise her, it must be severely. Go, order her to be brought hither.

Elm. What is your design, sir?

Sul. I would, before her face, repair the injustice I were going to do you; excite her envy; and, rendering her punishment complete, leave her in everlasting jealousy.

Elm. I beseech you, think no more of her.

Sul. Pardon me, I think differently. Let her be brought hither, I say.

Osmyn. Sir, they have not had time to put on her slave's habit yet.

Sul. No matter; fetch her as she is: and now, Elmira, let our endearments be redoubled in her.

Elm. Is that necessary, sir? [sight.]

Sul. Oh! it will gall her; I know it will gall her. We feel our misfortunes with tenfold anguish, when we compare what we are with what we might have been.

Elm. It will have no effect; she is a giddy creature; her gaiety is her all.

Sul. No, no, the contrary; that's the thing that strikes me in Roxalana's character. Through what you call her frivolous gaiety, candour and good sense shine so apparent—

Elm. There's an end on't, if you justify her.

Sul. I justify her! far from it; and you shall presently be convinced I mean to make her feel the utmost rigour of my resentment.

Re-enter ROXALANA.

Here she comes: she's in affliction; and her left hand, there, endeavours to hide a humiliated countenance. Approach. (To Roxalana.) Elmira, have you determined how you will dispose of her?

Elm. I shall not add to what she suffers.

Sul. How that sentiment charms me! Indeed, Elmira, I blush to think that so unworthy an object should have been able for a moment to surprise me to a degree, even to make me forget your superior merit; but I am your's for ever and ever.

Rox. Ha, ha, ha!

Sul. Death and hell! she laughs.

Rox. Ha, ha, ha! 'Tis involuntary, I assure you; therefore, pray, forgive me; I beg your pardon.

Sul. 'Tis impudence beyond bearing; but I want to know the meaning of all this?

Rox. The meaning is plain, and anybody may see with half an eye you don't love Elmira.

Sul. Whom do I love, then?

Rox. Me.

Sul. You are the object of my anger.

Rox. That don't signify, love and anger often go together; I am the object of your anger, because I treat you with the sincerity of a friend; but with your highness's permission, I shall take myself away this moment for ever.

Sul. Go, then, and prefer infamy to grandeur.

Rox. I will instantly get out of your sublime presence. (Going.)

Sul. No, you sha'n't go. Elmira, do you withdraw. [Exit Elmira.] Were I to give way to my transports, I should make you feel the weight of my displeasure; but I frame excuses for you that you scorn to make for yourself. What, despise my favours, insult my condescension? Sure, you can't be sensible of your own folly. Proceed, go on, continue to enrage your too indulgent master.

Rox. You are my master, it is true; but could the robber that sold me to you for a thousand chequins, transfer my mind and inclinations to you along with my person? No, sir; let it never be said that the great Solymán meanly triumphed over the person of the slave whose mind he could not subdue.

Sul. Tell me who you are; what species of inconsistent being, at once so trifling and respectable, that you seduce my heart while you teach me my duty. [friend.]

Rox. I am nothing but a poor slave, who is your

Sul. Be still my friend, my mistress; for hitherto I have known only flatterers. I here devote myself to you, and the whole empire shall pay you homage.

Rox. But, pray, tell me, then, by what title I am to govern here?

Sul. By what title! I don't understand you. Come, come, no more of this affected coyness and dissembling. I see, I know you love me.

Rox. As Solymán I do, but not as emperor of the Turks: nor will I ever consent to ascend his bed at night, at whose feet I must fall in the morning.

Sul. If it depended upon me, Roxalana, I swear by our holy prophet, that I should be happy in calling you my queen.

Rox. That's a poor excuse. Had the man I loved but a cottage, I would gladly partake it with him; would sooth his vexations, and soften his cares: but, were he master of a throne, I should expect to share it with him, or he has no love for me.

Sul. Or, if you will wait, perhaps time will bring it about.

Rox. Wait, indeed! No, sir. Your wife, or humble servant: my resolution is fixed—fix your's.

Sul. But an emperor of the Turks—

Rox. May do as he pleases, and should be despotic, sometimes, on the side of reason and virtue.

Sul. Then there is our law—

Rox. Which is monstrous and absurd.

Sul. The mufti, the vizirs, and the agas—

Rox. Are your slaves. Set them a good example.

Sul. Besides, what would the people say?

Rox. The people! are they to govern you? Make the people happy, and they will not prevent your being so. They would be pleased to see you raise to the throne one that you love, and would love you, and would be beloved by your people. Should she interpose in behalf of the unfortunate, relieve the distressed by her munificence, and diffuse happiness through the palace, she would be admired, she would be adored; she'd be like the queen of the country from whence I came.

Sul. It is enough; my scruples are at an end: my prejudices, like clouds before the rising sun, vanish before the light of your superior reason: my love is no longer a foible; you are worthy of empire.

Re-enter OSMYN.

Osmyn. Most sublime Sultan, the Sultana Elmira claims your promise for liberty to depart.

Rox. Is that the case? Let, then, the first instance of my exaltation be to give her liberty; let the gates of the seraglio be thrown open.

Sul. And as for Elmira, she shall go in a manner suitable to her rank. [Osmyn goes out and returns.]

Osmyn. Sir, the dwarfs and botanges, your highness had ordered, attend.

Sul. Let them come in. This day is devoted to festivity; and you who announce my decree, proclaim to the world, that the Sultana Roxalana reigns the unrivalled partner of our diadem.

Osmyn. There's an end of my office. Who would have thought that a little cocked-up nose would have overturned the customs of a mighty empire?

Sul. Now, my Roxalana, let the world observe, by thy exaltation, the wonderful dispensation of Providence, which evinces that

*The liberal mind, by no distinction bound,
Through nature's glass looks all the world around;
Would all that's beautiful together join,
And find perfection in a mind like thine.* [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Temple of Isis.

SERAPION and MYRIS, Priests of Isis, discovered.

Ser. Portents and prodigies are grown so frequent
That they have lost their name. Our fruitful Nile
Flow'd, ere the wonted season, with a torrent
So unexpected and so wondrous fierce,
That the wild deluge overtook the haste
Ev'n of the hinds that watch'd it. Men and beasts
Were borne above the tops of trees that grew
On th' utmost margin of the water-mark:
Then with so swift an ebb the flood drove backward,
It slipp'd from underneath the scaly herd:
Here monstrous phocæ panted on the shore;
Forsaken dolphins there, with their broad tails
Lay lashing the departing waves; hard by 'em,
Sea-horses, flound'ring in the slimy mud,
Toss'd up their heads and dash'd the ooze about
'em.

Enter ALEXAS behind them.

Myr. Avert these omens, heav'n!

Ser. Last night, between the hours of twelve and one,
In a lone aisle o'the temple while I walk'd,
A whirlwind rose, that with a violent blast
Shook all the dome; the doors around me clapp'd;
The iron wicket, that defends the vault
Where the long race of Ptolemies is laid,
Burst open, and disclos'd the mighty dead:
From out each monument, in order plac'd,

An armed ghost starts up; the boy-king last
Rear'd his inglorious head: a peal of groans
Then follow'd, and a lamentable voice
Cry'd, "Egypt is no more!" My blood ran back,
My shaking knees against each other knock'd,
On the cold pavement down I fell entranc'd,
And so unfinish'd left the horrid scene!

Alex. And dreamt you this, or did invent the story (Shewing himself.)

To frighten our Egyptian boys withal,
And train 'em up betimes in fear of priesthood?

Ser. My lord, I saw you not,
Nor meant my words should reach your ears; but what

I utter'd was most true.

Alex. A foolish dream,
Bred from the fumes of indigested feasts
And holy luxury.

Ser. I know my duty:
This goes no further.

Alex. 'Tis not fit it should;
Nor would the times now bear it were it true.
All southern from yon hills the Roman camp
Hangs o'er us black and threat'ning, like a storm
Just breaking on our heads.

Ser. 'Tis strange that Antony for some days past
Has not beheld the face of Cleopatra,
But here in Isis' temple lives retir'd;
And makes his heart a prey to black despair.

Alex. 'Tis true; and we much fear he hopes by absence
To cure his mind of love.

Ser. How stands the queen affected?

Alex. Oh! she dotes,
She dotes, Serapion, on this vanquish'd man,
And winds herself about his mighty ruins;
Whom would she yet forsake, yet yield him up,
This hunted prey, to his pursuer's hands,
She might preserve us all: but 'tis in vain—
This changes my designs, this blasts my counsels,
And makes me use all means to keep him here
Whom I could wish divided from her arms
Far as the earth's deep centre. Well, you know
The state of things: no more of your ill omens
And black prognostics; labour to confirm
The people's hearts.

Enter VENTIDIUS, talking aside with a Gentleman of Marc Antony's.

Ser. These Romans will o'erhear us.
But who's that stranger? by his warlike port,
His fierce demeanour, and erected look,
He's of no vulgar note.

Alex. Oh! 'tis Ventidius,
Our emperor's great lieutenant in the east,
Who first shew'd Rome that Parthia could be conquer'd.

When Antony return'd from Syria last,
He left this man to guard the Roman frontiers.

Ser. You seem to know him well.

Alex. Too well. I saw him in Cilicia first,
When Cleopatra there met Antony;
A mortal foe he was to us and Egypt.
But let me witness to the worth I hate;
A braver Roman never drew a sword:
Firm to his prince, but as a friend, not slave:
He ne'er was of his pleasures, but presides
O'er all his cooler hours and morning counsels:
In short, the plainness, fierceness, rugged virtue,
Of an old true stamp'd Roman lives in him.
His coming bodes I know not what of ill
To our affairs. Withdraw to mark him better,
And I'll acquaint you why I sought you here,
And what's our present work.

(They retire, and Ventidius with the other come forward.)

Ven. Not see him, say you?
I say, I must and will.

Gent. He has commanded,
On pain of death, none should approach his presence.

Ven. I bring him news will raise his drooping spirits,
Give him new life.

Gent. He sees not Cleopatra.

Ven. Would he had never seen her!

Gent. He eats not, drinks not, sleeps not, has no use
Of anything but thought; or if he talks,
'Tis to himself, and then 'tis perfect raving;
Then he defies the world, and bids it pass.
Sometimes he gnaws his lip, and curses loud
The boy Octavius; then he draws his mouth
Into a scornful smile, and cries, "Take all,
The world's not worth my care!"

Ven. Just, just his nature.
Virtue's his path, but sometimes 'tis too narrow
For his vast soul, and then he starts out wide,
And bounds into a vice that bears him far
From his first course, and plunges him in ills:
He must not thus be lost.

(Alexas and the Priests come forward.)

Alex. You have your full instructions; now advance;
Proclaim your orders loudly.

Ser. Romans! Egyptians! hear the queen's command.
Thus Cleopatra bids: let labour cease;
To pomp and triumphs give this happy day
That gave the world a lord; 'tis Antony's.
Live Antony, and Cleopatra live!
Be this the gen'ral voice sent up to heav'n,
And ev'ry public place repeat this echo.

Ven. Fine pageantry

(Aside.)

Ser. Set out before your doors
The images of all your sleeping fathers,
With laurels crown'd; with laurels wreath your posts,

And strew with flow'rs the pavement; let the priest
Do present sacrifice, pour out the wine,
And call the gods to join with you in gladness.

Ven. Curse on the tongue that bids this gen'ral joy!

Can they be friends of Antony who revel
When Antony's in danger? Hide, for shame,
You Romans, your great grandsires' images,
For fear their souls should animate their marbles
To blush at their degenerate progeny.

Alex. A love which knows no bounds to Antony
Would mark the day with honours; when all heav'n
Labour'd for him, when each propitious star
Stood wakeful in his orb to watch that hour
And shed his better influence, her own birth-day
Our queen neglected, like a vulgar fate
That pass'd obscurely by.

Ven. Would it had slept,
Divided far from his, till some remote
And future age had call'd it out to ruin
Some other prince, not him.

Alex. Your emperor,
Though grown unkind, would be more gentle than
T' upbraid my queen for loving him too well.

Ven. I tell thee, eunuch, she has quite unmann'd him:

Can any Roman see and know him now,
Thus alter'd from the lord of half mankind;
Unbent, unsinew'd, made a woman's toy;
Shrunk from the vast extent of all his honours,
And cramp'd within a corner of the world?
Oh! Antony,
Thou bravest soldier and thou best of friends!
Bounteous as nature, next to nature's God!
Couldst thou but make new worlds, so wouldst
thou give 'em,

As bounty were thy being. Rough in battle
As the first Romans when they went to war,
Yet after victory more pitiful
Than all their praying virgins left at home.

Alex. Would you could add to those more shining virtues

His truth to her who loves him.

Ven. Would I could not!
But wherefore waste I precious hours with thee?
Thou art her darling mischief, her chief engine,
Antony's other fate. Go, tell thy queen
Ventidius is arriv'd to end her charms.
Let your Egyptian timbrels play alone,
Nor mix effeminate sounds with Roman trumpets.
You dare not fight for Antony; go pray,
And keep your coward's holyday in temples.

[Exeunt Alexas and Priests.]

Enter another Gentleman of Marc Antony's.

2 Gent. The emperor approaches, and commands,
On pain of death, that none presume to stay.

1 Gent. I dare not disobey him.

[Exit with the other.]

Ven. Well, I dare;
But I'll observe him first unseen, and find
Which way his humour drives: the rest I'll venture.
(Retires.)

Enter MARC ANTONY, walking with a disturbed motion before he speaks.

Marc A. They tell me 'tis my birth-day, and I'll keep it
With double pomp of sadness:
'Tis what the day deserves which gave me breath.
Why was I rais'd the meteor of the world,
Hung in the skies, and blazing as I travell'd,
Till all my fires were spent, and then cast downward
To be trod out by Cæsar?

Ven. (Aside.) On my soul,
'Tis mournful, wondrous mournful!

Marc A. Count thy gains
Now, Antony; wouldst thou be born for this?
Glutton of fortune, thy devouring youth
Has starv'd thy wanting age.

Ven. (Aside.) How sorrow shakes him!
So, now the tempest tears him up by the roots,
And on the ground extends the noble ruin.

Marc A. (Having thrown himself down.) Lie there,
thou shadow of an emperor;
The place thou pressest on thy mother earth
Is all thy empire now: now it contains thee;
Some few days hence, and then 'twill be too large,

When thou'rt contracted in thy narrow urn,
Shrunk to a few cold ashes; then, Octavia,
(For Cleopatra will not live to see it,)
Octavia, then, will have thee all her own,
And bear thee in her widow'd hand to Cæsar:—
I'll think no more on't.

Give me some music; look that it be sad.
I'll sooth my melancholy till I swell,
And burst myself with sighing. (Soft music.)
'Tis somewhat to my humour. Stay, I fancy
I'm now turn'd wild, a commoner of nature;
Of all forsaken, and forsaking all;
Live in a shady forest's sylvan scene,
Stretch'd at my length beneath some blasted oak,
I lean my head upon the mossy bark,
And look just of apiece, as I grew from it:
My uncomb'd locks, matted like mistletoe,
Hang o'er my hoary face; a murmur'ing brook
Runs at my feet— (Soft music again.)

Ven. I must disturb him: I can hold no longer.
(Stands before him.)

Marc A. (Starting up.) Art thou Ventidius?

Ven. Are you Antony?
I'm liker what I was, than you to him
I left you last.

Marc A. I would be private. Leave me.

Ven. Sir, I love you,
And, therefore, will not leave you.

Marc A. Will not leave me!

Where have you learnt that answer? Who am I?

Ven. My emperor; the man I love next heav'n:
If I said more, I think 'twere scarce a sin:
You're all that's good and godlike.

Marc A. All that's wretched.

You will not leave me, then?

Ven. 'Twas too presuming
To say I would not; but I dare not leave you;
And 'tis unkind in you to chide me hence
So soon, when I so far have come to see you.

Marc A. Now thou hast seen me art thou sa-tisfy'd?

For if a friend, thou hast beheld enough;
And if a foe, too much.

Ven. Look, emperor, this is no common dew:
(Weeping.)

I have not wept this forty years; but now
My mother comes afresh into my eyes;
I cannot help her softness.

Marc A. By heav'n, he weeps! poor, good, old man, he weeps!

Sure, there's contagion in the tears of friends;
See, I have caught it, too. Believe me, 'tis not
For my own griefs, but thine. Nay, father—

Ven. Emperor.

Marc A. Emperor! why, that's the style of victory:

The conquer'ing soldier, red with unfelt wounds,
Salutes his gen'ral so; but never more
Shall that sound reach my ears.

Ven. I warrant you.

Marc A. Actium, Actium! Oh!

Ven. It sits too near you.

Marc A. Here, here it lies, a lump of lead by day,

And in my short, distracted, nightly slumbers,
The hag that rides my dreams—

Ven. Out with it; give it vent.

Marc A. Urge not my shame—
I lost a battle.

Ven. So has Julius done.

Marc A. Thou favour'st me, and speak'st not half thou think'st;

For Julius fought it out and lost it fairly;

But Antony—

Ven. Nay, stop not.

Marc A. Antony

(Well, thou wilt have it) like a coward fled;
Fled while his soldiers fought; fled first, Ventidius.
Thou long'st to curse me, and I give thee leave;
I'll help thee—I have been a man, Ventidius.

Ven. Yes, and a brave one; but—

Marc A. I know thy meaning.
But I have lost my reason, have disgrac'd
The name of soldier with inglorious ease.

Help me, soldier,

To curse this madman, this industrious fool,
Who labour'd to be wretched. Pr'ythee, curse me.

Ven. No.

Marc A. Why?

Ven. You are too sensible already
Of what you've done, too conscious of your failings;
And like a scorpion, whipp'd by others first
To fury, sting yourself in mad revenge.

I would bring balm, and pour it in your wounds,
Cure your distemper'd mind, and heal your fortunes.

Marc A. I know thou wouldst.

Ven. I will.

Marc A. Sure, thou dream'st, Ventidius.

Ven. No, 'tis you dream; you sleep away your hours

In desp'rate sloth, miscall'd philosophy.
Up, up, for honour's sake! twelve legions wait you,
And long to call you chief: by painful journies
I led 'em, patient of both heat and hunger,
Down from the Parthian marches to the Nile:
'Twill do you good to see their sun-burnt faces,
Their scarr'd cheeks, and chapp'd hands: there's virtue in 'em:

They'll sell those mangled limbs at dearer rates
Than yon trim bands can buy.

Marc A. Where left you them?

Ven. I said in Lower Syria.

Marc A. Bring 'em hither;
There may be life in these.

Ven. They will not come.

Marc A. Why didst thou mock my hopes with promis'd aids,

To double my despair? they're mutinous.

Ven. Most firm and loyal.

Marc A. I will not stir.

Why did they refuse to march?

Ven. They said they would not fight for Cleopatra.

Marc A. What was't they said?

Ven. They said they would not fight for Cleopatra.
Why should they fight, indeed, to make her conquer,
And make you more a slave? to gain you kingdoms,
Which, for a kiss at your next midnight feast,
You'll sell to her?

Marc A. Ventidius, I allow your tongue free license

On all my other faults, but on your life
No word of Cleopatra; she deserves
More worlds than I can lose.

Ven. Behold, you pow'rs!

To whom you have intrusted humankind;
See, Europe, Afric, Asia, put in balance,
And all weigh'd down by one light worthless woman!

Marc A. You grow presumptuous.

Ven. I take the privilege of plain love to speak.

Marc A. Plain love! plain arrogance, plain insolence!

Thy men are cowards, thou an envious traitor,

Who, under seeming honesty, hath vented
The burden of thy rank o'erflowing gall.
Oh! that thou wert my equal, great in arms
As the first Cæsar was, that I might kill thee
Without stain to my honour!

Ven. You may kill me:

You have done more already, call'd me traitor.

Marc A. Art thou not one?

Ven. For shewing you yourself,
Which none else durst have done? But had I been
That name, which I disdain to speak again,
I needed not have sought your abject fortunes,
Come to partake your fate, to die with you.
What hinder'd me t' have led my conqu'ring eagles
To fill Octavia's bands? I could have been
A traitor then, a glorious happy traitor,
And not have been so call'd.

Marc A. Forgive me, soldier;
I've been too passionate.

Ven. You thought me false,
Thought my old age betray'd you. Kill me, sir,
Pray, kill me: yet you need not; your unkindness
Has left your sword no work.

Marc A. I did not think so;
I said it in my rage: pr'ythee, forgive me.
Why didst thou tempt my anger by discov'ry
Of what I would not hear?

Ven. No prince but you
Could merit that sincerity I us'd,
Nor durst another man have ventur'd it.

Marc A. But Cleopatra—
Go on, for I can bear it now.

Ven. No more.

Marc A. Thou dar'st not trust my passion, but thou may'st:
Thou only lov'st, the rest have flatter'd me.

Ven. Heav'n's blessing on your heart for that kind word!

May I believe you love me? speak again.

Marc A. Indeed I do. Speak this, and this, and this. (Embracing him.)

Thy praises were unjust; but I'll deserve 'em,
And yet mend all. Do with me what thou wilt:
Lead me to victory, thou know'st the way.

Ven. And will you leave this—

Marc A. Pr'ythee, do not curse her,
And I will leave her, though heav'n knows I love
Beyond life, conquest, empire, all but honour:
But I will leave her.

Ven. That's my royal master.
And shall we fight?

Marc A. I warrant thee, old soldier;
Thou shalt behold me once again in iron,
And, at the head of our old troops that beat
The Parthians, cry aloud, "Come, follow me!"

Ven. Oh! now I hear my emperor! In that word

Octavius fell. Gods! let me see that day,
And if I have ten years behind, take all;
I'll thank you for th' exchange.

Marc A. Oh! thou hast fir'd me! my soul's up
in arms,

And man's each part about me. Once again
That noble eagerness of fight has seiz'd me,
That eagerness with which I darted upward
To Cassius' camp: in vain the steepy hill
Oppos'd my way, in vain a war of spears
Sung round my head, and planted all my shield;
I won the trenches, while my foremost men
Lagg'd on the plain below.

Ven. Ye gods, ye gods,
For such another honour!

Marc A. Come on, my soldier;
Our hearts and arms are still the same: I long
Once more to meet our foes, that thou and I,
Like time and death, marching before our troops,
May taste fate to 'em, mow 'em out a passage,
And ent'ring where the foremost squadrons yield,
Begin the noble harvest of the field. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A grand Saloon.

Enter CLEOPATRA, IRAS, and ALEXAS.

Cleo. What shall I do, or whither shall I turn?
Ventidius has o'ercome, and he will go.

Alex. He goes to fight for you.

Cleo. Then he would see me ere he went to fight.
Flatter me not; if once he goes, he's lost.
And all my hopes destroy'd.

Alex. Does this weak passion
Become a mighty queen?

Cleo. I am no queen:
Is this to be a queen to be besieg'd
By yon insulting Roman, and to wait
Each hour the victor's chain? These ills are small;
For Antony is lost, and I can mourn
For nothing else but him. Now come, Octavius;
I have no more to lose; prepare thy bands;
I'm fit to be a captive: Antony
Has taught my mind the fortune of a slave.

Irás. Call reason to assist you.

Cleo. I have none,
And none would have: my love's a noble madness,
Which shews the cause deserv'd it. Moderate sorrow

Fits vulgar love, and for a vulgar man;
But I have lov'd with such transcendent passion,
I soar'd at first quite out of reason's view,
And now am lost above it.

Enter CHARMION.

Now, what news, my Charmion?
Will he be kind? and will he not forsake me?
Am I to live or die?

Char. I found him, madam—

Cleo. A long speech preparing!
If thou bring'st comfort, haste and give it me,
For never was more need.

Irás. I know he loves you.

Cleo. Had he been kind, her eyes had told me so
Before her tongue could speak it: now she studies
To soften what he said: but give me death
Just as he sent it, Charmion, undisguis'd,
And in the words he spoke.

Char. I found him, then,
Encompass'd round, I think, with iron statues;
So mute, so motionless his soldiers stood,
While awfully he cast his eyes about,
And ev'ry leader's hopes and fears survey'd;
Methought he look'd resolv'd, and yet not pleas'd:
When he beheld me struggling in the crowd,
He blush'd, and bade make way.

Alex. There's comfort yet.

Char. Ventidius fix'd his eyes upon my passage
Severely, as he meant to frown me back,
And sullenly gave place. I told my message
Just as you gave it, broken and disorder'd;
I number'd in it all your sighs and tears;
And while I mov'd your pitiful request,
That you but only begg'd a last farewell,
He fetch'd an inward groan, and ev'ry time
I nam'd you, sigh'd as if his heart were breaking,
But shunn'd my eyes, and guiltily look'd down.
He seem'd not now that awful Antony
Who shook an arm'd assembly with his nod,
But making shew as he would rub his eyes
Disguis'd, and blotted out a falling tear.

Cleo. Did he then weep? and was I worth a tear?
If what thou hast to say be not as pleasing
Tell me no more, but let me die contented.

Char. He bid me say he knew himself so well
He could deny you nothing if he saw you;
And, therefore—

Cleo. Thou wouldst say he would not see me.

Char. And, therefore, begg'd you not to use a pow'r
Which he could ill resist; yet he should ever
Respect you as he ought.

Cleo. Is that a word
For Antony to use to Cleopatra?
Oh! that faint word, respect! how I disdain it!
Disdain myself for loving after it!

Alex. You misjudge;
You see through love, and that deludes your sight,
But I, who bear my reason undisturb'd,
Can see this Antony, this dreaded man,
A fearful slave, who fain would run away,
And shun his master's eyes; if you pursue him,
My life on't, he still drags a chain along
That needs must clog his flight.

Cleo. Could I believe thee—

Alex. By ev'ry circumstance I know he loves.
True, he's hard press'd by int'rest and by honour;
Yet he but doubts and parleys, and casts out
Many a long look for succour.

Cleo. He sends word
He fears to see my face.

Alex. And would you more?
He shews his weakness who declines the combat;
And you must urge your fortune. Could he speak
More plainly? to my ears the message sounds,
"Come to my rescue, Cleopatra, come;
Come free me from Ventidius, from my tyrant;
See me, and give me a pretence to leave him!"

(A march.)

I hear his trumpets. This way he must pass.
Please you retire awhile; I'll work him first,
That he may bend more easy.

Cleo. You shall rule me,
But all, I fear, in vain. [Exit with Char. and Iras.]

Alex. I fear so, too,
Though I conceal'd my thoughts to make her bold;
But 'tis our utmost means, and fate befriend it.

(Retires. A march till all are on.)

Enter Lictors with fasces, one bearing the eagle; then enter MARC ANTONY and VENTIDIUS, followed by other Commanders.

Marc A. Octavius is the minion of blind chance,
But holds from virtue nothing.

Ven. Has he courage?

Marc A. But just enough to season him from coward.

Oh! 'tis the coldest youth upon a charge,
The most deliberate fighter! if he ventures
(As in Ilyria once they say he did)
To storm a town, 'tis when he cannot choose,
When all the world have fix'd their eyes upon him;
And then he lives on that for seven years after:
But at a close revenge he never fails.

Ven. I heard you challeng'd him.

Marc A. I did, Ventidius:
What think'st thou was his answer? 'twas so tame!

He said, he had more ways than one to die,
I had not.

Ven. Poor!

Marc A. He has more ways than one,
But he would choose 'em all before that one.

Ven. He first would choose an ague or a fever.

Marc A. No; it must be an ague, not a fever;
He has not warmth enough to die by that.

Ven. Or old age and a bed.

Marc A. Ay, there's his choice;
He would live like a lamp to the last wink,
And crawl upon the utmost verge of life.
Oh! Hercules, why should a man like this,
Who dares not trust his fate for one great action,
Be all the care of heav'n? why should he lord it
O'er fourscore thousand men of whom each one
Is braver than himself?

Ven. Sir, we lose time; the troops are mounted
all.

Marc A. Then give the word to march:
I long to leave this prison of a town
To join thy legions, and in open field
Once more to shew my face. Lead, my deliverer.

Enter ALEXAS.

Alex. Great emperor,
In mighty arms renown'd above mankind,
But, in soft pity to th' oppress'd, a god,
This message sends the mournful Cleopatra
To her departing lord.

Ven. (Aside.) Smooth sycophant!

Alex. A thousand wishes and ten thousand pray'rs,
Millions of blessings, wait you to the wars;
Millions of sighs and tears she sends you, too,
And would have sent

As many dear embraces to your arms,
As many parting kisses to your lips,
But those, she fears, have weary'd you already.

Ven. (Aside.) False crocodile!

Alex. And yet she begs not now you would not leave her;

That were a wish too mighty for her hopes,
And too presuming, (for her low fortune and your ebbing love,)

That were a wish for her most prosp'rous days,
Her blooming beauty and your growing kindness.

Marc A. (Aside.) Well, I must man it out.
What would the queen?

Alex. First, to these noble warriors who attend
Your daring courage in the chase of fame
(Too daring and too dang'rous for her quiet)
She humbly recommends all she holds dear,
All her own cares and fears, the care of you.

Ven. Yes, witness Actium.

Marc A. Let him speak, Ventidius.

Alex. You, when his matchless valour bears him forward

With ardour too heroic on his foes,
Fall down as she would do before his feet,
Lie in his way, and stop the paths of death;
Tell him this god is not invulnerable,
That absent Cleopatra bleeds in him;
And that you may remember her petition,
She begs you wear these trifles as a pawn,
Which, at your wish'd return, she will redeem
(Gives jewels to the Commanders.)

With all the wealth of Egypt.
This to the great Ventidius she presents,
Whom she can never count her enemy,
Because he loves her lord.

Ven. Tell her I'll none on't;
I'm not asham'd of honest poverty:
Not all the diamonds of the east can bribe
Ventidius from his faith. I hope to see
These and the rest of all her sparkling store
Where they shall more deservingly be plac'd.

Marc A. And who must wear 'em, then?

Ven. The wrong'd Octavia.

Marc A. You might have spar'd that word.

Ven. And she that bribe.

Marc A. But have I no remembrance?

Alex. Yes, a dear one;
Your slave, the queen—

Marc A. My mistress.

Alex. Then your mistress.
Your mistress would, she says, have sent her soul,
But that you had long since: she humbly begs
This ruby bracelet, set with bleeding hearts,
(The emblems of her own,) may bind your arm.

(Presenting a bracelet.)

Ven. Now, my best lord, in honour's name I ask
you,

For manhood's sake, and for your own dear safety,
Touch not these poison'd gifts,
Infected by the sender; touch 'em not;
Myriads of bluest plagues lie underneath 'em,
And more than aconite has dipp'd the silk.

Marc A. Nay, now you grow too cynical, Ven-tidius;

A lady's favours may be worn with honour.
What, to refuse her bracelet! on my soul,
When I lie pensive in my tent alone,
'Twill pass the wakeful hours of winter nights

To tell these pretty beads upon my arm,
To count for ev'ry one a soft embrace,
A melting kiss at such and such a time,
And now and then the fury of her love,
When—And what harm's in this?

Alex. None, none, my lord,
But what's to her, that now 'tis past for ever.

Marc A. (Going to tie it.) We soldiers are so awkward—help me to tie it.

Alex. In faith, my lord, we courtiers, too, are awkward

In these affairs; so are all men, indeed;
But shall I speak?

Marc A. Yes, freely.

Alex. Then, my lord, fair hands alone
Are fit to tie it; she who sent it can.

Ven. Hell! death! this eunuch pander ruins you.
You will not see her?

[Alexas whispers an Attendant, who goes out.]

Marc A. But to take my leave.

Ven. Then I have wash'd an Ethiop. Y' are undone!

Y' are in the toils! y' are taken! y' are destroy'd!
Her eyes do Cæsar's work.

Marc A. You fear too soon:

I'm constant to myself: I know my strength;
And yet she shall not think me barb'rous neither,
Born in the deeps of Afric: I'm a Roman,
Bred to the rules of soft humanity.

A guest, and kindly us'd, should bid farewell.

Ven. You do not know

How weak you are to her, how much an infant;
You are not proof against a smile or glance;
A sigh will quite disarm you.

Marc A. See, she comes!

Now you shall find your error. Gods! I thank you;
I form'd the danger greater than it was,
And now 'tis near, 'tis lessen'd.

Ven. Mark the end, yet.

Enter CLEOPATRA, CHARMION, and IRAS.

Marc A. Well, madam, we are met.

Cleo. Is this a meeting?

Then we must part!

Marc A. We must.

Cleo. Who says we must?

Marc A. Our own hard fates.

Cleo. We make those fates ourselves.

Marc A. Yes, we have made 'em; we have lov'd each other

Into our mutual ruin.

Cleo. The gods have seen my joys with envious eyes;

And all the world

(As 'twere the bus'ness of mankind to part us)

Is arm'd against my love; ev'n you yourself

Join with the rest: you, you are arm'd against me.

Marc A. I will be justify'd in all I do

To late posterity, and, therefore, hear me.

If I mix a lie

With any truth, reproach me freely with it,

Else favour me with silence.

Cleo. You command me,

And I am dumb.

Ven. I like this well: he shews authority. (Aside.)

Marc A. That I derive my ruin

From you alone—

Cleo. Oh, heav'ns! I ruin you!

Marc A. You promis'd me your silence, and you break it

Ere I have scarce begun.

Cleo. Well, I obey you.

Marc A. When I beheld you first it was in Egypt,
Ere Cæsar saw your eyes: you gave me love,
And were too young to know it. That I settled
Your father in his throne was for your sake;
I left th' acknowledgment for time to ripen.
Cæsar stepp'd in, and with a greedy hand
Pluck'd the green fruit ere the first blush of red

Yet cleaving to the bough. He was my lord,
And was, beside, too great for me to rival:
But I deserv'd you first, though he enjoy'd you.
When after I beheld you in Cilicia,
An enemy to Rome, I pardon'd you.

Cleo. I clear'd myself—

Marc A. Again you break your promise.

I lov'd you still, and took your weak excuses,
Took you into my bosom stain'd by Cæsar,
And not half mine: I went to Egypt with you,
And hid me from the bus'ness of the world,
Shut out inquiring nations from my sight
To give whole years to you.

Ven. Yes, to your shame be't spoken. (Aside.)

Marc A. How I lov'd,

Witness ye days and nights, and all ye hours,
That danc'd away with down upon your feet,
As all your bus'ness were to count my passion.
One day past by and nothing saw but love;
Another came, and still 'twas only love:
The suns were weary'd out with looking on,
And I untir'd with loving.

I saw you ev'ry day, and all the day,
And ev'ry day was still but as the first,
So eager was I still to see you more.

Ven. 'Tis all too true.

Marc A. Fulvia, my wife, grew jealous,
(As she, indeed, had reason,) rais'd a war
In Italy to call me back.

Ven. But yet

You went not. (Aside.)

Marc A. While within your arms I lay
The world fell mould'ring from my hands each hour,
And left me scarce a grasp: I thank your love
for't.

Ven. Well push'd: that last was home. (Aside.)

Cleo. Yet may I speak?

Marc A. If I have urg'd a falsehood, yes; else
not.

Your silence says I have not. Fulvia died:
(Pardon, you gods! with my unkindness died.)
To set the world at peace, I took Octavia,
This Cæsar's sister. In her pride of youth
And flow'r of beauty did I wed that lady,
Whom blushing I must praise, although I left her.
You call'd; my love obey'd the fatal summons:
This rais'd the Roman arms; the cause was your's.
I would have fought by land, where I was stronger;
You hinder'd it; yet, when I fought at sea,
Forsook me fighting; and, oh! stain to honour!
Oh! lasting shame! I knew not that I fled,
But fled to follow you.

Ven. What haste she made to hoist her purple sails!

And to appear magnificent in flight,
Drew half our strength away.

Marc A. All this you caus'd:

And would you multiply more ruin on me?
This honest man, my best, my only friend,
Has gather'd up the shipwreck of my fortunes:
Twelve legions I have left, my last recruits,
And you have watch'd the news, and bring your eyes

To seize them, too. If you have aught to answer
Now speak, you have free leave.

Alex. She stands confounded:

Despair is in her eyes. (Aside.)

Ven. Now lay a sigh i'th' way to stop his passage;

Prepare a tear, and bid it for his legions:
'Tis like they shall be sold.

Cleo. How shall I plead my cause, when you,
my judge,

Already have condemn'd me? Shall I bring
The love you bore me for my advocate?
That now is turn'd against me, that destroys me;
For love once past is, at the best, forgotten,
But oft'ner sours to hate. It will please my lord
To ruin me, and therefore I'll be guilty;

But could I once have thought it would have pleas'd
you,
That you would pry with narrow searching eyes
Into my faults, severe to my destruction,
And watching all advantages with care
That serve to make me wretched! Speak, my lord,
For I end here. Though I deserve this usage,
Was it like you to give it?

Marc A. Oh! you wrong me
To think I sought this parting, or desir'd
T' accuse you more than what will clear myself,
And justify this breach.

Cleo. Thus low I thank you;
And since my innocence will not offend,
I shall not blush to own it.

Ven. After this,
I think she'll blush at nothing. (Aside.)

Cleo. You seem griev'd
(And therein you are kind) that Cæsar first
Enjoy'd my love, though you deserv'd it better;
For had I first been your's it would have sav'd
My second choice; I never had been his,
And ne'er had been but your's. But Cæsar first,
You say, possess'd my love. Not so, my lord:
He first possess'd my person, you my love:
Cæsar lov'd me, but I lov'd Antony:

Ven. Oh! siren, siren!
Yet grant that all the love she boasts were true,
Has she not ruin'd you? I still urge that,
The fatal consequence.

Cleo. The consequence, indeed!
For I dare challenge him, my greatest foe,
To say it was design'd. It is true I lov'd you,
And kept you far from an uneasy wife;
Such Fulvia was.

Yes; but he'll say you left Octavia for me:
And can you blame me to receive that love
Which quitted such desert for worthless me?
How often have I wish'd some other Cæsar,
Great as the first, and as the second young,
Would court my love to be refus'd for you!

Ven. Words, words! but Actium, sir, remember Actium!

Cleo. Ev'n there I dare his malice. True, I counsell'd

To fight at sea; but I betray'd you not:
I fled, but not to the enemy. 'Twas fear:
Would I had been a man not to have fear'd!
For none would then have envy'd me your friendship,

Who envy me your love.

Marc A. We're both unhappy:
If nothing else, yet our ill fortune parts us.
Speak! would you have me perish by my stay?

Cleo. If as a friend you ask my judgment, go;
If as a lover, stay. If you must perish—
'Tis a hard word: but stay.

Ven. See now th' effects of her so boasted love!
She strives to drag you down to ruin with her;
But could she 'scape without you, oh! how soon
Would she let go her hold, and haste to shore,
And never look behind!

Cleo. Then judge my love by this.
(Giving Marc A. a writing.)

Could I have borne
A life or death, a happiness or woe,
From your's divided, this had giv'n me means.

Marc A. By Hercules, the writing of Octavius!
See, see, Ventidius! here he offers Egypt,
And joins all Syria to it as a present,
So, in requital, she forsake my fortunes
And join her arms with his.

Cleo. And yet you leave me!
You leave me, Antony; and yet I love you!
Indeed I do! I have refus'd a kingdom,
That's a trifle;
For I could part with life, with anything,
But only you. Oh! let me die but with you!
Is that a hard request?

Marc A. Next living with you,
'Tis all that heav'n can give.

Alex. He melts; we conquer. (Aside.)

Cleo. No, you shall go; your int'rest calls you
hence:

Yes, your dear int'rest pulls too strong for these Weak arms to hold you here. (Takes his hand.)

Go, leave me, soldier,
(For you're no more a lover,) leave me dying;
Push me all pale and panting from your bosom,
And when your march begins, let one run after,
Breathless almost for joy, and cry, "She's dead!"
The soldiers shout. You then, perhaps, may sigh,
And muster all your Roman gravity;
Ventidius chides, and straight your brow clears up,
As I had never been.

Marc A. Gods! 'tis too much! too much for man to bear!

Cleo. What is't for me, then,
A weak, forsaken woman and a lover?
Here let me breathe my last; envy me not
This minute in your arms! I'll die,
And end your trouble.

Marc A. Die! rather let me perish, loosen'd nature

Leap from its hinges, sink the props of heav'n,
And fall the skies to crush the nether world!
My eyes, my soul, my all! (Embraces her.)
"But could she 'scape without me, with what haste
Would she let slip her hold, and make to shore,
And never look behind!"

Down on thy knees, blasphemous as thou art,
And ask forgiveness of wrong'd innocence.

Ven. I'll rather die than take it. Will you go?

Marc A. Go! whither? go from all that's excellent!

Give to your boy, your Cæsar,
This rattle of a globe to play withal,
This gewgaw world, and put him clearly off;
I'll not be pleas'd with less than Cleopatra.

Cleo. She's wholly your's. My heart's so full of joy,

That I shall do some wild extravagance
Of love in public; and the foolish world,
Which knows not tenderness, will think me mad.

Ven. Oh! women, women, women! all the gods
Have not such pow'r of doing good to man
As you of doing harm. [Exit.]

Marc A. Our men are arm'd;
Unbar the gate that looks to Cæsar's camp;
I would revenge the treachery he meant me,
And long security makes conquest easy.
I'm eager to return before I go;
For all the pleasures I have known beat thick
On my remembrance. How I long for night!
That both the sweets of mutual love may try,
And triumph once o'er Cæsar ere we die. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—*Enter CLEOPATRA, CHARMION, IRAS,
ALEXAS, and a train of Egyptians; MARC AN-TONY and Romans. Cleopatra crowns Marc Antony.*

Marc A. My brighter Venus!

Cleo. Oh! my greater Mars!

Marc A. Thou join'st us well, my love.
There's no satiety of love in thee;
Enjoy'd, thou still art new; perpetual spring
Is in thy arms; the ripen'd fruit but falls
And blossoms rise to fill its empty place,
And I grow rich by giving.

Enter VENTIDIUS, and stands apart.

Alex. Oh! now the danger's past your gen'ral comes;
He joins not in your joys, nor minds your triumphs;
But with contracted brows looks frowning on,
As envying your success.

Marc A. Now on my soul he loves me, truly loves me;

He never flatter'd me in any vice,
But awes me with his virtue; ev'n this minute,
Methinks, he has a right of chiding me.
Lead to the temple; I'll avoid his presence;
It checks too strong upon me.

(As Marc A. is going with the rest, Ventidius pulls him by the robe.)

Ven. Emperor!

Marc A. (Looking back.) 'Tis the old argument;
I pr'ythee, spare me.

Ven. But this one hearing, emperor.

Marc A. Let go

My robe, or by the father Hercules—

Ven. By Hercules' father! that's yet greater;
I bring you somewhat you would wish to know.

Marc A. Thou seest we are observ'd; attend me here,

And I'll return. [Exit.]

Ven. I'm waning in his favour, yet I love him;
I love this man who runs to meet his ruin;
And sure the gods, like me, are fond of him:
His virtues lie so mingled with his crimes,
As would confound their choice to punish one
And not reward the other.

Re-enter MARC ANTONY.

Marc A. We can conquer,
You see, without your aid:
We have dislodg'd their troops.
Five thousand Romans, with their faces upward,
Lie breathless on the plain.

Ven. 'Tis well; and he
Who lost 'em could have spar'd ten thousand more:
Yet, if by this advantage you could gain
An easier peace, while Cæsar doubts the chance
Of arms—

Marc A. Oh! think not on't, Ventidius!
The boy pursues my ruin; he'll no peace!

Ven. Have you no friend,
In all his army, who has pow'r to move him?
Mecænas or Agrippa might do much.
Pray, think again.

Marc A. Why dost thou drive me from myself to search

For foreign aid, to hunt my memory,
And range all o'er a wide and barren place,
To find a friend? The wretched have no friends!
Yet I have one, the bravest youth of Rome,
Whom Cæsar loves beyond the love of women.

Ven. Him would I see, that man of all the world!
Just such an one we want.

Marc A. He lov'd me, too;
I was his soul; he liv'd not but in me:
We were so clos'd within each other's breasts,
The rivets were not found that join'd us first.
After this,

I need not tell his name: 'twas Dolabella.

Ven. He's now in Cæsar's camp.

Marc A. No matter where,
Since he's no longer mine. He took unkindly
That I forbade him Cleopatra's sight,
Because I fear'd he lov'd her.
Would he were here!

Ven. Would you believe he lov'd you?
I read your answer in your eyes—you would.
Not to conceal it longer, he has sent
A messenger from Cæsar's camp with letters.

Marc A. Let him appear.

Ven. I'll bring him instantly. [Exit.]

Re-enter VENTIDIUS, with DOLABELLA.

Marc A. 'Tis he himself, himself! by holy friendship! (Runs to embrace him.)
Art thou return'd at last, my better half?

Dol. I must be silent, for my soul is busy
About a nobler work. She's new come home,
Like a long absent man, and wanders o'er

Each room, a stranger to her own, to look
If all be safe.

Marc A. Thou hast what's left of me;
But, oh! my Dolabella,
Thou hast beheld me other than I am.
Hast thou not seen my morning chambers fill'd
With sceptred slaves, who waited to salute me?
With eastern monarchs, who forgot the sun
To worship my uprising? Menial kings
Ran coursing up and down my palace-yard,
Stood silenc'd in my presence, watch'd my eyes,
And at my least command, all started out
Like racers to the goal.

Dol. Slaves to your fortune.

Marc A. Fortune is Cæsar's now, and what am I?

Ven. What you have made yourself: I will not flatter.

Marc A. Is this friendly done?

Dol. Yes, when his end is so. I must join with him,

Indeed I must, and yet you must not chide:

Why am I else your friend?

Marc A. Take heed, young man,
How thou upbraid'st my love! the queen has eyes,
And thou, too, hast a soul! Canst thou remember
When, swell'd with hatred, thou beheld'st her first
As accessory to thy brother's death?

Dol. Spare my remembrance! 'twas a guilty
day,
And still the blush hangs here.

Marc A. To clear herself
For sending him no aid, she came from Egypt:
Her galley down the silver Cydnus row'd;
The tackling silk, the streamers wav'd with gold,
The gentle winds were lodg'd in purple sails,
Her nymphs like Nereids round her couch were plac'd,

Where she another sea-born Venus lay.

Dol. No more! I would not hear it!

Marc A. Oh! you must.
She lay, and leant her cheek upon her hand,
And cast a look so languishingly sweet,
As if secure of all beholders' hearts,
Neglecting she could take 'em. Boys, like Cupids,
Stood fanning, with their painted wings, the winds
That play'd about her face; but if she smil'd,
A darting glory seem'd to blaze abroad,
That men's desiring eyes were never weary'd,
But hung upon the object! To soft flutes
The silver oars kept time; and, while they play'd,
The hearing gave new pleasure to the sight,
And both to thought. 'Twas heav'n, or somewhat
more!

For she so charm'd all hearts, that gazing crowds
Stood panting on the shore, and wanted breath
To give their welcome voice.

Then, Dolabella, where was then thy soul?
Was not thy fury quite disarm'd with wonder?
Didst thou not shrink behind me from those eyes,
And whisper in my ear, "Oh! tell her not
That I accus'd her of my brother's death."

Dol. And should my weakness be a plea for your's?
Mine was an age when love might be excus'd;
Your's—

Ven. Speak boldly:
Your's, he would say, in your declining age;
In you (I would not use so harsh a word)
'Tis but plain dotage.

Marc A. Ha!

Dol. 'Twas urg'd too home.
But yet the loss was private that I made;
'Twas but myself I lost: I lost no legions;
I had no world to lose, no peoples' love.

Marc A. This from a friend?

Dol. Yes, Antony, a true one;
A friend so tender, that each word I speak
Stabs my own heart before it reach your ear.
Oh! judge me not less kind because I chide.
To Cæsar I excuse you.

Marc A. Oh! ye gods,
Have I, then, liv'd to be excus'd to Cæsar?

Dol. As to your equal.

Marc A. Well, he's but my equal:
While I bear this he never shall be more.

Dol. I bring conditions from him.

Marc A. Are they noble?

Methinks thou shouldst not bring 'em else; yet he
Is full of deep dissembling, knows no honour
Divided from his int'rest.

He's fit, indeed, to buy, not conquer kingdoms.

Ven. Then, granting this,
What power was theirs who wrought so hard a temper
To honourable terms?

Marc A. It was my Dolabella or some god.

Dol. Not I, nor yet Mecænas, nor Agrippa;
They were your enemies, and I a friend
Too weak alone; yet 'twas a Roman deed.

Marc A. 'Twas like a Roman done. Shew me that man

Who has preserv'd my life, my love, my honour;
Let me but see his face.

Ven. That task is mine,
And, heav'n! thou know'st how pleasing. [Exit.]

Dol. You'll remember
To whom you stand oblig'd?

Marc A. When I forget it,
Be thou unkind, and that's my greatest curse.
My queen shall thank him, too.

Dol. I fear she will not.

Marc A. But she shall do't. The queen, my Dolabella!

Hast thou not still some grudgings of thy fever?

Dol. I would not see her lost.

Marc A. When I forsake her,
Leave me, my better stars; for she has truth
Beyond her beauty. Cæsar tempted her
At no less price than kingdoms to betray me;
But she resisted all: and yet thou chid'st me
For loving her too well. Could I do so?

Dol. Yes; there's my reason.

Re-enter VENTIDIUS with OCTAVIA, leading Marc Antony's two little Daughters.

Marc A. Where—Octavia there? (Starting.)

Ven. What! is she poison to you? a disease?
Look on her, view her well, and those she brings:
Are they all strangers to your eyes? has nature
No secret call, no whisper, they are your's?

Dol. For shame, my lord! if not for love, receive 'em

With kinder eyes. If you confess a man,
Meet 'em, embrace 'em, bid 'em welcome to you.

Marc A. I stood amaz'd to think how they came hither.

Ven. I sent for 'em; I brought them in unknown
To Cleopatra's guards.

Dol. Yet are you cold?

Oct. Thus long I have attended for my welcome,
Which, as a stranger, sure I might expect.
Who am I?

Marc A. Cæsar's sister.

Oct. That's unkind!

Had I been nothing more than Cæsar's sister,
Know, I had still remain'd in Cæsar's camp;
But your Octavia, your much injur'd wife,
Though banish'd from your bed, driv'n from your house,

In spite of Cæsar's sister, still is your's.
'Tis true, I have a heart disdains your coldness,
And prompts me not to seek what you should offer;

But a wife's virtue still surmounts that pride:
I come to claim you as my own, to shew
My duty first, to ask, nay, beg your kindness.
Your hand, my lord; 'tis mine, and I will have it.

(Taking his hand.)

Ven. Do take it, thou deserv'st it.

Dol. On my soul,
And so she does.

Marc A. I fear, Octavia, you have begg'd my life.

Oct. Begg'd it, my lord?

Marc A. Yes, begg'd it, my ambassadress;
Poorly and basely begg'd it of your brother.

Oct. Poorly and basely I could never beg,
Nor could my brother grant.

Marc A. Shall I, who to my kneeling slave could say,

"Rise up, and be a king!" shall I fall down
And cry, "Forgive me, Cæsar?" No; that word
Forgive would choke me up,
And die upon my tongue.

Dol. You shall not need it.

Marc A. I will not need it. Come, you've all betray'd me:

My wife has bought me with her pray'rs and tears,
And now I must become her branded slave:

In ev'ry peevish mood she will upbraid
The life she gave: if I but look awry,
She'll cry, "I'll tell my brother!"

Oct. My hard fortune

Subjects me still to your unkind mistakes;
But the conditions I have brought, are such
You need not blush to take. I love your honour,
Because 'tis mine. It never shall be said,
Octavia's husband was her brother's slave.
Sir, you are free, free ev'n from her you loathe;
For though my brother bargains for your love,
Makes me the price and cement of your peace,
I have a soul like your's; I cannot take
Your love as alms, nor beg what I deserve.
I'll tell my brother we are reconcil'd;
He shall draw back his troops, and you shall march
To rule the east. I may be dropp'd at Athens;
No matter where; I never will complain,
But only keep the barren name of wife,
And rid you of the trouble.

Ven. Was ever such a strife of sullen honour!
Both scorn to be oblig'd. (Apart.)

Dol. Oh! she has touch'd him in the tend'rest part:
See how he reddens with despite and shame
To be outdone in generosity! (Apart.)

Marc A. Octavia, I have heard you, and must praise

The greatness of your soul,
But cannot yield to what you have propos'd;
For I can ne'er be conquer'd but by love,
And you do all for duty. You would free me,
And would be dropp'd at Athens; was't not so?

Oct. It was, my lord.

Marc A. Then I must be oblig'd
To one who loves me not, who to herself
May call me thankless and ungrateful man.
I'll not endure it; no.

Ven. I'm glad it pinches there. (Apart.)

Oct. Would you triumph o'er poor Octavia's virtue?

That pride was all I had to bear me up,
That you might think you ow'd me for your life,
And ow'd it to my duty, not my love.

Marc A. Therefore, you love me not.

Oct. Therefore, my lord,
I should not love you.

Marc A. Therefore, you would leave me.

Oct. And, therefore, I should leave you—if I could.

Dol. Her soul's too great, after such injuries,
To say she loves, and yet she lets you see it.
Her modesty and silence plead her cause.

Marc A. Oh! Dolabella, which way shall I turn?
I find a secret yielding in my soul;
But Cleopatra, who would die with me,
Must she be left? Pity pleads for Octavia,
But does it not plead more for Cleopatra?

Ven. Justice and pity plead for Octavia,
For Cleopatra neither.

One would be ruin'd with you, but she first

Had ruin'd you; the other you have ruin'd,
And yet she would preserve you.

In ev'rything their merits are unequal.

Marc A. Oh! my distracted soul!

Oct. Sweet heav'n! compose it.

Come, come; my lord, if I can pardon you,
Methinks you should accept it. Look on these;
Are they not your's? or stand they thus neglected
As they are mine? Go to him, children; go
Kneel to him; take him by the hand; speak to him:
You, Agrippina, hang upon his arms;
And you, Antonia, clasp about his waist:
If he will shake you off, if he will dash you
Against the pavement, you must bear it, children;
For you are mine, and I was born to suffer.

(The Children go to him.)

Ven. Was ever sight so moving! Emperor!

Dol. Friend!

Oct. Husband!

Children. Father!

Marc A. I am vanquish'd: take me,
Octavia; take me, children; share me all.

(Embracing them.)

I've been a thriftless debtor to your loves,
And run out much in riot from your stock;
But all shall be amended.

Oct. Oh! bless'd hour!

Dol. Oh! happy change!

Ven. My joy stops at my tongue!

Marc A. (To Octavia.) This is thy triumph:
lead me where thou wilt,
Ev'n to thy brother's camp.

Oct. All there are your's.

Enter ALEXAS, hastily.

Alex. The queen, my mistress, sir, and your's—

Marc A. 'Tis past. Octavia, you shall stay this night;
To-morrow, Cæsar and we are one. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Saloon.

Enter MARC ANTONY and DOLABELLA.

Dol. Why would you shift it from yourself on
me?

Can you not tell her you must part?

Marc A. I cannot;

I could pull out an eye and bid it go,
And t'other should not weep. Oh! Dolabella,
How many deaths are in this word depart!
I dare not trust my tongue to tell her so:
One look of hers would thaw me into tears,
And I should melt till I were lost again.

Dol. Then let Ventidius;
He's rough by nature.

Marc A. Oh! he'll speak too harshly;
He'll kill her with the news: thou, only thou.

Dol. Nature has cast me in so soft a mould
That I should speak
So faintly, with such fear to grieve her heart,
She'd not believe it earnest.

Marc A. Therefore, therefore,
Thou, only thou, art fit. Think thyself me,
And when thou speak'st (but let it first be long)
Take off the edge from ev'ry sharper sound,
And let our parting be as gently made
As other loves begin. Wilt thou do this?

Dol. What you have said so sinks into my soul,
That if I must speak, I shall speak just so.

Marc A. I leave you then to your sad task. Farewell!

I sent her word to meet you.

(Goes to the door and comes back.)

I forgot:

Let her be told I'll make her peace with mine:
Her crown and dignity shall be preserv'd,
If I have pow'r with Cæsar.—Oh! be sure
To think on that.

Dol. Fear not, I will remember.

(Marc A. goes again to the door and comes back.)

Marc A. And tell her, too, how much I was constrain'd;

I did not this but with extremest force.

Desire her not to hate my memory,

For I still cherish hers—insist on that.

Dol. Trust me I'll not forget it.

Marc A. Then that's all.

(Goes out and returns again.)

Wilt thou forgive my fondness this once more?

Tell her, though we shall never meet again,

If I should hear she took another love,

The news would break my heart.—Now I must go,

For ev'ry time I have return'd, I feel

My soul more tender, and my next command

Would be to bid her stay and ruin both. [Exit.]

Dol. Men are but children of a larger growth;

Our appetites as apt to change as theirs,

And full as craving, too, and full as vain;

And yet the soul, shut up in her dark room,

Viewing so clear abroad, at home sees nothing;

But, like a mole in earth, busy and blind,

Works all her folly up, and casts it outward

To the world's open view. Thus I discover'd,

And blam'd the love of ruin'd Antony,

Yet wish that I were he to be so ruin'd.

Enter VENTIDIUS, behind.

Ven. Alone, and talking to himself! Concern'd, too!

Perhaps my guess is right: he lov'd her once,

And may pursue it still. (Aside.)

Dol. Oh! friendship, friendship!

Ill canst thou answer this, and reason worse:

Unfaithful in th' attempt, hopeless to win,

And if I win, undone. Mere madness all.

And yet th' occasion fair. What injury

To him, to wear the robe which he throws by?

Ven. None, none at all. This happens as I wish,
To ruin her yet more with Antony. (Aside.)

Enter CLEOPATRA, talking with ALEXAS, CHAR-MION, and IRAS.

Dol. She comes! what charms have sorrow on that face!

Sorrow seems pleas'd to dwell with so much sweetness;

Yet now and then a melancholy smile

Breaks loose, like lightning in a winter's night,

And shews a moment's day.

Ven. If she should love him, too! Draw, draw nearer,

Sweet devil! that I may hear. (Aside.)

Alex. Believe me; try—

(Dolabella goes over to Charmion and Iras.)

To make him jealous; jealousy is like

A polish'd glass held to the lips when life's in doubt:

If there be breath, 'twill catch the damp and shew it.

Cleo. I grant you jealousy's a proof of love,

But 'tis a weak and unavailing medicine.

Alex. 'Tis your last remedy, and strongest, too:

And then this Dolabella, who so fit

To practise on? He's handsome, valiant, young,

And looks as he were laid for Nature's bait

To catch weak women's eyes.

He stands already more than half suspected

Of loving you: the least kind word or glance

You give this youth will kindle him with love;

Then, like a burning vessel set adrift,

You'll send him down amain before the wind,

To fire the heart of jealous Antony.

Cleo. Can I do this? ah! no; my love's so true,

That I can neither hide it where it is,

Nor shew it where it is not,

Alex. Force yourself:

Th' event will be, your lover will return

Doubly desirous to possess the good

Which once he fear'd to lose.

Cleo. I must attempt it;
But, oh! with what regret. [Exit Alexas.]

Ven. So, now the scene draws near; they're in my reach. (Aside.)

Cleo. (To Dol.) Discoursing with my women!
Might not I

Share in your entertainment?

Char. You have been
The subject of it, madam.

Cleo. How? and how?

Iras. Such praises of your beauty!

Cleo. Mere poetry:

Your Roman wits, your Gallus and Tibullus,
Have taught you this from Cytheris and Delia.

Dol. Those Roman wits have never been in Egypt,
Cytheris and Delia else had been unsung:
I who have seen—had I been born a poet,
Should choose a nobler name.

Cleo. You flatter me;
But 'tis your nation's vice: all of your country
Are flatt'ers, and all false. Your friend's like you:
I'm sure he sent you not to speak these words.

Dol. No, madam; yet he sent me—

Cleo. Well, he sent you—

Dol. Of a less pleasing errand.

Cleo. How less pleasing?

Less to yourself or me?

Dol. Madam, to both;

For you must mourn, and I must grieve to cause it.

Cleo. You Charmion, and your fellow, stand at distance.

Hold up my spirits! (Aside.)—Well, now your mournful matter;

For I'm prepar'd, perhaps can guess it, too.

Dol. I wish you would, for 'tis a thankless office
To tell ill news; and I of all your sex
Most fear displeasing you.

Cleo. Of all your sex

I soonest could forgive you, if you should.

Ven. Most delicate advances! Woman! woman!
Dear, d—d, unconstant sex! (Aside.)

Cleo. In the first place,

I am to be forsaken; is't not so?

Dol. I wish I could not answer to that question.

Cleo. Then pass it o'er because it troubles you:
I should have been more griev'd another time.
Next, I'm to lose my kingdom—Farewell, Egypt!
Yet is there any more?

Dol. Madam, I fear

Your too deep sense of grief has turn'd your reason.

Cleo. No, no, I'm not run mad; I can bear fortune;
And love may be expell'd by other love,
As poisons are by poisons.

Dol. You o'erjoy me, madam,
To find your griefs so moderately borne.
You've heard the worst: all are not false like him.

Cleo. No, heav'n forbid they should!

Dol. Some men are constant.

Cleo. And constancy deserves reward, that's certain.

Dol. Deserves it not, but give it leave to hope.

Ven. I'll swear thou hast my leave. I have enough. [Aside, and exit.]

Dol. I come prepar'd

To tell you heavy news, news which I thought
Would fright the blood from your pale cheeks
to hear;

But you have met it with a cheerfulness
That makes my task more easy; and my tongue,
Which on another's message was employ'd,
Would gladly speak its own.

Cleo. Hold, Dolabella.

First tell me, were you chosen by my lord,
Or sought you this employment?

Dol. He pick'd me out; and, as his bosom-friend,
He charg'd me with his words.

Cleo. The message, then,
I know was tender, and each accent smooth,
To mollify that rugged word depart.

Dol. Oh! you mistake: he chose the harshest words:

He coin'd his face in the severest stamp,
And fury shook his fabric like an earthquake:
He heav'd for vent, and burst like bellowing Ætna,
In sounds scarce human.

(All the time of this speech, Cleopatra seems more and more concerned, till she sinks quite down.)

Cleo. Oh! I can bear no more. (Faints.)

Dol. Help, help! Oh, wretch! oh! cursed, cursed wretch!

What have I done?

Char. Heav'n be prais'd,
She comes again!

Cleo. Why have you brought me back to this loath'd being,

Th' abode of falsehood, violated vows,
And injur'd love? For pity let me go;
For if there be a place of long repose,
I'm sure I want it. Unkind, unkind!

Dol. Believe me 'tis against myself I speak;
(Kneeling.)

That, sure, deserves belief. I injur'd him;
My friend ne'er spoke those words. Oh! had you seen

How often he came back, and ev'ry time
With something more obliging and more kind,
To add to what he said; what dear farewells,
How almost vanquish'd by his love he parted,
And lean'd to what unwillingly he left:
I, traitor as I was, for love of you,
(But what can you not do who made me false?)
I forg'd that lie, for whose forgiveness kneels
This self-accus'd, self-punish'd criminal.

Cleo. With how much ease believe we what we wish!

Rise, Dolabella; if you have been guilty,
I have contributed, and too much love
Has made me guilty, too.
Th' advance of kindness which I made was feign'd,
To call back fleeting love by jealousy;
But 'twould not last. Oh! rather let me lose,
Than so ignobly trifle with his heart.

Dol. I find your breast fenc'd round from human reach,

Transparent as a rock of solid crystal,
Seen through, but never pierc'd.

Cleo. Could you not beg
An hour's admittance to his private ear,
Before we part; for I have far to go,
If death be far, and never must return?

Re-enter VENTIDIUS with OCTAVIO, behind.

Ven. From whence you may discover—Oh, sweet, sweet!
Would you indeed! the pretty hand in earnest!

(Aside.)
Dol. I will for this reward: (Takes her hand.)

Draw it not back;
'Tis all I e'er will beg.

Ven. (Apart.) They turn upon us.
Seem not to have observ'd 'em, and go on.
(Comes forward with Octavio.)

Dol. Saw you the emperor, Ventidius?

Ven. No;
I sought him, but I heard that he was private;
None with him but Hipparchus, his freed man.

Dol. Know you his bus'ness?

Ven. Giving him instructions
And letters to his brother Cæsar.

Dol. Well,
He must be found. [Exit with Cleopatra.]

Oct. Most glorious impudence!

Ven. She look'd, methought,
As she would say, "Take your old man, Octavia;
Thank you, I'm better here."
Well, but what use
Make we of this discovery?

Oct. Let it die.

Ven. I pity Dolabella! but she's dang'rous;
And Antony
Must needs have some remains of passion still,
Which may ferment into a worse relapse
If now not fully cur'd.—But, see he comes.

Enter MARC ANTONY.

Marc A. Octavia, I was looking you, my love.
What, are your letters ready? I have giv'n
My last instructions.

Oct. Mine, my lord, are written.

Marc A. Ventidius! (Drawing him aside.)

Ven. My lord?

Marc A. A word in private.

When saw you Dolabella?

Ven. Now, my lord;

He parted hence, and Cleopatra with him.

Marc A. Speak softly; 'twas by my command he went

To bear my last farewell.

Ven. It look'd, indeed, (Aloud.)
Like your farewell.

Marc A. More softly.—My farewell!
What secret meaning have you in those words
Of my farewell? He did it by my order.

Ven. Then he obey'd your order, I suppose.
(Aloud.)

You bid him do it with all gentleness,
All kindness, and all—love.

Marc A. How she mourn'd!
The poor forsaken creature!

Ven. She took it as she ought; she bore your parting
As she did Caesar's, as she would another's,
Were a new love to come.

Marc A. Thou dost belie her; (Aloud.)
Most basely and maliciously belie her.

Ven. I thought not to displease you: I have done.

Oct. You seem disturb'd, my lord. (Coming up.)

Marc A. A very trifle.

Retire, my love.

Ven. It was indeed a trifle.

He sent—

Marc A. No more. Look how thou disobey'st me;
Thy life shall answer it. (Angrily.)

Oct. Then 'tis no trifle.

Ven. (To Oct.) 'Tis less; a very nothing: you,
too, saw it

As well as I; and, therefore, 'tis no secret.

Marc A. She saw it!

Ven. Yes; she saw young Dolabella—

Marc A. Young Dolabella!

Ven. Young! I think him young,
And handsome, too; and so do others think him.
But what of that? He went by your command,
Indeed, 'tis probable, with some kind message,
For she receiv'd it graciously: she smil'd;
And then he grew familiar with her hand,
Squeez'd it, and worry'd it with rav'nous kisses;
She blush'd, and sigh'd, and smil'd, and blush'd
again;

At last, she took occasion to talk softly,
And then she cried aloud, "That constancy
Should be rewarded!"—This I saw and heard.

Marc A. What woman was it who you heard and saw

So playful with my friend?
Not Cleopatra?

Ven. Ev'n she, my lord!

Marc A. My Cleopatra?

Ven. Your Cleopatra,
Dolabella's Cleopatra,
Ev'ry man's Cleopatra.

Marc A. 'Tis false.

I know 'tis false, and see the plot betwixt you.

Ven. What, has my age deserv'd that you should think

I would abuse your ears with perjury?
If heav'n be true, she's false.

Marc A. Though heav'n and earth
Should witness it, I'll not believe her tainted.

Ven. I'll bring you, then, a witness
From hell to prove her so. Nay, go not back;
(Seeing ALEXAS just entering and starting back.)
For stay you must, and shall.

Alex. What means my lord?

Ven. To make you do what most you hate, speak truth.

Alex. My noble lord.

Ven. My most illustrious pander!
No fine set speech, no cadence, no turn'd periods,
But a plain homespun truth, is what I ask:
I did myself o'erhear your queen make love
To Dolabella: speak, for I will know,
By your confession, what more past betwixt 'em,
How near the bus'ness draws to your employment,
And when the happy hour.

Marc A. Speak truth, Alexas; whether it offend
Or please Ventidius, care not. Justify
Thy injur'd queen from malace: dare his worst.

Alex. As far as love may plead for woman's frailty,

Urg'd by desert and greatness of the lover,
So far (divine Octavia!) may my queen
Stand ev'n excus'd to you for loving him
Who is your lord; so far from brave Ventidius.
May her past actions hope a fair report.

Marc A. 'Tis well, and truly spoken. Mark,
Ventidius.

Alex. To you, most noble emperor, her strong passion

Stands not excus'd, but wholly justify'd.
Her beauty's charms alone, without her crown,
From Ind and Meroe drew the distant vows
Of sighing kings, and at her feet were laid
The sceptres of the earth, expos'd on heaps,
To choose where she would reign;
She thought a Roman only could deserve her,
And of all Romans only Antony;
And, to be less than wife to you, disdain'd
Their lawful passion.

Marc A. 'Tis but truth.

Alex. And yet though love and your unmatch'd desert

Have drawn her from the due regard of honour;
At last, heav'n open'd her unwilling eyes
To see the wrongs she offer'd fair Octavia,
Whose holy bed she lawlessly usurp'd:
The sad effects of this improsp'rous war
Confirm'd those pious thoughts.

Ven. (Aside.) Oh! wheel you there?
Observe him now; the man begins to mend,
And talk substantial reason. Fear not, thou,
The emperor has giv'n thee leave to speak.

Alex. Else had I never dar'd t' offend his ears
With what the last necessity has urg'd
On my forsaken mistress; yet I must not Presume to say her heart is wholly alter'd.

Marc A. No; dare not for thy life, I charge thee, dare not
Pronounce that fatal word.

Oct. Must I bear this? Good heav'n! afford me patience! (Aside.)

Ven. My dear half man! proceed.

Alex. Yet Dolabella
Has lov'd her long; he next, my godlike lord,
Deserves her best; and should she meet his passion,
Rejected as she is by him she lov'd—

Marc A. Hence from my sight, for I can bear no
more!

Let furies drag the quick to hell! each torturing hand
Do thou employ till Cleopatra comes,
Then join thou too, and help to torture her.

[Exit Alexas, thrust out by Marc Antony.]

Oct. 'Tis not well!
Indeed, my lord, 'tis much unkind to me

To shew this passion, this extreme concernment,
For an abandon'd, faithless prostitute.

Marc A. Octavia, leave me! I am much disorder'd!

Leave me, I say!

Oct. My lord—

Marc A. I bid you leave me.

Oct. My lord, my lord! love will not always last,
When urg'd with long unkindness and disdain.
Take her again whom you prefer to me;
She stays but to be call'd. Poor, cozen'd man!
Let a feign'd parting give her back your heart,
Which a feign'd love first got; for injur'd me,
Though my just sense of wrongs forbid my stay,
My duty shall be your's.

To the dear pledges of our former love
My tenderness and care shall be transferr'd,
And they shall cheer by turns my widow'd nights.
So, take my last farewell! for I despair

To have you whole, and scorn to take you half. [Exit.

Ven. I combat heav'n, which blasts my best designs!

My last attempt must be to win her back;

But, oh! I fear in vain. [Exit.

Marc A. Why was I fram'd with this plain honest heart,

Which knows not to disguise its griefs and weakness,
But bears its workings outward to the world?

I should have kept the mighty anguish in,

And forc'd a smile at Cleopatra's falsehood;

Octavia had believ'd it, and had staid.

But I am made a shallow-forded stream,

Seen to the bottom, all my clearness scorn'd,

And all my faults expos'd.—See where he comes

Enter DOLABELLA.

Who has profan'd the sacred name of friend,
And worn it into vileness!

With how secure a brow and specious form

He gilds the secret villain! Sure, that face

Was meant for honesty, but heav'n mismatch'd it,

And furnish'd treason out with nature's pomp,

To make its work more easy.—

Well, Dolabella, you perform'd my message?

Dol. I did, unwillingly.

Marc A. Unwillingly!

Was it so hard for you to bear our parting?

You should have wish'd it.

Dol. Why?

Marc A. Because you love me:

And she receiv'd my message with as true,

With as unfeign'd a sorrow as you brought it?

Dol. She loves you ev'n to madness.

Marc A. Oh! I know it.

You, Dolabella, do not better know

How much she loves me. And should I

Forsake this beauty, this all perfect creature?

Dol. I could not, were she mine.

Marc A. And yet you first

Persuaded me. How come you alter'd since?

Dol. I said at first I was not fit to go:

I could not hear her sighs and see her tears,

But pity must prevail; and so, perhaps,

It may again with you; for I have promis'd

That she should take her last farewell; and see

She comes to claim my word.

Enter CLEOPATRA.

Marc A. False Dolabella!

Dol. What's false, my lord?

Marc A. Why, Dolabella's false,

And Cleopatra's false; both false and faithless.

Draw near, you well-join'd wickedness, you serpents

Who I have in my kindly bosom warm'd,

Till I am stung to death.

Dol. My lord, have I

Deserv'd to be thus us'd?

Cleo. Can heav'n prepare

A newer torment? can it find a curse

Beyond our separation?

Marc A. Yes, if fate

Be just, much greater. Two, two such!

Oh! there's no farther name; two such—to me,

To me, who lock'd my soul within your breasts,

Had no desires, no joys, no life, but you;

A friend and mistress

Was what the world could give. Oh! Cleopatra;

Oh! Dolabella; how could you betray

This tender heart, which, with an infant fondness,

Lay lull'd betwixt your bosoms, and there slept

Secure of injur'd faith?

Dol. If she has wrong'd you,

Heav'n, hell, and you, revenge it.

Marc A. If she has wrong'd me!

Ventidius heard it,

Octavia saw it.

Cleo. They are enemies.

Marc A. Alexas is not so; he, he confess'd it;

He, who next hell best knew it, he avow'd it.

Why do I seek a proof beyond yourself? (To Dol.)

You who I sent to bear my last farewell,

Return'd to plead her stay.

Dol. What shall I answer?

If to have lov'd be guilt, then I have sinn'd;

But if to have repented of that love

Can wash away my crime, I have repented;

Yet if I have offended past forgiveness,

Let her not suffer: she is innocent.

Marc A. Thin cobweb arts of falsehood;

Seen and broke through at first.

Dol. Forgive your mistress.

Cleo. Forgive your friend.

Marc A. I can forgive

A foe, but not a mistress and a friend:

Treason is there in its most horrid shape

Where trust is greatest—I'll hear no more:

Hence from my sight from ever.

Cleo. How! for ever?

I cannot go one moment from your sight,

And must I go for ever?

My joys, my only joys, are centred here:

What place have I to go to? my own kingdom?

That I have lost for you; or to the Romans?

They hate me for your sake: or must I wander

The wide world o'er, a helpless banish'd woman,

Banish'd for love of you, banish'd from you;

Ay, there's the banishment? Oh! hear me, hear me,

With strictest justice, for I beg no favour;

And if I have offended you, then kill me,

But do not banish me.

Marc A. I must not hear you;

I have a fool within me takes your part,

But honour stops my ears.

Cleo. For pity hear me!

Marc A. (To Cleo.) Your Alexas! your's!

I am not to be mov'd.

Cleo. Then must we part? farewell, my cruel lord.

Th' appearance is against me; and I go

Unjustifi'd for ever from your sight.

How I have lov'd you know; how yet I love,

My only comfort is I know myself:

I love you more, ev'n now you are unkind,

Than when you lov'd me most; so well, so truly,

I'll never strive against it, but die pleas'd

To think you once were mine.

Marc A. Good heav'n! they weep at parting:

Must I weep, too? that calls 'em innocent.

I must not weep; and yet I must, to think

That I must not forgive—

Live, but live wretched; 'tis but just you should

Who made me so: live from each other's sight;

Let me not hear you meet. Set all the earth

And all the seas betwixt your sunder'd loves;

View nothing common but the sun and skies.

Now all take several ways,

And each your own sad fate with mine deplore,

That you were false, and I could trust no more.

[Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Temple.Enter CLEOPATRA, CHARMION, and IRAS.

Cleo. I could tear out these eyes that gain'd his heart,
And had not pow'r to keep it. Oh! the curse
Of doting on, ev'n when I find it dotage!
Bear witness, gods! you heard him bid me go;
You whom he mock'd with imprecating vows
Of promis'd faith—I'll die, I will not bear it.

Enter ALEXAS.

Art thou there, traitor!—Oh!
Oh! for a little breath to vent my rage!

Alex. Yes, I deserve it for my ill-tim'd truth.

Cleo. I would reason
More calmly with you. Did you not o'errule
And force my plain, direct, and open love
Into these crooked paths of jealousy?
Now, what's th' event? Octavia is remov'd,
But Cleopatra banish'd

Alex. Believe me, madam, Antony is your's:
His heart was never lost, but started off
To jealousy, love's last retreat and covert;
Where it lies hid in shades, watchful in silence,
And list'ning for the sound that calls it back.
Some other, any man, 'tis so advanc'd,
May perfect this unfinish'd work, which I
(Unhappy only to myself) have left
So easy to his hand.

Cleo. Look well thou do't, else—

Alex. Else what your silence threatens. Antony
Is mounted up the Pharos, from whose turret
He stands surveying our Egyptian galleys
Engag'd with Cæsar's fleet: now death or conquest;
If the first happen, fate acquits my promise;
If we o'ercome, the conqueror is your's.

(A distant shout within.)

Char. Have comfort, madam: did you mark that shout?
(Second shout, nearer.)

Irás. Hark! they redouble it.

Alex. 'Tis from the port;
The loudness shews it near. Good news, kind heav'ns!

Enter SERAPION.

Ser. Where, where's the queen?
Oh! horror, horror!
Egypt has been; the latest hour is come.
The queen of nations from her ancient seat
Is sunk for ever in the dark abyss:
Time has unroll'd her glories to the last,
And now clos'd up the volume.

Cleo. Be more plain:
Say whence thou cam'st; though fate is in thy face;
Which, from thy haggard eyes, looks wildly out,
And threatens ere thou speak'st.

Ser. I came from Pharos,
From viewing (spare me, and imagine it)
Our land's last hope, your navy—

Cleo. Vanquish'd?

Ser. No;
They fought not.

Cleo. Then they fled.

Ser. Nor that: I saw
With Antony, your well appointed fleet,
Row out, and thrice he wav'd his hand on high,
And thrice with cheerful cries they shouted back:
The well-tim'd oars
Now dipp'd from ev'ry bark, now smoothly run
To meet the foe; and soon indeed they met,
But not as foes. In few, we saw their caps
On either side thrown up: th' Egyptian galleys,
Receiv'd like friends, past through, and fell behind
The Roman rear; and now they all come forward,
And ride within the port.

Cleo. Enough, Serapion;
I've heard my doom! This needed not, you gods!
When I lost Antony, your work was done.

'Tis but superfluous malice. Where's my lord?
How bears he this last blow?

Ser. His fury cannot be express'd by words:
Thrice he attempted headlong to have fall'n
Full on his foes, and aim'd at Cæsar's galley:
Withheld, he raves on you, cries he's betray'd.
Should he now find you—

Alex. Shun him, seek your safety,
Till you can clear your innocence.

Cleo. I'll stay.

Alex. You must not; haste to the monument,
While I make speed to Cæsar.

Cleo. Cæsar! no;
I have no bus'ness with him.

Alex. I can work him
To spare your life, and let this madman perish.

Cleo. Base, fawning wretch! wouldst thou betray him, too?

Hence from my sight, I will not hear a traitor:
'Twas thy design brought all this ruin on us.
Serapion, thou art honest; counsel me:
But haste, each moment's precious.

Ser. Retire; you must not yet see Antony.
He who began this mischief
'Tis just he tempt the danger: let him clear you;
And since he offer'd you his servile tongue
To gain a poor precarious life from Cæsar,
Let him expose that fawning eloquence,
And speak to Antony.

Alex. Oh, heav'ns! I dare not:
I meet my certain death.

Cleo. Slave, thou deserv'st it.
Not that I fear my lord, will I avoid him;
I know him noble: when he banish'd me,
And thought me false, he scorn'd to take my life:
But I'll be justify'd, and then die with him.

Alex. Oh! pity me, and let me follow you.

Cleo. To death, if thou stir hence. Speak, if thou canst,

Now for thy life, which basely thou wouldst save,
While mine I prize at this. Come, good Serapion.

[Exit with Serapion, Charmion, and Iras.]

Alex. Oh! that I less could fear to lose this being,
Which, like a snowball in my coward hand,
The more 'tis grasp'd the faster melts away.
Poor reason! what a wretched aid art thou!
For still, in spite of thee,
These two long lovers, soul and body, dread
Their final separation. Let me think;
What can I say to save myself from death?
No matter what becomes of Cleopatra.

Marc A. (Within.) Which way? where?Ven. (Within.) This leads to the monument.

Alex. Ah, me! I hear him: yet I'm unprepar'd:
My gift of lying's gone;
And this court-devil, which I so oft have rais'd,
Forsakes me at my need. I dare not stay,
Yet cannot go far hence. [Exit.]

Enter MARC ANTONY and VENTIDIOUS.

Marc A. Oh! happy Cæsar! thou hast men to lead.

Think not 'tis thou hast conquer'd Antony,
But Rome has conquer'd Egypt. I'm betray'd.

Ven. The nation is
One universal traitor, and their queen
The very spirit and extract of 'em all.

Marc A. Is there yet left
A possibility of aid and valour?
Is there one god unsworn to my destruction?
For if there be,
Methinks I cannot fall beneath the fate
Of such a boy as Cæsar.

Ven. There yet remain
Three legions in the town; the last assault
Lopp'd off the rest. If death be your design,
As I must wish it now, these are sufficient
To make a heap about us of dead foes,
An honest pile for burial.

Marc A. They're enough.
We'll not divide our stars, but side by side
Fight emulous, and with malicious eyes
Survey each other's acts.

Ven. Now you shall see I love you. Not a word
Of chiding more. By my few hours of life,
I am so pleas'd with this brave Roman fate
That I would not be Cæsar to outlive you!
When we put off this flesh, and mount together,
I shall be shewn to th' ethereal crowd;
"Lo! this is he who dy'd with Antony."

Marc A. Who knows, but we may pierce through all their troops,
And reach my veterans yet? 'Tis worth the tempting.

Enter ALEXAS, trembling.

Ven. See, see that villain! See
How he has set his count'nance for deceit,
And promises to lie before he speaks!
Let me despatch him first. (Drawing.)

Marc A. Hold; he's not worth your killing. On thy life,
(Which thou may'st keep, because I scorn to take it,)
No syllable to justify thy queen;
Save thy base tongue its office.

Alex. Sir, she's gone
Where she shall never be molested more
By love or you.

Marc A. Fled to her Dolabella!
Die, traitor; I revoke my promise; die!
(Going to kill him.)

Alex. Oh! hold; she is not fled.

Marc A. She is; my eyes
Are open to her falsehood. My whole life
Has been a golden dream of love and friendship;
But now I wake, I'm like a merchant rous'd
From soft repose to see his vessel sinking,
And all his wealth cast o'er. Ungrateful woman!
Who follow'd me but as the swallow summer,
Hatching her young ones in my kindly beams,
Singing her flatt'ries to my morning wake;
But now my winter comes, she spreads her wings,
And seeks the spring of Cæsar.

Alex. Think not so;
Her fortunes have in all things mix'd with your's:
Had she betray'd her naval force to Rome,
How easily might she have gone to Cæsar,
Secure by such a bribe!

Ven. She sent it first,
To be more welcome after.

Marc A. 'Tis too plain,
Else would she have appear'd to clear herself.

Alex. She could not bear
To be accus'd by you, but shut herself
Within her monument, look'd down and sigh'd,
While from her unchang'd face the silent tears
Dropp'd as they had not leave, but stole their parting.

Some undistinguish'd words she inly murmur'd;
At last, she rais'd her eyes, and with such looks
As dying Lucrece cast—

Marc A. My heart forbodes—

Ven. Go on.

Alex. She snatch'd her poniard,
And ere we could prevent the fatal blow,
Plung'd it within her breast; then turn'd to me;
"Go, bear my lord, (said she,) my last farewell,
And ask him if he yet suspect my faith."
More she was saying, but death rush'd betwixt.
She half pronounc'd your name with her last breath,
And bury'd half within her.

Ven. Heav'n be prais'd!

Marc A. Then art thou innocent, my poor dear love?

And art thou dead?

Oh! those two words; their sounds should be divided:

Hadst thou been false and died, or hadst thou liv'd,
And hadst been true—But innocence and death!

This shews not well above. Then what am I?
The murd'rer of this truth, this innocence!
Thoughts cannot form themselves in words so horrid
As can express my guilt!

Ven. Is't come to this? The gods have been too gracious,
And thus you thank 'em for't.

Marc A. (To Alexas.) Why stay'st thou here?
Thou art not worthy to behold what now
Becomes a Roman emp'ror to perform. [Exit Alex.]

Ven. Would she had died a little sooner, though,
Before Octavio went! you might have treated;
Now 'twill look tame, and would not be receiv'd.
Come, rouse yourself, and let's die warm together.

Marc A. Why, let him enter. Oh! Ventidius,
What should I fight for now? my queen is dead:
I was but great for her: my pow'r, my empire,
Were but my merchandize to buy her love,
And conquer'd kings my factors. Now she's dead,
Let Cæsar take the world—

Ven. Would you be taken?

Marc A. Yes, I would be taken;
But, as a Roman ought—dead, my Ventidius!

Ven. Choose your death;
For I have seen him in such various shapes,
I care not which I take: I'm only troubled
The life I bear is worn to such a rag,
'Tis scarce worth giving. I could wish, indeed,
We threw it from us with a better grace,
That, like two lions taken in the toils,
We might, at least, thrust out our paws, and wound
The hunters that enclose us.

Marc A. Thou hast lov'd me,
And fain I would reward thee. I must die;
Kill me, and take the merit of my death
To make thee friends with Cæsar.

Ven. Thank your kindness!
You said I lov'd you; and, in recompense,
You bid me turn a traitor! Did I think
You would have us'd me thus? that I should die
With a hard thought of you!

Marc A. Forgive me, Roman.
Since I have heard of Cleopatra's death,
My reason bears no rule upon my tongue,
But lets my thoughts break all at random out.
I've thought better; do not deny me twice.

Ven. By heav'n! I will not:
Let it not be t' outlive you.

Marc A. Kill me first,
And then die thou; for 'tis but just thou serve
Thy friend before thyself.

Ven. Give me your hand;
We soon shall meet again. Now farewell, emperor! (Embrace.)

Methinks, that word's too cold to be my last:
Since death sweeps all distinctions, farewell, friend!
That's all:

I will not make a bus'ness of a trifle;
And yet I cannot look on you and kill you:
Pray turn your face.

Marc A. I do: strike home; be sure.

Ven. Home as my sword will reach.
(Kills himself.)

Marc A. Oh! thou mistak'st!
That wound was none of thine; give it me back:
Thou robb'st me of my death.

Ven. I do, indeed;
But think 'tis the first time I e'er deceiv'd you,
If that may plead my pardon. And you, gods!
Forgive me if you will; for I die perjur'd,
Rather than kill my friend. (Dies.)

Marc A. Farewell! ever my leader, ev'n in death!

My queen and thou have got the start of me,
And I'm the lag of honour.—Gone so soon!
Is death no more! 'Tis not worth
My further thought; for death, for aught I know,
Is but to think no more. Here's to be satisfy'd.
(Falls on his sword.)

I've miss'd my heart! oh! unperforming hand!
 Thou never couldst have err'd in a worse time.
(Trampling within.)
 Some, perhaps, from Cæsar! I'll mend
 My work ere they can reach me.
(Rises upon his knees.)

Enter CLEOPATRA, CHARMION, and IRAS.

Cleo. Where is my lord? where is he?
 My fears were prophets! I am come too late!
 Oh! that accurs'd Alexas. (Runs to him.)

Marc A. Art thou living?
 Or am I dead before I knew, and thou
 The first kind ghost that meets me?

Cleo. How is it with you?

Marc A. 'Tis as with a man
 Removing in a hurry; all pack'd up
 But one dear jewel that his haste forgot,
 And he for that returns upon the spur;
 So I come back for thee.

Cleo. Too long, ye heav'ns! you have been cruel
 to me;
 Oh! now be kind, and give me back
 His fleeting life.

Marc A. It will not be, my love!
 I keep my soul by force.
 Say but thou art not false.

Cleo. 'Tis now too late
 To say I'm true; I'll prove it, and die with you.
 Unknown to me, Alexas feign'd my death;
 Which, when I knew, I hastened to prevent
 This fatal consequence. My fleet betray'd
 Both you and I.

Marc A. And Dolabella—

Cleo. Scarce esteem'd before he lov'd, but hated
 now.

Marc A. Enough! my life's not long enough for more.

Thou say'st thou wilt come after: I believe thee;
 For I can now believe whate'er thou say'st,
 That we may part more kindly.

Cleo. I will come;
 Doubt not, my life! I'll come, and quickly, too!
 Cæsar shall triumph o'er no part of thee.

Marc A. But grieve not while thou stay'st
 My last disastrous times!
 Think we have had a clear and glorious day,
 And heav'n did kindly to delay the storm
 Just till our close of ev'ning. Ten years' love,
 And not a moment lost, but all improv'd
 To th' utmost joys! What ages have we liv'd!
 And now to die each other's! and so dying,
 While hand in hand we walk in groves below,
 Whole troops of lovers' ghosts shall flock about
 us,

And all the train be ours.

Cleo. Your words are like the notes of dying swans,

Too sweet to last. Were there so many hours
 For your unkindness, and not one for love?

Marc A. No, not a minute—this one kiss—more worth
 Than all I leave to Cæsar. (Dies.)

Cleo. Oh! tell me so again!
 My lord, my lord! speak, if you yet have being:
 Sigh to me if you cannot speak; or cast
 One look; do anything that shews you live!

Irás. He's gone too far to hear you.

Char. Remember, madam,
 He charg'd you not to grieve.

Cleo. And I'll obey him.
 I have not lov'd a Roman not to know
 What should become his wife—his wife, my Char-mion!

For 'tis to that high title I aspire;
 And now I'll not die less.

Irás. Will you, then, die?

Cleo. Why shouldst thou make that question?
 Fly both, and bring the cure of all our ills.

Irás. The aspicks, madam?

Cleo. Must I bid you twice?

[Exit Char. and Irás.]

'Tis sweet to die when they would force life on me,
 To rush into the dark abode of death
 And meet my love. Oh! welcome, welcome!

Re-enter CHARMION and IRAS, with the aspicks, &c.
 Welcome, thou kind deceiver!

(Putting aside the leaves.)

Thou best of thieves! who with an easy key
 Dost open life, and, unperceiv'd by us,
 Ev'n steals us from ourselves.

Ser. (Within.) The queen, where is she?
 The town is yielded, Cæsar's at the gates.

Cleo. He comes too late t' invade the rights of death.

Haste, haste, my friend, and rouse the serpent's fury. (Holds out her arm, and draws it back.)
 Coward flesh!

Wouldst thou conspire with Cæsar to betray me,
 As thou wert none of mine? I'll force thee to't,
 And not be sent by him,

But bring myself, my soul, to Antony.

(Turns aside, and then shews her arm bloody.)

Take hence; the work is done!

Ser. (Within.) Break ope the door,
 And guard the traitor well.

(Charmion and Irás apply the aspicks.)

Cleo. Already, death, I feel thee in my veins;
 I go with such a will to find my lord
 That we shall quickly meet.

A heavy numbness creeps through ev'ry limb,
 And now 'tis at my head: my eyelids fall,
 And my dear love is vanish'd in a mist.

Cæsar, thy worst! Now part us if thou canst.

(Dies. Irás sinks down at her feet, and dies; Charmion stands behind her chair, as dressing her head.)

Enter SERAPION, two Priests, ALEXAS bound, and Egyptians.

2 Priest. Behold, Serapion, what havoc death has made!

Ser. 'Twas what I fear'd.

See how the lovers lie in state together,
 As they were giving laws to half mankind!
 Th' impression of a smile left in her face
 Shews she died pleas'd with him for whom she liv'd,
 And went to charm him in another world.
 Cæsar's just ent'ring; grief has now no leisure.
 Secure that villain, as our pledge of safety,
 To grace th' imperial triumph. Sleep, blest pair!
 Secure from human chance, long ages out,
 While all the storms of fate fly o'er your tomb;
 And Fame to late posterity shall tell,
 No lovers liv'd so great, or died so well. [Exeunt.]

THE CARELESS HUSBAND;

A COMEDY, IN FIVE ACTS.—BY COLLEY CIBBER.

Act V.—Scene 5.

LORD MORELOVE

SIR CHARLES EASY
LADY BETTY MODISH

LADY GRAVEAIRS
LADY EASY

MRS. EDGING
SERVANTS

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Sir Charles Easy's Lodgings.

Enter LADY EASY.

Lady E. Was ever woman's spirit, by an injurious husband, broken like mine? Must he bring home his follies, too? wrong me with my own servant? Oh! how tedious a relief is patience! and yet, in my condition, 'tis the only remedy: for to reproach him with my wrongs, is taking upon myself the means of a redress, bidding defiance to his falsehood, and but naturally provokes him to undo me. The uneasy thought of my continued jealousy may tease him to a fixed aversion; and, hitherto, though he neglects, I cannot think he hates me. It must be so; since I want power to please him, he never shall upbraid me with an attempt of making him uneasy. My eyes and tongue shall yet be blind and silent to my wrongs; nor would I have him think my virtue could suspect him, till by some gross, apparent proof of his misdoing, he forces me to see, and to forgive it.

Enter MRS. EDGING, hastily.

Mrs. E. Oh, madam!

Lady E. What's the matter?

Mrs. E. I have the strangest thing to shew your ladyship—such a discovery!

Lady E. You are resolved to make it without much ceremony, I find: what's the business, pray?

Mrs. E. The business, madam! I have not patience to tell you; I am out of breath at the very thoughts of it; I shall not be able to speak this half-hour.

Lady E. Not to the purpose, I believe; but, methinks, you talk impertinently with a great deal of ease.

Mrs. E. Nay, madam, perhaps not so impertinent as your ladyship thinks; there's that that will speak to the purpose, I am sure. A base man! (Gives a letter.)

Lady E. What's this, an open letter? Whence

Mrs. E. Nay, read it, madam; you'll soon guess.

If these are the tricks of husbands, keep me a maid still, say I.

Lady E. (Looking on the superscription.) "To Sir Charles Easy." Ha! too well I know this hateful hand. Oh! my heart! but I must veil my jealousy, which 'tis not fit this creature should suppose I am acquainted with. (Aside.) This direction is to your master; how came you by it?

Mrs. E. Why, madam, as my master was lying down, after he came in from hunting, he sent me into his dressing-room to fetch his snuff-box out of his waistcoat-pocket; and so, as I was searching for the box, madam, there I found this wicked letter from a mistress; which I had no sooner read, but, I declare it, my very blood rose at him again; methought I could have torn him and her to pieces.

Lady E. Intolerable! This odious thing's jealous of him herself, and wants me to join with her in a revenge upon him. Sure, I am fallen indeed! but 'twere to make me lower yet, to let her think I understand her. (Aside.) [of patience at it.]

Mrs. E. Nay, pray, madam, read it; you'll be out

Lady E. You are bold, mistress. Has my indulgence, or your master's good humour, flattered you into the assurance of reading his letters? A liberty I never gave myself. Here, lay it where you had it immediately. Should he know of your sauciness, it would not be my favour could protect you. [Exit.]

Mrs. E. Your favour! marry come up! Sure, I don't depend upon your favour! Here's my master; I'll try whether I am to be huffed by her, or no. (Walks behind)

Enter SIR CHARLES EASY.

Sir C. So, the day is come again! Life but rises to another stage, and the same dull journey is before us. How like children do we judge of happiness! When I was stinted in my fortune, almost everything was a pleasure to me, because most things then being out of my reach, I had always the pleasure of hoping for them; now fortune's in my hand, she's as insipid as an old acquaintance. It's mighty silly, 'faith! Just the same thing by my wife, too; I am told she's extremely handsome; nay, and have heard a great many people say she is certainly the best woman in the world. Why, I don't know but she may; yet I could never find that her person or good qualities gave me any concern: in my eye, the woman has no more charms than my mother.

Mrs. E. Humph! he takes no notice of me yet: I'll let him see, I can take as little notice of him. (As she is walking by him, he lays hold of her.) Pray, sir—

Sir C. A pretty pert air that; I'll humour it. (Aside.) What's the matter, child? Are not you well? Kiss me, hussy.

Mrs. E. No; the deuce fetch me, if I do.

Sir C. Has anything put you out of humour, love?

Mrs. E. No, sir; 'tis not worth my being out of humour at; though if ever you have anything to say to me again, I'll be burned.

Sir C. Somebody has belied me to you.

Mrs. E. No, sir; 'tis you have belied yourself to me. Did not I ask you when you first made a fool of me, if you would be always constant to me, and did not you say, I might be sure you would? And here, instead of that, you are going on in your old intrigue with my Lady Graveairs.

Sir C. So!

Mrs. E. Besides, don't you suffer my lady to huff me every day, as if I were her dog, or had no more concern with you—I declare I won't bear it, and she sha'n't think to huff me; for aught I know, I am as agreeable as she; and though she dares not take any notice of your baseness to her, you sha'n't think to use me so; and so, pray take your nasty letter—I know the hand well enough—for my part, I won't stay in the family to be abused at this rate. I that have refused lords and dukes for your sake: I'd have you to know, sir, I have had as many blue and green ribands after me, for aught I know, as would have made me an apron.

Sir C. My Lady Graveairs!—my nasty letter!—and I won't stay in the family! Death! I'm in a pretty condition. (Aside.) [as you do your wife?

Mrs. E. I suppose, sir, you think to use everybody

Sir C. My wife! ah! Come hither, Mrs. Edging; harkye, drab! (Seizing her.)

Mrs. E. Oh!

Sir C. When you speak of my wife, you are to say your lady; and you are never to speak of your lady to me in any regard of her being my wife: I only give you leave to be saucy with me. In the next place, you are never to suppose there is any such person as my Lady Graveairs; and lastly, my pretty one, how came you by this letter?

Mrs. E. It's no matter, perhaps.

Sir C. Ay, but if you should not tell me quickly, how are you sure I won't take a great piece of flesh out of your shoulder. (Shakes her.)

Mrs. E. Oh, lud! oh, lud! I will tell you, sir.

Sir C. Quickly, then.

Mrs. E. Oh! I took it out of your pocket, sir.

Sir C. When? [your snuff-box.

Mrs. E. Oh! this morning, when you sent me for

Sir C. And your ladyship's pretty curiosity has looked it over, I presume, eh? (Shakes her again.)

Mrs. E. Oh, lud!—dear sir,—don't be angry—indeed I'll never touch one again.

Sir C. I don't believe you will; and I'll tell you how you may be sure you never will.

Mrs. E. Yes, sir.

Sir C. By steadfastly believing, that the next time you offer it, you will have your pretty white neck twisted behind you.

Mrs. E. Yes, sir. (Courtesying.)

Sir C. And you will be sure to remember every-

Mrs. E. Yes, sir. [thing I have said to you?

Sir C. And now, child, I was not angry with your person, but your follies; but let me hear no more of your lady, child.

Mrs. E. No, sir.

Sir C. Here she comes. Begone.

Mrs. E. Yes, sir. Oh! I was never so frightened in my life. [Aside, and exit.

Sir C. So! good discipline makes good soldiers. It often puzzles me to think, from my own carelessness, and my wife's continual good humour, whether she really knows anything of the strength of my forces: I'll sift her a little. [Enter LADY EASY.] My dear, how do you do? You are dressed very early to day; are you going out?

Lady E. Only to church, my dear.

Sir C. Well, child, how does Windsor air agree with you? Do you find yourself any better yet? or have you a mind to go to London again?

Lady E. No, indeed, my dear; the air is so very pleasant, that if it were a place of less company, I could be content to end my days here.

Sir C. Pr'ythee, my dear, what sort of company would most please you?

Lady E. When business would permit it, your's; and in your absence, a sincere friend, that were truly happy in an honest husband, to sit a cheerful hour, and talk in mutual praise of our condition.

Sir C. Are you, then, really very happy, my dear?

Lady E. Why should you question it? (Smiling.)

Sir C. Because I fancy I am not so good to you as I should be.

Lady E. Psha!

Sir C. Nay, the deuce take me if I don't really confess myself so bad, that I have often wondered how any woman of your sense, rank, and person, could think it worth her while to have so many useless good qualities.

Lady E. Fie! my dear.

Sir C. By my soul, I'm serious.

Lady E. I can't boast of my good qualities, nor if I could, do I believe you think them useless.

Sir C. Nay, I submit to you—Don't you find 'em so? Do you perceive that I am one tittle the better husband for your being so good a wife?

Lady E. Psha! you jest with me.

Sir C. Upon my life I don't. Tell me truly, were you never jealous of me?

Lady E. Did I ever give you any sign of it.

Sir C. Humph! that's true. But do you really think I never gave you occasion? [you had?

Lady E. That's an odd question. But suppose

Sir C. Why, then, what good has your virtue done you, since all the good qualities of it could not keep me to yourself?

Lady E. What occasion have you given me to suppose I have not kept you to myself?

Sir C. I given you occasion! Fie! my dear; you may be sure—I—lookye, that is not the thing; but still a—Death, what a blunder have I made! (Aside.)—Still, I say, madam, you sha'n't make me believe you have never been jealous of me; not that you ever had any real cause, but I know women of your principle have more pride than those that have no principle at all; and where there is pride, there must be some jealousy; so, that if you are jealous, my dear, you know you wrong me, and—

Lady E. Why, then, upon my word, my dear, I don't know that ever I wronged you that way in my life. [be jealous, how would you do, then?

Sir C. But suppose I had given a real cause to Lady E. It must be a very substantial one that makes me jealous.

Sir C. Say it were a substantial one. Suppose, now, I were well with a woman of your own acquaintance, that under pretence of frequent visits to you, should only come to carry on an affair with me: suppose now my Lady Graveairs and I were great—

Lady E. Would I could not suppose it. (Aside.)

Sir C. If I come off here, I believe I am pretty safe. (Aside.) Suppose, I say, my lady and I were so very familiar, that not only yourself, but half the town should see it?

Lady E. Then I should cry myself sick in some dark closet, and forget my tears when you spoke kindly to me.

Sir C. The most convenient piece of virtue, sure, that ever wife was mistress of. (Aside.)

Lady E. But pray, my dear, did you ever think I had any ill thoughts of my Lady Graveairs?

Sir C. Oh, fie! child; only you know she and I used to be a little free sometimes, so I had a mind to see if you thought there was any harm in it: but since I find you so very easy, I think myself obliged to tell you, that, upon my soul, my dear, I have so little regard to her person, that the deuce take me, if I would not as soon have an affair with your own woman.

[pect you with one as t'other.]

Lady E. Indeed, my dear, I should as soon sus-

Sir C. Poor dear! shouldst thou? Give me a kiss.

Lady E. Psha! you don't care to kiss me.

Sir C. By my soul, I do. I wish I may die if I don't think you a very fine woman.

Lady E. I only wish you would think me a good wife. (Kisses him.) But pray, my dear, what has made you so very inquisitive?

Sir C. Inquisitive! Why—a—I don't know; one's always saying one foolish thing or another—Tol de rol. (Sings and talks.) My dear, what! are we never to have any ball here? Tol de rol. I fancy I could recover my dancing again, if I would but practise. Tol lol lol!

Lady E. This excess of carelessness to me excuses half his vices. If I can make him once think seriously, time yet may be my friend. (Aside.)

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, Lord Morelove gives his service.

Sir C. Lord Morelove! where is he?

Serv. At the chocolate-house. He called me to him, as I went by, and bid me tell your honour he'll wait upon you presently.

Lady E. I thought you had not expected him here again this season, my dear?

Sir C. I thought so, too; but you see there's no depending upon the resolution of a man that's in love.

Lady E. Is there a chair?

Serv. Yes, madam.

[Exit.]

Lady E. I suppose Lady Betty Modish has drawn him hither.

[am afraid so.]

Sir C. Ay, poor soul! for all his bravery, I

Lady E. Well, my dear, I haven't time to ask my lord how he does now; you'll excuse me to him, but I hope you'll make him dine with us.

Sir C. I'll ask him. If you see Lady Betty at prayers, make her dine, too; but don't take any notice of my lord's being in town.

Lady E. Very well. If I should not meet her there, I'll call at her lodgings.

Sir C. Do so.

Lady E. My dear, your servant.

[Exit.]

Sir C. My dear, I'm your's. Well, one way or other, this woman will certainly bring about her business with me at last; for though she can't make me happy in her own person, she lets me be so intolerably easy with the woman that can, that she has at least brought me in a fair way of being as weary of them, too.

Enter a Servant and LORD MORELOVE.

Serv. Sir, my Lord Morelove.

[Exit.]

More. Dear Charles!

Sir C. My dear lord, this is an happiness undreamt of; I little thought to have seen you at Windsor again this season; I concluded, of course, that books and solitude had secured you till winter.

More. Nay, I did not think of coming myself; but I found myself not very well in London, so I thought—a—little hunting, and this air—

Sir C. Ha, ha, ha!

More. What do you laugh at?

Sir C. Only because you should not go on with your story. If you did but see how a man fumbles for an excuse, when he's a little ashamed of being in love, you would not wonder what I laugh at. Ha, ha, ha!

More. Thou art a very happy fellow; nothing touches you; always easy. Then you conclude I follow Lady Betty again?

Sir C. Yes, 'faith, do I: and to make you easy, my lord, I cannot see why a man that can ride fifty miles after a poor stag, should be ashamed of running twenty in chase of a fine woman, that, in all probability, will make him so much the better sport, too.

More. Dear Charles, don't flatter my distemper; I own I still follow her. Do you think her charms have power to excuse me to the world?

Sir C. Ay, ay! a fine woman's an excuse for anything; and the scandal of her being in jest, is a jest itself; we are all forced to be their fools, before we can be their favourites.

More. You are willing to give me hope; but I can't believe she has the least degree of inclination for me.

Sir C. I don't know that; I am sure her pride likes you, and that's generally your fine lady's darling passion.

[rent, it would touch her?]

More. Do you suppose if I could grow indiffe-

Sir C. Sting her to the heart. Will you take my advice?

More. I have no relief but that. Had I not you now and then to talk an hour, my life were insupportable.

Sir C. I am sorry for that, my lord. But mind what I say to you. But hold! first let me know the particulars of your late quarrel with her.

More. Why—about three weeks ago, (when I was last here at Windsor,) she had for some days treated me with a little more reserve, and another with more freedom, than I found myself easy at.

Sir C. Who was that other?

More. One of my Lord Foppington's gang; the pert coxcomb that's just come to a small estate and a great periwig; he that sings himself among the women—what d'ye call him?—He won't speak to a commoner when a lord's in company—you always see him with a cane dangling at his button, his breast open, no gloves, one eye tucked under his hat, and a tooth-pick—Startup, that's his name. [on.

Sir C. Oh! I have met him on a visit. But, pray go

More. So, disputing with her about the conduct of women, I took the liberty to tell her how far I thought she erred in hers; she told me I was rude, and that she would never believe any man could love a woman, that thought her wrong in anything she had a mind to, at least, if he dared to tell her so. This provoked me into her whole character, with as much spite and civil malice as I have seen her bestow upon a woman of true beauty, when the men first toasted her; so, in the middle of my wisdom, she told me, she desired to be alone, that I would take my odious proud heart along with me, and trouble her no more. I bowed very low; and, as I left the room, vowed I never would, and that my proud heart should never be humbled by the outside of a fine woman. About an hour after, I whipped into my chaise for London, and have never seen her since.

Sir C. Very well. And how did you find your proud heart by the time you got to Hounslow?

More. I am almost ashamed to tell you: I found her so much in the right, that I cursed my pride for contradicting her at all; and began to think, according to her maxim, that no woman could be in the wrong to a man that she had in her power.

Sir C. Ha, ha! Well, I'll tell you what you shall do—You can see her without trembling, I hope?

More. Not if she receives me well.

Sir C. If she receives you well, you will have no occasion for what I am going to say to you. First, you shall dine with her.

More. How? where? when?

Sir C. Here, here! at two o'clock.

More. Dear Charles!

Sir C. My wife's gone to invite her. When you see her first, be neither too humble nor too stubborn; let her see, by the ease in your behaviour, you are still pleased in being near her, while she is upon reasonable terms with you. This will neither open the door of an eclaircissement, or quite shut it against you; and if she is still resolved to keep you out—

More. Nay, if she insults me, then perhaps I may recover pride enough to rally her by an over-acted submission.

Sir C. Why, you improve, my lord; this is the very thing I was going to propose to you.

More. Was it, 'faith! Harkye! dare you stand by me?

Sir C. Dare I! ay, to my last drop of assurance, against all the insolent airs of the proudest beauty in Christendom.

More. Nay, then, defiance to her. We two—you have inspired me; I find myself as valiant as a flattered coward. [her.]

Sir C. Courage, my lord; I'll warrant we beat

More. My blood stirs at the very thought of it; I long to be engaged.

Sir C. She'll certainly give ground, when she once sees you are thoroughly provoked.

More. Dear Charles, thou art a friend indeed.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, my Lord Foppington gives his service; and if your honour's at leisure, he'll wait upon you as soon as he's dressed.

More. Lord Foppington! is he in town?

Sir C. Yes; I heard last night he was come. Give my service to his lordship, and tell him I shall be glad if he'll do me the honour of his company here at dinner. [Exit Servant.] We may have occasion for him in our design upon Lady Betty.

More. What use can we make of him?

Sir C. We'll see when he comes; at least, there's no danger in him; not but I suppose you know he's

More. Psha! a coxcomb. [your rival.]

Sir C. Nay, don't despise him, neither: he's able to give you advice; for though he's in love with the same woman, yet to him she has not charms enough to give a moment's pain.

More. Pr'ythee, what sense has he of love?

Sir C. 'Faith! very nearly as much as a man of sense ought to have. I grant you, he knows not how to value a woman truly deserving, but he has a pretty just esteem for most ladies about town.

More. That he follows, I grant you; for he seldom visits any of extraordinary reputation.

Sir C. Have a care, I have seen him at Lady Betty Modish's.

More. To be laughed at.

Sir C. Don't be too confident of that; the women now begin to laugh with him, not at him: for he really sometimes rallies his own humour with so much ease and pleasantry, that a great many women begin to think he has no follies at all, and those he has, have been as much owing to his youth, and a great estate, as want of natural wit: 'tis true, he's often a bubble to his pleasures, but he has always been wisely vain enough to keep himself from being too much the ladies' humble servant in love.

More. There, indeed, I almost envy him.

Sir C. The easiness of his opinion upon the sex, will go near to pique you. We must have him.

More. As you please. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Lady Betty Modish's Lodgings.

LADY BETTY MODISH and LADY EASY, meeting.

Lady B. Oh! my dear, I am overjoyed to see you! I am strangely happy to-day; I have just received my new scarf from London, and you are most critically come to give me your opinion of it.

Lady E. Oh! your servant, madam; I am a very indifferent judge, you know. What, is it with sleeves?

Lady B. Oh! 'tis impossible to tell you what it is! 'tis all extravagance, both in mode and fancy, my dear; I believe there are six thousand yards of edging in it. Then such an enchanting slope from the elbow; something so new, so lively, so noble, and charming—But you shall see it, my dear.

Lady E. Indeed I won't, my dear; I am resolved to mortify you for being so wrongly fond of a trifle.

Lady B. Nay, now, my dear, you are ill-natured.

Lady E. Why, truly, I'm half angry to see a woman of your sense so warmly concerned in the care of her outside; for when we have taken our best pains about it, 'tis the beauty of the mind alone that gives us lasting value.

Lady B. Ah! my dear, my dear! you have been a married woman to a fine purpose, indeed, that know so little of the taste of mankind: take my word, a new fashion, upon a fine woman, is often a greater proof of her value, than you are aware of.

Lady E. That I can't comprehend; for you see among the men, nothing's more ridiculous than a new fashion. Those of the first sense are always the last to come into it.

Lady B. That is, because the only merit of a man is his sense; but, doubtless, the greatest value of a woman is her beauty. An homely woman, at the head of a fashion, would not be allowed in it by the men, and, consequently, not followed by the women: so, that to be successful in one's fancy, is an evident sign of one's being admired; and I always take admiration for the best proof of beauty, and beauty certainly is the source of power, as power in all creatures is the height of happiness.

Lady E. At this rate, you would rather be thought beautiful than good.

Lady B. As I had rather command than obey. The wisest homely woman can't make a man of sense of a fool; but the veriest fool of a beauty shall make a fool of a statesman; so that, in short, I can't see a woman of spirit has any business in this world but to dress, and make the men like her.

Lady E. Do you suppose this is a principle the men of sense will admire you for?

Lady B. I do suppose, that when I suffer any man to like my person, he sha'n't dare to find fault with my principle. [humbled.]

Lady E. But men of sense are not so easily

Lady B. The easiest of any; one has ten thousand times the trouble with a coxcomb.

Lady E. Nay, that may be; for I have seen you throw more good humour in hopes of a tendresse from my Lord Foppington, who loves all women alike, than would have made my Lord Morelove perfectly happy, who loves only you.

Lady B. The men of sense, my dear, make the best fools in the world; their sincerity and good breeding throws them so entirely into one's power, and gives one such an agreeable thirst of using them ill, that 'tis impossible not to quench it.

Lady E. But, methinks, my Lord Morelove's manner to you might move any woman to a kinder sense of his merit.

Lady B. Ay; but would it not be hard, my dear, for a poor, weak woman to have a man of his quality and reputation in her power, and not let the world see him there? Would any creature sit newly-dressed all day in her closet? Could you bear to have a sweet-fancied suit, and never shew it at the play, or the drawing-room?

Lady E. But one would not ride in it, methinks, or harass it out, when there's no occasion.

Lady B. Pooh! my Lord Morelove's a mere Indian damask, one can't wear him out; on my conscience, I must give him to my woman at last; I begin to be known by him! Had I not best leave him off, my dear? for (poor soul!) I believe I have a little fretted him of late.

Lady E. Now 'tis to me amazing, how a man of his spirit can bear to be used like a dog, for four or five years together. But nothing's a wonder in love: but, pray, when you found you could not like him at first, why did you ever encourage him?

Lady B. Why, what would you have one do? for my part, I could no more choose a man by my eye, than a shoe; one must draw them on a little to see if they are right to one's feet.

Lady E. But I'd no more fool on with a man I could not like, than I'd wear a shoe that pinched me.

Lady B. Ay; but then a poor wretch tells one, he'll widen them, or do anything; and is so civil and silly, that one does not know how to turn such a trifle, as a pair of shoes or a heart, upon a fellow's hands again.

Lady E. Well, I confess you are very happily distinguished amongst most women of fortune, to have a man of my Lord Morelove's sense and quality so long and honourably in love with you: for, now-a-days, one hardly ever hears of such a thing as a man of quality in love with the woman he would marry. To be in love now, is only having a design upon a woman; a modish way of declaring war against her virtue, which they generally attack first, by toasting up her vanity.

Lady B. Ay, but the world knows that is not the case between my lord and I.

Lady E. Therefore, I think you happy.

Lady B. Now I don't see it; I'll swear I'm better pleased to know there are a great many foolish fellows of quality, that take occasion to toast me frequently.

Lady E. I vow I should not thank any gentleman for toasting me; and I have often wondered how a woman of your spirit could bear to have so many other freedoms I have seen some men take with you.

Lady B. As how, my dear? come, pr'ythee, be free with me; for you must know, I love dearly to hear my faults. Who is't you have observed to be too free with me?

Lady E. Why, there's my Lord Foppington; could any woman but you bear to see him with a respectful flier stare full in your face, draw up his breath, and cry, "Gad! you're handsome."

Lady B. My dear, fine fruit will have flies about it; but, poor things! they do it no harm: for if you observe, people are generally most apt to choose that which the flies have been busy with. Ha, ha!

Lady E. Thou art a strange, giddy creature.

Lady B. That may be from so much circulation of thought, my dear.

Lady E. But my Lord Foppington's married, and one would not fool with him for his lady's sake; it may make her uneasy, and—

Lady B. Poor creature! her pride, indeed, makes her carry it off without taking any notice of me; though I know she hates me in her heart. I can't endure malicious people; so I used to dine with her once a week, purely to give her the disorder—if you had but seen when my lord and I fooled a little, the creature looked so ugly.

Lady E. I should not think my reputation safe; my Lord Foppington's a man that talks often of his amours, but seldom speaks of favours that are refused him.

Lady B. Psha! Will anything a man says make a woman the less agreeable? Will his talking spoil one's complexion, or put one's hair out of order? And for reputation, lookye, my dear; take it for a rule, that as amongst the lower rank of people, no woman wants beauty that has fortune; so, amongst people of fortune, no woman wants virtue that has beauty: but an estate and beauty joined, are of an unlimited, nay, a power pontifical; makes one not only absolute, but infallible. A fine woman's never in the wrong; or if she is, 'tis not the strength of a poor creature's reason that can unfetter him. Oh! how I love to hear a wretch curse himself for loving on, or now and then coming out with a—

"Yet for the plague of human race,
This devil has an angel's face."

Lady E. At this rate, I don't see you allow reputation to be at all essential to a fine woman.

Lady B. Just as much as honour to a great man. Power is always above scandal. Indeed, my dear, that jewel reputation is a very fanciful business; one shall not see a homely creature in town, but wears it in her mouth as monstrously as Indians do bobs at their lips.

Lady E. Have a care, my dear, of trusting too far to power alone: for nothing is more ridiculous than the fall of pride; and a woman's pride at best may be suspected to be more a distrust, than a real contempt of mankind: for when we have said all we can, a deserving husband is certainly our best happiness; and I don't question but my Lord Morelove's merit, in a little time, will make you think so, too; for whatever airs you give yourself to the world, I'm sure your heart don't want good nature.

Lady B. You are mistaken; I am very ill-natured, though your good humour won't let you see it.

Lady E. Then to give me a proof of it, let me see you refuse to go immediately and dine with me, after I have promised Sir Charles to bring you.

Lady B. Pray, don't ask me.

Lady E. Why?

Lady B. Because, to let you see I hate good nature, I'll go without asking, that you may not have the malice to say I did you a favour. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Sir Charles Easy's Lodgings.

LORD MORELOVE and SIR CHARLES EASY at piquet.

Sir C. Come, my lord, one single game for the tout, and so have done.

More. No, hang 'em, I have enough of 'em; ill cards are the dullest company in the world. How much is it?

Sir C. Three parties.

More. Fifteen pounds—very well. (While Lord M. counts out his money, a Servant gives Sir C. a letter, which he reads to himself.)

Sir C. (To the Servant.) Give my service; say I have company dines with me; if I have time, I'll call there in the afternoon. Ha, ha, ha; [Exit Serv.]

More. What's the matter?—there—(Paying the money.)

Sir C. The old affair; my Lady Graveairs.

More. Oh! pr'ythee, how does that go on?

Sir C. As agreeably as a chancery suit: for now it's come to the intolerable plague of my not being able to get rid of't; as you may see. (Gives the letter.)

More. (Reads.) "Your behaviour, since I have been at Windsor, has convinced me of your villany, without my being surprised, or angry at it: I desire you will let me see you at my lodgings immediately, where I shall have a better opportunity to convince you, that I never can, nor positively will be, as I have been,—Your's, &c." A very whimsical letter! 'Faith! I think she has had hard luck with you; if a man were obliged to have a mistress, her person and condition seem to be cut out for the ease of a lover; for she's a young, handsome, wild, well-jointured widow. But what's your quarrel?

Sir C. Nothing; she sees the coolness happens to be first on my side, and her business with me now, I suppose, is to convince me how heartily she's vexed that she was not beforehand with me.

More. Her pride, and your indifference, must occasion a pleasant scene, sure. What do you intend to do?

Sir C. Treat her with a cool familiar air, till I pique her to forbid me her sight, and then take her at her word.

More. Very gallant and provoking.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, my Lord Foppington. [Exit.]

Sir C. Oh! now, my lord, if you have a mind to be let into the mystery of making love without pain, here's one that's master of the art, and shall declaim to you.—[Enter LORD FOPPINGTON.]—My dear Lord Foppington!

Fop. My dear agreeable! My lord, I am your lordship's most obedient humble servant.

More. My lord, I kiss your hand. I hope we shall have you here some time; you seem to have laid in a stock of health to be in at the diversions of the place. You look extremely well.

Fop. To see one's friends look so, my lord, may easily give a vermeille to one's complexion.

Sir C. Lovers in hope, my lord, always have a visible brilliant in their eyes and air.

Fop. What dost thou mean, Charles?

Sir C. Come, come, confess what really brought you to Windsor, now you have no business here?

Fop. Why, two hours, and six of the best nags in Christendom, or the devil drive me.

More. You make haste, my lord.

Fop. My lord, I always fly when I pursue: but they are well kept, indeed. I love to have creatures go as I bid 'em. You have seen 'em Charles; but so has all the world. Foppington's long-tails are known in every road in England.

Sir C. Well, my lord, but how came they to bring you this road? You don't use to take these irregular jaunts without some design in your head of having more than nothing to do.

Fop. Psha! prythee, Charles, thou knowest I am a fellow sans consequence, be where I will.

Sir C. Nay, nay; this is too much among friends, my lord; come, come, we must have it; your real business here?

Fop. Why then, entre nous, there is a certain fille de joie about the court here, that loves winning at cards better than all the fine things I have been able to say to her; so I have brought an odd thousand bill in my pocket that I design tête-à-tête, to play off with her at piquet, or so; and now the business is out. [lord.]

Sir C. Ah! and a very good business, too, my

Fop. If it be well done, Charles— [lord.]

Sir C. That's as you manage your cards, my

More. This must be a woman of consequence, by the value you set upon her favours. [woman.]

Sir C. Oh! nothing's above the price of a fine

Fop. Nay, lookye, gentlemen; the price may not happen to be altogether so high, neither; for I fancy I know enough of the game, to make it but an even bet I get her for nothing.

More. How so, my lord?

Fop. Because, if she happen to lose a good sum to me, I shall buy her with her own money.

More. That's new, I confess.

Fop. You know, Charles, 'tis not impossible but I may be five hundred pounds deep with her; then bills may fall short, and the devil's in't if I want assurance to ask her to pay me some way or other.

Sir C. And a man must be a churl, indeed, that won't take a lady's personal security. Ha, ha!

Fop. He, he, he! thou art a devil, Charles.

More. Death! how happy is this coxcomb. (Aside.)

Fop. But to tell you the truth, gentlemen, I had another pressing temptation that brought me hither, which was—my wife.

More. That's kind, indeed; my lady has been here this month; she'll be glad to see you.

Fop. That I don't know; for I design this afternoon to send her to London. [that would be cruel.]

More. What the same day you come, my lord?

Fop. Ay, but it will be mighty convenient, for she is positively of no manner of use in my amours.

More. That's your fault; the town thinks her a very deserving woman.

Fop. If she were a woman of the town, perhaps I should think so, too; but she happens to be my wife, and when a wife is once given to deserve more than her husband's inclinations can pay, in my mind she has no merit at all. [prudent conduct.]

More. She's extremely well bred, and of very

Fop. Um—ay, the woman's proud enough.

More. Add to this, all the world allows her handsome.

Fop. The world's extremely civil, my lord; and I should take it as a favour done to me, if they could find an expedient to unmarry the poor woman from the only man in the world that can't think her handsome.

More. I believe there are a great many in the world that are sorry 'tis not in their power to unmarry her.

Fop. I am a great many in the world's very humble servant; and whenever they find 'tis in their power, their high and mighty wisdoms may command me at a quarter of an hour's warning.

More. Pray, my lord, what did you marry for?

Fop. To pay my debts at play, and disinherit my younger brother.

More. But there are some things due to a wife.

Fop. And there are some debts I don't care to pay; to both which I plead husband and my lord.

More. If I should do so, I should expect to have my own coach stopped in the street, and to meet my wife with the windows up in a hackney.

Fop. Then would I put in bail, and order a separate maintenance. [married for nothing.]

More. So, pay double the sum of the debt, and be

Fop. Now I think deferring a dun, and getting rid of one's wife, are two of the most agreeable sweets in the liberties of an English subject.

More. If I were married, I would as soon part from my estate as my wife.

Fop. Now I would not; sun-burn me if I would!

More. Death! But since you are thus indifferent, my lord, why would you needs marry a woman of so much merit? Could not you have laid out your spleen upon some ill-natured shrew, that wanted the plague of an ill husband, and have let her alone to some plain, honest man of quality that would have deserved her.

Fop. Why 'faith, my lord, that might have been considered; but I really grew so passionately fond of her fortune, that, curse catch me! I was quite blind to the rest of her good qualities.

Sir C. Ay, ay, my lord; virtue in a wife is good for nothing but to make her proud, and put the world in mind of her husband's faults.

Fop. Right, Charles; the women of virtue are now grown perfect idiots in love.

More. But I thought, my lord, your chief business now at Windsor had been your design upon a woman of quality.

Fop. That's true, my lord; though I don't think your fine lady the best dish myself, yet a man of quality can't be without such things at his table.

More. Oh! then you only desire the reputation of an affair with her.

Fop. I think the reputation is the most inviting part of an amour with most women of quality.

More. Why so, my lord?

Fop. Why who the devil would run through all the degrees of form and ceremony, that lead one up to the last favour, if it were not for the reputation of understanding the nearest way to get over the difficulty.

More. But, my lord, does not the reputation of your being so general an undertaker, frighten the women from engaging with you? For they say, no man can love but one at a time.

Fop. That's just one more than ever I came up to: for, stap my breath! if ever I loved one in my life.

More. How do you get 'em, then?

Fop. Why sometimes as they get other people; I dress, and let them get me.

More. The shame or scandal of a repulse, always made me afraid of attempting a woman of condition.

Sir C. Ha, ha! Egad! my lord, you deserve to be ill used; your modesty's enough to spoil any woman in the world; but my lord and I understand the sex a little better; we see, plainly, that women are only cold, as some men are brave, from the modesty or fear of those that attack them.

Fop. Right, Charles; a man should no more give up his heart to a woman, than his sword to a bully; they are both as insolent as the devil after it.

Sir C. How do you like that, my lord? (Aside to Lord M.)

More. 'Faith, I envy him. (Aside to Sir C.) But, my lord, suppose your inclination should stumble upon a woman truly virtuous, would not a severe repulse from such an one put you strangely out of countenance?

Fop. Not at all, my lord; for if a man don't mind a box o' the ear in a fair struggle with a fresh country-girl, why should he be concerned at an impertinent frown for an attack upon a woman of quality?

More. Then you've no notion of a lady's cruelty?

Fop. Ha, ha! let me blood, if I think there's a greater jest in nature. I am ready to crack my sides with laughing to see a senseless flirt (because the creature happens to have a little pride that she calls virtue about her) give herself such insolent airs of resentment and disdain to an honest fellow. Ha, ha! It puts me in mind of an affair of mine, so impertinent— [let's hear it.

More. Oh! that's impossible, my lord. Pray,

Fop. Why, I happened once to be very well in a man of quality's family, and his wife liked me.

More. How do you know she liked you?

Fop. Why, from the very moment I told her I liked her, she never durst trust herself at the end of a room with me.

More. That might be her not liking you.

Fop. My lord, women of quality don't use to speak the thing plain: but to satisfy you, I did not want encouragement; I never came there in my life, but she immediately smiled, and borrowed my snuff-box.

More. She liked your snuff, at least. Well, but how did she use you?

Fop. By all that's infamous, she jilted me!

More. How jilt you? Pray, let's hear.

Fop. When I was pretty well convinced she had a mind to me, I one day made her a hint of an appointment; upon which, with an insolent frown, (which made her look as ugly as the devil,) she told me, that if ever I came there again, her lord should know that she had forbidden me the house before. Did you ever hear of such a slut?

Sir C. Intolerable!

More. But how did her answer agree with you?

Fop. Oh! passionately well; for I stared full in her face, and bursted out a-laughing; at which she turned upon her heel, and gave a crack with her fan like a coach-whip, and bridled out of the room with the air and complexion of an incensed turkey-cock.

More. What did you, then?

Fop. I looked after her, gaped, threw up the sash, and fell a-singing out of the window; so that, you see, my lord, while a man is not in love, there's no great affliction in missing one's way to a woman.

Sir C. Ay, ay; you talk this very well, my lord; but now let's see how you dare behave yourself upon action. Dinner's served, and the ladies stay for us. There's one within has been too hard for as brisk a man as yourself.

More. I guess who you mean. Have a care, my lord; she'll prove your courage for you.

Fop. Will she? then she's an undone creature: for, let me tell you, gentlemen, courage is the whole mystery of making love, and of more use than conduct is in war; for the bravest fellow in Europe may beat his brains out against the stubborn walls of a town; but

"Women, born to be controll'd,

Stoop to the forward and the bold." [Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Sir Charles Easy's Lodgings.

Enter LORD MORELOVE and SIR CHARLES EASY.

More. Did not I bear up bravely?

Sir C. Admirably! With the best bred insolence in nature, you insulted like a woman of quality, when her country-bred husband's jealous of her in the wrong place.

More. Ha, ha! Did you observe, when I first came into the room, how carelessly she brushed her eyes over me; and when the company saluted me, stood all the while with her face to the window?

Sir C. What astonished airs she gave herself, when you asked her "what made her so grave upon her old friends?"

More. And whenever I offered anything in talk, what affected care she took to direct her observations of it to a third person?

Sir C. If you keep your temper she's undone.

More. Provided she stick to her pride, I believe I may.

Sir C. Ah! never fear her; I warrant in the humour she is in, she would as soon part with her sense of feeling.

More. Well, what's to be done next?

Sir C. Only observe her motions; for, by her behaviour at dinner, I am sure she designs to gall you with my Lord Foppington; if so, you must even stand her fire, and then play Lady Graveairs upon her, whom I will immediately pique and prepare for your purpose.

More. I understand you: the most proper woman in the world, too; for she'll certainly encourage the least offer from me, in hopes of revenging her slights upon you.

Sir C. Right; and the very encouragement she gives you, at the same time, will give me a pretence to widen the breach of my quarrel with her.

More. Besides, Charles, I own I am fond of any attempt that will forward a misunderstanding there, for your lady's sake. A woman so truly good in her nature, ought to have something more from a man, than bare occasion to prove her goodness.

Sir C. Why, then, upon honour, my lord, to give you proof that I am positively the best husband in the world, my wife never yet found me out.

More. That may be her being the best wife in the world; perhaps, she won't find you out.

Sir C. Nay, if she won't tell a man of his faults, when she sees them, how the deuce should he mend them? But, however, you see I am going to leave them off as fast as I can.

More. Being tired of a woman is, indeed, a pretty tolerable assurance of a man's not designing to fool on with her. Here she comes; and, if I don't mistake, brimfull of reproaches. You can't take her in a better time. I'll leave you.

Enter LADY GRAVEAIRS.

Your ladyship's most humble servant. Is the company broken up, pray?

Lady G. No, my lord: they are just talking of basset; my Lord Foppington has a mind to tally, if your lordship would encourage the table.

More. Oh! madam, with all my heart. But Sir Charles, I know, is hard to be got to it: I'll leave your ladyship to prevail with him. [Exit.

Lady G. Sir Charles, I sent you a note this morning.

Sir C. Yes, madam; but there were some passages I did not expect from your ladyship: you seem to tax me with things that—

Lady G. Lookye, sir; 'tis not at all material whether I taxed you with anything or no. I don't in the least desire to hear you clear yourself; upon my word, you may be very easy as to that matter: for my part, I am very well satisfied that things are as they are. All I have to say to you is, that you need not give yourself the trouble to call at my lodgings this afternoon, if you should have time, as you were pleased to send me word: and so, your servant, sir. That's all, (Going.)

Sir C. Hold, madam!

Lady G. Lookye, Sir Charles; 'tis not your calling me back that will signify anything, I can assure you.

Sir C. Why this extraordinary haste, madam?

Lady G. In short, I have taken a great many things from you of late, that you know I have often told you I would positively bear no longer. But I see things are in vain; and the more people strive to oblige people, the less they are thanked for it. And since there must be an end of one's ridiculous conduct one time or other, I don't see any time so proper as the present; therefore, sir, I desire you'd think of things accordingly. Your servant. (Going, Sir C. lays hold of her.)

Sir C. Nay, madam, let's start fair, however; you ought at least to stay till I'm as ready as your ladyship; and then, if we must part,—

*"Adieu, ye silent grots and shady groves;
Ye soft amusements of our growing loves;
Adieu, ye whisper'd sighs that fann'd the fire,
And all the thrilling joys of young desire."*

Lady G. Oh! mighty well, sir. I am very glad we have, at last, come to a right understanding; the only way I have long wished for; not but I'd have you to know, I see your design through all your painted ease of resignation: I know you'd give your soul to make me uneasy now.

Sir C. Oh! lie, madam! upon my word, I would not make you uneasy, if it were in my power.

Lady G. Oh! dear sir, you need not take such care; upon my word, you'll find I can part with you without the least disorder: I'll try, at least; and so, once more, and for ever, sir, your servant: not but you must give me leave to tell you, as my last thought of you, too, that I do think—you are a villain. [Exit, hastily.]

Sir C. Oh! your very humble servant, madam.—Ah! Re-enter LADY GRAVEAIRS.

Lady G. Lookye, Sir Charles! don't presume upon the uneasiness of my temper; for to convince you that I am positively in earnest in this matter, I desire you will let me have what letters you have had of mine since you came to Windsor; and I expect you'll return the rest, as I will your's, as soon as we come to London.

Sir C. Upon my faith, madam, I never keep any; I always put snuff in them, and so they wear out.

Lady G. Sir Charles, I must have them; for, positively, I won't stir without them.

Sir C. Ha! then I must be civil, I see. (Aside.) Perhaps, madam, I have no mind to part with them or you.

Lady G. Lookye, sir; all those sort of things are in vain, now there's an end of everything between us. If you say you won't give them, I must e'en get them as well as I can.

Sir C. Ha! that won't do, then, I find. (Aside.)

Lady G. Who's there—Mrs. Edging?—Your keeping a letter, sir, won't keep me, I'll assure you.

Enter MRS. EDGING.

Mrs. E. Did your ladyship call me, madam?

Lady G. Ay, child; pray do me the favour to fetch my scarf out of the dining-room.

Mrs. E. Yes, madam.

Sir C. Oh! then there's hope again. (Aside.)

Mrs. E. Ha! she looks as if my master had quarrelled with her. I hope she's going away in a huff; she sha'n't stay for her scarf, I warrant her. This is pure. [Aside, and exit.]

Lady G. Pray, Sir Charles, before I go, give me leave now, after all, to ask you why you have used me thus?

Sir C. What is it you call usage, madam?

Lady G. Why, then, since you will have it, how comes it you have been so grossly careless and neglectful of me, of late? Only tell me seriously wherein I have deserved this.

Sir C. Why, then, seriously, madam—

Re-enter MRS. EDGING, with the scarf.

Mrs. E. Here's your ladyship's scarf, madam.

Lady G. Thankye, Mrs. Edging.—Oh, la! pray, will you let somebody get me a chair to the door?

Mrs. E. Humph! she might have told me that before, if she had been in such haste to go.

[Aside, and exit.]

Sir C. Then, seriously, I am, of late, grown so very lazy in my pleasures, that I had rather lose a woman than go through the plague and trouble of having or keeping her: and, to be free, I have found so much even in my acquaintance with you, (whom I confess to be a mistress in the art of pleasing,) that I am, from henceforth, resolved to follow no pleasure that rises above the degree of amusement; and that woman that expects I should make her my business, why, like my business, is then in a fair way to be forgotten. When once she comes to reproach me with vows, and usage, and stuff, I would as soon hear her talk of bills, bonds, and ejectments; her passion becomes as troublesome as a law-suit, and I would as soon converse with my solicitor: in short, I shall never care sixpence for any woman that won't be obedient.

Lady G. I'll swear, sir, you have a very free way of treating people; I am glad I am so well acquainted with your principles, however.—And you would have me obedient?

Sir C. Why not? my wife's so; and I think she has as much pretence to be proud as your ladyship.

Lady G. Lard! is there no chair to be had?

Enter MRS. EDGING.

Mrs. E. Here's a chair, madam.

Lady G. 'Tis very well, Mrs. Edging. Pray, will you let somebody get me a glass of fair water?

Mrs. E. Humph! her huff's almost over, I suppose: I see he's a villain still. [Aside, and exit.]

Lady G. Well, that was the prettiest fancy about obedience, surely, that ever was! Certainly, a woman of condition must be infinitely happy under the dominion of so generous a lover! But how came you to forget kicking and whipping all this while? Methinks you should not have left so fashionable an article out of your scheme of government.

Sir C. Humph!—No, there's too much trouble in that; though I have known them of admirable use in the reformation of some humorsome ladies.

Lady G. But one thing more, and I have done. Pray, what degree of spirit must the lady have, that is to make herself happy under so much freedom, order, and tranquillity.

Sir C. Oh! she must at least have as much spirit as your ladyship, or she'd give me no pleasure in breaking it.

Lady G. No; that would be troublesome. You had better take one that's broken to your hand.

Sir C. Lookye, madam; I have loved you a great while; now you would have me love you better and longer, which is not in my power to do; and I don't think there's any plague upon earth like a dun that comes for more money than one's ever likely to be able to pay.

Lady G. A dun! do you take me for a dun, sir? do I come a dunning to you? [pany.]

Sir C. Hist! don't expose yourself. Here's com—

Lady G. I care not. A dun! you shall see, sir, I can revenge an affront, though I despise the wretch that offers it. A dun! oh! I could die with laughing at the fancy. [Exit.]

Sir C. So! she's in admirable order. Here comes my lord, and I'm afraid in the very nick of his occasion for her.

Enter LORD MORELOVE.

More. Oh! Charles, undone again! all's lost and

Sir C. What's the matter now? [ruined.]

More. I have been playing the fool yonder, even to contempt. My senseless jealousy has confessed a weakness I never shall forgive myself: she has insulted on it to that degree, too—I can't bear the thought. Oh! Charles, this devil still is mistress of my heart; and I could dash my brains to think how grossly, too, I have let her know it.

Sir C. Ah! how it would tickle her if she saw you in this condition. Ha, ha, ha!

More. Pr'ythee, don't torture me: think of some present ease, or I shall burst.

Sir C. Well, well, let's hear. Pray, what has she done to you? Ha, ha!

More. Why, ever since I left you, she treated me with so much coolness and ill-nature, and that thing of a lord with so much laughing ease, such an acquainted, such a spiteful familiarity, that, at the last, she saw and triumphed in my uneasiness.

Sir C. Well, and so you left the room in a pet?

More. Oh! worse, worse still; for, at last, with half shame and anger in my looks, I thrust my—self between my lord and her, pressed her by the hand, and, in a whisper, tremblingly begged her in pity of herself and me, to shew her good humour only where she knew it was truly valued; at which she broke from me with a cold smile, sat herself down by the peer, whispered him, and burst into a loud laughter in my face.

Sir C. Ha, ha! then would I have given fifty pounds to have seen your face. Why what, in the name of common sense, had you to do with humility? Will you never have enough of't? Death! 'twas setting a lighted match to gunpowder to blow yourself up.

More. I see my folly, now, Charles. But what shall I do with the remains of life that she's left me.

Sir C. Oh! throw it at her feet, by all means; put on your tragedy face; catch fast hold of her petticoat; whip out your handkerchief; and, in point blank verse, desire her, one way or other, to make an end of the business.

More. What a fool dost thou make me?

Sir C. I only shew you as you came out of her hands, my lord.

More. How contemptibly have I behav'd myself!

Sir C. That's according as you bear her behaviour.

More. Bear it! no, I thank thee, Charles; thou hast awakened me, now; and if I bear it—What have you done with my Lady Graveairs?

Sir C. Your business, I believe. She's ready for you; she's just gone down stairs. Make haste after her; for I expect her back again, presently, with a knife or pistol.

More. I'll go this minute.

Sir C. No; stay a little; here comes my lord: we'll see what we can get out of him first.

More. Methinks I now could laugh at her.

Enter LORD FOPPINGTON.

Fop. Nay, pr'ythee, Sir Charles, let's have a little of thee: we have been so chagrin without thee, that, stap my breath! the ladies have gone, half asleep, to church, for want of thy company.

Sir C. That's hard, indeed, while your lordship was among them. Is Lady Betty gone, too?

Fop. She was just upon the wing; but I caught her by the snuff-box, and she pretends to stay to see if I'll give it her again or no.

More. Death! 'tis that I gave her, and the only present she would ever receive from me. Ask him how he came by it? (Apart to Sir C.)

Sir C. Pr'ythee, don't be uneasy. (Apart to Lord Morelove.)—Did she give it to you, my lord?

Fop. 'Faith, Charles, I can't say she did, or she did not; but we were playing the fool, and I took it à-la—Psha! I can't tell you in French neither; but Horace touches it to a nicety—'twas "Pignus direptum male pertinacia."

More. So! but must I bear it! (Aside.)—If your lordship has a mind to the box, I'll stand by you in the keeping of it.

Fop. My lord, I am passionately obliged to you; but I am afraid I cannot answer your hazarding so much of the lady's favour.

More. Not at all, my lord: 'tis possible I may not have the same regard to her frown that your lordship has.

Fop. That's a bite, I am sure. He'd give a joint of his little finger to be as well with her as I am. (Aside.)—But here she comes. Charles, stand by me. Must not a man be a vain coxcomb, now, to think this creature followed one?

Sir C. Nothing so plain, my lord.

Enter LADY BETTY MODISH.

Lady B. Psha! my Lord Foppington, pr'ythee, don't play the fool, now; but give me my snuff-box. Sir Charles, help me to take it from him.

Sir C. You know I hate trouble, madam.

Lady B. Pooh! you'll make me stay till prayers are half over, now. [give it to you.]

Fop. If you'll promise me not to go church, I'll

Lady B. I'll promise nothing at all; for, positively, I will have it. (Struggling with Lord F.)

Fop. Then, comparatively, I won't part with it. Ha, ha!

Lady B. Oh! you devil! you have killed my arm. Oh!—Well, if you'll let me have it, I'll give you a better.

More. Oh! Charles, that has a view of distant kindness in it. (Apart to Sir C.)

Fop. Nay, now I keep it superlatively. I find there's a secret value in it.

Lady B. Oh, dismal! Upon my word, I am only ashamed to give it you. Do you think I would offer such an odious fancied thing to anybody I had the least value for?

Sir C. Now it comes a little nearer, methinks it does not seem to be any kindness at all. (Apart to Lord More.)

Fop. Why really, madam, upon second view, it has not extremely the mode of a lady's utensil. Are you sure it never held anything but snuff?

Lady B. Oh! you monster!

Fop. Nay, I only ask; because it seems to me to have very much the air and fancy of Monsieur Smoakandsot's tobacco-box.

More. (Apart to Sir C.) I can bear no more.

Sir C. (Apart to Lord M.) Why don't, then. I'll step into the company, and return to your relief immediately. [Exit.]

More. Come, madam, will your ladyship give me leave to end the difference? Since the slightness of the thing may let you bestow it without any mark of favour, shall I beg it of your ladyship?

Lady B. Oh! my lord, nobody sooner. I beg you'll give it to my lord. (Looking earnestly on Lord Foppington, who gives it to Lord Morelove.)

More. Only to have the honour of restoring it to your lordship: and if there be any other trifle of mine your lordship has a fancy to, (though it were a mistress,) I don't know any person in the world that has so good a claim to my resignation.

Fop. Oh! my lord, this generosity will distract me.

More. My lord, I do but common justice. But from your conversation, I had never known the true value of the sex: you positively understand them the best of any man breathing; therefore, I think every one of common prudence ought to resign to you.

Fop. Then, positively, your lordship is the most obliging person in the world; for I'm sure your judgment can never like any woman that is not the finest creature in the universe. (Bows to Lady B.)

More. Oh! your lordship does me too much honour. I have the worst judgment in the world: no man has been more deceived it.

Fop. Then your lordship, I presume, has been apt to choose in a mask, or by candle-light.

More. In a mask, indeed, my lord; and of all masks the most dangerous.

Fop. Pray, what's that, my lord?

More. A bare face.

Fop. Your lordship will pardon me, if I don't so really comprehend how a woman's bare face can hide her face.

More. It often hides her heart, my lord; and, therefore, I think it sometimes a more dangerous mark than a piece of velvet: that's rather a mark than a disguise of an ill woman; but the mischiefs skulking behind a beauteous form, give no warning, as they are always sure, fatal, and innumerable.

Lady B. Oh! barbarous aspersion! My Lord Foppington, have you nothing to say for the poor women?

Fop. I must confess, madam, nothing of this nature ever happened in my course of amours: I always judge the beauteous form of a woman to be the most agreeable part of her composition; and when once a lady does me the honour to toss that into my arms, I think myself obliged in good nature not to quarrel about the rest of her equipage.

Lady B. Why ay, my lord, there's some good humour in that, now.

More. He's happy in a plain English stomach, madam; I could recommend a dish that's perfectly to your lordship's gust, where beauty's the only sauce to it.

Fop. My lord, when my wine's right, I never care it should be zested. [that opinion.]

More. I know some ladies would thank you for Lady B. My Lord Morelove's really grown such a churl to the women, I don't only think he is not, but can't conceive how he ever could be in love.

More. Upon my word, madam, I once thought I was. (Smiling.)

Lady B. Fie, fie! How could you think so? I fancy, now, you had only a mind to domineer over some poor creature, and so you thought you were in love. Ha, ha!

More. The lady I loved, madam, grew so unfortunate in her conduct, that she, at last, brought me to treat with her with the same indifference and civility as I now pay your ladyship.

Lady B. And ten to one, just at that time, she never thought you such tolerable company.

More. That I can't say, madam; for, at that time, she grew so affected, there was no judging of her thoughts at all. (Mimicking her.)

Lady B. What, and so you left the poor lady? Oh! you inconstant creature!

More. No, madam; to have loved her on, had been inconstancy; for she was never two hours together the same woman. (Talks apart with Lady B.)

Fop. (Aside.) Ha, ha, ha! I see he has a mind to abuse her; so I'll e'en give him an opportunity of doing his business at once with her for ever.—My lord, I perceive your lordship's going to be good company to the lady; and, for her sake, I don't think it good manners in me to disturb you.

Enter SIR CHARLES EASY.

Sir C. My Lord Foppington.

Fop. Oh! Charles, I was just wanting you. Harkye! I have three thousand secrets for you. I have made such discoveries! To tell you in one word—Morelove's as jealous as the devil. He, he!

Sir C. Is't possible! Has she given him any occasion?

Fop. Only rallied him to death upon my account. She told me within, just now, she'd use him like a dog; and begged me to draw off for an opportunity.

Sir C. Oh! keep in while the scent lies, and she's your own, my lord.

Fop. I can't tell that, Charles; but I'm sure she's fairly unharboured; and when once I throw off my inclinations, I usually follow them till the game has enough of it: and, between you and I, she's pretty well blown, too; she can't stand long, I believe; for, curse catch me! if I have not ridden down half a thousand pounds after her already.

Sir C. What do you mean?

Fop. I have lost five hundred to her at piquet since dinner.

Sir C. You are a fortunate man, 'faith: you are resolved not to be thrown out, I see.

Fop. Hang it! what should a man come out for, if he does not keep up to the sport?

Sir C. Well pushed, my lord.

Fop. Tally-ho! Have at her. [hanches!]

Sir C. Down, down, my lord! Ah! 'ware,

Fop. Ah, Charles! (Embracing him.) Pr'ythee, let's observe a little. There's a foolish cur; now I have run her to a stand, he has a mind to be at her by himself; and you will see she won't stir out of her way for him. (They stand aside.)

More. Ha, ha! your ladyship's very grave of a sudden; you look as if your lover had insolently recovered his common senses.

Lady B. And your lordship is so very gay, and unlike yourself, one would swear you were just come from the pleasure of making your mistress afraid of you.

More. No, 'faith, quite the contrary: for, do you know, madam, I have just found out, that, upon your account, I have made myself one of the most ridiculous puppies upon the face of the earth: I have upon my faith! nay, and so extravagantly such—ha, ha, ha!—that it's at last become a jest even to myself; and I can't help laughing at it, for the soul of me. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady B. I want to cure him of that laugh, now. (Aside.) My lord, since you are so generous, I'll tell you another secret: do you know, too, that I still find (spite of all your great wisdom and my contemptible qualities, as you are pleased now and then to call them)—do you know, I say, that I see, under all this, you still love me with the same helpless passion? and can your vast foresight imagine I won't use you accordingly, for these extraordinary airs you are pleased to give yourself?

More. Oh! by all means, madam; 'tis fit you should; and I expect it, whenever it is in your power.—Confusion. (Aside.)

Lady B. My lord, you have talked to me this half-hour, without confessing pain. (Affects to gape.) Only remember it.

More. Hell and tortures!

Lady B. What did you say, my lord?

More. Fire and furies!

Lady B. Ha, ha! he's disordered. Now I am easy. (Aside.)—My Lord Foppington, have you a mind to your revenge at piquet?

Fop. I have always a mind to an opportunity of entertaining your ladyship, madam. (Lady B. coquets with Lord F.)

More. Oh! Charles, the insolence of this woman might furnish out a thousand devils. (Apart.)

Sir C. And your temper is enough to furnish out a thousand such women. Come away; I have business for you upon the terrace.

More. Let me but speak one word to her.

Sir C. Not a syllable: the tongue's a weapon you'll always have the worst at; for I see you have no guard, and she carries a devilish edge.

Lady B. (To Lord M.) My lord, don't let anything I've said frighten you away; for if you have the least inclination to stay and rail, you know the old conditions; 'tis but your asking me pardon next day, and you may give your passion any liberty you may think fit.

More. Daggers and death! (Apart.)

Sir C. Are you mad? (Apart.)

More. Let me speak to her now, or I shall burst.

Sir C. Upon condition you'll speak no more of her to me, my lord, do as you please. [do.]

More. Pr'ythee, pardon me; I know not what to Sir C. Come along; I'll set you to work, I warrant you. Nay, nay, none of your parting ogles. Will you go?

More. Yes; and I hope for ever. [Exit with Sir C.]

Fop. Ha, ha, ha! Did ever mortal monster set up for a lover with such unfortunate qualifications?

Lady B. Indeed, my Lord Morelove has something strangely singular in his manner.

Fop. I thought I should have burst to see the creature pretend to rally, and give himself the airs of one of us. But, run me through, madam, your ladyship pushed like a fencing-master; that last thrust was a coup de grace, I believe. I'm afraid his honour will hardly meet your ladyship in haste again.

Lady B. Not unless his second, Sir Charles, keeps him better in practice, perhaps. Well, the humour of this creature has done me signal service to-day, I must keep it up for fear of a second engagement. (Aside.)

Fop. Never was poor wit so foiled at his own weapon, sure.

Lady B. Wit! Had he ever any pretence to it?

Fop. Ha, ha! he has not much in love, I think, though he wears the reputation of a very pretty, young fellow among some sort of people; but, strike me stupid! if ever I could discover common sense in all the progress of his amours. He expects a woman should like him for endeavouring to convince her that she has not one good quality belonging to the whole composition of her soul and body.

Lady B. That, I suppose, is only in a modest hope, that she'll mend her faults, to qualify herself for his vast merit. Ha, ha!

Fop. Poor Morelove! I see she can't endure him. (Aside.)

Lady B. Or if one really had those faults, he does not consider, that sincerity in love is as much out of fashion as sweet snuff; nobody takes it now.

Fop. Oh! no mortal, madam; unless it be here and there a 'squire that's making his lawful court to the cherry-cheek charms of my lord bishop's great fat daughter in the country.

Lady B. Oh! what a surfeiting couple has he put together. (Throwing her hand carelessly upon his.)

Fop. Fond of me, by all that's tender! Poor fool! I'll give thee ease immediately. (Aside.)—But, madam, you were pleased, just now, to offer me my revenge at piquet; now, here's nobody within, and I think we can't make use of a better opportunity.

Lady B. Oh! no; not now, my lord: I have a favour I would fain beg of you first.

Fop. But time, madam, is very precious in this place; and I shall not easily forgive myself, if I don't take him by the forelock.

Lady B. But I have a great mind to have a little more sport with my Lord Morelove first, and would fain beg your assistance.

Fop. Oh! with all my heart: and, upon second thoughts, I don't know but piquing a rival in public may be as good sport, as being well with a mistress in private; for, after all, the pleasure of a fine woman is like that of her own virtue—not so much in the thing, as the reputation of having it. (Aside.) Well, madam, how can I serve you in this affair?

Lady B. Why, methought, as my Lord Morelove went out, he shewed a stern resentment in his look, that seemed to threaten me with rebellion, and downright defiance; now I have a great fancy, that you and I should follow him to the terrace, and laugh at his resolution before he has time to put it into practice. [it. Ha, ha, ha!

Fop. And so punish his fault before he commits

Lady B. Nay, we won't give him time if his courage should fail to repent it. [be at it.

Fop. Ha, ha, ha! let me blood, if I don't long to Lady B. Oh! 'twill be such diversion to see him bite his lips, and broil within, only with seeing us ready to split our sides in laughing at nothing.

Fop. Ha, ha! I see the creature does really like me. (Aside.)—And, then, madam, to hear him hum a broken piece of a tune, in affectation of his not minding us: 'twill be so foolish when we know he loves us to death all the while. Ha, ha!

Lady B. And if, at last, his sage mouth should open, (in surly contradiction of our humour,) then will we, in pure opposition to his, immediately fall foul upon everything that is not gallant and fashionable: constancy shall be the mark of age and ugliness; virtue a jest; we'll rally discretion out of doors; lay gravity at our feet; and only love, free love! disorder, liberty, and pleasure, be our standing principles.

Fop. Madam, you transport me: for if ever I was obliged to nature for any one tolerable qualification, 'twas positively the talent of being exuberantly pleasant upon this subject. I am impatient; my fancy's upon the wing already; let's fly to hail him.

Lady B. No, no; stay till I am just got out; our going together won't be so proper.

Fop. As your ladyship pleases, madam: but when this affair is over, you won't forget that I have a certain revenge due.

Lady B. Ay, ay; after supper I am for you. Nay, you sha'n't stir a step, my lord.

Fop. Only to tell you, you have fixed me your's to the last existence of my soul's eternal entity.

Lady B. Oh! your servant. [Exit.

Fop. Ha, ha! Stark mad for me, by all that's handsome! Poor Morelove! That a fellow who has ever been abroad should think a woman of her spirit is to be taken as the confederates do towns, by a regular siege, when so many of the French successes might have shewn him the surest way is to whisper the governor. How can a coxcomb give himself the fatigue of bombarding a woman's understanding, when he may, with so much ease, make a friend of her constitution? I'll see if I can shew him a little French play with Lady Betty: let me see—ay, I'll make an end of it the old way: get her into piquet at her own lodgings; not mind one tittle of my play, give her every game before she's half up, that she may judge the strength of my inclination by my haste of losing up to her price; then, of a sudden, with a familiar leer, cry, "Rat piquet!" sweep counters, cards, and money all upon the floor, et donc, l'affaire est faite. [Exit.

ACT IV.—SCENE I.—The Castle-terrace.

Enter LADY BETTY MODISH and LADY EASY.

Lady E. My dear, you really talk to me as if I were your lover, and not your friend; or else I am so dull, that, by all you've said, I can't make the least guess at your real thoughts. Can you be serious for a moment? [oblige you.

Lady B. Not easily: but I would do more to Lady E. Then, pray, deal ingenuously, and tell me without reserve, are you sure you don't love my Lord Morelove?

Lady B. Then, seriously, I think not. But, because I won't be positive, you shall judge by the worst of my symptoms. First, I own I like his conversation; his person has neither fault nor beauty—well enough; I don't remember I ever secretly wished myself married to him, or that I ever seriously resolved against it.

Lady E. Well, so far you are tolerably safe. But come, as to his manner of addressing you, what effect has that had?

Lady B. I am not a little pleased to observe few men follow a woman with the same fatigue and spirit that he does me; am more pleased when he lets me use him ill; and if ever I have a favourable thought of him, 'tis when I see he can't bear that usage.

Lady E. Have a care; that last is a dangerous symptom. He pleases your pride, I find.

Lady B. Oh! perfectly: in that, I own, no mortal ever can come up to him.

Lady E. But now, my dear, now comes the main point—jealousy! Are you sure you have never been touched with it? Tell me that with a safe conscience, and then I pronounce you clear.

Lady B. Nay, then, I defy him; for, positively, I was never jealous in my life.

Lady E. How, madam! have you never been stirred enough to think a woman strangely forward for being a little familiar in talk with him? Or are you sure his gallantry to another never gave you the least disorder? Were you never, upon no accident, in an apprehension of losing him?

Lady B. Ah! Why, madam—Bless me!—why, sure, you don't call this jealousy, my dear?

Lady E. Nay, nay, that is not the business. Have you ever felt anything of this nature, madam?

Lady B. Lard! don't be so hasty, my dear: anything of this nature! Oh, lud! I swear, I don't like it. Dear creature, bring me off here; for I am half frightened out of my wits.

Lady E. Nay, if you can't rally upon it, your wound is not over deep, I'm afraid.

Lady B. Well, that's comfortably said, however.

Lady E. But come, to the point: how far have you been jealous?

Lady B. Why—Oh, bless me! He gave the music, one night, to my Lady Languish here upon the terrace; and, (though she and I were very good friends,) I remember, I could not speak to her in a week for't. Oh!

Lady E. Nay, now you may laugh if you can; for, take my word, the marks are upon you. But come; what else?

Lady B. Oh! nothing else, upon my word, my dear.

Lady E. Well, one word more, and then I give sentence: suppose you were heartily convinced that he actually followed another woman?

Lady B. But, pray, my dear, what occasion is there to suppose any such thing at all?

Lady E. Guilty, upon my honour!

Lady B. Psha! I defy him to say that ever I owned any inclination for him. [to guess it.]

Lady E. No; but you have given him terrible leave

Lady B. If ever you see us meet again, you'll have but little reason to think so, I can assure you.

Lady E. That I shall see presently; for here comes Sir Charles, and I'm sure my lord can't be far off. [Enter SIR CHARLES EASY.]

Sir C. Servant, Lady Betty; my dear, how do you do?

Lady E. At your service, my dear. But, pray, what have you done with my Lord Morelove?

Lady B. Ay, Sir Charles, pray, how does your pupil do? Have you any hopes of him?

Sir C. Well, madam, to confess your triumph over me, as well as him, I own my hopes of him are lost. I offered what I could to his instruction, but he's incorrigibly your's, and undone; the news, I presume, does not displease your ladyship.

Lady B. Fie, fie! Sir Charles, you disparage your friend; I am afraid you don't take pains with him.

Sir C. Ah! Ifancy, Lady Betty, your good nature won't let you sleep. Don't you love dearly to hurt people?

Lady B. Oh! your servant; then, without a jest, the man is so unfortunate in his want of patience, that, let me die, if I don't often pity him.

Sir C. Ah! Strange goodness! Oh! that I were your lover for a month or two!

Lady B. What then?

Sir C. I would make that pretty heart's blood of your's ache in a fortnight.

Lady B. Ugh! I should hate you; your assurance would make your address intolerable.

Sir C. I believe it would, for I'd never address

Lady B. Oh! you clown, you! [you at all.]

Sir C. Why, what to do? to feed a diseased pride, that's eternally breaking out in the affectation of an ill nature, that, in my conscience, I believe is but affectation.

Lady B. You nor your friend have no great reason to complain of my fondness, I believe. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir C. Thou insolent creature! How can you make a jest of a man, whose whole life's but one continued torment from your want of common gratitude? [him as easy as you are.]

Lady B. Torment! For my part, I really believe

Sir C. Poor, intolerable affectation! You know the contrary, you know him blindly your's; you know your power, and the whole pleasure of your life is the poor and low abuse of it. [power?]

Lady B. Pray, how do I abuse it—if I have any

Sir C. You drive him to extremes that make him mad, then punish him for acting against his reason. You've almost turned his brain; his common judgment fails him. He's now, at this very moment, driven by his despair, upon a project, (in hopes to free himself from your power,) that I am sensible, (and so must any one be that has his sense,) of course, must ruin him with you for ever. I almost blush to think of it, yet your unreasonable disdain has forced him to it; and should he now suspect I offer'd but a hint of it to you, and in contempt of his design, I know he'd call my life to answer it. But I have no regard to men in madness; I rather choose, for once, to trust in your good-nature, in hopes the man, whom your unwary beauty has made miserable, your generosity would scorn to make ridiculous.

Lady B. Sir Charles, you charge me very home; I never had it in my inclination to make anything ridiculous that did not deserve it. Pray, what is this business you think so extravagant in him?

Sir C. Something so absurdly rash and bold, you'll hardly forgive even me that tell it you.

Lady B. Oh, fie! If it be a fault, Sir Charles, I shall consider it as his, not your's. Pray, what is it?

Lady E. I long to know, methinks.

Sir C. You may be sure he did not want my Lady B. Let's hear it. [dissuasions from it.]

Sir C. Why, this man, whom I have known to love you with such excess of generous desire; whom I have heard in his ecstatic praises on your beauty talk till from the soft head of his distilling thoughts the tears have fallen—

Lady B. Oh! Sir Charles—

Sir C. Nay, grudge not, since 'tis past, to hear what was (though you condemned it) once his merit; but now I own that merit ought to be forgotten.

Lady B. Pray, sir, be plain.

Sir C. This man, I say, whose unhappy passion has so ill succeeded with you, at last, has forfeited all his hopes (into which, pardon me, I confess my friendship had lately flattered him) of even deserving now your lowest pity or regard.

Lady B. You amaze me! for I can't suppose his utmost malice dares assault my reputation. And what—

Sir C. No; but he maliciously presumes the world will do it for him; and, indeed, he has taken no unlikely means to make them busy with their tongues; for he is this moment upon the open terrace, in the highest public gallantry with my Lady Graveairs. "And to convince the world and me," he said, "he was not that tame lover we fancied him; he'd venture to give her the music to-night." Nay, I heard him, before my face, speak to one of the hautboys to engage the rest, and desired they would all take their directions only from my Lady Graveairs.

Lady B. My Lady Graveairs! Truly, I think my lord's very much in the right on't: for my part, Sir Charles, I don't see anything in this that's so very ridiculous, nor, indeed, that ought to make me think either the better or worse of him for it.

Sir C. Psha, psha! madam, you and I know 'tis not in his power to renounce you; this is but the poor disguise of a resenting passion vainly ruffled to a storm, which the least gentle look from you can reconcile at will, and laugh into a calm again.

Lady B. Indeed, Sir Charles, I sha'n't give myself that trouble, I believe.

Sir C. So I told him, madam. "Are not all your complaints," said I, "already owing to her pride? and can you suppose this public defiance of it (which, you know, you can't make good, too,) won't incense her more against you?"—"That's what I'd have," said he, starting wildly; "I care not what becomes of me, so I but live to see her piqued at it."

Lady B. Upon my word, I fancy my lord will find himself mistaken: I sha'n't be piqued, I believe. I must first have a value for the thing I lose, before it piques me. Piqued! Ha, ha, ha!

Sir C. Madam, you've said the very thing I urged to him. "I know her temper so well," said I, "that though she doted on you, if you once stood out against her, she'd sooner burst than shew the least motion of uneasiness."

Lady B. I can assure you, Sir Charles, my lord won't find himself deceived in your opinion. Piqued!

Sir C. She has it. (Aside.)

Lady E. Alas! poor woman! how little do our passions make us! (Aside.)

Lady B. Not but I would advise him to have a little regard to my reputation in this business: I would have him take heed of publicly affronting me.

Sir C. Right, madam; that's what I strictly warned him of; for, among friends, whenever the world sees him follow another woman, the malicious tea-tables will be apt to be very free with your ladyship.

Lady B. I'd have him consider that, methinks.

Sir C. But, alas! madam, 'tis not in his power to think with reason: his mad resentment has destroyed even his principles of common honesty: he considers nothing but a senseless, proud revenge, which, in his fit of lunacy, 'tis impossible that either threats or danger can dissuade him from.

Lady B. What! does he defy me, threaten me? Then he shall see, that I have passions, too; and know, as well as he, to stir my heart against any pride that dares insult me. Does he suppose I fear him? fear the little malice of a slighted passion, that my own scorn has stung into a despised resentment? Fear him! Oh! it provokes me to think he dare have such a thought. [so.]

Lady E. Dear creature, don't disorder yourself

Lady B. Let me but live to see him once more within my power, and I'll forgive the rest of fortune.

Lady E. Well, certainly, I am very ill-natured; for though I see this news has disturbed my friend, I can't help being pleased with the hopes of my Lady Graveairs being otherwise disposed of. (Aside.) My dear, I am afraid you have provoked her a little too far. (Apart to Sir C.)

Sir C. Oh! not at all. You shall see: I'll sweeten her, and she'll cool like a dish of tea. (Apart to Lady E.) [again.]

Lady B. I may see him with his complaining face

Sir C. I am sorry, madam, you so wrongly judge of what I've told you; I was in hopes to have stirred your pity, not your anger; I little thought your generosity would punish him for faults, which you yourself resolved he should commit. Yonder he comes, and all the world with him. Might I advise you, madam, you should not resent the thing at all: I would not so much as stay to see him in his fault; nay, I'd be the last that heard of it. Nothing can sting him more, or so justly punish his folly, as your utter neglect of it.

Lady E. Come, dear creature, be persuaded, and go home with me; indeed, it will shew more indifference to avoid him.

Lady B. No, madam; I'll oblige his vanity, for once, and stay to let him see how strangely he has piqued me.

Sir C. (Aside.) Oh! not at all to speak of; you had as good part with a little of that pride of your's, or I shall yet make it a very troublesome companion to you.

Enter LORD MORELOVE, LORD FOPPINGTON, LADY GRAVEAIRS, and Ladies. (Sir C. whispers to Lord Morelove.)

Fop. Ladies, your servant. Oh! we have wanted you beyond reparation. Such diversion!

Lady B. Well, my lord, have you seen my Lord Morelove?

Fop. Seen him! Ha, ha, ha! Oh! I have such things to tell you: madam, you'll die—

Lady B. Oh! pray, let's hear them! I was never in a better humour to receive them.

Fop. Harkye! (They whisper.)

More. So! she's engaged already. (To Sir C.)

Sir C. So much the better; make but a just advantage of my success, and she's undone.

Fop. and Lady B. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir C. (Apart to More.) You see already what ridiculous pains she's taking to stir your jealousy, and

Fop. and Lady B. Ha, ha, ha! [cover her own.

More. Oh! never fear me; for, upon my word, it now appears ridiculous even to me. (Apart to Sir C.)

Sir C. And harkye! (Whispers More.)

Lady B. And so, the widow was as full of airs as his lordship? (To Fop.)

Sir C. Only observe that, and 'tis impossible you can fail. (Apart.) [me, and I thank you.]

More. (Apart.) Dear Charles, you have convinced

Lady G. My Lord Morelove, what, do you leave us? [just—

More. Ten thousand pardons, madam, I was but Lady G. Nay, nay, no excuses, my lord; so you will but let us have you again.

Sir C. (Aside to Lady G.) I see you have good humour, madam, when you like your company.

Lady G. And you see, for all your mighty thirst of dominion, you could stoop to be obedient, if one thought it worth one's while to make you so.

Sir C. Ah! Power would make her an admirable tyrant. (Aside.)

Lady E. (Observing Sir C. and Lady G.) So! there's another couple have quarrelled, too, I find. Those airs to my Lord Morelove look as if designed to recover Sir Charles into jealousy: I'll endeavour to join the company, and may be, that will let me into the secret. (Aside.) My Lord Foppington, I vow this is very uncomplaisant, to engross so agreeable a part of the company to yourself.

Sir C. Nay, my lord, this is not fair, indeed, to enter into secrets among friends. Ladies, what say you? I think we ought to declare against it.

Ladies. Oh! no secrets, no secrets!

Lady B. Well, ladies, I ought only to ask your pardon; my lord's excusable, for I would pull him into a corner.

Fop. I swear, 'tis very hard, though. I observe two people of extreme condition can no sooner grow particular, but the multitude of both sexes are immediately up, and think their property's invaded.

Lady G. Oh! my lord, we women have all reason to be jealous of Lady Betty Modish's power.

More. (To Lady B.) As the men, madam, all have of my Lord Foppington; beside, favourites of great merit discourage those of an inferior class for their prince's service: he has already lost you one of your retinue, madam.

Lady B. Not at all, my lord; he has only made room for another: one must, sometimes, make vacancies, or there could be no preferments.

Lady E. Ha, ha! Ladies' favours, my lord, like places at court, are not always held for life, you know.

Lady B. No, indeed; if they were, the poor fine women would be all used like their wives, and no more minded than the business of the nation.

Lady E. Have a care, madam; an undeserving favourite has been the ruin of many a prince's empire.

Fop. Ha, ha! Upon my soul, Lady Betty, we must grow more discreet; for, positively, if we go on at this rate, we shall have the world throw you under the scandal of constancy, and I shall have all the swords of condition at my throat for a monopolist.

More. Oh! there's no great fear of that, my lord; though the men of sense give it over, there will be always some idle fellows vain enough to believe their merit may succeed as well as your lordship's.

Lady B. Or, if they should not, my lord, cast lovers, you know, need not fear being long out of employment, while there are so many well-disposed people in the world. There are, generally, neglected wives, maids, or charitable widows always ready to relieve the necessities of a disappointed passion. And, by the way—harkye! Sir Charles—

More. (Aside.) So, she's stirred, I see, for all her pains to hide it: she would hardly have glanced an affront at a woman she was not piqued at.

Lady G. (Aside.) That wit was thrown at me, I suppose; but I'll return it.

Lady B. (Apart to Sir C.) Pray, how came you all this while to trust your mistress so easily?

Sir C. (Apart to Lady B.) One is not so apt, madam, to be alarmed at the liberties of an old acquaintance as, perhaps, your ladyship ought to be at the resentment of a hardly-used, honourable lover.

Lady B. (Apart.) Suppose I were alarmed, how does that make you easy?

Sir C. (Apart.) Come, come, be wise at last; my trusting them together, may easily convince you, that (as I told you before) I know his addresses to her are only outward, and 'twill be your fault now, if you let him go on till the world thinks him in earnest, and a thousand busy tongues are set upon malicious inquiries into your reputation.

Lady B. (Apart.) Why, Sir Charles, do you suppose while he behaves himself as he does, that I won't convince him of my indifference?

Sir C. (Apart.) But hear me, madam—

Lady G. (Aside.) The air of that whisper looks as if the lady had a mind to be making her peace again; and 'tis possible, his worship's being so busy in the matter, too, may proceed as much from his jealousy of my lord with me, as friendship to her; at least, I fancy so; therefore, I'm resolved to keep her still piqued, and prevent it, though it be only to gall him.—Sir Charles, that is not fair to take a privilege you just now declared against in my Lord

More. Well observed, madam. [Foppington.]

Lady G. Besides, it looks so affected to whisper, when everybody guesses the secret.

More. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady B. Oh! madam, your pardon in particular; but 'tis possible you may be mistaken: the secrets of people that have any regard to their actions, are not so soon guessed as theirs that have made a con-

Fop. Ha, ha, ha! [fidant of the whole town.]

Lady G. A coquet, in her affected airs of disdain to a revolted lover, I am afraid, must exceed your ladyship in prudence, not to let the world see, at the same time, she'd give her eyes to make peace

More. Ha, ha, ha! [with him. Ha, ha!]

Lady B. 'Twould be a mortification, indeed, if it were in the power of a fading widow's charms to prevent it; and the man must be miserably reduced, surely, that could bear to live buried in woollen, or take up with the motherly comforts of a swan-skin petticoat. Ha, ha!

Lady G. Widows, it seems, are not so squeamish to their interest; they know their own minds and take the man they like; though it happens to be one that a froward, vain girl has disobliged, and is pining to be friends with.

More. Nay, though it happens to be one that confesses he was once fond of a piece of folly, and afterwards ashamed of it. [two of you.]

Lady B. Nay, my lord, there's no standing against

Fop. No, 'faith! that's odds at tennis, my lord: not but, if your ladyship pleases, I'll endeavour to keep your back-hand a little; though, upon my soul, you may safely set me up at the line; for, knock me down! if ever I saw a rest of wit better played than that last, in my life: what say you, madam, shall we engage?

Lady B. As you please, my lord. [mi lor.]

Fop. Ha, ha, ha! Allons! Tout de bon! Joues,

More. Oh! pardon me, sir; I shall never think myself, in anything, a match for the lady.

Fop. To you, madam.

Lady B. That's much, my lord, when the world knows you have been so many years teasing me to play the fool with you.

Fop. Ah! bien joué! Ha, ha, ha!

More. At that game, I confess, your ladyship has chosen a much more proper person to improve your hand with.

Fop. To me, madam! My lord, I presume whoever the lady thinks fit to play the fool with, will, at least, be able to give as much envy as the wise person that had not wit enough to keep well with her when he was so.

Lady G. Oh! my lord, both parties must needs be greatly happy; for I dare swear, neither will have any rivals to disturb them.

Lady B. None that will disturb them, I dare swear. (Company laugh.)

Sir C. I don't know, gentlefolks, but you are all in extremely good humour, methinks; I hope there's none of it affected.

Lady E. I should be loth to answer for any but my Lord Foppington. (Aside.)

Lady B. Mine is not, I'll swear.

More. Nor mine, I'm sure.

Lady G. Mine's sincere, depend upon it.

Fop. And may the eternal frowns of the whole sex doubly d— me, if mine is not!

Lady E. Well, good people, I am mightily glad to hear it. You have all performed extremely well: but, if you please, you shall even give over your wit now, while it is well.

Lady B. (Aside.) Now I see his humour, I'll stand it out, if I were sure to die for it.

Sir C. You should not have proceeded so far with my Lord Foppington, after what I had told you. (Apart to Lady B.)

Lady B. (Apart.) Pray, Sir Charles, give me leave to understand myself a little.

Sir C. (Apart.) Your pardon, madam; I thought a right understanding would have been for both your interest and reputation.

Lady B. (Apart.) For his, perhaps.

Sir C. (Apart.) Nay, then, madam, it is time for me to take care of my friend.

Lady B. (Apart.) I never in the least doubted your friendship to him in anything that was to shew yourself my enemy.

Sir C. (Apart.) Since I see, madam, you have so ungrateful a sense of my Lord Morelove's merit, and my service, I shall never be ashamed of using my power, henceforth, to keep him entirely out of your ladyship's.

Lady B. Was ever anything so insolent! I could find in my heart to run the hazard of a downright compliance, if it were only to convince him that my power, perhaps, is not inferior to his. (Aside.)

Lady E. My Lord Foppington, I think you generally lead the company upon these occasions. Pray, will you think of some prettier sort of diversion for us than parties and whispers?

Fop. What say you, ladies; shall we step and see what's done at the basset-table?

Lady B. With all my heart. Lady Easy—

Lady E. I think it is the best thing we can do; and because we won't part to-night, you shall all sup where you dined. What say you, my lord?

More. Your ladyship may be sure of me, madam.

Fop. Ay, ay, we'll all come.

Lady E. Then, pray, let's change parties a little. My Lord Foppington, you shall 'squire me.

Fop. Oh! you do me honour, madam.

Lady B. My Lord Morelove, pray, let me speak

More. Me, madam? [with you.]

Lady B. If you please, my lord.

More. Ah! that look shot through me! What can this mean? (Apart.)

Lady B. (Apart.) This is no proper place to tell you what it is, but there is one thing I'd fain be truly answered in: I suppose you'll be at my Lady Easy's by-and-by, and if you'll give me leave there—

More. (Apart.) If you please to do me that honour, madam, I shall certainly be there.

Lady B. (Apart.) That's all, my lord.

More. Is not your ladyship for walking?

Lady B. If your lordship dare venture with me.

More. Oh! madam. (Taking her hand.) How my heart dances! what heavenly music is in her voice, when softened into kindness! (Aside.)

Lady B. (Aside.) Ah! his hand trembles! Sir Charles may be mistaken.

[Exit with Lord M. and Lady E.]

Fop. My Lady Graveairs, you won't let Sir Charles leave us?

Lady G. No, my lord; we'll follow you. Stay a little. (To Sir C.)

Sir C. (Apart to Lady G.) I thought your ladyship designed to follow them.

Lady G. (Apart.) Perhaps I'd speak with you.

Sir C. (Apart.) But, madam, consider, we shall certainly be observed.

Lady G. Lud, sir! If you think it such a favour! [Exeunt.]

ACT V.—SCENE I.—The Castle Terrace.

Enter SIR CHARLES EASY and LORD MORELOVE.

Sir C. Come a little this way. My Lady Graveairs had an eye upon me, as I stole off, and I am apprehensive will make use of any opportunity to talk with me.

More. Oh! we are pretty safe here. Well, you were speaking of my Lady Betty.

Sir C. Ay, my lord: I say, notwithstanding all this sudden change of her behaviour, I would not have you yet be too secure of her: for, between you and I, since, as I told you, I have professed myself an open enemy to her power with you, 'tis not impossible but this new air of good humour may very much proceed from a little woman's pride, of convincing me you are not yet out of her power.

More. Not unlikely: but still, can we make no advantage of it?

Sir C. That's what I have been thinking of. Lookye!—Death! my Lady Graveairs!

More. Ha! she will have audience, I find.

Sir C. There's no avoiding her: the truth is, I have owed her a little good nature, a great while. I see there is but one way of getting rid of her; I must even appoint her a day of payment, at last. If you'll step into my lodgings, my lord, I'll just give her an answer, and be with you in a moment.

More. Very well; I'll stay there for you. [Exit.]

Enter LADY GRAVEAIRS.

Lady G. Sir Charles—

Sir C. Come, come, no more of these reproachful looks; you'll find, madam, I have deserved better of you than your jealousy imagines. Is it a fault to be tender of your reputation? Fie, fie! This may be a proper time to talk, and of my contriving, too. You see, I just now shook off my Lord Morelove

Lady G. May I believe you? [on purpose.]

Sir C. Still doubting my fidelity, and mistaking my discretion for want of good-nature.

Lady G. Don't think me troublesome; for, I confess, 'tis death to think of parting with you: since the world sees, for you I have neglected friends and reputation, have stood the little insults of disdainful prudes, that envied me, perhaps, your friendship; have borne the freezing looks of near and general acquaintance: since this is so, don't let them ridicule me, too, and say my foolish vanity undid me; don't let them point at me as a cast mistress.

Sir C. You wrong me to suppose the thought. When shall you be at leisure?

Lady G. I confess, I would see you once again; if what I have more to say prove ineffectual, perhaps it may convince me, then, 'tis my interest to part with you. Can you come to-night?

Sir C. You know we have company, and I am afraid they'll stay too late: can't it be before supper? What's o'clock now?

Lady G. It is almost six.

Sir C. At seven, then, be sure of me; till then, I'd have you go back to the ladies to avoid suspicion, and about that time have the vapours.

Lady G. May I depend upon you? [Exit.]

Sir C. Depend on everything. A very troublesome business this: send me once fairly rid of't, if ever I am caught in an honourable affair again—a debt, now, that a little ready civility, and away, would satisfy, a man might bear with; but to have a rent-charge upon one's good-nature, with an unconscionable long scroll of arrears, too, that would eat out the profits of the best estate in Christendom—ah! intolerable! Well, I'll even to my lord, and shake off the thoughts of it. [Exit.]

Enter LADY BETTY MODISH and LADY EASY.

Lady B. I observe, my dear, you have usually this great fortune at play; it were enough to make one suspect your good luck with a husband.

Lady E. Truly, I don't complain of my fortune either way.

Lady B. Pr'ythee, tell me, (you are often advising me to it,) are there those real, comfortable advantages in marriage, that our old aunts and grandmothers would persuade us of?

Lady E. Upon my word, if I had the worst husband in the world, I should still think so.

Lady B. Ay, but then, the hazard of not having a good one, my dear.

Lady E. You may have a good one, I dare say, if you don't give airs till you spoil him.

Lady B. Can there be the same dear, full delight in giving ease, as pain? Oh! my dear, the thought of parting with one's power is insupportable!

Lady E. And the keeping it till it dwindles into no power at all, is most ruefully foolish.

Lady B. But still to marry before one's heartily in love!

Lady E. Is not half so formidable a calamity. But, if I have any eyes, my dear, you'll run no great hazard of that, in venturing upon my Lord Morelove. You don't know, perhaps, that within this half-hour, the tone of your voice is strangely softened to him. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady B. My dear, you are, positively, one or other, the most censorious person in the world: and so, I see it's in vain to talk with you. Pray, will you go back to the company?

Lady E. Ah! poor Lady Betty! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Sir Charles Easy's Lodgings.

Enter SIR CHARLES EASY and LORD MORELOVE.

More. Charles, you have transported me! you have made my part in the scene so very easy, too, 'tis impossible I should fail in it.

Sir C. That's what I considered; for, now, the more you throw yourself into her power, the more I shall be able to force her into your's.

More. After all, (begging the ladies' pardon,) your fine women, like bullies, are only stout when they know their men: a man of an honest courage may fright them into anything. Well, I am fully instructed, and will about it instantly: won't you go along with me?

Sir C. That may not be so proper; besides, I have a little business upon my hands.

More. Oh! your servant, sir. Good b'ye! you sha'n't stir.

Sir C. My lord, your servant. [Exit Lord M.] So! now to dispose of myself, till 'tis time to think of my Lady Graveairs. Humph! I have no great mind to that business, methinks; I don't find myself in humour enough to come up to the civil things that are usually expected in the making up of an old quarrel. [MRS. EDGING crosses the stage.] There goes a warmer temptation by half. Ha! into my wife's bed-chamber, too! I question if the jade has any great business there; I have a fancy she has only a mind to be taking the opportunity of nobody's being at home, to make her peace with me. Let me see; ay, I shall have time enough to go to her ladyship afterwards: besides, I want a little sleep, I find. Your young fops may talk of their women of quality; but to me, now, there is a strange agreeable convenience in a creature one is not obliged to say much to upon these occasions. (Going.)

Enter MRS. EDGING.

Mrs. E. Did you call me, sir?

Sir C. Ha! all's right. (Aside.) Yes, madam, I did call you. (Sits down.)

Mrs. E. What would you please to have, sir?

Sir C. Have! why, I would have you grow a good girl, and know when you are well used, hussy.

Mrs. E. Sir, I don't complain of anything, not I.

Sir C. Well, don't be uneasy; I am not angry with you, now. Come and kiss me.

Mrs. E. Lard, sir!

Sir C. Don't be a fool, now: come hither.

Mrs. E. Psha! (Goes to him.)

Sir C. No wry face; so, sit down. I won't have you look grave, neither: let me see you smile, you jade you.

Mrs. E. Ha, ha! (Laughs and blushes.)

Sir C. Ah! you melting rogue!

Mrs. E. Come, don't be at your tricks, now. Lard! can't you sit still and talk with one? I am sure there are ten times more love in that, and fifty times the satisfaction, people may say what they will.

Sir C. Well, now you're good, you shall have your own way. I am going to lie down in the next room; and since you love a little chat, come and throw my night-gown over me, and you shall talk me to sleep. [Exit.]

Mrs. E. Yes, sir: for all his way, I see he likes me still. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Castle Terrace.

Enter LADY BETTY MODISH, LADY EASY, and LORD MORELOVE.

More. Nay, madam, there you are too severe upon him; for, bating now and then a little vanity, my Lord Foppington does not want wit sometimes to make him a very tolerable woman's man.

Lady B. But such eternal vanity grows tiresome.

Lady E. Come, if he were not so loose in his morals, his vanity, methinks, might be easily excused, considering how much it is in fashion: for, pray, observe, what's half the conversation of most of the fine young people about town, but a perpetual affectation of appearing foremost in the knowledge of manners, new modes, and scandal? and in that I don't see anybody comes up to him.

More. Nor I, indeed; and here he comes. Pray, madam, let's have a little more of him; nobody shews him to more advantage than your ladyship.

Lady B. Nay, with all my heart; you'll second me, my lord.

More. Upon occasion, madam.

Lady E. Engaging upon parties, my lord? (Aside and smiling at Lord M.)

Enter LORD FOPPINGTON.

Fop. So, ladies, what's the affair now?

Lady B. Why, you were, my lord; I was allowing you a great many good qualities; but Lady Easy says you are a perfect hypocrite; and that, whatever airs you give yourself to the women, she's confident you value no woman in the world equal to your own lady.

Fop. You see, madam, how I am scandalized upon your account. But it's so natural for a prude to be malicious, when a man endeavours to be well with anybody but herself. Did you never observe she was piqued at that before? Ha, ha!

Lady B. I'll swear you are a provoking creature.

Fop. Let us be more familiar upon it, and give her disorder. Ha, ha!

Lady B. Ha, ha, ha!

Fop. Stap my breath! but Lady Easy is an admirable discoverer. Marriage is, indeed, a prodigious security of one's inclination: a man is likely to take a world of pains in an employment, where he can't be turned out for his idleness.

Lady B. I vow, my lord, that's vastly generous to all the fine women; you are for giving them a despotic power in love, I see, to reward and punish as they think fit.

Fop. Ha, ha! Right, madam, what signifies beauty without power? and a fine woman, when she's married, makes as ridiculous a figure as a beaten general marching out of a garrison.

Lady E. I am afraid, Lady Betty, the greatest danger, in your use of power, would be from a too heedless liberality: you would more mind the man than his merit.

Fop. Piqued again, by all that's fretful! (Aside.) Well, certainly, to give envy is a pleasure inexpressible. (Apart to Lady B.)

Lady B. Ha, ha!

Lady E. Does not she shew him well, my lord? (Aside to Lord M.)

More. Perfectly; and me to myself; for now I almost blush to think I ever was uneasy at him. (To Lady E.)

Fop. Lady Easy, I ask ten thousand pardons, I am afraid I am rude all this while.

Lady E. Oh! not at all, my lord; you are always good company, when you please: not but in some things, indeed, you are apt to be like other fine gentlemen, a little too loose in your principles.

Fop. Oh! madam, never to the offence of the ladies; I agree in any community with them; nobody is a more constant churchman, when the fine ladies are there.

Lady E. Oh, fie! my lord, you ought not to go for their sake at all. And I wonder you, that are for being such a good husband of your virtues, are not afraid of bringing your prudence into a lampoon or a play. [things to be laughed at.]

Lady B. Lampoons and plays, madam, are only

More. Plays now, indeed, one need not be so much afraid of; for since the late short-sighted view of them, vice may go on and prosper, the stage dares hardly shew a vicious person speaking like himself, for fear of being called prophane for exposing him.

Lady E. 'Tis hard, indeed, when people won't distinguish between what's meant for contempt, and what's for example.

Fop. Odso! ladies, the court's coming home, I see; shall not we make our bows?

Lady B. Oh! by all means.

Lady E. Lady Betty, I must leave you; for I'm obliged to write letters, and I know you won't give me time after supper.

Lady B. Well, my dear, I'll make a short visit, and be with you. [Exit Lady E.] Pray, what's become of my Lady Graveairs?

More. Oh! I believe she's gone home, madam; she seemed not to be very well.

Fop. And where's Sir Charles, my lord?

More. I left him at his own lodgings.

Lady B. He's upon some ramble, I'm afraid.

Fop. Nay, as for that matter, a man may ramble at home sometimes. But here come the chaises; we must make a little more haste, madam. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Sir Charles Easy's Lodgings.

Enter LADY EASY and a Servant.

Lady E. Is your master come home?

Serv. Yes, madam.

Lady E. Where is he?

Serv. I believe, madam, he's laid down to sleep.

Lady E. Where's Edging? Bid her get me some wax and paper—stay, it's no matter, now I think on it; there's some above upon my toilet. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A Room.

SIR CHARLES EASY discovered, without his periwig, and MRS. EDGING by him, both asleep. Enter LADY EASY.

Lady E. Ha! (Starts and trembles.)

Protect me virtue, patience, reason!
Teach me to bear this killing sight, or let Me think my dreaming senses are deceiv'd!
For, sure, a sight like this might raise the arm
Of duty, ev'n to the breast of love! At least
I'll throw this vizor of my patience off;
Now wake him in his guilt,
And barefac'd front him with my wrongs.
I'll talk to him till he blushes, nay, till he—
Frowns on me, perhaps; and then,
I'm lost again. The ease of a few tears
Is all that's left to me;
And duty, too, forbids me to insult,
When I have vow'd obedience. Perhaps,
The fault's in me, and nature has not form'd
Me with the thousand little requisites
That warm the heart to love.
Somewhere there is a fault;
But heav'n best knows what both of us deserve.—
Ha! bare-headed, and in so sound a sleep! [air,
Who knows, while thus expos'd to th' unwholesome
But heav'n, offended, may o'ertake his crime,
And, in some languishing distemper, leave him,
A severe example of its violated laws.
Forbid it mercy, and forbid it love!
This may prevent it. (Puts a handkerchief on his head.)

And if he should awake offended at my too busy care, let my heart-breaking patience, duty, and fond affection plead my pardon. [Exit. A bell rings.]

Mrs. E. Oh!

Sir C. How now! what's the matter?

Mrs. E. Oh! bless my soul! my lady's come home.

Sir C. Go, go, then. (Bell rings.)

Mrs. E. Oh, lud! my head's in such a condition, too. (Runs to the glass.) I am coming, madam! Oh, lud! here's no powder, neither. Here, madam!

[Exit.]

Sir C. How now! (Feeling the handkerchief upon his head.) What's this? How came it here? (Puts on his wig.) Did not I see my wife wear this to-day? Death! she can't have been here, sure. It could not be jealousy that brought her home; for my coming was accidental; so, too, I fear, might her's. How careless have I been not to secure the door, neither! 'Twas foolish—It must be so! she certainly has seen me here sleeping with her woman: if so, how low an hypocrite to her must that sight have proved me! The thought has made me despicable even to myself. How mean a vice is lying! and how often have those empty pleasures lulled my honour and my conscience to a lethargy, while I grossly have abused her, poorly skulking behind a thousand falsehoods! Now I reflect, this has not been the first of her discoveries. How contemptible a figure must I have made to her! A crowd of recollected circumstances confirms me now, she has been long acquainted with my follies; and yet with what amazing prudence has she borne the secret pangs of injured love, and worn an everlasting smile to me! This asks a little thinking: something should be done. I'll see her instantly, and be resolved from her behaviour. [Exit.]

SCENE VI.—A Room.

Enter LADY EASY and MRS. EDGING.

Lady E. Where have you been, Edging?

Mrs. E. Been, madam! I—I—I came as soon as I heard you ring, madam.

Lady E. How guilt confounds her! but she's below my thought. (Aside.) Fetch my last new scarf hither; I have a mind to alter it a little.

Mrs. E. Yes, madam. I see she does not suspect anything. [Aside, and exit.]

Lady E. Heigho! (Sitting down.) I had forgot—but I am unfit for writing now. 'Twas a hard conflict; yet, it's a joy to think it over: a secret pride, to tell my heart my conduct has been just. How low are vicious minds that offer injuries! how much superior innocence that bears them! Still there's a pleasure even in the melancholy of a quiet conscience. Away, my fears! it is not yet impossible; for while his human nature is not quite shook off, I ought not to despair.

Re-enter MRS. EDGING with the scarf.

Mrs. E. Here's the scarf, madam.

Lady E. So, sit down there; and, let me see: here, rip off all that silver.

Mrs. E. Indeed, I always thought it would become your ladyship better without it. But, now suppose, madam, you carried another row of gold round the scollops, and then you take and lay this silver plain all along the gathers, and your ladyship will perfectly see, it will give the thing ten thousand times another air. [bid you.]

Lady E. Pr'ythee, don't be impertinent; do as I

Mrs. E. Nay, madam, with all my heart; your ladyship may do as you please.

Lady E. This creature grows so confident; and I dare not part with her, lest he should think it jealousy. (Aside.)

Enter SIR CHARLES EASY.

Sir C. So, my dear! what, at work? How are you employed, pray?

Lady E. I was thinking to alter this scarf here.

Sir C. What's amiss? methinks it's very pretty.

Mrs. E. Yes, sir, it's pretty enough, for that matter; but my lady has a mind it should be proper, too.

Sir C. Indeed!

Lady E. I fancy plain gold and black would become me better.

Sir C. That's a grave thought, my dear.

Mrs. E. Oh, dear! sir, not at all; my lady's much in the right; I am sure, as it is, it's fit for nothing

Sir C. Leave the room. [but a girl.]

Mrs. E. Lard! sir, I can't stir; I must stay to—

Sir C. Go. (Angrily.)

Mrs. E. If ever I speak to him again I'll be burned! [Aside, and exit.]

Sir C. Sit still, my dear. I came to talk with you; and, which you may well wonder at, what I have to say is of importance, too; but 'tis in order to my hereafter always talking kindly to you.

Lady E. Your words were never disobliging, nor can I charge you with a look that ever had the appearance of unkindness.

Sir C. The perpetual spring of your good-humour, lets me draw no merit from what I have appeared to be; which makes me curious now to know your thoughts of what I really am: and never having asked you this before, it puzzles me; nor can I (my strange negligence considered) reconcile to reason your first thoughts of venturing upon marriage with Lady E. I never thought it such a hazard. [me.]

Sir C. How could a woman of your restraint in principles, sedateness, sense, and tender disposition, propose to see a happy life with one (now I reflect) that hardly took an hour's pains, even before marriage, to appear but what I am? A loose, unheeded wretch; absent in all I do; civil, and as often rude, without design; unseasonably thoughtful; easy to a fault; and, in my best of praise, but carelessly good-natured: how shall I reconcile your temper with having made so strange a choice?

Lady E. Your own words may answer you. Your having never seemed to be but what you really were; and through that carelessness of temper, there still shone forth to me an undesigning honesty, I always doubted of in smoother faces: thus while I saw you took least pains to win me, you pleased and wooed me most; nay, I have thought, that such a temper could never be deliberately unkind; or, at the worst, I knew that errors from want of thinking might be borne; at least, when, probably, one moment's serious thought would end them: these were my worst of fears; and these, when weighed by growing love against my solid hopes, were nothing.

Sir C. My dear, your understanding startles me, and justly calls my own in question: I blush to think I've worn so bright a jewel in my bosom, and till this hour, have scarcely been curious enough once to look upon its lustre.

Lady E. You set too high a value on the common qualities of an easy wife.

Sir C. Virtues, like benefits, are double when concealed: and, I confess, I yet suspect you of a higher value than I have as yet spoken of you.

Lady E. I understand you not.

Sir C. I'll speak more plainly to you. Be free and tell me—where did you leave this handkerchief?

Lady E. Ha! [question.]

Sir C. What is't you start at? You hear the Lady E. What shall I say? my fears confound me.

Sir C. Be not concerned, my dear; be easy in the truth, and tell me.

Lady E. I cannot speak; and I could wish you would not oblige me to it: 'tis the only thing I ever yet refused you; and though I want a reason for my will, let me not answer you.

Sir C. Your will, then, be a reason; and since I see you are so generously tender of reproaching me, 'tis fit I should be easy in my gratitude, and make what ought to be my shame, my joy; let me be, therefore, pleased to tell you now, your wondrous conduct has awakened me to a sense of your disquiet past, and resolution never to disturb it more: and (not that I offer it as a merit, but yet in blind compliance to my will) let me beg you would immediately discharge your woman.

Lady E. Alas! I think not of her. Oh! my dear, distract me not with this excess of goodness. (Weeping.)

Sir C. Nay, praise me not, lest I reflect how little I have deserved it. I see you're in pain to give me this confusion: come, I will not shock your softness by my untimely blush for what is past, but rather soothe you to a pleasure at my sense of joy for my recovered happiness to come. Give, then, to my new-born love what name you please; it cannot, shall not be too kind: oh! it cannot be too soft for what my soul swells up with emulation to deserve. Receive me, then, entire at last; and take what yet no woman ever truly had, my conquered heart.

Lady E. Oh! the soft treasure! oh! the dear reward of long-desiring love! Now I am blest, indeed, to see you kind without the expense of pain in being so, to make you mine with easiness. Thus, thus to have you mine, is something more than happiness; 'tis double life and madness of abounding joy. But 'twas a pain intolerable to give you a confusion.

Sir C. Oh! thou engaging virtue! But I am too slow in doing justice to thy love: I know thy softness will refuse me; but, remember, I insist upon it: let thy woman be discharged this minute.

Lady E. No, my dear; think me not so low in faith, to fear that (after what you've said) 'twill ever be in her power to do me future injury. When I can conveniently provide for her, I'll think on't; but to discharge her now, might let her guess at the occasion; and, methinks, I would have all our differences, like our endearments, be equally a secret to our servants.

Sir C. Still my superior every way. Be it as you have better thought. Well, my dear, now I'll confess a thing that was not in your power to accuse me of; to be short, I own this creature is not the only one I have been to blame with.

Lady E. I know she is not, and was always less concerned to find it so; for constancy in errors might have been fatal to me.

Sir C. What is it you know, my dear? (Surprised.)

Lady E. Come, I am not afraid to accuse you now—my Lady Graveairs. Your carelessness, my dear, let all the world know it, and it would have been hard, indeed, had it been only to me a secret.

Sir C. My dear, I'll ask no more questions, for fear of being more ridiculous: I do confess, I thought my discretion there had been a master-piece. How contemptible must I have looked all this while!

Lady E. You sha'n't say so.

Sir C. Well, to let you see I had some shame as well as nature in me, I had written this to my Lady Graveairs, upon my first discovering that you knew I had wronged you. Read it.

Lady E. (Reads.) "Something has happened that prevents the visit I intended you; and I could gladly wish you never would reproach me if I tell you it is utterly inconvenient that I should ever see you more." This, indeed, was more than I had merited.

Enter a Servant.

Sir C. Who's there? Here, step with this to my Lady Graveairs. (Gives the letter to the Servant.)

Serv. Yes, sir. Madam, my Lady Betty's come.

Lady E. I'll wait on her. [Exit Serv.]

Sir C. My dear, I am thinking there may be other things my negligence may have wronged you in; but, be assured, as I discover them, all shall be corrected. Is there any part or circumstance in your fortune that I can change, or yet make easier to you?

Lady E. None, my dear; your good-nature never stinted me in that; and now, methinks, I have less occasion there than ever.

Re-enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, my Lord Morelove's come.

Sir C. I am coming. [Exit Serv.] I think I told you of the design we had laid against Lady Betty.

Lady E. You did, and I should be pleased to be myself concerned in it.

Sir C. I believe we may employ you. I know he waits for me with impatience. But, my dear, won't you think me tasteless to the joy you've given me, to suffer, at this time, any concern but you to employ my thoughts?

Lady E. Seasons must be obeyed; and since I know your friend's happiness is depending, I could not taste my own, should you neglect his.

Sir C. Thou easy sweetness! Oh! what a waste on thy neglected love, has my unthinking brain committed! But time and future thrift of tenderness shall yet repair it all. The hour will come when this soft gliding stream that swells my heart, uninterrupted shall renew its course;

And like the ocean after ebb, shall move

With constant force of due returning love.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE VII.—A Room.

Enter LADY EASY and LADY BETTY MODISH.

Lady B. You've been in tears, my dear, and yet you look pleased, too.

Lady E. You'll pardon me, if I can't let you into circumstances; but be satisfied, Sir Charles has made me happy even to a pain of joy.

Lady B. Indeed, I am truly glad of it, though I am sorry to find that any one who has generosity enough to do you justice, should, unprovoked, be so great an enemy to me.

Lady E. Sir Charles your enemy!

Lady B. My dear, you'll pardon me if I always thought him so, but now I am convinced of it.

Lady E. In what, pray? I can't think you'll find him so.

Lady B. Oh! madam, it has been his whole business, of late, to make an utter breach between my Lord Morelove and I.

Lady E. That may be owing to your usage of my lord: perhaps, he thought it would not disoblige you. I am confident you are mistaken in him.

Lady B. Oh! I don't use to be out in things of this nature; I can see well enough: but I shall be able to tell you more when I have talked with my lord.

Lady E. Here he comes; and because you shall talk with him—no excuses; for, positively, I will leave you together.

Lady B. Indeed, my dear, I desire you would stay, then; for, I know you think, now, that I have a mind to—to—

Lady E. To—to—Ha, ha, ha! (Going.)

Lady B. Well, remember this.

Enter LORD MORELOVE.

More. I hope I don't frighten you away, madam?

Lady E. Not at all, my lord; but I must beg your pardon for a moment; I'll wait upon you immediately. [Exit.]

Lady B. My Lady Easy gone!

More. Perhaps, madam, in friendship to you, she thinks I may have deserved the coldness you of late have shewn me, and was willing to give you this opportunity to convince me, that you have not done it without reason.

Lady B. How handsomely does he reproach me! But I can't bear that he should think I know it. (Aside.) My lord, whatever has passed between you and I, I dare swear that could not be her thoughts at this time: for when two people have appeared professed enemies, she can't but think one will as little care to give, as the other to receive a justification of their actions.

More. Passion, indeed, often does repeated injuries on both sides; but I don't remember in my heat of error that I ever yet professed myself your enemy.

Lady B. My lord, I shall be very free with you: I confess I do think now I have not a greater enemy in the world.

More. If having long loved you, to my own disquiet, be injurious, I am contented, then, to stand the foremost of your enemies.

Lady B. Oh! my lord, there's no great fear of your being my enemy that way, I dare say.

More. There's no other way my heart can bear to offend you now, and I foresee in that it will persist to my undoing.

Lady B. Fie, fie! my lord, we know where your heart is well enough.

More. My conduct has, indeed, deserved this scorn; and, therefore, it is but just I should submit to your resentment, and beg (though I am assured in vain) for pardon. (Kneels.)

Enter SIR CHARLES EASY.

Sir C. How, my lord! (Lord M. rises.)

Lady B. Ha! He here! This is unlucky. (Aside.)

More. Oh! pity my confusion! (To Lady B.)

Sir C. I am sorry to see you can so soon forget yourself; methinks, the insult you have borne from that lady, by this time, should have warned you into a disgust of her regardless principles.

More. Hold, Sir Charles! While you and I are friends, I desire you would speak with honour of this lady: 'tis sufficient I have no complaint against her, and—

Lady B. My lord, I beg you would resent this thing no farther: an injury like this is better punished with our contempt: apparent malice should only be laughed at.

Sir C. Ha, ha! the old recourse. Offers of any hopes to delude him from his resentment; and, then, (as the grand Monarque did with Cavalier,) you are sure to keep your word with him.

Lady B. Sir Charles, to let you know how far I am above your little spleen, my lord, your hand from this hour.

Sir C. Psha, psha! All design, all pique! mere artifice, and disappointed woman.

Lady B. Lookye! sir, not that I doubt my lord's opinion of me; but—

Sir C. Lookye! madam, in short, your word has been too often taken to let you make up quarrels, as you used to do, with a soft look, and a fair promise you never intended to keep.

Lady B. Was there ever such insolence! he won't

More. Sir Charles! [give me leave to speak.

Lady B. No, pray, my lord, have patience; and since his malice seems to grow particular, I dare his worst, and urge him to the proof of't: pray, sir, wherein can you charge me with a breach of promise to my lord?

Sir C. Death! you won't deny it? How often, to piece up a quarrel, have you appointed him to visit you alone; and though you have promised to see no other company the whole day, when he has come, he has found you among the laugh of noisy fops, coquets, and coxcombs, dissolutely gay, while your full eyes ran over with transport of their flattery, and your own vain power of pleasing? How often, I say, have you been known to throw away, at least, four hours of your good-humour upon such wretches; and the minute they were gone, grew only dull to him; sunk into a distasteful spleen, complained you had talked yourself into the headache, and then indulged upon the dear delight of seeing him in pain: and by that time you had stretched, and gaped him heartily out of patience, of a sudden, most importantly remember you had outsat your appointment with my Lady Fiddle-faddle; and immediately order your coach to the Lady B. Yet, sir, have you done? [park?

Sir C. No; though this might serve to shew the nature of your principles. But the noble conquest you have gained at last, over defeated sense of reputation, too, has made your fame immortal.

More. How, sir?

Lady B. My reputation!

Sir C. Ay, madam, your reputation! My lord, if I advance a falsehood, then resent it. I say, your reputation; it has been your life's whole pride, of late, to be the common toast of every public table; vain even in the infamous addresses of a married man, my Lord Foppington; let that be reconciled with reputation, and I'll now shake hands with shame, and bow me to the low contempt which you deserve from him: not but I suppose you'll yet endeavour to recover him; now you find ill usage in danger of losing your conquest, 'tis possible you'll stop at nothing to preserve it.

Lady B. Sir Charles—(Confused.)

Sir C. I know your vanity is so voracious, 'twill even wound itself to feed itself; offer him a blank, perhaps, to fill up with hopes of what nature he pleases, and part with even your pride to keep him.

Lady B. Sir Charles, I have not deserved this of you. (Bursting into tears.)

Sir C. Ah! true woman! drop him a soft dissembling tear, and then his just resentment must be hushed of course.

More. Oh! Charles, I can bear no more; those tears are too reproaching.

Sir C. Hist, for your life! (Aside.) My lord, if you believe her, you're undone; the very next sight of my Lord Foppington would make her yet forswear all that she can promise.

Lady B. My Lord Foppington! Is that the mighty crime that must condemn me, then? You know I used him but as a tool of my resentment, which you yourself, by a pretended friendship to us both, most artfully provoked me to.

More. Hold! I conjure you, madam; I want not this conviction.

Lady B. Send for him this minute; and you and he shall be witnesses of the contempt and detestation I have for any forward hopes his vanity may have given him, or your malice would insinuate.

Sir C. Death! you would as soon eat fire, as soon part with your luxurious taste of folly, as dare to own the half of this before his face, or any one that would make you blush to deny it to. Here comes my wife; now we shall see; ha! and my Lord Foppington with her. Now, now, we shall see this mighty proof of your sincerity: now, my lord, you'll have a warning, sure, and henceforth know me for your friend indeed.

Enter LADY EASY and LORD FOPPINGTON.

Lady E. In tears, my dear; what's the matter?

Lady B. Oh! my dear, all I told you is true; Sir Charles has shewn himself to be such an inveterate enemy of mine, that if I believed I deserved but half his hate, 'twould make me hate myself.

Fop. Harkye! Charles, pr'ythee, what is this business?

Sir C. Why, your's, my lord, for aught I know. I have made such a breach betwixt them—I can't promise much for the courage of a woman; but if it holds, I am sure it's wide enough, that you may enter ten a-breast, my lord. (Apart.)

Fop. Say'st thou so, Charles? then I hold six to four I am the first man in the town.

Lady E. Sure, there must be some mistake in this; I hope he has not made my lord your enemy.

Lady B. I know not what he has done.

More. Far be that thought! Alas! I am too much in fear myself, that what I have this day committed, (advised by his mistaken friendship,) may have done my love irreparable prejudice.

Lady B. No, my lord; since I perceive his little arts have not prevailed upon your good-nature to my prejudice, I am bound in gratitude, in duty to myself, and to the confession you have made, my lord, to acknowledge now, I have been to blame, too.

More. Ah! is it possible? can you own so much? Oh! my transported heart!

Lady B. He says I have taken pleasure in seeing you uneasy—I own it: but it was when that uneasiness, I thought, proceeded from your love; and if you did love—'twill not be much to pardon it.

More. Oh! let my soul, thus bending to your power, adore this soft descending goodness.

Lady B. And since the giddy woman's slights I have shewn you too often, have been public, 'tis fit, at last, the amends and reparation should be so: therefore, what I offered to Sir Charles, I now repeat before this company, my utter detestation of any past or future gallantry that has or shall be offered by me to your uneasiness.

More. Oh! be less generous, or teach me to deserve it. Now blush, Sir Charles, at your injurious accusation.

Lady B. As for my Lord Foppington, I owe him thanks for having been so friendly an instrument of our reconciliation; for, though in the little outward gallantry I received from him, I did not immediately trust him with my design in it, yet I have a better opinion of his understanding than to suppose he could mistake it.

Fop. I am struck dumb with the deliberation of her assurance; and do not positively remember that the non-chalance of my temper ever had so bright an occasion to shew itself before. (Aside.)

Lady B. My lord, I hope you'll pardon the freedom I have taken with you.

Fop. Oh! madam, don't be under the confusion of an apology upon my account; for, in cases of this nature, I am never disappointed, but when I find a lady of the same mind two hours together.

Lady B. My lord, that's a very prudent temper.

Fop. Madam, to convince you that I am in an universal peace with mankind, give me leave to have the honour of completing it, by joining your hands where you have already offered up your inclination. [you.]

Lady B. My lord, that's a favour I can't refuse

More. Generous, indeed, my lord.

Fop. And, stap my breath! if ever I was better pleased since my first entrance into human nature.

Sir C. How now, my lord! What, throw up the cards before you have lost the game?

Fop. Lookye! Charles, 'tis true, I did design to have played with her alone: but he that will keep well with the ladies must sometimes be content to make one at a pool with them: and since I know I must engage her in my turn, I don't see any great odds in letting him take the first game with her.

Sir C. Wisely considered, my lord.

Lady B. And now, Sir Charles—

Sir C. And now, madam, I'll save you the trouble of a long speech; and, in one word, confess that everything I have done in regard to you this day was purely artificial. I saw there was no way to secure you to my Lord Morelove but by alarming your pride with the danger of losing him: and since the success must have, by this time, convinced you that in love nothing is more ridiculous than an over-acted aversion; I am sure you won't take it ill, if we at last congratulate your good-nature by heartily laughing at the fright we had put you in. Ha, ha!

Lady B. Why—well, I declare it now, I hate you worse than ever.

Sir C. Ha, ha, ha! And was it afraid they would take away its love from it. Poor Lady Betty!

Lady E. My dear, I beg your pardon; but 'tis impossible not to laugh when one's so heartily pleased.

Fop. Really, madam, I am afraid the humour of the company will draw me into your displeasure, too; but if I were to expire this moment, my last breath would positively go out with a laugh.

Lady B. Nay, I have deserved it all, that's the truth on't; but I hope, my lord, you were not in this design against me.

More. As a proof, madam, I am inclined never to deceive you more, I do confess I had my share in it.

Lady B. You do, my lord; then I declare 'twas a design the best carried on, that ever I knew in my life; and (to my shame I own it) for aught I know, the only thing that could have prevailed upon my temper: it was a foolish pride that has cost me many a bitten lip to support it. I wish we don't both repent, my lord. [never shall.]

More. Don't you repent without me, and we

Sir C. Well, madam, now the worst that the world can say of your past conduct is, that my lord had constancy, and you have tried it.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. (To More.) My lord, Mr. Le Fevre's below, and desires to know what time your lordship will please to have the music begin.

More. Sir Charles, what say you? will you give me leave to bring them hither?

Sir C. As the ladies think fit, my lord.

Lady B. Oh! by all means; 'twill be better here, unless we could have the Terrace to ourselves.

More. Then, pray, desire them to come all hither immediately. [Exit Serv.]

Enter LADY GRAVEAIRS.

Lady G. Yes, you may well start! but don't suppose I am now come, like a poor fool, to upbraid your guilt; but, if I could, to blast you with a look.

Sir C. Come, come, you have sense—don't expose yourself: you are unhappy, and I own myself the cause; the only satisfaction I can offer you is, to protest no new engagement takes me from you; but a sincere reflection of the long neglect and injuries I have done the best of wives; for whose amends and only sake I now must part with you, and all the inconvenient pleasures of my life.

Lady G. Have you then fallen into the low contempt of exposing me, and to your wife, too?

Sir C. 'Twas impossible without it, I could ever be sincere in my conversion.

Lady G. Despicable!

Sir C. Do not think so: for my sake I know she'll not reproach you; nor, by her carriage, ever let the world perceive you've wronged her.

Lady E. Lady Graveairs, I hope you'll sup with us? [pany.]

Lady G. Madam, I can't refuse such good com-

Sir C. You see the worst of her resentment: in the meantime, don't endeavour to be her friend, and she'll never be your enemy.

Lady G. I am unfortunate: 'tis what my folly has deserved, and I submit to it.

More. So! here's the music. (Music.)

Lady E. Come, ladies, shall we sit?

SONG.

*Sabina, with an angel's face,
By love ordain'd for joy,
Seems of the syren's cruel race,
To charm and then destroy:
With all the arts of look and dress,
She fans the fatal fire;
Through pride, mistaken oft for grace,
She bids the swain expire.
The god of love enrag'd to see
The nymph defy his flame,
Pronounc'd his merciless decree
Against the haughty dame;
Let age with double speed o'ertake her,
Let love the room of pride supply;
And when the lovers all forsake her,
A spotless virgin let her die.*

Sir C. (To Lady E.) Now, my dear, I find my happiness grow fast upon me. In all my past experience of the sex, I found, even among the better sort, so much of folly, pride, malice, passion, and irresolute desire, that I concluded you but of the foremost rank, and, therefore, scarcely worthy my concern; but thou hast stirred me with so severe a proof of thy exalted virtue, it gives me wonder equal to my love. If, then, the unkindly thought of what I have been, hereafter should intrude upon thy growing quiet, let this reflection teach thee to be easy:

*Thy wrongs, when greatest, most thy virtue prov'd,
And from that virtue found, I blush'd and truly lov'd.*
[Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Park.

Enter CLERIMONT, Senior, and FAINLOVE.

Cler. sen. Well, Mr. Fainlove, how do you go on in your amour with my wife?

Fain. I am very civil and very distant; if she smiles or speaks, I bow and gaze at her; then throw down my eyes, as if oppressed by fear of offence, then steal a look again till she again sees me:—this is my general method.

Cler. sen. And 'tis right: for such a fine lady has no guard to her virtue, but her pride; therefore, you must constantly apply yourself to that. But, dear Lucy, as you have been a very faithful, but a very costly wench to me; so my spouse, also, has been constant to my bed, but careless of my fortune.

Fain. Ah! my dear, how could you leave your poor Lucy, and run into France to see sights, and shew your gallantry with a wife? Was not that unnatural?

Cler. sen. She brought me a noble fortune, and I thought she had a right to share it: therefore, I carried her to see the world, forsooth, and make the tour of France and Italy, where she learned to lose her money gracefully, to admire every vanity in our sex, and condemn every virtue in her own; which, with ten thousand other perfections, are the ordinary improvements of a travelled lady. Now I can neither mortify her vanity that I may live at ease with her, or quite discard her, till I have caught her a little enlarging her innocent freedoms, as she calls them; for this end, I am content to be a French husband, though, now and then, with the secret pangs of an Italian one; and therefore, sir, or madam, you are thus equipped to attend and accost her ladyship: it concerns you to be diligent: if we wholly part—I need say no more; if we do not—I'll see thee well provided for.

Fain. I'll do all I can, I warrant you; but you are not to expect I'll go much among the men.

Cler. sen. No, no; you must not go near men, you are only (when my wife goes to a play) to sit in a side-box with pretty fellows: I don't design you to personate a real man, you are only to be a pretty gentleman. Not to be of any use or consequence in the world, as to yourself, but merely as a property to others. You must have seen many of that species.

Fain. I apprehend you; such as stand in assemblies, with an indolent softness and contempt of all around them; who make a figure in public, and are scorned in private. I have seen such an one with a pocket-glass to see his own face, and an affected perspective to know others. (Imitates each.)

Cler. sen. Ay, ay, that's my man. Thou dear rogue!

Fain. Let me alone; I'll lay my life I'll horn you; that is, I'll make it appear I might if I could.

Cler. sen. Ay, that will please me quite as well.

Fain. To shew you the progress I have made, I last night won of her five hundred pounds, which I have brought you safe. (Giving him bills.)

Cler. sen. Oh! the d—d vice! That women can imagine all household care, regard to posterity, and fear of poverty, must be sacrificed to a game at cards. Suppose she had not had it to pay, and you had been capable of finding your account another way—

Fain. That's but a suppose.

Cler. sen. I say she must have complied with everything you asked.

Fain. But she knows you never limit her expenses. I'll gain her from him for ever if I can. (Aside.)

Cler. sen. With this, you have repaid me two thousand pounds, and if you did not refund thus honestly, I could not have supplied her. We must have parted.

Fain. Then you shall part—if t'other way fails. (Aside.) However, I can't blame your fondness of her, she has so many entertaining qualities with her vanity. Then she has such a pretty unthinking air, while she saunters round a room, and prattles sentences—

Cler. sen. That was her way from her infancy; she always had a great genius for knowing everything but what it was necessary she should. Thus the case stood when she went to France; but her fine follies improved so daily, that, though I was then proud of her being called Mr. Clerimont's wife, I am now as much out of countenance to hear myself called Mrs. Clerimont's husband; so much is the superiority of her side.

Fain. I am sure, if ever I gave myself a little liberty, I never found you so indulgent.

Cler. sen. I should have the whole sex on my back, should I pretend to retrench a lady so well visited as mine is. Therefore, I must bring it about that it shall appear her own act, if she reform; or else I shall be pronounced jealous, and have my eyes pulled out for being open. But I hear my brother Jack coming, who, I hope, has brought your's with him. Hist! not a word.

Enter CAPTAIN CLERIMONT and POUNCE.

Capt. C. I have found him out, at last, brother, and brought you the obsequious Mr. Pounce. I saw him at a distance, in a crowd, whispering in their turns with all about him. He is a gentleman so received, so courted, and so trusted—

Pounce. I am very glad if you saw anything like that, if the approbation of others can recommend me (where I much more desired it) to this company.

Capt. C. Oh! the civil person! But, dear Pounce, you know I am your professed admirer. Now my brother and I want your help in a business that requires a little more dexterity than we ourselves are masters of.

Pounce. You know, sir, my character is helping the distressed, which I do freely, and without reserve; while others are for distinguishing rigidly on the justice of the occasion, and so lose the grace of the benefit. Now 'tis my profession to assist a free-hearted young fellow against an unnatural long-lived father; to disencumber men of pleasure of the vexation of unwieldy estates; to support a feeble title to an inheritance; to—

Cler. sen. I have been well acquainted with your merits ever since I saw you, with so much compassion, prompt a stammering witness in Westminster-hall, that wanted instruction. I love a man that can venture his ears with so much bravery for his friend.

Pounce. Dear, sir, spare my modesty, and let me know to what all this panegyric tends.

Cler. sen. Why, sir, what I would say is in behalf of my brother, the Captain, here, whose misfortune it is that I was born before him.

Pounce. I am confident that he had rather you should have been so, than any other man in England.

Capt. C. You do me justice, Mr. Pounce: but though 'tis to that gentleman, I am still a younger brother; and you know we that are so, are generally condemned to shops, colleges, or inns of court—

Pounce. But you, sir, have escaped them; you have been trading in the noble mart of glory.

Capt. C. That's true: but the general makes such haste to finish the war, that we red coats may be soon out of fashion; and then, I am a fellow of the most easy, indolent disposition in the world; I hate all manner of business.

Pounce. A composed temper, indeed!

Capt. C. In such case, I should have no way of livelihood, but calling over this gentleman's dogs in the country, drinking his stale beer to the neighbourhood, or marrying a fortune.

Cler. sen. To be short, Pounce, I am putting Jack upon marriage; and you are so public an envoy, or rather plenipotentiary, from the very different nations of Cheapside, Covent-garden, and St. James's; you have, too, the mien and language of each place so naturally, that you are the properest instrument I know in the world, to help an honest young fellow to favour in one of them, by credit in the other.

Pounce. By what I understand of your many prefaces, gentlemen, the purpose of all is this: that it would not, in the least, discompose this gentleman's easy, indolent disposition, to fall into twenty thousand pounds, though it came upon him never so suddenly.

Capt. C. You are a very discerning man. How could you see so far through me as to know I love a fine woman, pretty equipage, good company, and a clean habitation?

Pounce. Well, though I am so much a conjurer, what then?

Cler. sen. You know a certain person into whose hands you now and then recommend a young heir to be relieved from the vexation of tenants, taxes, and so forth—

Pounce. What, my worthy friend, and city patron, Hezekiah Tipkin, banker, in Lombard-street? Would the noble Captain lay any sums in his hands?

Capt. C. No; but the noble Captain would have treasure out of his hands. You know his niece.

Pounce. To my knowledge, ten thousand pounds in money.

Capt. C. Such a stature! such a blooming countenance! so easy a shape!

Pounce. In jewels of her grandmother's five thousand—

Capt. C. Her wit so lively, her mien so alluring!

Pounce. In land a thousand a year.

Capt. C. Her lips have that certain prominence, that swelling softness, that they invite to a pressure; her eyes that languish, that they give pain, though they look only inclined to rest; her whole person that one charm—

Pounce. Why, I thought you had never seen her.

Capt. C. No more I haven't.

Pounce. Who told you, then, of her inviting lips, her soft, sleepy eyes?

Capt. C. You yourself.

Pounce. Sure, you rave; I never spoke of her before to you.

Capt. C. Why, you won't face me down.—Did you not just now say, she had ten thousand pounds in money, five in jewels, and a thousand a year?

Pounce. I confess my own stupidity, and her charms. Why, if you were to meet, you would certainly please her; you have the cant of loving. But, pray, may we be free? That young gentleman—

Capt. C. A very honest, modest gentleman of my acquaintance: one that has much more in him than he appears to have; you shall know him better, sir: this is Mr. Pounce; Mr. Pounce, this is Mr. Fainlove; I must desire you to let him be known to you and your friends.

Pounce. I shall be proud. Well, then, since we may be free, you must understand, the young lady, by being kept from the world, has made a world of her own. She has spent all her solitude in reading romances; her head is full of shepherds, knights, flowery meads, groves, and streams; so that if you talk like a man of this world to her, you do nothing.

Capt. C. Oh! let me alone; I have been a great traveller in fairy land myself; I know Oroondates, Cassandra—Astrea and Clelia are my intimate acquaintance.

Pounce. That would do, that would do; her very language.

Cler. sen. Why, then, dear Pounce, I know thou art the only man living that can serve him.

Pounce. Gentlemen, you must pardon me, I am soliciting the marriage settlement between her and a country booby, her cousin, Humphrey Gubbin, Sir Harry's heir, who is come to take possession of her.

Cler. sen. Well, all that I can say to the matter is, that a thousand pounds on the day of Jack's marriage to her, is more than you'll get by the despatch of those deeds.

Pounce. Why, a thousand pounds is a pretty thing; especially when 'tis to take a lady fair out of the hands of an obstinate, ill-bred clown, to give her to a gentle swain, a dying, enamoured knight.

Cler. sen. Ay, dear Pounce, consider but that: the justice of the thing.

Pounce. Besides, he is just come from the glorious Blenheim. Lookye! Captain, I hope you have learned an implicit obedience to your leaders.

Capt. C. 'Tis all I know.

Pounce. Then, if I am to command, make no one step without me. And since we may be free, I am also to acquaint you, there will be more merit in bringing this matter to bear than you imagine. Yet right measures make all things possible.

Capt. C. We'll follow your's exactly.

Pounce. But the great matter against us is want of time; for the nymph's uncle, and 'squire's father, this morning met, and made an end of the matter.

But the difficulty of a thing, Captain, shall be no reason against attempting it.

Capt. C. I have so great an opinion of your conduct, that I warrant you we conquer all.

Pounce. I am so intimately employed by old Tipkin, and so necessary to him, that I may, perhaps, puzzle things yet.

Cler. sen. I have seen thee cajole the knave very dexterously.

Pounce. Why, really, sir, generally speaking, 'tis but knowing what a man thinks of himself, and giving him that, to make him what else you please. Now Tipkin is an absolute Lombard-street wit, a fellow that drolls on the strength of fifty thousand pounds: he is called, on 'Change, Slyboots; and by the force of a very good credit, and very bad conscience, he is a leading person: but we must be quick, or he'll sneer old Sir Harry out of his senses, and strike up the sale of his niece immediately.

Capt. C. But my rival, what's he?

Pounce. There's some hopes there; for I hear the booby is as averse, as his father is inclined to it. One is as obstinate, as the other cruel.

Cler. sen. He is, they say, a pert blockhead, and very lively out of his father's sight.

Pounce. He that gave me his character, called him a docile dunce; a fellow rather absurd, than a direct fool. When his father's absent, he'll pursue anything he's put upon. But we must not lose time. Pray, be you two brothers at home to wait for any notice from me, while that pretty gentleman and I, whose face I have known, take a walk and look about for them. So, so, young lady!

[Aside to Fainlove. Exeunt.]

Enter SIR HARRY GUBBIN and TIPKIN.

Sir H. Lookye! brother Tipkin, as I told you before, my business in town is to dispose of a hundred head of cattle and my son.

Tip. Brother Gubbin, as I signified to you in my last, bearing date September 13th, my niece has a thousand pounds per annum; and because I have found you a plain-dealing man, (particularly in the easy pad you put into my hands last summer,) I was willing you should have the refusal of my niece, provided that I have a discharge from all retrospects while her guardian, and one thousand pounds for my care.

Sir H. Ay, but, brother, you rate her too high; the war has fetched down the price of women; the whole nation is overrun with petticoats; our daughters lie upon our hands, brother Tipkin; girls are drugs, sir, mere drugs.

Tip. Lookye! Sir Harry, let girls be what they will, a thousand pounds a year is a thousand pounds a year; and a thousand pounds a year is neither girl nor boy.

Sir H. Lookye! Mr. Tipkin, the main article with me is, that foundation of wives' rebellion, and husbands' cuckoldom, that cursed pin-money. Five hundred pounds per annum pin-money!

Tip. The word pin-money, Sir Harry, is a term—

Sir H. It is a term, brother, we never had in our family, nor ever will; make her jointure in widowhood accordingly large, but four hundred pounds a year is enough to give no account of.

Tip. Well, Sir Harry, since you can't swallow these pins, I will abate to four hundred pounds.

Sir H. And to mollify the article, as well as specify the uses, we'll put in the names of several female utensils; as needles, knitting-needles, tape, thread, scissors, bodkins, fans, play-books, with other toys of that nature. And now, since we have as good as concluded on the marriage, it will not be improper that the young people see each other.

Tip. I don't think it prudent till the very instant of marriage, lest they should not like one another.

Sir H. They shall meet. As for the young girl, she cannot dislike Numps; and for Numps, I never suffered him to have anything he liked in his life. He'll be here immediately; he has been trained up from his childhood under such a plant as this in my hand: I have taken pains in his education.

Tip. Sir Harry, I approve your method; for since you have left off hunting, you might otherwise want exercise, and this is a subtle expedient to preserve your own health, and your son's good manners.

Sir H. It has been the custom of the Gubbins to preserve severity and discipline in their families: I myself was caned the day before my wedding.

Tip. Ay, Sir Harry, had you not been well cudgelled in youth, you had never been the man you are.

Sir H. You say right; now I feel the benefit of it. There's a crab-tree near our house, which flourishes for the good of my posterity, and has brushed our jackets, from father to son, for several generations.

Tip. I am glad to hear you have all things necessary for the family within yourselves.

Sir H. Oh! yonder, I see Numps is coming; I have dressed him in the very suit I had on at my own wedding; 'tis a most becoming apparel.

Enter HUMPHREY GUBBIN.

Tip. Truly, the youth makes a good marriageable figure.

Sir H. Come forward, Numps; this is your uncle Tipkin, your mother's brother, Numps, that is so kind as to bestow his niece upon you. Don't be so glum, sirrah. Don't bow to a man with a face as if you'd knock him down, don't, sirrah! (Apart.)

Tip. I am glad to see you, cousin Humphrey. He is not talkative, I observe already.

Sir H. He is very shrewd, sir, when he pleases. Do you see this crab-stick, you dog? (Apart.) Well, Numps, don't be out of humour. Will you talk? (Apart.) Come, we're your friends, Numps; come, lad.

Hump. You are a pure fellow for a father. This is always your trick, to make a great fool of one before company. (Apart to his father.)

Sir H. Don't disgrace me, sirrah: you grim graceless rogue! (Apart.) Brother, he has been bred up to respect and silence before his parents; yet did you but hear what a noise he makes sometimes in the kitchen, or the kennel, he's the loudest of them all.

Tip. Well, Sir Harry, since you assure me he can speak, I'll take your word for it.

Hump. I can speak when I see occasion, and I can hold my tongue when I see occasion.

Sir H. Well said, Numps! Sirrah, I see you can do well, if you will. (Apart.)

Tip. Pray, walk up to me, cousin Humphrey.

Sir H. Ay, walk to and fro between us, with your hat under your arm. Clear up your countenance. (Apart.)

Tip. I see, Sir Harry, you haven't set him a capering under a French dancing-master; he does not mince it; he has not learned to walk by a courant, or a borée. His paces are natural, Sir Harry.

Hump. I don't know, but 'tis so we walk in the west of England.

Sir H. Ay, right, Numps, and so we do. Ha, ha, ha! Pray, brother, observe his make; none of your lath-backed, wishy-washy breed. Come hither, Numps. Can't you stand still? (Apart, measuring his shoulders.)

Tip. I presume, this is not the first time, Sir Harry, you have measured his shoulders with your cane.

Sir H. Lookye! brother, two feet and a half in the shoulders.

Tip. Two feet and a half! we must make some settlement on the younger children.

Sir H. Not like him, quotha!

Tip. He may see his cousin when he pleases.

Hump. But harkye! uncle, I have a scruple I had better mention before marriage than after.

Tip. What's that? what's that?

Hump. My cousin, you know, is akin to me, and I don't think it lawful for a young man to marry his own relation.

Sir H. Harkye, harkye! Numps, we have got a way to solve all that. Sirrah! consider this cudgel! Your cousin! Suppose I'd have you marry your grandmother, what then? (Apart.)

Tip. Well, has your father satisfied you in the point, Mr. Humphrey?

Hump. Ay, ay, sir, very well; I have not the least scruple remaining; no, no, not in the least, sir.

Tip. Then harkye! brother, we'll go take a wet, and settle the whole affair.

Sir H. Come, we'll leave Numps here; he knows the way. Not marry your own relations, sirrah!

[Apart. Exit with Tipkin.]

Hump. Very fine, very fine! how prettily this park is stocked with soldiers, and deer, and ducks, and ladies. Ha! where are the old fellows gone? where can they be, 'trow? I'll ask these people.

Enter POUNCE and FAINLOVE.

Ha! you pretty young gentleman, did you see my father?

Fain. Your father, sir?

Hump. A weazel-faced, cross, old gentleman with spindle shanks.

Fain. No, sir.

Hump. A crab-tree stick in his hand.

Pounce. We haven't met anybody with these marks; but, sure, I have seen you before: are not you Mr. Humphrey Gubbin, son and heir to Sir Henry Gubbin?

Hump. I am his son and heir, but how long I shall be so I can't tell, for he talks every day of disinheriting me.

Pounce. Dear sir, let me embrace you. Nay, don't be offended if I take the liberty to kiss you; Mr. Fainlove, pray, kiss the gentleman. (Fainlove kisses Humphrey.) Nay, dear sir, don't stare and be surprised; for I have had a desire to be better known to you ever since I saw you, one day, clinch your fist at your father, when his back was turned upon you: for, I must own, I very much admire a young gentleman of spirit.

Hump. Why, sir, would it not vex a man to the heart, to have an old fool snubbing a body every minute afore company?

Pounce. Oh, fie! he uses you like a boy.

Hump. Like a boy! He lays me on, now and then, as if I were one of his hounds. You can't think what a rage he was in this morning, because I boggled a little at marrying my own cousin.

Pounce. A man can't be too scrupulous, Mr. Humphrey; a man can't be too scrupulous.

Hump. Sir, I could as soon love my own flesh and blood; we should squabble like brother and sister; do you think we should not, Mr. ———?

Pray, gentlemen, may I crave the favour of your names?

Pounce. Sir, I am the very person that have been employed to draw up the articles of marriage between you and your cousin.

Hump. Ay, say you so? Then you can inform me in some things concerning myself: pray, sir, what estate am I heir to?

Pounce. To fifteen hundred pounds a year, an entailed estate—

Hump. I am glad to hear it, with all my heart; and can you satisfy me in another question: pray, how old am I at present?

Pounce. Three-and-twenty last March.

Hump. Why, as sure as you are there, they have kept me back. I have been told, by some of the neighbourhood, that I was born the very year the pigeon-house was built, and everybody knows the pigeon-house is three-and-twenty. Why, I find there have been tricks played me; I have obeyed him all along, as if I had been obliged to it.

Pounce. Not at all, sir; your father can't cut you out of one acre of fifteen hundred pounds a year.

Hump. What a fool have I been to give him his head so long!

Pounce. A man of your beauty and fortune may find out ladies enough that are not akin to you.

Hump. Lookye! Mr. What-d'ye-call, as to my beauty, I don't know but they may take a liking to that. But, sir, mayn't I crave your name?

Pounce. My name, sir, is Pounce, at your service.

Hump. Pounce, with a P?

Pounce. Yes, sir; and Samuel, with an S.

Hump. Why, then, Mr. Samuel Pounce, do you know any gentlewoman that you think I could like? For to tell you truly, I took an antipathy to my cousin ever since my father proposed her to me: and since everybody knows I came up to be married, I don't care to go down and look balked.

Pounce. I have a thought just come into my head: do you see this young gentleman? he has a sister, a prodigious fortune—faith! you two shall be acquainted.

Fain. I can't pretend to expect so accomplished a gentleman as Mr. Humphrey for my sister; but, being your friend, I will be at his service in the affair.

Hump. If I had your sister, she and I should live like two turtles.

Pounce. Mr. Humphrey, you sha'n't be fooled any longer. I'll carry you into company. Mr. Fainlove, you shall introduce him to Mrs. Clerimont's toilet.

Fain. She'll be highly taken with him, for she loves a gentleman whose manner is particular.

Pounce. What, sir, a person of your pretensions, a clear estate, no portions to pay! 'tis barbarous your treatment. Mr. Humphrey, I'm afraid you want money: there's for you. (Giving him a purse.) What, a man of your accomplishments!

Hump. And yet, you see, sir, how they use me. Dear sir, you are the best friend I ever met with in all my life. Now I am flush of money bring me to your sister, and I warrant you for my behaviour. A man's quite another thing with money in his pocket, you know.

Pounce. How little the oaf wonders why I should give him money! (Aside.) You shall never want, Mr. Humphrey, while I have it, Mr. Humphrey. But, dear friend, I must take my leave of you; I have some extraordinary business on my hands; I can't stay: but you must not say a word.

Fain. But you must be in the way half-an-hour hence, and I'll introduce you at Mrs. Clerimont's.

Pounce. Make them believe you are willing to have your cousin Bridget, till opportunity serves: farewell, dear friend. [Exit with Fainlove.]

Hump. Farewell, good Mr. Samuel Pounce. But let's see my cash: 'tis very true, the old saying, a man meets with more friendship from strangers, than his own relations. Let's see my cash: one, two, three, four, there on that side; one, two, three, four, on that side; 'tis a foolish thing to put all one's money in one pocket; 'tis like a man's whole estate in one county. I'll keep these in my hand, lest I should have present occasion. But this town's full of pickpockets, so I'll go home again.

[Exit, whistling.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter POUNCE and CAPTAIN CLERIMONT with his arm in a scarf.

Pounce. You are now well enough instructed both in the aunt and niece to form your behaviour.

Capt. C. But to talk with her apart is the great matter.

Pounce. The antiquated virgin has a mighty affectation for youth, and is a great lover of men and money. One of these, at least, I am sure I can gratify her in, by turning her pence in the annuities, or the stocks of one of the companies; some way or other I'll find to entertain her, and engage you with the young lady.

Capt. C. Since that is her ladyship's turn, so busy and fine a gentleman as Mr. Pounce must needs be in her good graces.

Pounce. So shall you, too. But you must not be seen with me at first meeting; I'll dog them, while you watch at a distance. [Exeunt.]

Enter Aunt and Niece.

Niece. Was it not my gallant that whistled so charmingly in the parlour, before we went out this morning? He's a most accomplished cavalier!

Aunt. Come, niece, come; you don't do well to make sport of your relations, especially with a young gentleman that has so much kindness for you.

Niece. Kindness for me! What a phrase is there to express the darts and flames, the sighs and languishings of an expecting lover!

Aunt. Pray, niece, forbear this idle trash, and talk like other people. Your cousin Humphrey will be true and hearty in what he says, and that's a great deal better than the talk and compliment of romances.

Niece. Good, madam, don't wound my ears with such expressions: do you think I can ever love a man that's true and hearty? What a peasant-like amour do these coarse words import! True and hearty! Pray, aunt, endeavour a little at the embellishment of your style.

Aunt. Alack-a-day! cousin Biddy, these idle romances have quite turned your head.

Niece. How often must I desire you, madam, to lay aside that familiar name, cousin Biddy? I never hear it without blushing. Did you ever meet with an heroine, in those idle romances as you call 'em, that was termed Biddy?

Aunt. Ah! cousin, cousin, these are mere vapours, indeed; nothing but vapours.

Niece. No; the heroine has always something soft and engaging in her name; something that gives us a notion of the sweetness of her beauty and behaviour. A name that glides through half-a-dozen tender syllables, as Elismunda, Clidamira, Deidamia, that runs upon vowels of the tongue, not hissing through one's teeth, or breaking them with consonants. 'Tis strange rudeness, those familiar names they give us, when there is Aurelia, Saccharissa, Gloriana, for people of condition; and Celia, Chloris, Corinna, Mopsa, for their maids and those of lower rank.

Aunt. Lookye! Biddy, this is not to be supported; I know not where you have learned this nicety; but I can tell you, forsooth, as much as you despise it, your mother was a Bridget afore you, and an excellent housewife.

Niece. Good madam, don't upbraid me with my mother Bridget, and an excellent housewife.

Aunt. Yes, I say, she was; and spent her time in better learning than ever you did; not in reading of fights and battles of dwarfs and giants; but in writing out receipts for broths, possets, caudles, and surfeit-waters, as became a good country gentlewoman.

Niece. My mother, and a Bridget?

Aunt. Yes, niece; I say again, your mother, my sister, was a Bridget: the daughter of her mother Margery, of her mother Cicely, of her mother Alice—

Niece. Have you no mercy? Oh! the barbarous genealogy!

Aunt. Of her mother Winifred, of her mother Joan—

Niece. Since you will run on, then, I must needs tell you I am not satisfied in the point of my nativity. Many an infant has been placed in a cottage with obscure parents, till by chance some ancient servant of the family has known it by its marks.

Aunt. Ay, you had best be searched. That's like your calling the winds the fanning gales, before I don't know how much company; and the tree that was blown by them, had, forsooth, a spirit imprisoned in the trunk of it.

Niece. Ignorance!

Aunt. Then, a cloud, this morning, had a flying dragon in it.

Niece. What eyes had you that you could see nothing? For my part, I look upon it as a prodigy, and expect something extraordinary will happen to me before night. But you have a gross relish of things. What noble descriptions in romances had been lost, if the writers had been persons of your goût!

Aunt. I wish the authors had been hanged, and their books burnt, before you had seen them.

Niece. Simplicity!

Aunt. A parcel of improbable lies—

Niece. Indeed, madam, your raillery is coarse.

Aunt. Fit only to corrupt young girls, and turn their heads with a thousand foolish dreams of I don't know what.

Niece. Nay, now, madam, you grow extravagant.

Aunt. What I say is not to vex, but advise you for your good.

Niece. What, to burn Philocles, Artaxerxes, Oroondates, and the rest of the heroic lovers, and take my country booby, cousin Humphrey, for a husband!

Aunt. Oh, dear! oh, dear! Biddy, pray, good dear, learn to act and speak like the rest of the world; come, come, you shall marry your cousin, and live comfortably.

Niece. Live comfortably! What kind of life is that? A great heiress live comfortably! Pray, aunt, learn to raise your ideas. What is, I wonder, to live comfortably?

Aunt. To live comfortably, is to live with prudence and frugality, as we do in Lombard-street.

Niece. As we do! That's a fine life, indeed! with one servant of each sex. Let us see how many things our coachman is good for: he rubs down his horses, lays the cloth, whets the knives, and sometimes makes beds.

Aunt. A good servant should turn his hand to everything in a family.

Niece. Nay, there's not a creature in our family that has not two or three different duties: as John is butler, footman, and coachman; so, Mary is cook, laundress, and chamber-maid.

Aunt. Well, and do you laugh at that?

Niece. No, not I; nor at the coach-horses, though one has an easy trot for my uncle's riding, and t'other an easy pace for your side-saddle.

Aunt. And so you jeer at the good management of your relations, do you?

Niece. No, I am well satisfied that all the house are creatures of business; but, indeed, was in hopes that my poor lap-dog might have lived with me upon my fortune without an employment; but my uncle threatens every day to make him a turnspit, that he, too, in his sphere, may help us to live comfortably.

Aunt. Harkye! cousin Biddy—

Niece. I vow I'm out of countenance when our butler, with his careful face, drives us all stowed in a chariot, drawn by one horse ambling, and t'other trotting, with his provisions behind for the family, from Saturday night till Monday morning, bound for Hackney. Then we make a comfortable figure, indeed.

Aunt. So we do; and so will you always, if you marry your cousin Humphrey.

Niece. Name not the creature.

Aunt. Creature! what, your own cousin a creature!

Niece. Oh! let's be going; I see yonder another creature, that does my uncle's law business, and has, I believe, made ready the deeds, those barbarous deeds!

Aunt. What, Mr. Pounce a creature, too! Nay, now I'm sure you're ignorant. You shall stay, and you'll learn more wit from him in an hour, than in a thousand of your foolish books in an age. Your servant, Mr. Pounce.

Enter POUNCE.

Pounce. Ladies, I hope I don't interrupt any private discourse.

Aunt. Not in the least, sir.

Pounce. I should be loth to be esteemed one of those who think they have a privilege of mixing in all companies, without any business, but to bring forth a loud laugh, or vain jest.

Niece. He talks with the mien and gravity of a Paladin. (Aside.)

Pounce. Madam, I bought, the other day, at three and a half, and sold at seven.

Aunt. Then, pray, sir, sell for me in time. Niece, mind him; he has an infinite deal of wit. (Apart.)

Pounce. This that I speak of was for you. I never neglect such opportunities to serve my friends.

Aunt. Indeed, Mr. Pounce, you are, I protest, without flattery, the wittiest man in the world.

Pounce. I assure you, madam, I said, last night, before a hundred head of citizens, that Mrs. Bar-sheba Tipkin was the most ingenious young lady in the liberties.

Aunt. Well, Mr. Pounce, you are so facetious! but you are always among the great ones; 'tis no wonder you have it.

Niece. Idle, idle! (Aside.)

Pounce. But madam, you know Alderman Grey-goose; he's a notable joking man: "Well," says he, "here's Mrs. Barsheba's health; she's my mistress."

Aunt. That man makes me split my sides with laughing, he's such a wag. Mr. Pounce pretends Greygoose said all this, but I know 'tis his own wit, for he's in love with me. (Aside.)

Pounce. But, madam, there's a certain affair I should communicate to you. (Apart.)

Aunt. Ay, 'tis certainly so; he wants to break his mind to me. (Aside.)

Enter CAPTAIN CLERIMONT.

Pounce. Oh! Captain Clerimont, Captain Clerimont! Ladies, pray, let me introduce this young gentleman; he's my friend; a youth of great virtue and goodness, for all he is in a red coat.

Aunt. If he's your friend, we need not doubt his virtue.

Capt. C. Ladies, you're taking the cool breath of the morning.

Niece. A pretty phrase. (Aside.)

Aunt. That's the pleasantest time this warm weather.

Capt. C. Oh! 'tis the season of the pearly dews and gentle zephyrs.

Niece. Ay, pray, mind that again, aunt. (Aside.)

Pounce. Sha'n't we repose ourselves on yonder seat? I love improving company, and to communicate.

Aunt. 'Tis certainly so: he's in love with me, and wants opportunity to tell me so. I don't care if we do. He's a most ingenious man.

[Aside, and exit with Pounce.]

Capt. C. We enjoy here, madam, all the pretty landscapes of the country, without the pain of going thither.

Niece. Art and nature are in a rivalry, or rather a confederacy, to adorn this beauteous park with all the agreeable variety of water, shade, walks, and air. What can be more charming than these flowery lawns?

Capt. C. Or these gloomy shades?

Niece. Or these embroidered valleys?

Capt. C. Or that transparent stream?

Niece. Or these bowing branches on the banks of it, that seem to admire their own beauty in the crystal mirror?

Capt. C. I am surprised, madam, at the delicacy of your phrase. Can such expressions come from Lombard-street?

Niece. Alas! sir, what can be expected from an innocent virgin, that has been immured almost one-and-twenty years from the conversation of mankind, under the care of an Urganda of an aunt?

Capt. C. Bless me! madam, how you have been abused! many a lady, before your age, has had a hundred lances broken in her service, and as many dragons cut to pieces in honour of her.

Niece. Oh! the charming man! (Aside.)

Capt. C. Do you believe Pamela was one-and-twenty before she knew Musidorus?

Niece. I could hear him ever. (Aside.)

Capt. C. A lady of your wit and beauty might have given occasion for a whole romance in folio before that age.

Niece. Oh! the powers! who can he be? (Aside.) Oh! youth unknown! But let me, in the first place, know whom I talk to; for, sir, I am wholly unacquainted both with your person and your history. You seem, indeed, by your deportment, and the distinguishing mark of your bravery which you bear, to have been in a conflict; may I not know what cruel beauty obliged you to such adventures, till she pitied you?

Capt. C. Oh! the pretty coxcomb! (Aside.)

Oh! Blenheim, Blenheim! Oh! Cordelia, Cordelia!

Niece. You mention the place of battle, I would fain hear an exact description of it. Our public papers are so defective, they don't so much as tell us how the sun rose on that glorious day. Were there not a great many flights of vultures before the battle begun?

Capt. C. Oh! madam, they have eaten up half my acquaintance.

Niece. Certainly, never birds of prey were so feasted; by report, they might have lived half a year on the very legs and arms our troops left behind them.

Capt. C. Had we not fought near a wood, we should never have got legs enough to have come home upon. The joiner of the foot-guards has made his fortune by it.

Niece. I shall never forgive your general. He has put all my ancient heroes out of countenance; he has pulled down Cyrus and Alexander, as much as Louis le Grand. But your own part in that action—

Capt. C. Only that slight hurt; for the astrologer said, at my nativity, "Nor fire, nor sword, nor pike, nor musket shall destroy this child, let him but avoid fair eyes." But, madam, may not I crave the name of her that has captivated my heart?

Niece. I can't guess whom you mean by that description; but if you ask my name, I must confess you put me upon revealing what I always keep as the greatest secret I have; for, would you believe it? they have called me—I don't know how to own it—but have called me Bridget.

Capt. C. Bridget!

Niece. Bridget.

Capt. C. Bridget!

Niece. Spare my confusion, I beseech you, sir; and if you have occasion to mention me, let it be by Parthenissa; for that's the name I have assumed ever since I came to years of discretion.

Capt. C. The insupportable tyranny of parents, to fix names on helpless infants which they must blush at all their lives after! I don't think there's a surname in the world to match it.

Niece. No! what do you think of Tipkin?

Capt. C. Tipkin! Why, I think if I were a young lady that had it, I'd part with it immediately.

Niece. Pray, how would you get rid of it?

Capt. C. I'd change it for another. I could recommend to you three very pretty syllables: what do you think of Clerimont?

Niece. Clerimont, Clerimont! Very well. But what right have I to it?

Capt. C. If you will give me leave, I'll put you in possession of it. By a very few words, I can make it over to you, and your children after you.

Niece. Oh, fie! whither are you running? You know, a lover should sigh in private, and languish whole years before he reveals his passion; he should retire into some solitary grove, and make the woods and wild beasts his confidants; you should have told it to the echo half a year before you had discovered it even to my handmaid. And yet, besides, to talk to me of children! Did you ever hear of a heroine having children?

Capt. C. What can a lover do, madam, now the race of giants is extinct? Had I loved in those days, there had not been a mortal six feet high, but should have owned Parthenissa for the paragon of beauty, or measured his length on the ground. Parthenissa should have been heard by the brooks and deserts at midnight; the echo's burden, and the river's murmur.

Niece. That had been a golden age, indeed! But see, my aunt has left her grave companion, and is coming towards us; I command you to leave me.

Capt. C. Thus Oroondates, when Statira dismissed him her presence, threw himself at her feet, and implored permission but to live. (Offering to kneel.)

Niece. And thus Statira raised him from the earth, permitting him to live and love.

[Exit Capt. C.]

Enter Aunt.

Aunt. Is not Mr. Pounce's conversation very improving, niece?

Niece. Is not Mr. Clerimont a very pretty name, aunt?

Aunt. He has so much prudence—

Niece. He has so much gallantry.

Aunt. So sententious in his expressions—

Niece. So polished in his language.

Aunt. All he says is, methinks, so like a sermon.

Niece. All he speaks savours of romance.

Aunt. Romance, niece! Mr. Pounce? What savours of romance?

Niece. No, I mean his friend, the accomplished Mr. Clerimont.

Aunt. Fie! for one of your years to commend a young fellow!

Niece. One of my years is mightily governed by example. You did not dislike Mr. Pounce.

Aunt. What, censorious, too? I find there is no trusting you out of the house; a moment's fresh air does but make you still the more in love with strangers, and despise your own relations.

Niece. I am, certainly, by the power of an enchantment placed among you; but I hope I this morning employed one to seek adventures, and break the charm.

Aunt. Vapours, Biddy, indeed! Nothing but vapours. Cousin Humphrey shall break the charm.

Niece. Name him not. Call me still Biddy, rather than name that brute. [Exeunt.]

Enter CAPTAIN CLERIMONT and POUNCE.

Capt. C. A perfect Quixote in petticoats! I tell thee, Pounce, she governs herself wholly by romance. It has got into her very blood: she starts by rule, and blushes by example. Could I but have produced one instance of a lady's complying at first sight, I should have gained her promise on the spot. How am I bound to curse the cold constitutions of the Philocleas and Statiras! I am undone for want of precedents.

Pounce. I am sure I laboured hard to favour your conference; and plied the old woman all the while with something that tickled either her vanity or her covetousness.

Capt. C. I pity the drudgery you have gone through; but what's next to be done towards getting my pretty heroine?

Pounce. What should be next done in the ordinary method of things? You have seen her; the next regular approach is, that you cannot subsist a moment without sending forth musical complaints of your misfortune, by way of serenade.

Capt. C. I can nick you there, sir; I'll get everything ready as soon as possible.

Pounce. While you are playing upon the fort, I'll be within, and observe what execution you do, and give you intelligence accordingly.

Capt. C. You must have an eye upon Mr. Humphrey, while I feed the vanity of Parthenissa; for I am so experienced in these matters, that I know none but coxcombs think to win a woman by any desert of their own. No; it must be done rather by complying with some prevailing humour of your mistress, than exerting any good quality in yourself.

*'Tis not the lover's merit wins the field,
But to themselves alone the beauteous yield.*

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter MRS. CLERIMONT, FAINLOVE carrying her lap-dog, and JENNY.

Jenny. Madam, the footman that's recommended to you is below, if your ladyship will please to take him.

Mrs. C. Oh, fie! don't believe I'll think on't; it is impossible he should be good for anything. The English are so saucy with their liberty. I'll have all my lower servants French; there cannot be a good footman born out of an absolute monarchy.

Jenny. I am beholden to your ladyship for believing so well of the maid-servants in England.

Mrs. C. Indeed, Jenny, I could wish thou wert really French: for thou art plain English in spite of example. Your arms do but hang on, and you move perfectly upon joints; not with a swim of the whole person. But I am talking to you, and have not adjusted myself to-day. What pretty company a glass is, to have another self! (Kisses the dog.) The converse in soliloquy! To have company that never contradicts or displeases us! The pretty visible echo of our actions! (Kisses the dog.) How easy, too, it is to be disencumbered with stays, where a woman has anything like shape; if no shape, a good air! But I look best when I am talking.

Jenny. You always look well.

Mrs. C. For I'm always talking, you mean so: that disquiets thy sullen English temper; but I don't really look so well when I am silent: if I do but offer to speak, then I may say that—Oh! bless me! Jenny, I am so pale, I am afraid of myself: I have not laid on half red enough. What a dough-baked thing I was before I improved myself, and travelled for beauty. However, my face is very prettily designed to-day.

Fain. Indeed, madam, you begin to have so fine a hand, that you are younger every day than otherwise.

Mrs. C. The ladies abroad used to call me Mademoiselle Titian, I was so famous for my colouring: but, pr'ythee, wench, bring me my black eyebrows out of the next room.

Jenny. Madam, I have them in my hand.

Fain. It would be happy for all that are to see you to-day, if you could change your eyes, too.

Mrs. C. Gallant enough! No, hang it! I'll wear these I have on; this mode of visage takes mightily; I had three ladies, last week, come over to my complexion. I think to be a fair woman this fortnight, till I find I am aped too much; I believe there are a hundred copies of me already.

Jenny. Dear madam, won't your ladyship please to let me be of the next countenance you leave off?

Mrs. C. You may, Jenny; but I assure you it is a very pretty piece of ill-nature, for a woman that has any genius for beauty, to observe the servile imitation of her manner, her motion, her glances, and her smiles.

Fain. Ay, indeed, madam, nothing can be so ridiculous as to imitate the inimitable.

Mrs. C. Indeed, as you say, Fainlove, the French mien is no more to be learned than the language, without going thither. Then again, to see some poor ladies who have clownish, penurious, English husbands, turn and torture their old clothes into so many forms, and dye them into so many colours, to follow me. What say'st, Jenny? what say'st? not a word?

Jenny. Why, madam, all that I can say—

Mrs. C. Nay, I believe, Jenny, thou hast nothing to say any more than the rest of thy countrywomen. The splenetics speak just as the weather lets them; they are mere talking barometers. Abroad, the people of quality go on so eternally, and still go on, and are gay and entertaining: in England, discourse is made up of nothing but question and answer—I was, t'other day, at a visit where there was a profound silence for, I believe, the third part of a minute.

Jenny. And your ladyship there?

Mrs. C. They infected me with their dulness. Who can keep up their good humour at an English visit? They sit, as at a funeral, silent in the midst of many candles; one, perhaps, alarms the room: "'Tis very cold weather!" then all the mutes play their fans till some other question happens, and then the fans go off again.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Madam, Captain Clerimont and a very strange gentleman are come to wait on you.

Mrs. C. Let him and the very strange gentleman come in. [Exit Serv.]

Fain. Oh! madam, that's the country gentleman I was telling you of.

Enter HUMPHREY GUBBIN and CAPTAIN CLERIMONT.

Madam, may I do myself the honour to recommend Mr. Gubbin, son and heir to Sir Harry Gubbin, to your ladyship's notice?

Mrs. C. Mr. Gubbin, I am extremely pleased with your suit; 'tis antique, and originally from France.

Hump. It is always locked up, madam, when I am in the country. My father prizes it mightily.

Mrs. C. 'Twould make a very pretty dancing suit in a mask. Oh! Captain Clerimont, I have a quarrel with you.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Madam, your ladyship's husband desires to know whether you see company to-day, or not?

Mrs. C. Who, you clown?

Serv. Mr. Clerimont, madam.

Mrs. C. He may come in. [Exit Serv.]

Enter CLERIMONT, Senior.

Your very humble servant.

Cler. sen. I was going to take the air this morning in my coach, and did myself the honour, before I went, to receive your commands, finding you saw company.

Mrs. C. At any time, when you know I do, you may let me see you. Pray, how did you sleep last night? If I had not asked him that question, they might have thought we lay together. (Aside.) But, Captain, I have a quarrel with you; I have utterly forgot those three coupées you promised to come again and shew me. But, oh! (as she is going to be led by the Captain) have you signed that mortgage to pay off my Lady Faddle's winnings at ombre?

Cler. sen. Yes, madam.

Mrs. C. Then, all's well; my honour's safe. [Exit Clerimont, sen.] Come, Captain, lead me this step, for I'm apt to make a false one: you shall shew me.

Capt. C. I'll shew you, madam; 'tis no matter for a fiddle; I'll give you them the French way, in a teaching tune. Pray, more quick—"Oh! mademoiselle, que faites vous—à moi?"—There again: now slide, as it were, with and without measure. There you outdid the gipsy; and you have all the smiles of the dance to a tittle.

Hump. If this be French dancing and singing, I fancy I could do it. Haw, haw! (Capers aside.)

Mrs. C. I protest, Mr. Gubbin, you have almost the step, without any of our country bashfulness. Give me your hand—haw, haw! So, so, a little quicker; that's right—haw! Captain, your brother delivered this spark to me, to be diverted here, till he calls for him. [Exit Capt. C.]

Hump. This cutting so high makes one's money jingle confoundedly; I'm resolved I'll never carry above one pocket full hereafter.

Mrs. C. You do it very readily; you amaze me.

Hump. Are the gentlemen of France generally so well bred as we are in England? are they, madam, eh? But, young gentleman, when shall I see this sister? Haw, haw, haw! Is not the higher one jumps the better?

Fain. She'll be mightily taken with you, I'm sure. One would not think 'twas in you; you're so gay, and dance so very high—

Hump. What should ail me? Did you think I were wind-galled? I can sing, too, if I please; but I won't till I see your sister. This is a mighty pretty house.

Mrs. C. Well, do you know that I like this gentleman extremely? I should be glad to form him. But were you never in France, Mr. Gubbin?

Hump. No; but I'm always thus pleasant, if my father's not by. I protest, I'd advise your sister to have me; I am for marrying her at once: why should I stand shilly-shally like a country bumpkin?

Fain. Mr. Gubbin, I dare say she'll be as forward as you; we'll go in and see her. (Apart.)

Mrs. C. Then he has not yet seen the lady he is in love with. I protest, very new and gallant. Mr. Gubbin, she must needs believe you a frank person. Fainlove, I must see this sister, too; I am resolved she shall like him.

*There needs not time true passion to discover;
The most believing is the most a lover. [Exeunt.]*

SCENE II.—The Park.

Enter Niece.

Niece. Oh! Clerimont, Clerimont! To be struck at first sight! I'm ashamed of my weakness; I find in myself all the symptoms of a raging amour: I love solitude; I grow pale; I sigh frequently; I call upon the name of Clerimont when I don't think of it; his person is ever in my eyes, and his voice in my ears; methinks, I long to lose myself in some pensive grove, or to hang over the head of some warbling fountain, with a lute in my hand, softening the murmurs of the water.

Enter Aunt.

Aunt. Biddy, Biddy! Where's Biddy Tipkin?

Niece. Who do you inquire for?

Aunt. Come, come; he's just a-coming at the park-door?

Niece. Who is coming?

Aunt. Your cousin Humphrey. Who should be coming? Your lover, your husband that is to be. Pray, my dear, look well, and be civil, for your credit and mine too.

Niece. If he answers my idea, I shall rally the rustic to death.

Aunt. Hist! here he is.

Enter HUMPHREY GUBBIN.

Hump. Aunt, your humble servant. Is that—eh! aunt?

Aunt. Yes, cousin Humphrey, that's your cousin Bridget. Well, I'll leave you together.

[Exit.]

Hump. Aunt does as she'd be done by, cousin Bridget, doesn't she, eh! cousin? What, are you a Londoner, and not speak to a gentleman? Lookye! cousin, the old folks resolving to marry us, I thought it would be proper to see how I liked you, as not caring to buy a pig in a poke; for I love to look before I leap.

Niece. Sir, your person and address bring to my mind the whole history of Valentine and Orson: what, would they marry me to a wild man? Pray, answer me a question or two.

Hump. Ay, ay, as many as you please, cousin Bridget.

Niece. What wood were you taken in? How long have you been caught?

Hump. Caught!

Niece. Where were your haunts?

Hump. My haunts!

Niece. Are not clothes very uneasy to you? Is this strange dress the first you ever wore?

Hump. How!

Niece. Are you not a great admirer of roots and raw flesh? Let me look upon your nails. Don't you love blackberries, haws, and pig-nuts, mightily?

Hump. How!

Niece. Canst thou deny that thou wert suckled by a wolf? You haven't been so barbarous, I hope, since you came amongst men, as to hunt your nurse, have you?

Hump. Hunt my nurse! Ay, 'tis so; she's distracted, as sure as a gun. (Aside.)—Harkye! cousin, pray, will you let me ask you a question or two?

Niece. If thou hast yet learned the use of language, speak, monster.

Hump. How long have you been thus?

Niece. Thus! what wouldst thou say?

Hump. What's the cause of it? Tell me truly, now: did you never love anybody before me?

Niece. Go, go; thou'rt a savage.

Hump. They never let you go abroad, I suppose.

Niece. Thou'rt a monster, I tell thee.

Hump. Indeed, cousin, though 'tis folly to tell thee so, I am afraid thou art a mad woman.

Niece. I'll have thee into some forest.

Hump. I'll take thee into a dark room.

Niece. I hate thee.

Hump. I wish you did; there's no hate lost, I assure you, cousin Bridget.

Niece. Cousin Bridget, quotha! I'd as soon claim kindred with a mountain bear. I detest thee.

Hump. You never do any harm in these fits, I hope. But do you hate me in earnest?

Niece. Dost thou ask it, ungentle forester?

Hump. Yes; for I've a reason, lookye! It happens very well if you hate me, and are in your senses; for to tell you truly, I don't much care for you; and there is another fine woman, as I am informed, that is in some hopes of having me.

Niece. This merits my attention. (Aside.)

Hump. Lookye! d'ye see? as I said, I don't care for you. I would not have you set your heart on me; but, if you like anybody else, let me know it, and I'll find out a way for us to get rid of one another, and deceive the old folks that would couple us.

Niece. This wears the face of an amour. (Aside.) There is something in that thought which makes thy presence less insupportable.

Hump. Nay, nay, now you're growing fond; if you come with these maid's tricks, to say you hate at first and afterwards like me, you'll spoil the whole design.

Niece. Don't fear it. When I think of consorting with thee, may the wild boar defile the cleanly ermine! may the tiger be wedded to the kid!

Hump. When I of thee, may the pole-cat catterwaul with the civet!

Niece. When I harbour the least thought of thee, may the silver Thames forget its course!

Hump. When I like thee, may I be soused over head and ears in a horse-pond! But do you hate me?

Enter Aunt.

Niece. For ever; and you me?

Hump. Most heartily.

Aunt. Ha! I like this. They are come to promises and protestations. (Aside.)

Hump. I am very glad I have found a way to please you.

Niece. You promise to be constant?

Hump. Till death.

Niece. Thou best of savages!

Hump. Thou best of savages! poor Biddy!

Aunt. Oh! the pretty couple joking on one another. Well, how do you like your cousin Humphrey now?

Niece. Much better than I thought I should. He's quite another thing than what I took him for. We have both the same passions for one another.

Hump. We only wanted an occasion to open our hearts, aunt.

Aunt. Oh! how this will rejoice my brother and Sir Harry! We'll go to them.

Hump. No; I must fetch a walk with a new acquaintance, Mr. Samuel Pounce.

Aunt. An excellent acquaintance for your husband! Come, niece, come.

Niece. Farewell, rustic!

Hump. B'ye, Biddy!

Aunt. Rustic! Biddy! Ha, ha! Pretty creatures! [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter CAPTAIN CLERIMONT and POUNCE.

Capt. C. Does she expect me, then, at this very instant?

Pounce. I tell you, she ordered me to bring the painter at this very hour precisely, to draw her niece. Now I know you are a pretender that way.

Capt. C. Enough, I warrant, to personate the character on such an inspiring occasion.

Pounce. Be sure you play your part in humour: to be a painter for a lady, you're to have the excessive flattery of a lover, the ready invention of a poet, and the easy gesture of a player.

Capt. C. Come, come, no more instructions; my imagination out-runs all you can say. Begone, begone! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Niece's Lodgings.

Enter Aunt and Niece.

Aunt. Indeed, niece, I am as much overjoyed to see your wedding-day, as if it were my own.

Niece. But, why must it be huddled up so?

Aunt. Oh! my dear, a private wedding is much better; your mother had such a bustle at her's, with feasting and fooling: besides, they did not go to bed till two in the morning.

Niece. Since you understand things so well, I wonder you never married yourself.

Aunt. My dear, I was very cruel thirty years ago, and nobody asked me since.

Niece. Alas-a-day!

Aunt. Yet, I assure you, there were a great many matches proposed to me. There was Sir Gilbert Jolly; but he, forsooth, could not please; he drank ale, and smoked tobacco, and was no fine gentleman, forsooth! but then, again, there was young Mr. Peregrine Shapely, who had travelled, and spoke French, and smiled at all I said; he was a fine gentleman, but then, he was consumptive: and yet, again, to see how one may be mistaken! Sir Jolly died in half a year, and my Lady Shapely has, by that thin slip, eight children, that should have been mine. But here's the bridegroom. So, cousin Humphrey!

Enter HUMPHREY GUBBIN.

Hump. Your servant, ladies. So, my dear!

Niece. So, my savage!

Aunt. Oh, fie! no more of that to your husband, Biddy.

Hump. No matter; I like it, as well as duck or love. I know my cousin loves me as well as I do her.

Aunt. I'll leave you together; I must go and get ready an entertainment for you when you come home. [Exit.]

Hump. Well, cousin, are you constant? Do you hate me still?

Niece. As much as ever.

Hump. What a happiness it is, when people's inclinations jump! I wish I knew what to do with you. Can you get nobody, d'ye think, to marry you?

Niece. Oh! Clerimont, Clerimont! where art thou? (Aside.)

Enter Aunt, and CAPTAIN CLERIMONT disguised.

Aunt. This, sir, is the lady who you are to draw. You see, sir, as good flesh and blood as a man would desire to put into colours. I must have her maiden picture.

Hump. Then the painter must make haste—eh! cousin?

Niece. Hold thy tongue, good savage.

Capt. C. Madam, I am generally forced to new-mould every feature, and mend nature's handy-work; but here she has made so finished an original, that I despair of my copy's coming up to it.

Aunt. Do you hear that, niece?

Niece. I don't desire you to make graces where you find none.

Capt. C. To see the difference of the fair sex! I protest to you, madam, my fancy is utterly exhausted with inventing faces for those that sit to me. The first entertainment I generally meet with are complaints for want of sleep; they never looked so pale in their lives, as when they sit for their pictures. Then, so many touches and retouches when the face is finished! "That wrinkle ought not to have been; those eyes are too languid; the colour's too weak; that side-look hides the mole on the left cheek." In short, the whole likeness is struck out: but in you, madam, the highest I can come up to will be but rigid justice.

Hump. A comical dog, this! (Aside.)

Aunt. Truly, the gentleman seems to understand his business.

Niece. Sir, if your pencil flatters like your tongue, you are going to draw a picture that won't be at all like me. Sure, I have heard that voice somewhere. (Aside.)

Capt. C. Madam, be pleased to place yourself near me; nearer still, madam; here falls the best light. You must know, madam, there are three kinds of airs which the ladies most delight in: there is your haughty, your mild, and your pensive air. The haughty may be expressed with the head a little more erect than ordinary, and the countenance with a certain disdain in it, so as she may appear almost, but not quite inexorable: this kind of air is generally heightened with a little knitting of the brows. I gave my Lady Scornwell her choice of a dozen frowns, before she could find one to her liking.

Niece. But what's the mild air?

Capt. C. The mild air is composed of a languish and a smile. But, if I might advise, I'd rather be a pensive beauty; the pensive usually feels her pulse, leans on one arm, or sits ruminating with a book in her hand; which conversation she is supposed to choose, rather than the endless importunities of lovers.

Hump. A comical dog!

Aunt. Upon my word, he understands his business well. I'll tell you, niece, how your mother was drawn: she had an orange in her hand, and a nosegay in her bosom; but a look so pure and fresh-coloured, you'd have taken her for one of the seasons.

Capt. C. You seem, indeed, madam, most inclined to the pensive. The pensive delights also in the fall of waters, pastoral figures, or any rural view suitable to a fair lady, who, with a delicate spleen, has retired from the world, as sick of its flattery and admiration.

Niece. No; since there is room for fancy in a picture, I would be drawn like the amazon Thales-tris, with a spear in my hand, and an helmet on a table before me. At a distance behind, let there be a dwarf, holding by the bridle a milk-white palfrey.

Capt. C. Madam, the thought is full of spirit; and, if you please, there shall be a Cupid stealing away your helmet, to shew that love should have a part in all gallant actions.

Niece. That circumstance may be very picturesque.

Capt. C. Here, madam, shall be your own picture, here the palfrey, and here the dwarf. The dwarf must be very little, or we sha'n't have room for him.

Niece. A dwarf cannot be too little.

Capt. C. I'll make him a blackamoor, to distinguish him from the other too powerful dwarf, (sighs) the Cupid. I'll place that beauteous boy near you, 'twill look very natural: he'll certainly take you for his mother, Venus.

Niece. I leave those particulars to your own fancy.

Capt. C. Please, madam, to uncover your neck a little; a little lower still; a little, little lower.

Niece. I'll be drawn thus, if you please, sir.

Capt. C. Ladies, have you heard the news of a late marriage between a young lady of a great fortune and a younger brother of a good family?

Aunt. Pray, sir, how is it?

Capt. C. This young gentleman, ladies, is a particular acquaintance of mine, and much about my age and stature—Look me full in the face, madam—He accidentally met the young lady, who had in her all the perfections of her sex—Hold up your head, madam; that's right—She let him know that his person and discourse were not altogether disagreeable to her; the difficulty was how to gain a second interview—Your eyes full upon mine, madam—For never was there such a sigher in all the valleys of Arcadia, as that unfortunate youth, during the absence of her he loved.

Aunt. Alack-a-day! poor young gentleman!

Niece. It must be him: what a charming amour is this! (Aside.)

Capt. C. At length, ladies, he bethought himself of an expedient: he dressed himself just as I am now, and came to draw her picture—Your eyes full upon mine, pray, madam.

Hump. A subtle dog, I warrant him.

Capt. C. And by that means found an opportunity of carrying her off, and marrying her.

Aunt. Indeed, your friend was a very vicious young man.

Niece. Yet, perhaps, the young lady was not displeased at what he had done.

Capt. C. But, madam, what were the transports of the lover, when she made him that confession?

Niece. I dare say she thought herself very happy when she got out of her guardian's hands.

Aunt. 'Tis very true, niece, there is abundance of those headstrong young baggages about town.

Capt. C. The gentleman has often told me, he was strangely struck at first sight; but when she sat to him for her picture, and assumed all those graces that are proper for the occasion, his torment was so exquisite, his occasions so violent, that he could not have lived a day, had he not found means to make the charmer of his heart his own.

Hump. 'Tis certainly the foolishhest thing in the world to stand shilly-shally about a woman when one has a mind to marry her.

Capt. C. The young painter turned poet on the subject; I believe I have the words by heart.

Niece. A sonnet! Pray, repeat it.

Capt. C. When gentle Parthenissa walks,
And sweetly smiles, and gaily talks,
A thousand shafts around her fly,
A thousand swains unheeded die.

If, then, she labours to be seen
With all her killing air and mien;
For so much beauty, so much art,
What mortal can secure his heart?

Aunt. Why, this is pretty! I think a painter should never be without poetry; it brightens the features strangely. I profess, I'm mightily pleased: I'll but just step in, and give some orders, and be with you presently. [Exit.]

Niece. Was not this adventurous painter called Clerimont?

Capt. C. It was Clerimont, the servant of Parthenissa; but let me beseech that beauteous maid to resolve, and make the incident I feigned to her a real one; consider, madam, you are environed by cruel and treacherous guards, which would force you to a disagreeable marriage; your case is exactly the same with the princess of the Leontines in Clelia.

Niece. How can we commit such a solecism against all rules! What, in the first leaf of our history to have the marriage? You know it cannot be.

Capt. C. The pleasantest part of the history will be after marriage.

Niece. No; I never yet read of a knight that entered tilt or tournament after wedlock. 'Tis not to be expected. When the husband begins, the hero ends; all that noble impulse to glory, all the generous passion for adventures is consumed in the nuptial torch: I don't know how it is, but Mars and Hymen never hit it.

Hump. (Listening.) Consumed in the nuptial torch! Mars and Hymen! What can all this mean? I am very glad I can hardly read; they could never get these foolish fancies into my head; I had always a strong brain. (Aside.) Harkye! cousin, is not this painter a comical dog?

Niece. I think he's very agreeable company.

Hump. Why, then, I tell you what—marry him. A painter's a very genteel calling. He's an ingenious fellow, and certainly poor; I fancy he'd be glad of it. I'll keep my aunt out of the room a minute or two, that's all the time you have to consider. [Exit.]

Capt. C. Fortune points out to us this only occasion of our happiness: love's of celestial origin, and needs no long acquaintance to be manifest. Lovers, like angels, speak by intuition: their souls are in their eyes.

Niece. Then I fear he sees mine. (Aside.) But I can't think of abridging our amours, and cutting off all farther decorations of disguise, serenade, and adventure.

Capt. C. Nor would I willingly lose the merit of long services, midnight sighs, and plaintive solitudes, were there not a necessity.

Niece. Then to be seized by stealth!

Capt. C. Why, madam, you are a great fortune, and should not be married the common way. Indeed, madam, you ought to be stolen.

Niece. But, then, our history will be so short.

Capt. C. I grant it; but you don't consider there's a device in another's leading you instead of this person that's to have you; and, madam, though our amours can't furnish out a romance, they'll make a very pretty novel. Why smiles my fair?

Niece. I am almost of opinion that had Oroon dates been as pressing as Clerimont, Cassandra had been but a pocket-book: but it looks so ordinary, to go out at a door to be married. Indeed, I ought to be taken out of a window, and run away with.

Enter HUMPHREY GUBBIN and POUNCE.

Hump. Well, cousin, the coach is at the door. If you please, I'll lead you.

Niece. I put myself into your hands, good savage; but you promise to leave me?

Hump. I tell you plainly, you must not think of having me.

Pounce. (To Capt. C.) You'll have opportunity enough to carry her off; the old fellow will be busy with me; I'll gain all the time I can; but be bold and prosper.

Niece. Clerimont, you follow us.

Capt. C. Upon the wings of love. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter CLERIMONT, Senior, and FAINLOVE.

Cler. sen. Then she gave you this letter, and bid you read it as a paper of verses?

Fain. This is the place, the hour, the lucky minute. Now am I rubbing up my memory, to recollect all you said to me when you first ruined me, that I may attack her rightly.

Cler. sen. Your eloquence would be needless; 'tis so unmodish to need persuasion: modesty makes a lady embarrassed; but my spouse is above that, as for example: (reading her letter) "Fainlove,—You don't seem to want wit, therefore, I need say no more than that distance to a woman of the world is becoming in no man but a husband; an hour hence come up the back stairs to my closet. Adieu, mon mignon." I am glad you are punctual. I'll conceal myself to observe your interview. Oh! torture!—But this wench must not see it. (Aside.)

Fain. Be sure you come time enough to save my reputation.

Cler. sen. Remember your orders, distance becomes no man but a husband.

Fain. I am glad you are in so good humour on the occasion; but you know me to be but a bully in love, that can only bluster till the minute of engagement. But I'll top my part, and form my conduct by my own sentiments: if she grow coy, I'll grow more saucy: 'twas so I was won myself.

Cler. sen. Well, my dear rival, your assignation draws nigh; you are to put on your transport, your impatient, throbbing heart won't let you wait her arrival: let the dull family thing and husband, who reckons his moments by his cares, be content to wait; but you are a gallant, and measure time by ecstasies.

Fain. I hear her coming: to your post; good husband, know your duty, and don't be in the way when your wife has a mind to be in private; to your post, into the coal-hole.

Enter MRS. CLERIMONT.

Welcome, my dear, my tender charmer! Oh! to my longing arms; feel the heart pant, that falls and rises as you smile or frown. Oh! the ecstatic moment! I think that was something like what has been said to me. (Aside.)

Mrs. C. Very well, Fainlove! I protest I value myself for my discerning; I knew you had fire through all the respect you shewed me. But how came you to make no direct advances, young gentleman? Why was I forced to admonish your gallantry?

Fain. Why, madam, I knew you a woman of breeding, and above the senseless niceties of an English wife. The French way is, you are to go so far, whether they are agreeable or not: if you are so happy as to please, nobody that is not of a constrained behaviour is at a loss to let you know it; besides, if the humble servant makes the first approaches, he has the impudence of making a request, but not the honour of obeying a command.

Mrs. C. Right; a woman's man should conceal passion in a familiar air of indifference. Now there's

Mr. Clerimont; I can't allow him the least freedom, but the unfashionable fool grows so fond of me, he cannot hide it in public.

Fain. Ay, madam, I have often wondered at your ladyship's choice of one who seems to have so little of the beau monde in his carriage, but just what you force him to, while there were so many pretty gentlemen. (Dancing.)

Mrs. C. Oh! young gentleman, you are mightily mistaken, if you think such animals as you, and pretty Beau Titmouse, and pert Billy Butterfly, though I suffer you to come in, and play about my rooms, are any way in competition with a man whose name one would wear.

Fain. Oh! madam, then I find we are—

Mrs. C. A woman of sense must have respect for a man of that character; but, alas! respect, is respect! respect is not the thing; respect has something too solemn for soft moments. You things are more proper for hours of dalliance.

Cler. sen. (Peeping.) How have I wronged this fine lady! I find I am to be a cuckold out of her pure esteem for me.

Mrs. C. Besides, those fellows for whom we have respect, have none for us; I warrant, on such an occasion, Clerimont would have ruffled a woman out of all form, while you—

Cler. sen. A good hint: now my cause comes on. (Aside.)

Fain. Since, then, you allow us fitter for soft moments, why do we misemploy them? Let me kiss that beauteous hand, and clasp that graceful frame.

Mrs. C. How, Fainlove! What, you don't design to be impertinent? But my lips have a certain roughness on them to-day, haven't they?

Fain. (Kissing.) No; they are all softness; their delicious sweetness is inexpressible. Here language fails: let me applaud thy lips not by the utterance but by the touch of mine.

Enter CLERIMONT, Senior, drawing his sword.

Cler. sen. Ha! villain, ravisher, invader of my bed and honour! draw.

Mrs. C. What means this insolence, this intrusion into my privacy? What, do you come into my very closet without knocking? Who put this into your head?

Cler. sen. My injuries have alarmed me, and I'll bear no longer, but sacrifice your bravado, the author of them.

Mrs. C. Oh! poor Mr. Fainlove! Must he die for his complaisance and innocent freedoms with me? How could you, if you might? Oh! the sweet youth! What, fight Mr. Fainlove? What will the ladies say?

Fain. Let me come at the intruder on ladies' private hours: the unfashionable monster! I'll prevent all future interruption from him: let me come. (Drawing her sword.)

Mrs. C. Oh! the brave, pretty creature! Look at his youth and innocence. He is not made for such rough encounters. Stand behind me, poor Fainlove! There is not a visit in town, sir, where you shall not be displayed at full length for this intrusion. I banish you for ever from my sight and bed.

Cler. sen. I obey you; madam, for distance is becoming in no man but a husband! (Giving her the letter, which she reads, and falls into a swoon.) I've gone too far. (Kissing her.) The impertinent was guilty of nothing but what my indiscretion led her to. This is the first kiss I've had these six weeks; but she awakes. Well, Jenny, you topped your part, indeed! Come to my arms, thou ready, willing fair one; thou hast no vanities, no niceties;

but art thankful for every instance of love I bestow on thee. (Embracing her.)

Mrs. C. What, am I, then, abused? Is it a wench, then, of his? Oh, me! Was ever poor abused wife, poor innocent lady thus injured! (Runs and seizes Fainlove's sword.)

Cler. sen. Oh! the brave, pretty creature! Hurt Mr. Fainlove! Look at his youth, his innocence. Ha, ha! (Interposing.)

Fain. Have a care, have a care, dear sir. I know myself she'll have no mercy.

Mrs. C. I'll be the death of her: let me come on. Stand from between us, Mr. Clerimont, I would not hurt you.

Cler. sen. Run, run, Jenny. [Exit Fainlove. Looks at Mrs. C. upbraidingly.] Well, madam, are these the innocent freedoms you claimed of me? Have I deserved this? How has there been a moment of your's ever interrupted with the real pangs I suffer? The daily importunities of creditors, who become so by serving your profuse vanities: did I ever murmur at supplying any of your diversions, while I believed them (as you called them) harmless? Must, then, those eyes, that used to glad my heart with their familiar brightness, hang down with guilt? Guilt has transformed thy whole person; nay, the very memory of it. Fly from my growing passion.

Mrs. C. I cannot fly, nor bear it. Oh! look not.

Cler. sen. What can you say? Speak quickly. (Offering to draw.)

Mrs. C. I never saw you moved before. Don't murder me, impenitent; I'm wholly in your power as a criminal; but, remember, I have been so in a tender regard.

Cler. sen. But how have you considered that regard?

Mrs. C. Is it possible you can forgive what you ensnared me into? Oh! look at me kindly. You know I have only erred in my intention, nor saw my danger till, by this honest art, you had shewn me what 'tis to venture to the utmost limit of what is lawful. You laid that train, I'm sure, to alarm, not to betray, my innocence. Mr. Clerimont scorns such baseness; therefore, I kneel, I weep, I am convinced. (Kneels.)

Cler. sen. (Raising her up and embracing her.) Then kneel, and weep no more, my fairest, my reconciled! Be so in a moment; for know I cannot, without wringing my own heart, give you the least compunction. Be in humour: it shall be your own fault, if ever there be a serious word more on this subject.

Mrs. C. I must correct every idea that rises in my mind, and learn every gesture of my body anew. I detest the thing I was.

Cler. sen. No, no, you must not do so; our joy and grief, honour and reproach, are the same; you must slide out of your foppery by degrees, so that it may appear your own act.

Mrs. C. But this wench?

Cler. sen. She is already out of your way. You shall see the catastrophe of her fate yourself. But still keep up the fine lady till we go out of town. You may return to it with as decent airs as you please. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room.

Enter POUNCE, with papers.

Pounce. 'Tis a delight to gall these old rascals, and set them at variance about stakes, which I know neither of them will ever have possession of.

Enter TIPKIN and SIR HARRY GUBBIN.

Tip. Do you design, Sir Harry, that they shall have an estate in their own hands, and keep house themselves, poor things?

Sir H. No, no, sir, I know better; they shall go down into the country, and live with me; not touch a farthing of money; but having all things necessary provided, they shall go tame about the house, and breed.

Tip. Well, Sir Harry, then considering that all human things are subject to change, it behoves every man that has a just sense of mortality, to take care of his money.

Sir H. I don't know what you mean, brother. What do you drive at, brother?

Tip. This instrument is executed by you, your son, and my niece, which discharges me of all retrospects.

Sir H. It is confessed, brother; but what then?

Tip. All that remains is, that you pay me for the young lady's twelve years' board, as also all other charges, as wearing apparel, &c.

Sir H. What is this you say? Did I give you my discharge from all retrospects, as you call it, and after all do you come with this, and t'other, and all that? I find you are—I tell you, sir, to your face—I find you are—

Tip. I find, too, what you are, Sir Harry.

Sir H. What am I, sir? what am I?

Tip. Why, sir, you are angry.

Sir H. Sir, I scorn your words; I am not angry. Mr. Pounce is my witness, I am as gentle as a lamb. Would it not make any flesh alive angry to see a close hunk come after all with a demand of—

Tip. Mr. Pounce, pray, inform Sir Harry in this point.

Pounce. Indeed, Sir Harry, I must tell you plainly, that Mr. Tipkin, in this, demands nothing but what he may recover. For though this case may be considered multifariam; that is to say, as 'tis usually, commonly, vicatim, or vulgarly expressed. Yet, I say, when we only observe, that the power is settled as the law requires, assensu patris, by the consent of the father, that circumstance imports you are well acquainted with the advantage which accrue to your family by this alliance, which corroborates Mr. Tipkin's demand, and avoids all objections that can be made.

Sir H. Why, then, I find you are his adviser in all this.

Pounce. Lookye! Sir Harry, to shew you I love to promote among my clients a good understanding; though Mr. Tipkin may claim four thousand pounds, I'll engage for him, and I know him so well, that he shall take three thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight pounds, four shillings, and eight-pence farthing.

Tip. Indeed, Mr. Pounce, you are too hard upon me.

Pounce. You must consider a little, Sir Harry is your brother.

Sir H. Three thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight pounds, four shillings, and eight-pence farthing! for what, I say? for what, sir?

Pounce. For what, sir! for what she wanted, sir; a fine lady is always in want, sir; her very clothes would come to that money in half the time.

Sir H. Three thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight pounds, four shillings, and eight-pence farthing, for clothes! Pray, how many suits does she wear out in a year?

Pounce. Oh, dear! sir, a fine lady's clothes are not old by being worn, but by being seen.

Sir H. Well, I'll save her clothes for the future;

after I have got her into the country, I'll warrant her she shall not appear more in this wicked town, where clothes are worn out by sight. And as to what you demand, I tell you, sir, 'tis extortion.

Tip. Sir Harry, do you accuse me of extortion?

Sir H. Yes, I say extortion.

Tip. Mr. Pounce, write down that. There are very good laws provided against scandal and calumny; loss of reputation may tend to loss of money.

Pounce. (Writes.) Item, for having accused Mr. Tipkin of extortion—

Sir H. Nay, if you come to your items, lookye! Mr. Tipkin, this is an inventory of such goods as were left to my niece Bridget by her deceased father, and which I expect shall be forthcoming at her marriage to my son. (Reads.) Imprimis: A golden locket of her mother's, with something very ingenious in Latin on the inside of it. Item, A couple of muskets, with two shoulder belts and bandeliers. Item, A large silver caudle-cup, with a true story engraven on it.

Pounce. But, Sir Harry—

Sir H. (Reads.) Item, A base viol, with almost all the strings to it, and only a small hole on the back.

Pounce. But nevertheless, sir—

Sir H. This is the furniture of my brother's bed-chamber that follows: (reads) A suit of tapestry hangings, with the story of Judith and Holofernes, torn only where the head should have been off. An old bestead, curiously wrought about the posts, consisting of two load of timber. A hone, a basin, three razors, and a comb-case. Lookye! sir, you see I can item it.

Pounce. Alas! Sir Harry, if you had ten quire of items, 'tis all answered in the word retrospect.

Sir H. Why, then, Mr. Pounce and Mr. Tipkin, you are both rascals.

Tip. Do you call me rascal, Sir Harry?

Sir H. Yes, sir.

Tip. Write it down, Mr. Pounce, at the end of the leaf.

Sir H. If you have room, Mr. Pounce, put down villain, son of a w—, curmudgeon, hunks, and scoundrel.

Tip. Not so fast, Sir Harry; he cannot write so fast; you are at the next word, villain; son of a w—, I take it, was next. You may make the account as large as you please, Sir Harry.

Sir H. Come, come, I won't be used thus. Harkye! sirrah, draw! What do you do at this end of the town without a sword? Draw, I say.

Tip. Sir Harry, you are a military man, a colonel of the militia.

Sir H. I am so, sirrah, and will run such an extorting dog as you through the guts, to shew the militia is useful.

Pounce. Oh, dear! oh, dear! how am I concerned to see persons of your figure thus moved. The wedding is coming in. We'll settle these things afterwards.

Tip. I am calm.

Sir H. Tipkin, live these two hours; but expect—

Enter HUMPHREY GUBBIN, leading Niece; MRS. CLERIMONT led by FAINLOVE; CAPTAIN CLERIMONT; and CLERIMONT, Senior.

Pounce. Who are these? Heyday! who are these, Sir Harry?

Sir H. Some frolic; 'tis wedding-day. No matter.

Hump. Haw, haw! Father, master uncle, come, you must stir your stumps; you must dance. Come, old lads, kiss the ladies.

Mrs. C. Mr. Tipkin, Sir Harry, I beg pardon for an introduction so mal-à-propos; I know sudden familiarity is not the English way. Alas! Mr. Gubbin, this father and uncle of your's must be new modelled. How they stare both of them!

Sir H. Harkye! Numps, who is this you have brought hither? Is it not the famous fine lady, Mrs. Clerimont? What a plague, did you let her come near your wife?

Hump. Lookye! don't expose yourself, and play some mad country prank to disgrace me before her; I shall be laughed at, because she knows I understand better.

Mrs. C. I congratulate, madam, your coming out of the bondage of a virgin state: a woman can't do what she will properly till she's married.

Sir H. Did you hear what she said to your wife? (Apart.)

Enter Aunt, before a service of dishes.

Aunt. So, Mr. Bridegroom, pray take that napkin, and serve your spouse to-day, according to custom.

Hump. Mrs. Clerimont, pray, know my aunt.

Mrs. C. Madam, I must beg your pardon; I can't possibly like all that vast load of meat that you are sending in to table; besides, 'tis so offensively sweet, it wants that haut-goût we are so delighted with in France.

Aunt. You'll pardon it, since we did not expect you. Who is this? (Aside.)

Mrs. C. Oh! madam, I only speak for the future: little saucers are much more polite. Lookye! I'm perfectly for the French way: whenever I'm admitted, I take the whole upon me.

Sir H. The French, madam! I'd have you to know—

Mrs. C. You'll not like it at first, out of a natural English sullenness; but that will come upon you by degrees. When I first went into France, I was mortally afraid of a frog; but, in a little time, I could eat nothing else, except sallads.

Aunt. Eat frogs! Have I kissed one that has eaten frogs? Paw, paw!

Mrs. C. Oh! madam, a frog and a sallad are delicious fare.

Hump. Now, father, uncle, before we go any further, I think 'tis necessary we know who and who's together; then I give either of you two hours to guess which is my wife. And 'tis not my cousin; so far I'll tell you.

Sir H. How! what do you say? But, oh! you mean she is not your cousin now; she's nearer akin; that's well enough. Well said, Numps. Ha, ha, ha!

Hump. No; I don't mean so, I tell you; I don't mean so: my wife hides her face under her hat. (All looking at Fainlove.)

Tip. What does the puppy mean? His wife under a hat!

Hump. Ay, ay; that's she, that's she! A good jest, 'faith.

Sir H. Harkye! Numps, what dost mean, child? Is that a woman, and are you really married to her?

Hump. I am sure of both.

Sir H. Are you so, sirrah? Then, sirrah, this is your wedding-dinner, sirrah! Do you see, sirrah, here's roast meat? (Shakes his cane at Humphrey.)

Hump. Oh, oh! what, beat a married man? Hold him, Mr. Clerimont,—brother Pounce,—Mr. Wife,—Nobody stand by a young married man! (Runs behind Fainlove.)

Sir H. Did not the dog say, brother Pounce? What, is this Mrs. Ragout, this Madam Clerimont? Who the devil are you all? but, especially, who the devil are you, too?

[Beats Humphrey and Fainlove off; Sir Harry follows.]

Tip. (Aside.) Master Pounce, all my niece's fortune will be demanded now; for, I suppose, that red coat has her. Don't you think that you and I had better break?

Pounce. You may as soon as you please; but 'tis my interest to be honest a little longer.

Tip. Well, Biddy, since you would not accept of your cousin, I hope you haven't disposed of yourself elsewhere.

Niece. If you will for a little while suspend your curiosity, you shall have the whole history of my amour to this my nuptial day, under the title of the loves of Clerimont and Parthenissa.

Tip. Then, madam, your portion is in safe hands.

Capt. C. Come, come, old gentleman, 'tis in vain to contend; here's honest Mr. Pounce shall be my engineer, and I warrant you, we beat you out of all your holds.

Aunt. What, then, is Mr. Pounce a rogue? he must have some trick, brother; it cannot be; he must have cheated t'other side, for I'm sure he's honest. (Apart to Tipkin.)

Cler. sen. Mr. Pounce, all your sister has won of this lady, she has honestly put into my hands, and I'll return it her at this lady's particular request. (To Pounce.) Pounce. And the thousand pounds you promised in your brother's behalf, I'm willing should be her's also.

Re-enter FAINLOVE, SIR HARRY GUBBIN, and HUMPHREY GUBBIN.

Sir H. Well, since you say you are worth something, and the boy has set his heart upon you, I'll have patience till I see further.

Pounce. Come, come, Sir Harry, you shall find my alliance more considerable than you imagine; the Pounces are a family that will always have money, if there be any in the world.

*You've seen th' extremes of the domestic life,
A son too much confin'd, too free a wife;
By generous bonds you either should restrain,
And only on their inclinations gain;
Wives to obey must love, children revere,
While only slaves are govern'd by their fear.*

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter DON CARLOS and SANCHO.

Don C. I tell thee, I am not satisfied; I am in love enough to be suspicious of everybody.

San. And yet, methinks, sir, you should leave me out.

Don C. It may be so; I can't tell: but I'm not at ease. If they don't make a knave, at least, they make a fool of you.

San. I don't believe a word on't. But, good faith! master, your love makes somewhat of you; I don't know what 'tis; but, methinks, when you suspect me, you don't seem a man of half those parts I used to take you for. Look in my face; 'tis round and comely, not one hollow line of a villain in it; men of my fabric don't use to be suspected for knaves; and when you take us for fools, we never take you for wise men. For my part, in this present case, I take myself to be mighty deep. A stander-by, sir, sees more than a gamester. You are pleased to be jealous of your poor mistress without a cause; she uses you but too well, in my humble opinion; she sees you, and talks with you till, indeed, I am quite tired of it, sometimes: and your rival, that you are so scared about, forces a visit upon her about once a fortnight.

Don C. Alas! thou art ignorant in these affairs: women often appear warm to one, to hide a flame for another. Lorenzo, in short, appears too composed of late to be a rejected lover; and the indifference he shews upon the favours I seem to receive from her, poisons the pleasure I else should taste in them, and keeps me on a perpetual rack. No; I would fain see some of his jealous transports; have him fire at the sight of me; contradict me whenever I speak; affront me wherever he meets me; challenge me, fight me—

San. Run you through the body.

Don C. But he's too calm, his heart's too much at ease to leave mine at rest.

San. But, sir, you forget that there are two ways for our hearts to get at ease: when our mistresses come to be very fond of us, or we not care a fig for them. Now suppose, upon the rebukes you know he has had, it should chance to be the latter.

Don C. Again thy ignorance appears. Alas! a lover who has broken his chain will shun the tyrant that enslaved him: indifference never is his lot; he loves or hates for ever: and if his mistress prove another's prize, he cannot calmly see her in his arms.

San. For my part, master, I am not so great a philosopher as you may be, nor (thank my stars!) so bitter a lover; but what I see, that I generally believe; and when Jacinta tells me she loves me dearly, I have good thoughts enough of my person never to doubt the truth on't. See, here the baggage comes.

Enter JACINTA, with a letter.

Hist! Jacinta, my dear!

Jac. Who's that? Blunderbuss! Where's your master?

San. Hard by.

Jac. Oh! sir, I am glad I have found you at last.

I believe I have travelled five miles after you, and could neither find you at home, nor in the walks, nor at church, nor at the opera, nor—

San. Nor anywhere else, where he was not to be found; if you had looked for him where he was, 'twere ten to one but you had met with him.

Jac. I had, Jack-a-dandy!

Don C. But, pr'ythee, what's the matter? who sent you after me?

Jac. One, who is never well but when she sees you, I think; 'twas my lady.

Don C. Dear Jacinta, I fain would flatter myself, but am not able: the blessing's too great to be my lot; yet, 'tis not well to trifle with me: how short soever I am in other merit, the tenderness I have for Leonora claims something from her generosity: I should not be deluded.

Jac. And why do you think you are? Methinks, she's pretty well above board with you. What must be done more to satisfy you?

San. Why, Lorenzo must hang himself, and then we are content.

Jac. How! Lorenzo?

San. If less will do, he'll tell you.

Jac. Why, you are not mad, sir, are you? Jealous of him! Pray, which way may this have got into your head? I took you for a man of sense before. Is this your doings, log? (To Sancho.)

San. No, forsooth, pert! I am not much given to suspicion, as you can tell, Mrs. Forward; if I were, I might find more cause, I guess, than your mistress has given our master here. But I have so many pretty thoughts of my own person, housewife, more than I have of your's, that I stand in dread of no man.

Jac. Oh, oh! you men are mighty simple in love matters, sir! when you suspect a woman's falling off, you fall a plaguing, to bring her on again; attack her with reason, and a sour face! Egad! sir, attack her with a fiddle; double your good humour; give her a ball; let her cheat you at cards a little, and I'll warrant all's right again. But to come upon a poor woman with the gloomy face of jealousy, before she gives the least occasion for it, is to set a complaisant rival in too favourable a light.

Don C. Say no more: I have been to blame, but there shall be no more of it.

Jac. I should punish you justly, however, for what's past, if I carried back what I have brought to you: but I'm good-natured, so here 'tis; open it, and see how wrong you timed your jealousy.

Don C. (Reads.) "If you love me with that tenderness you have made me long believe you do, this letter will be welcome: 'tis to tell you, you have leave to plead a daughter's weakness to a father's indulgence; and if you prevail with him to lay his commands upon me, you shall be as happy as my obedience to them can make you."—LEONORA." Then I shall be what man never was yet. (Kissing the letter.) Ten thousand blessings on thee for thy news; I could adore thee as a deity. (Embracing Jacinta.)

Jac. True flesh and blood, for all that.

Don C. (Reads again.) "And if you prevail with him to lay his commands upon me, you shall be as happy as my obedience can make you." Oh! happy, happy Carlos! But what shall I say to you for this welcome message? Alas! I want words; but let this speak for me, and this, and this, and—(Giving her his ring, watch, and purse.)

San. Hold, sir! pray, leave a little something for our board-wages. You can't carry them all, I believe. (To Jacinta.) Shall I ease you of this? (Offering to take the purse.)

Jac. No; but you may carry that, sirrah. (Giving him a box of the ear.)

San. The jade's grown purse-proud already.

Don C. Well, dear Jacinta, say something to your charming mistress that I am not able to say myself; but, above all, excuse my late unpardonable folly, and offer her my life to expiate my crime.

Jac. The best plea for pardon will be never to repeat the fault.

Don C. If that will do, 'tis sealed for ever.

Jac. Enough: but I must begone; success attend you with the old gentleman! Good b'ye, sir! [Exit.]

Don C. Eternal blessings follow thee!

San. I think she has taken them all with her; the jade has got her apron full. [Way?]

Don C. Is not that Lorenzo's man coming this

San. Yes, 'tis he; his man and confidant, Lopez. Shall I draw him on a Scotch pair of boots, master, and make him tell all?

Don C. Some questions I must ask him. Call him hither.

San. Hem! Lopez! hem!

Enter LOPEZ.

Lop. Who calls?

San. I and my master.

Lop. I can't stay. (Going.)

San. You can, indeed, sir. (Lays hold of him, and places him between Don C. and himself.)

Don C. Whither in such haste, honest Lopez? What, upon some love errand?

Lop. Sir, your servant; I ask your pardon, but I was going—

Don C. I guess where; but you need not be so shy of me any more; thy master and I are no longer rivals. I have yielded up the cause; the lady will have it so, so I submit.

Lop. Is it possible, sir? Shall I live, then, to see my master and you friends again?

San. Yes, and what's better, thou and I shall be friends, too. There will be no more fear of Christian bloodshed; I give thee up Jacinta; she's a slippery housewife: so master and I are going to match ourselves elsewhere.

Lop. But is it possible, sir, your honour should be in earnest? I am afraid you are pleased to be merry with your poor humble servant.

Don C. I'm not at present much disposed to mirth; but my reason has so far mastered my passion, to shew me 'tis in vain to pursue a woman whose heart is already another's. I have roused my resolution to my aid, and broken my chains for ever.

Lop. Well, sir, to be plain with you, this is the most joyful news I have heard a long time; for I always knew you to be a mighty honest gentleman; and, good faith! it often went to the heart of me to see you so abused. "Dear, dear," have I often said to myself, when they have had a private meeting just after you was gone—

Don C. Ha!

San. Hold, master, don't kill him yet. (Apart to Don C.)

Lop. I say, I have said to myself, "What wicked things are women! and what a pity it is they are suffered in a Christian country! what a shame they should be allowed to play Will-o'-the-wisp with men of honour, and lead them through thorns, and briars, and rocks, and rugged ways, till their hearts are torn in pieces, like an old coat in a fox-chase!" I say, I have said to myself—

Don C. Thou hast said enough to thyself, but say a little more to me. Where were these secret meetings thou talkest of?

Lop. In sundry places, and by divers ways: sometimes in the cellar, sometimes in the garret, sometimes in the court, sometimes in the gutter; but the place where the kiss of kisses was given

Don C. In hell!

[was—]

Lop. Sir?

Don C. Speak, fury! what dost thou mean by the kiss of kisses?

Lop. The kiss of peace, sir; the kiss of union; the kiss of consummation.

Don C. Thou liest, villain!

Lop. I don't know but I may, sir.

Don C. There is not one word of truth in all thy cursed tongue bath uttered.

Lop. No, sir, I—I believe there is not.

Don C. Why, then, didst thou say it?

Lop. Oh! only in jest, sir.

Don C. I am not in a jesting condition.

Lop. Nor I, at present, sir.

Don C. Speak, then, the truth, as thou wouldst do it at the hour of death.

Lop. Yes, at the gallows; and be turned off as soon as I've done.

Don C. What's that you murmur?

Lop. Nothing but a short prayer.

Don C. I am distracted, and fright the wretch from telling me what I am upon the rack to know. (Aside.) Forgive me, Lopez; I am to blame to speak thus harshly to you; let this obtain my pardon. (Giving him money.) Thou seest I am disturbed.

Lop. Yes, sir, I see I have been led into a snare; I have said too much.

Don C. And yet, thou must say more; nothing can lessen my torment but a farther knowledge of what causes my misery. Speak, then; have I anything to hope?

Lop. Nothing; but that you may be a happier bachelor than my master may, probably, be a married man.

Don C. Married, say'st thou?

Lop. I did, sir; and I believe he'll say so, too, in a twelvemonth.

Don C. Oh, torment!—But give me more of it. How—when—to whom—where? [pantry.]

Lop. Yesterday, to Leonora, by the parson, in the Don C. Look to't if this be false; thy life shall pay the torment thou hast given me. Well, sir, what have you to say for yourself now?

Lop. Why, sir, I have only to say that I am a very unfortunate, middle-aged man; and that I believe all the stars upon heaven and earth have been concerned in my destiny. Children now unborn will hereafter sing my downfall in mournful lines, and notes of doleful tune; I am, at present, troubled in mind; despair all around me, signified in appearing gibbets, with a great bundle of dog-whips by way of preparation.

*I, therefore, will go seek some mountain high,
If high enough some mountain may be found,
With distant valley, dreadfully profound,
And from the horrid cliff—look calmly round.*

[Exit.]

San. Base news, master.

Don C. Now my insulting rival's smile speaks out. Oh! cursed, cursed woman!

Enter JACINTA.

Jac. I am come in haste to tell you, sir, that as soon as the moon's up, my lady will give you a meeting in the close-walk by the back-door of the garden; she thinks she has something to propose to you will certainly get her father's consent to marry you.

Don C. Past sufferance! this aggravation is not to be borne! Go, thank her with my curses; fly, and let them blast her while their venom's strong.

[Exit.]

Jac. Won't you explain? What's this for?

San. And dar'st thou ask me questions, smooth-faced iniquity, crocodile of the Nile, siren of the rocks? Go, carry back the too-gentle answer thou hast received; only let me add with the poet:

*We are no fools, trollop, my master nor me;
And thy mistress may go to the devil with thee.*

[Exit.]

Jac. Am I awake? I fancy not: a very idle dream this. Well, I'll go and talk in my sleep to my lady about it; and when I awake, we'll try what interpretation we can make on't.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.

Enter LEONORA and JACINTA.

Jac. Madam, you are too violent.

Leo. A slighted woman knows no bounds. Vengeance is all the cordial she can have, so snatches at the nearest. Ungrateful wretch! to use me with such insolence!

Jac. You see I am as much enraged at it as you are yourself, yet my brain is roving after the cause, for something there must be. Never was letter received by man with more passion and transport; I was almost as charming a goddess as yourself, only for bringing it. Yet, when in a moment after, I came with a message worth a dozen of it, never was witch so handled: something must have passed between one and t'other, that's sure.

Leo. Nothing could pass worth my inquiring after, since nothing could happen that can excuse his usage of me; he had a letter under my hand, which owned him master of my heart, and till I contradicted it with my mouth, he ought not to doubt the truth of it.

Jac. Nay, I confess, madam, I haven't a word to say for him. I am afraid he's but a rogue at bottom, as well as my shameless that attends him: we are bit, by my troth! and, haply, well enough served, for listening to the glib tongues of the rascals; but be comforted, madam, they'll fall into the hands of some foul sluts or other, before they die, that will set our account even with them.

Leo. Well; let him laugh, let him glory in what he has done, he shall see I have a spirit can use him as I ought.

Jac. And let one thing be your comfort by the way, madam, that in spite of all your dear affection for him, you have had the grace to keep him at arm's end, for there are times when the stoutest of us are in danger, the rascals wheedle so.

Leo. In short, my very soul is fired at this treatment; and if ever that perfidious monster should relent, though he should crawl like a poor worm beneath my feet, nay, plunge a dagger in his heart, to bleed for pardon, I charge thee strictly, charge thee on thy life, thou do not urge a look to melt me toward him, but strongly buoy me up in brave resentment; and if thou seest (which heaven avert!) a glance of weakness in me, call to my memory the vile wrongs I have borne, and rouse me to revenge them.

[Exit.]

Jac. Madam, never doubt me: I am charged to the mouth with fury; and if ever I meet that false rogue, that tatterdemalion of mine, such a volley will I pour about his ears—Now heaven prevent all hasty vows; but when next I see him, let him swear or pray; let him bounce or swell; may I be carried a virgin to my grave if I don't try all I can—to make it up with him.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.

Enter DON CARLOS and SANCHE.

Don C. Repulsed again! This is not to be borne. What, though this villain's story be a falsehood, was I to blame to hearken to it? This usage cannot be supported. How was it she treated you?

San. Never was ambassador worse received. "Madam, my master begs ten thousand pardons, and humbly begs one moment's interview." "Begone, you rascal, you!" "Madam, what answer shall I give my master?" "Tell him he's a villain!" "Indeed, fair lady, I think this is hasty treatment." "Here, my footman, toss me this fellow out at the window!" and away she went to her devotions.

Don C. Did you see Jacinta?

San. Yes; she saluted me with half-a-score rogues and rascals, too. I think our destinies are much alike, sir; and, on my conscience, a couple of scurvy jades we are hampered with.

Don C. Ungrateful woman! to receive with such contempt so quick a return of heart so justly alarmed! As just as my suspicions were, have I long suffered them to arraign her?

San. No. [to clear her?]

Don C. Have I waited for oaths or imprecations

San. No.

Don C. Nay, even now, is not the whole world still in suspense about her, whilst I alone conclude her innocent?

San. 'Tis very true.

Don C. She might, methinks, through this profound respect, observe a flame another would have cherished: she might support me against groundless fears, and save me from a rival's tyranny; she might release me from these cruel racks; and would, no doubt, if she could love as I do.

San. Ha, ha, ha!

Don C. But since she don't, what do I do whining here? Curse on the base humilities of love!

San. Right.

Don C. Let children kiss the rod that flays them; let dogs lie down and lick the shoe that spurns them.

San. Ay.

Don C. I am a man, by nature meant for power; the sceptre's given us to wield, and we betray our trust whenever we meanly lay it at a woman's feet.

San. True, we are men, boo! Come, master, let us both be in a passion; here's my sceptre. (Shewing a cudgel.) Subject Jacinta, look about you. Sir, were you ever in Muscovy? the women there love the men dearly: why? because (shaking his stick) there's your love-powder for you. Ah! sir, were we but wise and stout, what work should we make with them! But this humble love-making spoils them all. A rare way, indeed, to bring matters about with them! we are persuading them all day they are angels and goddesses, in order to use them at night like human creatures. We are likely to succeed, truly!

Don C. For my part, I never yet could bear a slight from anything, nor will I now. There's but one way, however, to resent it from a woman, and that is to drive her bravely from your heart, and place a worthier in her vacant throne. [Exit.]

San. Now, with submission to my betters, I have another way, sir; I'll drive my tyrant from my heart, and place myself on her throne. Yes; I will be lord of my own tenement, and keep my household in order: for I have been servitor in a college at Salamanca, and read philosophy with the doctors; where I found that a woman, in all times, has been observed to be an animal hard to understand, and much inclined to mischief. Now as an animal is always an animal, and a captain always a captain, so a woman is always a woman; whence it is that a certain Greek says, her head is like a bank of sand; or, as another, a solid rock; or, according to a third, a dark lanthorn: and so, as the head is the head of the body; and that the body without a head, is like a head without a tail; and that where there is neither head nor tail, 'tis a very strange body; so, I say, a woman is, by comparison, do you see? (for nothing explains things like comparisons,) I say, by comparison, as Aristotle has often said before me, one may compare her to the raging sea; for, as the sea, when the wind rises, knits it brows like an angry bull, and that waves mount upon rocks, and rocks mount upon waves; that porpoises leap like trouts, and whales skip about like gudgeons; that ships roll like beer-barrels, and mariners pray like saints; just so, I say, a woman—a woman, I say, just so, when her reason is shipwrecked upon her passion, and the hulk of her understanding lies thumping against the rock of her fury; then it is, I say, that by certain immotions, which—um—cause, as one may suppose, a sort of convulsive—yes—hurricanious—um—like—in short, a woman is the devil. [Exit.]

Enter LEONORA and JACINTA.

Jac. Oh! my dear madam, how I rejoice to find you support this noble spirit of resentment!

Leo. Be assured, Jacinta, it can end but with life. What! after all my tender frankness, nothing could have happened to excuse his usage of me; he had a letter under my hand, which owned him master of my heart, and till I should contradict it with my mouth, he ought not to doubt the truth of it.

Jac. Oh! madam, I haven't a word to say for him, and my sweet swain is just as bad. As I live, madam, yonder they come! But if Don Carlos should beg your pardon, you'll never grant it?

Leo. If I do—

Jac. That's brave! (They retire.)

Enter DON CARLOS and SANCHO.

San. Yonder they are, sir, lying in wait; but let us shew ourselves men, and leave their briny tears to wash their dirty faces.

Don C. You look, madam, upon me, as if you thought I came to trouble you with my usual importunities: I'll ease you of that pain, by telling you my business now is calmly to assure you, but I assure it you with heaven and hell for seconds—for may the joys of one fly from me, if all your charms displayed e'er shake my resolution—I'll never see you more.

San. Bon!

Leo. You are a man of that nice honour, sir, I know you'll keep your word; I expected this assurance from you, and came this way only to thank you for it.

Jac. Very well!

Don C. You did, imperious dame, you did? how base is woman's pride! how wretched are the ingredients it is formed of! If you saw cause for just disdain, why did you not at first repulse me? why lead a slave in chains, that could not grace your triumphs? If I am thus to be condemned, think on the favours you have done the wretch, and hide your face for ever.

San. Well argued!

Leo. I own you have hit the only fault the world can charge me with: the favours I have done to you I am, indeed, ashamed of; but since women have their frailties, you'll allow me mine.

Don C. 'Tis well; extremely well, madam; I'm happy, however, you at last speak frankly: I thank you for it, from my soul I thank you; but don't expect me groveling at your feet again, don't; for if I do—

Leo. You will be treated as you deserve—trod upon.

Don C. Give me patience—but I don't want it; I am calm. Madam, farewell; be happy if you can; by heavens, I wish you so; but never spread your net for me again; for if you do—

Leo. You'll be running into it.

Don C. Rather run headlong into fire and flames; rather be torn with pincers, bit from bit; rather be broiled, like martyrs, upon gridirons—but I am wrong; this sounds like passion, and heaven can tell I am not angry. Madam, I think we have no farther business together; your most humble servant.

Leo. Farewell t'ye, sir.

Don C. (To Sancho.) Come along. (Going, returns.) Yet once more before I go, lest you should doubt my resolution, may I starve, perish, rot, be dead, d—d, or any other thing that men or gods can think on, if on any occasion whatever, civil or military, pleasure or business, love or hate, or any other accident of life, I from this moment change one word or look with you. [Exit.]

Leo. Content: come away, Jacinta.

Re-enter DON CARLOS.

Don C. Yet one word, madam, if you please; I have a foolish bauble I once was fond of. (Taking her picture from his breast.) Will you accept a trifle from your servant?

Leo. Willingly, sir; I have a bauble, too, I think, you may have some claim to; you'll wear it for my sake. (Breaks a bracelet from her arm, and gives it to him.)

Don C. Most thankfully: this, too, I should restore you, it was once your's. (Giving her a table-book.) By your favour, madam, there is a line or two in it I think you once did me the honour to write with your own fair hand. Here it is. (Reads.)

"You love me, Carlos, and would know

The secret movements of my heart;

Whether I give you mine or no,

With your's, methinks, I'd never, never part."

Thus you have encouraged me, and thus you have deceived me.

San. Very true.

Leo. I have some faithful lines, too; I think I can produce them. (Pulls out a table-book, and reads.)

"How long soe'er to sigh in vain,

My destiny may prove,

My fate, in spite of your disdain,

Will let me glory in your chain,

Eternally to love."

There, sir, take your poetry again. (Throwing it at his feet.) 'Tis not much worse for my wearing; 'twill serve again upon a fresh occasion.

Jac. Well done!

Don C. I believe I can return the present, madam, with a pocket-full of your prose: there. (Throwing a handful of letters at her feet.)

Leo. Jacinta, give me his letters. There, sir, not to be behind-hand with you. (Takes a handful of his letters out of a box, and throws them in his face.)

Jac. And there, and there, sir. (Throwing the rest of the letters at him.)

San. Ods my life! we want ammunition; but for a shift—there, and there, you saucy slut, you! (Pulls a dirty pack of cards out of his pocket, and throws them at Jacinta; they then close, he pulls off her head-clothes, and she his wig, and then part; she running to her mistress, he to his master.) How the armies stand and gaze at one another after the battle! What think you, sir, of shewing yourself a great general, by making an honourable retreat?

Don C. I scorn it. Oh! Leonora, Leonora! a heart like mine should not be treated thus.

Leo. Carlos, Carlos! I have not deserved this usage.

Don C. Barbarous Leonora! but 'tis useless to reproach you; she that is capable of what you have done, is formed too cruel ever to repent of it. Go then, tyrant, make your bliss complete; torment me still, for still, alas! I love enough to be tormented.

Leo. Ah! Carlos, little do you know the tender movement of that thing you name: the heart where love presides admits no thought against the honour of its ruler.

Don C. 'Tis not to call that honour into doubt, if, conscious of our own unworthiness, we interpret every frown to our destruction.

Leo. When jealousy proceeds from such humble apprehensions, it shews itself with more respect than your's has done.

Don C. And where a heart is guiltless, it easily forgives a greater crime.

Leo. Forgiveness is not now in our debate: if both have been in fault, 'tis fit that both should suffer for it: our separation will do justice on us.

Don C. But since we are ourselves the judges of our actions, what if we inflict a gentler punishment?

Leo. 'Twould but encourage us to sin again.

Don C. And if it should—

Leo. 'Twould give a fresh occasion for the leasing exercise of mercy.

Don C. Right; and so we act the part of earth and heaven together, of men and gods, and taste of both their pleasures.

Leo. The banquet's too inviting to refuse it.

Don C. Then, thus let us fall upon it, thus let us fall upon it for ever!

[Carries off Leonora, embracing her.]

Jac. Ah! woman; foolish, foolish woman!

San. Very foolish, indeed.

Jac. But don't expect I'll follow her example.

San. You would, Mopsy, if I'd let you.

Jac. I'd sooner tear my eyes out! Ah! that she had a little of my spirit in her!

San. I believe I shall find thou hast a great deal of her flesh, my charmer; but 'twon't do; I am all rock, very marble.

Jac. A very pumice-stone, you rascal, you! if one would try you; but to prevent any humilieties, and shew you all submission would be vain; to convince you that you have nothing but misery and despair before you, here, take back thy paltry thimble, and be in my debt for the shirts I made you with it.

San. Nay, if you are at that sport, mistress, I believe I shall lose nothing by the balance of thy presents: there, take thy tobacco-stopper, and—

Jac. Here, take thy satin pincushion, with thy curious half-hundred of pins in it, that you made such a vapouring about yesterday; tell them carefully, there's not one wanting.

San. There's thy ivory-hafted knife again; whet it well; 'tis so blunt 'twill cut nothing but love.

Jac. And there's thy pretty pocket scissors thou hast honoured me with, they'll cut off a leg or an arm, heaven bless 'em!

San. Here's the enchanted handkerchief you were pleased to endear with your precious blood, when the violence of your love, at dinner, t'other day, made you cut your fingers. There. (Blows his nose in it, and gives it to her.)

Jac. The rascal so provokes me, I won't even keep his paltry garters from him. Do you see these? you pitiful, beggarly scoundrel, you! There, take 'em; there. (Takes her garters off, and flaps them about his face.)

San. I have but one thing more of thine: (shewing his cudgel) I own 'tis the top of all thy presents, and might be useful to me; but that you may have nothing to upbraid me with, e'en take it again, with the rest of them. (Lifts it up to strike her, she leaps about his neck.)

Jac. Ah! cruel Sancho! now beat me, Sancho, do!

San. Rather, like Indian beggars, beat my precious self. (Throws away his stick, and embraces her.)

Rather let infants' blood about the street,

Rather let all the wine about the cellar,

Rather let—Oh! Jacinta, thou hast o'ercome.

How foolish are the great resolves of man!

Resolves, which we neither would keep, nor can;

When those bright eyes in kindness please to shine,

Their goodness I must needs return with mine:

Bless my Jacinta in her Sancho's arms!

Jac. And I my Sancho with Jacinta's charms.

Re-enter DON CARLOS and LEONORA.

Don C. Well, I see you have followed our example, Sancho.

San. Yes, sir; like master, like man.

Don C. From this good day, then, let all discord cease:

Let those to come be harmony and peace.

Henceforth let all our diff'rent interests join,

Let fathers, lovers, friends, let all combine,

To make each other's days as blest as she will mine.

[Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The great Square. At the right corner, in front, Gripe's house; some paces backward, a large quadrangular pyramid; at the left corner, in front, stands Hunks's house; in its side, facing the audience, are two windows, the lower defended by iron bars from top to bottom. To the left, in front, near Hunks's house, is a draw-well, surrounded by a low breast-wall, whereon are fixed two strong posts, with a cross-bar at top to support a large pulley.

LIVELY appears at Hunks's upper window.

Live. (Hems and coughs repeatedly, as signals to Harriot.) Hem, hem! She does not hear me, sure: I'll sing, then.

AIR.—LIVELY.

*At eve, sweet Philomel's fond lay,
His Philomela cheers:
So love, whom spies o'erawe by day,
Casts off, at night, his fears. (Listens.)*
Hush! No; all quiet; her window still shut. Ah! her uncle's within. (Listens.) Eh! no; try again. Hem, hem! (Sings louder.)

*At eve, sweet Philomel's fond lay,
His Philomela cheers.*

(HARRIOT attended by JENNY, shews herself at Gripe's window; she opens it, and in a low voice answers, singing to the latter strain of the same air.)

*Har. Love, though disguis'd by fears all day,
By night unmask'd appears.*

Live. My Harriot! your uncle's gone, then?

Har. Gone—and your's?

Live. Gone, too. Shall we down into the square?

Jenny. Hist, hist! some one's coming. I protest, Mr. Lively, your uncle Hunks. Retire, retire, and let him pass. (Lively retires, shutting his window. Harriot and Jenny keep their's half shut, watching Hunks's motions.)

Enter HUNKS slowly from the left side, stops now and then, peeping round.

Hunks. A murrain seize the inventor of these tell-tale lamps! the very bane of all clandestine enterprize! Why, here, 'tis as light as day, now. I'fecks! we might as well have no night at all. Then those d—d janizaries, everlastingly patrolling and prying. Vexation upon vexation! However, 'tis, luckily, rather latish, and this a solitary quarter. Who knows? I may chance to execute my scheme still. (Sees Gripe at a distance.) Pah! what interloper now? (Steps aside to observe.)

Jenny. (At the window, seeing Gripe.) So! here comes t'other skinflint, Gripe himself. Away, miss, away.

Enter GRIPE.

Gripe. (Drawing forth a large bunch of keys.) Such a gull! Ha, ha, ha! Bled so freely! but, no tick; no, no, the rooks would not tick. Pise on it! he has had a devilish tumble! Well, well; speed the plough; his loss, my gain. Twenty per cent. premium, and two per cent. by the hour: no bad tontine.

AIR.—GRIPE.

*Let the novice depend on his luck,
On the science the gambler profess'd;
What pigeon soever they pluck,
With his plumes I shall feather my nest.
They fling, they ding,
They swear, they tear,
While smug I look on and sit still:
For well I trow,
Blow high, blow low,
Each puff will bring grist to my mill.*

*A bird in the bush, we are told,
Is pretty enough to the view;
But I think, when I look on my gold,
That one in the hand is worth two.
For birds will fly,
But what care I,
While thus I can hold 'em at will?
Blow high, blow low,
They never shall go;
But come and bring grist to my mill.*

[Unlocks his door in a hurry, goes in, and shuts it.

Hunks. (Coming forward.) Gossip Gripe! Well, he's housed. And now to reconnoitre my scene of action. (Surveying the pyramid accurately.) Here, then, it is, underneath this pyramid, that they have deposited the carcass of his mustiship; and along with it, all his gold, his plate, his diamonds, his—Oh! Hunks, Hunks! what a treasure were here now! Acapulco!

AIR.—HUNKS.

*My dear treasure always nigh me,
Night and day my strong box by me;
Still to spy it,
Try it,
Eye it,
Feel
And kneel,
And deify it.*

*Oh! what transport to behold!
What delight to chink my gold!
Mahomet's a scurvy prophet,
His fool's paradise, I scoff it.
Think to gull folks with his houries!
Beggar wenches without dowries!
Had he feign'd his heav'n of pelf,
I'd ha' been a Turk myself.*

Live. (Opens the window softly.) Pest seize him! will he never be gone? [Aside. Shuts the window.

Hunks. (Again surveying the pyramid.) No child's play to make a breach here; must get help, i'fecks! Gripe! yes, the very man; but he—he'll be for going snacks; well, better give half than lose all. Ay, ay; and here he comes, just in the nick.

Re-enter GRIPE, from his house.

Gripe. (To himself, while locking the door.) Safe bind, safe find; forage abroad, but guard at home. Pise on't! how I loiter! (Pockets the keys: as he is hobbling away, Hunks calls after him.)

Hunks. Gripe! Gossip Gripe!

Gripe. (Just looking back with a nod.) Good night. Can't stay.

Hunks. A moment. Lord, man! what's your hurry?

Gripe. (Coming back.) Hurry! Why, Squander, the young merchant, fallen in at hazard yonder with some knowing ones, is fleeced, done up to the last shilling, so I'm fetching him a supply: two hundred pieces.

Hunks. And at what interest?

Gripe. Pise on it! a mere nothing: two per cent.

Hunks. Are you turned fool? Two per cent!

Gripe. Ay, by the hour.

Hunks. Oh! cry you mercy! But, gossip, (with a mysterious air) I—observe that pyramid: yesterday, in a vault beneath that pyramid, was interred the late musti—

Gripe. Well, peace be with him!

Hunks. Ye-s, and his rhino with us! for you must know, that here in Smyrna, when a musti dies, they bury all his riches with him; they do, i'fecks!

Gripe. Indeed! in that case, 'twould scarce vex a man to die.

Hunks. It does mitigate, to be sure.

Gripe. (After a pause.) All his riches buried with him! (Eyeing the pyramid, then eagerly to Hunks.) Pise on it! gossip, here were a venture now! eh!

Hunks. And yet, I have my scruples. Is it not a sin, think you, to disturb the ashes of the dead? But, then, the price is so great.

Gripe. We're to go halves.

Hunks. A sacrilege, eh!

Gripe. Not if we go halves.

RECITATIVE.

Gripe. Indeed, had he a Christian been,

Hunks. Oh! ay, had he a Christian been,

Gripe. Nice casuists might, perhaps—

Hunks. Might what?

Gripe. Pronounce it sin.

DUETT.—GRIPE and HUNKS.

Gripe. But a vile Turk, and a musti, too.

Hunks. Yes, Turk, and musti, too.

A foe to wine, 'tis true, 'tis true.

Gripe. A foe to wine, 'tis true, 'tis true.

Let's take—

Hunks. Let's seize on all he left.

'Tis lawful spoil,

Gripe. Not sinful theft.

Hunks. 'Tis lawful spoil, not sinful theft.

(They shake hands, and are going off, when Lively appears at his window.)

Live. Rot 'em! will they sleep here? Ah! he saw me. (Shuts the window.)

Gripe. (Turning hastily.) Ha! somebody at that window, methought.

Hunks. My hopeful nephew, 'tis like. A scape-grace! but, i'fecks! I shall soon rid my hands of him; I'll shut him up in a mad-house.

Gripe. An excellent scheme! Ay, ay; clean straw and a dark cell. The scoundrel flirts with my niece, too; but, by your leave, I forbid the bans there. They'd instantly call us to account for their fortunes.

Hunks. They would; and be ever gaping, gaping at ours. Come, come along with me, to get the implements for our enterprize.

Gripe. Can't you as well step for them yourself? One business must not obstruct another; I'll but carry my spark this cash, just hard by, and be back presently. (As the two Misers are going off, Harriot appears at her window attended by Jenny; they make signs of great joy, then retire as descending into the square. In the meantime Lively unscrews a bar of his window, leaps down, and runs to meet Harriot. Jenny withdraws to watch.)

DUETT.—HARRIOT and LIVELY.

Har. They're gone, and our flames we may freely reveal.

Live. What transport, in this precious moment I feel! My Harriot!

Har. My Lively!

Live. My Harriot!

Har. My Lively!

Live. *In vain they our hearts would dissever;
I love, and will love you for ever.*

Har. In vain they our hearts would dissever.

Live. For Harriot I live, and for Harriot would die.

Har. *Ah! Lively, I swear, and this heart cannot lie,
I will ne'er be but your's.*

Live. *What! never?
Nor ever will I be but your's.*

Har. What! never?

Live. No, never will I be but your's.

Har. *Though Gripe locks his doors,
(Points at the door open.)*

Live. *Though his window Hunks grates,
(Points to the unscrewed bar.)*

Har. Love loves to make fools of such wary grey pates.

Live. *Love loves to o'erreach such designing bald
pates.
Deign love, then, to guide us—*

Har. *For ever;
Nor suffer these grubs to divide us.*

Live. Oh! never.

Har. Deign love, then, to guide us, for ever.

Live. They shall not divide us: no, never.

Jenny. (Rejoins them.) Well, my dears, since upright love is your motive, and downright matrimony your end, I think I must even beat about to bring you together.

Live. But when, dear Jenny, when?

Jenny. Sooner, perhaps, than you imagine. Miss has an aunt in Dublin, Lady Mildmay; her heart and house are open to you.

Live. Why aren't we gone, then? What stops us?

Jenny. Stops! What stops many an hopeful project?—lack of cash. (Looks archly at him.) Are you flush, sir? (He shakes his head sorrowfully.) So I thought; and, therefore, hold it bad policy to leave all miss's fortune, all her mamma's effects, in Gripe's clutches. Cheer up, however; a lucky crisis may come, and trust me for not letting it slip.

Live. Infernal muck-worms! 'Sdeath! I grow wild with resentment; but you, my love, you seem quite unconcerned.

Har. Pardon me, dear Lively, I feel the utmost contempt of their depravity, mixed with a kind of pity for my uncle's foible; but (takes his hand and looks fondly at him) the truth is, that—

AIR.—HARRIOT.

*At thy presence, vengeful passion,
Envy, hate, and indignation,
From this tranquil bosom fly:
Wealth, by gold, let miscreants measure;
Be but Lively's heart my treasure,
Gripe will be less rich than I.*

Jenny. In, in; get ye in; here's Gripe a-coming.

Har. My uncle! Oh, lud! I shall die in a fright.

[Runs into the house with Jenny, who locks the door.

Live. Plague welcome him!

[Leaps in at his window, and replaces the bar.

Re-enter GRIPE, walking leisurely, with a parchment bond in his hand,

Gripe. Here's the bond, stamped and all. Servant, kind Mr. Squander! Will you any more rouleaus at the same discount? He, he, he! I ha' trotted it up: two hundred pistoles, at two per cent. by the hour, will amount, in six months, (with interest upon interest,) to about twenty thousand pounds sterling. Good, good! Pise on it! I'll have an execution in petto; then smash go his magazines, his town house, his villa; all mine, all mine. Come, come; upon the whole, no dear purchase. (Pulls out a bunch of keys, and unlocks his door, leaving the key in the lock.) Jenny, Jenny! I say.

Jenny. (Above at the window.) Sir?

Gripe. Fetch hither my supper, hussy!

Jenny. Your everyday supper, sir?

Gripe. Yes; and the bottle of Cyprus wine. [Exit Jenny. Gripe takes a turn in the square towards Hunks's house.] I have made too good a day's work of it to grudge myself wine at night.

Live. (Softly opening the window.) What is he muttering there? (Aside.)

Gripe. A lucky day has this been both to Hunks and me; and, to-morrow, he'll finish this glorious work by getting that nephew of his shut up for life.

Live. How, how! The infamous wretch! Shut up for life, indeed! I shall give him the slip though.

(Aside, and withdraws, shutting the window.

Gripe, retreating towards his own door, is met by JENNY, carrying a morsel of bread, a phial-bottle half full of wine, and a small glass, on a pewter-plate.)

Jenny. Here, sir.

Gripe. What's Harriot doing? (Eating, and holding the glass to be filled.)

Jenny. Waiting for you. We have not supped.

Gripe. Well, you may (sips) go to bed. Mufti! (To himself.)

Jenny. Best go in doors, sir.

Gripe. (Walks to and fro, munching and sipping.) No. Warm rogues, you mufties! (Aside.) I sha'n't come home to-night, mayhap. (Holds out the glass to be filled.) A plum, at least. (Aside.)

Jenny. (Staring at him, and not filling.) Why, sir, 'tis wine; wine, sir.

Gripe. Eh! Pise on't! I wasn't minding. Here, lock up; (gives her the glass, and remnant of bread) this for to-morrow. Oh! a mint! a mine! the Indies! I fly, I fly. [Hurries away, leaving his keys.

Jenny. (Looks after him.) Quite frantic, I declare; (going in) and has forgot—nay, as I'm alive, he has—(Runs in with the things, then seizes the keys, and calls aloud.) Mr. Lively! Miss Harriot! (They look out.) Come down, come down. (They disappear. Jenny turns over the keys.) Ay, this is the key of his den; this of the iron-door to his closet; and this—

Re-enter HARRIOT and LIVELY.

See here, my lambkins! the crisis is come; Gripe has forgotten his keys. See; he said he should not be at home to-night. But there's no trusting to that: so, while I step in, stay you here, and watch. I'll not return empty-handed, I promise you.

[Runs into the house.

Live. 'Faith! my dearest Harriot, 'twas high time: do you know, that my vile uncle is plotting to get me confined?

Har. Confined! on what pretext?

Live. Madness, I suppose. But let him catch me if he can. The tables are now turned, and our escape secured past prevention.

Har. I am on thorns to embark. My heart presages we shall be happy in Europe.

Re-enter JENNY; on her arm a basket crammed full, in her hand a band-box, a casket, and parcels of paper wrapped up in an apron.

Jenny. Joy, joy! the deeds! the chattels! I have them all. (To Harriot.) Now, take wing, like two turtle-doves. (Recollecting.) Hang it! I forgot.

Here, these. (Delivers them in a hurry.) Be careful of the contents; I'll be back immediately. [Exit.]

Har. Oh, mercy! what a load of finery! Come, Lively, let's sit down, and lay them all in order. (They sit on the wall of the draw-well, placing the apron and basket between them, then range the parcels out of the one into the other.) And first, this bundle of bonds, I suppose, at bottom.

Live. Next, this band-box in the corner—so; and here, on this side, the casket of jewels.

Har. Stay; let me just take a peep. Oh! Lively, such noble brilliants!

Live. With what delight shall I see my angel wear them! Ah! Harriot, how enchanting is that look! while your eyes thus tenderly shoot into mine, 'tis perfect ecstasy! (Embraces her.)

Har. How now, sir? what liberty? (Resentfully. Takes her hand off the basket to repel him; the basket and apron fall into the well; she screams.) Oh! heavens! the basket's dropped into the well.

Re-enter JENNY, who overhears Harriot, and screams.

Jenny. Heavens and earth! into the well! (Lively turns away in confusion.)

Har. A silly youth! with his hoydenish pranks.

Live. I was sure she had hold of it; so, in my transport—

Jenny. Transport! nonsense! Yes, yes; we're finely on our way now! Lovers, lovers! say I; wretch that I am.

Live. Patience, Jenny; can't I go down for them?

Jenny. Egad! that's true; and, by my troth, so you shall, Mr. Transport.

Har. Into the well? (Alarmed, and runs to look down into it.)

Jenny. La! what are you so afraid of? 'tis really not deep; and, besides, has been dry this long while.

Live. (Looks up at the pulley.) Ay, but where's the rope?

Jenny. We can take the rope and bucket off Gripe's well. Come, let us in a bit for the present; the patrol will be going their rounds, and they must not surprise us.

[Exeunt into Gripe's house, shutting the door.]

The Guards' march is played. Enter ALI, at the head of the Janizaries, marching in file. They halt in the middle of the square.

Ali. Don't you observe, lads, the nocturnal stillness of this city, ever since our corps has mounted guard here?

Osman. True, Captain; everybody allows it.

Ali. (Struts importantly.) Let's keep it up, then. Harken to your orders. Hem, hem! To you, Osman, for this night, I consign half the corps, and half the city, westward: you, Mustapha, with the remainder, follow me. This square shall be our place of rendezvous.

Mus. In faith, noble Captain, a masterly manœuvre.

Ali. Now take heed all: let your march be orderly and silent. One thing more: I have intelligence of a tavern hereabout, where, in mockery of our holy law, wine is privily sold to the true believers. Those quarters I shall beat up; and, if the wine be good, secure it for our secret service. Whisker of Mahomet! there's nothing like maintaining strict order and discipline. Make ready, march!

AIR.—Turkish March.

The guards their midnight rounds begin,
Let all retire; let cease all din:
Home, home, without delaying,
No murmur; no gainsaying:
Hush! high and low degree;
So wills our lord cadî.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter GRIPE, walking circumspectly about the Square, peeping and listening.

RECITATIVE—GRIPE.

If it were done, when 'tis done; then 'twere well,
it were done quickly.

Th' attempt, and not the deed, confounds us—strictly.

The sleeping and the dead are but as pictures,
Then—we shall both be Cræsus's—if victors.

I'll fetch Hunks. (Ponders.) May I trust him on this job?

Besides, the rigour of these Turkish laws!
To swing; forfeit my wealth! Ay, there's the rub
Must give us pause.

AIR.

What a cursed hole I'm in,
Yet must on through thick and thin:
If my gossip, Hunks, should peach,
I'm within the cadî's reach.
After all, 'tis a crack rope venture;
He the vault alone shall enter.
His shall be the art of thieving,
Mine but that of bare receiving.
'Gad, if I ben't sharp and sly,
He'll clap flatt'ry to my eye. [Exit.]

Enter from Gripe's house, LIVELY, with a large rope in his hand, JENNY with a bucket, and HARRIOT following.

Live. Escape? ay, sure, nothing to stop us; there's a ship sails in the morning: her captain is my acquaintance, and has engaged to take us on board.

Har. Lucky though, that my uncle stays abroad all night.

AIR.—HARRIOT.

Like the tuneful linnet gay,
Long I sported in the May,
And echo heard my cheerful call;
I just could tattle,
Chirp and prattle;
I just could sing, and that was all.
But now I perch, and plume, and pride,
And more than tattle,
Chirp and prattle,
I now can sing, and love beside.

Live. Yes, we shall be under sail ere missed. (Mounts on the breast-wall, and slips the rope into the pulley.) Oh! 'gad, how gaily we shall live in Ireland upon the funds of this well. (Leaps down, and hands the rope's-end to Jenny.) Ireland, my Harriot! that's your true female Paradise. There you'll all be queens, empresses, sultanas—eh! Jenny?

Jenny. Ay, ay. Well, this is secured; all's ready. (Hangs the bucket over the wall.)

Live. Come, then, down I go.

Har. But, harkye, are you sure there's no danger?

Jenny. Danger!—Why, the well is quite dry, I tell you. (Lively sits upon the wall, and puts his feet in the bucket, while they lay hold of the rope.)

TRIO.—HARRIOT, LIVELY, and JENNY.

Har. Hold the rope fast—hold faster. (To Jenny.)
For you I'm in pains, my dear. (To Lively.)

Live. Why should you dread disaster?
Kind love is my guide, never fear.

Har. I would it were past!
Now, now hold fast. (To Jenny.)

Live. The worst is past.

Jenny. I do hold fast.

Har. La! I'm in a terrible fright.

Live. Now down I go. (Gradually disappears.)

Jenny. So, so, so, so.

Live. And the motion's slow.

Har. Have a care below.

Live. You've nothing to do but hold tight.

Jenny. We all shall be made by this night.

Har. Ah! now he's quite out of sight.

Jenny. The basket, pray save it. (To Lively.)

Live. I have it.

Har. I'm glad he has got no hurt.

Jenny. The casket, don't leave it. (To Lively.)

Live. I've pick'd 'em both out of the dirt.

Jenny. Next find the cloth. (To Lively.)

Live. I'll get it.

Har. Deuce take ye both! I'm fretted.

Live. All's safe—and now let us retreat.

Jenny. Now let us retreat.

Har. *Let us retreat.
Don't loiter thus;
For I'm in fuss,
For fear we be caught in the street.
(Jenny turning about, sees Gripe and Hunks at a distance.)*

Jenny. Who are these two, coming yonder?

Har. *Coming yonder?
Good lack! our uncles!*

Jenny. Your uncles, I swear.

Har. *What brings 'em home so soon, I wonder?
Old Nick must sure have conjur'd 'em there.*

Jenny. Nick take the troublesome pair.

Live. Hawl, hawl away, hawl.

Har. Hush, hush, do not bawl.

Jenny. He will ruin us all.

Live. I'm ready; what makes you delay?

Har. Our uncles are coming this way.

Jenny. There's company coming this way.

Har. We're forc'd to retire.

Live. Blood and fire!

Jenny. Have patience, squire.

Har. We're surely caught, if we stay.

Live. You'll keep me here till 'tis day.

Jenny. *Excuse this little delay.
(Harriot and Jenny escape into Gripe's house, and shut the door.)*

Enter HUNKS, carrying a lantern, followed by GRIPE, carrying a ladder and an iron crow: as they advance, LIVELY, in the well, continues calling to Harriot and Jenny.

Live. Hawl, hawl away, hawl!

Hunks. (Hearing the voice.) Eh! what are you muttering, gossip?

Gripe. Nothing I.—Wasn't it you that spoke?

Hunks. No. (Lays down the sledge near the well, Gripe throws down the crow.)

Gripe. Oh, pise on't! (Groans.) this d—d ladder has broken my back. (Goes to set it up beneath the deep window of the distant house.)

Hunks. What matter, man?—No gains without pains, i'fecks. Now, how set about this job? (Takes the lantern to examine the ground.)

Gripe. Why, this whole front is but one single stone. (Examines it likewise.)

Hunks. Just hit it with your sledge. (Claps his ear to it.)

Gripe. Well, how does it sound? (Strikes gently in several parts.)

Hunks. Hollow, Hollow. This must be the entrance, i'fecks, gossip, and that same stone we must force out. (Takes up the sledge, and Gripe the crow.)

DUETT.—GRIPE and HUNKS.

Gripe. Now, gossip, now, gossip, strike home.

Hunks. And you too, good gossip, strike home.

Gripe. *We'll soon make a breach in this tomb.
Strike it harder, I warrant 'twill come.*

Hunks. 'Twill come.

Gripe. 'Twill come.

Both. 'Twill come.

Gripe. Once more.

Hunks. Once more—the mortar is crumbling.

Gripe. *'Tis crumbling—I now see the joint.
'Tis tumbling.*

Hunks. 'Tis tumbling. Stick to the point.

Both. Let's stick to the point.

Gripe. *Pray hand me the crow.
Now double your blow.*

Hunks. I will strike while you pinch.

Gripe. It comes.

Hunks. It comes.

Both. It comes inch by inch.

Gripe. Now strike—it comes.

Hunks. Now pinch—it comes.

Both. It comes inch by inch.

Gripe. It totters.

Hunks. It totters.

Both. To fall it begins.

Gripe. Look to your shins.

Hunks. Look to your shins.

Gripe. Look, look to your shins.

Hunks. Zounds! look to your shins.

(The stone tumbling with noise, shews the entrance of the vault, defended by an iron portcullis. They meanwhile throw aside their tools, and embrace exultingly.)

Gripe. So! that task's finished, and the treasure's our own.

Hunks. (Turning to the pyramid.) Finished! yes, to be sure; rarely finished! Why, there's a huge iron grate still. Stay. (Takes the lantern to examine.)

Gripe. No trifling hoard for certain, so firmly barricaded. (Aside.)

Hunks. Oh! we may compass it yet. Here's a groove, you see, shows 'tis a slider. Hold this. (Presents the lantern.) I'll try to lift it. No, i'fecks, I a'n't strong enough; lend me a hand.

Gripe. (Sets down the lantern, and goes to assist him.) Now, lay to o'your side. That's it; let's raise it quite up.

Hunks. There it goes; high enough, if we had something to clap under it.

Gripe. Bear it up, while I run for the crow. (Having fixed it.) Let go now; it can't fall.

Hunks. That's clever, i'fecks! Stay; is the vault deep? Why, (Takes the lantern, and looks down.) our ladder was needless; here's a little staircase.

Gripe. All the better. Now then, down wi' ye; you have the lantern.

Hunks. Here, gossip, take it you, and go down yourself.

Gripe. A tomb—I—troth, gossip, I'm afraid I should never get alive to the bottom.

Hunks. (Snatching the lantern from him.) Psha! poltroon, give it me; I'll go down myself. (Going to the pyramid, turns to Gripe.) But take notice, I'll ha' the larger share.

Gripe. Go down, go down, man; we'll settle that afterwards.

Hunks. (Entering the pyramid.) I'fecks, I'm all in a flutter too; but then the treasure—ay, that keeps me up. (Goes down.)

Gripe. (At the mouth of the vault to Hunks below.) Well, are you at bottom? Is there much? Throw up to me whatever you find.

Hunks. (Below.) Find! I'fecks, I find nothing; but this Turk's cloak. (Throws out a caftan.)

Gripe. (Impatiently.) Pise on it! what has the booby flung up here? (Examines it.) A pretty rag, wot. (Going nearer to the vault.) The gold, the diamonds, man! That's all you need mind.

Hunks. There, there's a mufti's cap for you. (Throws out a turban.)

Gripe. Mufti yourself, sirrah! (Stamps on the turban, leans into the vault and bawls.) What the devil are you about? The gold, I say; the jewels. Are you mad?

Hunks. No such gear, i'fecks; not a jot else, unless you'll ha' the corpse.

Gripe. Oh, ho! you want to keep all, do you? These your tricks? Ay, I suspected as much.

Hunks. Why, step down yourself, and see. I give you my oath.

Gripe. Your oath! you worthless dog.

Hunks. Hey! This to me? you old curmudgeon.

Gripe. Yes, you may well talk, you shabby, swindling scoundrel! but, sirrah, you shall—

Hunks. Stay, rascal! stay till I come up and break your bones. (The light of the candle begins to reappear, and with it Hunks in a rage. Gripe suddenly takes out the crow that supported the grate, which falls at once, and shuts in Hunks.)

Gripe. My bones; ha, ha, ha! you will, jail bird.

Hunks. (Vainly labouring to raise the grate.) The treacherous villain! Why, sirrah! you don't mean—

Gripe. (To himself.) Gulled! defrauded! nay, exposed to the gallows! and, (Kicking the turban and robe.) and all for—for this trumpery. (Flings them into the well.)

Ali. (Behind.) Who's there? Stand, ho!

Hunks. Mercy on us! 'tis the patrol! Harkye, Gripe, if I be caught I'll impeach you; I will, i'fecks.

Gripe. Pise on it! so he may. (Aside.) Hush, hush, dear gossip! Pho, man, I was but in jest. Do, run down again quick, and hide your lantern. When they are passed I'll come and release you. (Wheedling.)

Hunks. (Retiring.) At your own peril, cut-throat! be assured I'll not swing single. (Hunks retires into the vault; Gripe hurries to his own door, where, searching in all his pockets, he misses his keys; the Janizaries are heard approaching tumultuously.)

Gripe. My keys! undone! robbed! beggared! (In consternation.) Oh! they're coming! what shall I do? Pise on it! stay, I'll even mount that ladder—my last shift—skulk in the hollow of the window; perhaps they mayn't see me. (Climbs up in haste, and stands in the window.)

Enter ALI, with four Janizaries, half drunk, each carrying two bottles and a drinking cup; and OSMAN, with the party: they are surprised at the intoxication of their comrades, but, getting from them each one bottle, they fall to guzzling in long draughts. During the symphony of the ensuing Catch, a faint light glimmers from the vault.

CATCH.—ALI, MUSTAPHA, and Janizary.

Ali. }
Must. } Fill every lad his cup.
Jan. }

Ali. Fill it a bumper.

Jan. Mine's a thumper.

Must. Drink it up.

(Ali drinks, making a noise in his throat while swallowing, viz.)

Ali. Wi—ne.

Must. }
Jan. } Swill 'till mellow! honest fellow.

Ali. I don't leave one drop in mine.

(Mustapha drinks, making the same noise.)

Must. Wi—ne.

Ali. }
Jan. } Swill till, &c.

Must. I don't leave, &c.

(Janizary drinks, making the same noise.)

Jan. Wi—ne.

Must. }
Ali. } Swill till, &c.

Ali. } Let drones pour on

Must. } Their dull Coran,

Jan. } While we're laughing,

Gaily quaffing.

Ali. Rosy wine.

(Ali's men lay aside their bottles and cups, and then come back. Osman and his party sit down continuing to drink; one of Ali's men seats himself close to the Draw-well, leaning his elbow on the wall; two others place themselves near him, sitting. Ali and Mustapha stagger forward.)

Ali. And yet, this devilish liquor parches one up. (Hiccups.) By Mecca, my stomach's a coal of fire.

Must. And mine boiling oil, by Omar! But see! here's a well; let's draw some water, (Hiccups.) 'twill quench us.

Ali. Right; and the rope's in the pulley, too. (They lay hold on the cord, and begin to pull. The other three drunk, fall asleep.) Now, both together.

Must. (Looking toward the pyramid.) Eh! bless me! don't I see a light from yonder monument? and a hole broken in the front, I think.

Ali. D—d heavy, this same water. (Tugging the cord.)

Must. Nay, but look! if I have eyes—(Still looking to the pyramid.)

Ali. Pho! confound ye, pull away. Visionary! 'Cause the mufti was buried there, you're afraid he'll rise and eat you, eh? (Looking towards the pyramid, and pulling with all his might.) See! what can you see? Were I to see the devil, I'd no more matter—(Lively drawn up in the bucket, while their heads are turned aside, appears dressed in the Mufti's turban and robe, with the basket on his arm; he lays hold on one of the posts with his left hand, and springs upon the wall, giving, at the same instant with the right hand, a hearty box on the ear to the sleeping Janizary next to him, who, in a fright tumbles upon his comrade; they, struggling to rise, obstruct each other. Meanwhile, Ali and Mustapha, pulling hard, and not being longer resisted by Lively's weight, suddenly fall; letting go the rope, the bucket falls.)

Live. (Standing on the breast-wall, bellows out.) Boo! miscreants! boo!

Janizaries. Oh, oh! the mufti! the devil!

Ali. (Coming up in terror.) Accursed wine! A judgment! our prophet's vengeance! (Runs off. Mustapha and Osman with his party rise in a fright, and running away, throw down the ladder.)

Janizaries. The devil! the mufti himself at our heels! Run, run.

[Exeunt. Hunks alarmed, comes up to the grate.

Gripe stands trembling in the window.

Live. (Upon the wall.) Ha, ha! I think I have scared the rascals. (Leaps down.)

Gripe. Save us! A spectre! I shall tumble headlong.

Live. (Aloud at Gripe's door.) Jenny! Jenny! come down, 'tis I. (Gazing joyfully at his basket.)

Jenny. (Within.) Mr. Lively's voice, I vow. Quick, quick, Miss.

Gripe. (Astonished.) Benedicite!—Pise on it! I'll make off—Distraction! my ladder thrown down! and the cadi—posting hither.

Enter HARRIOT and JENNY, running.

Har. Is it you, my dear sir? (She and Jenny, frightened at the Mufti's habit, run back, screaming.) Ah, ah!

Live. (Overtakes them.) Stop, stop! don't squall! What ails ye? (Throwing off the turban and robe.) 'Tis I—Lively. (They stare.)

Gripe. How? Lively! (Amazed.)

Hunks. My nephew! he'll help me out, i'fecks.

Har. (Coming to herself.) Lud! how you frightened me—that strange disguise. (To Lively.)

Jenny. (Springs at the basket on his arm.) This is safe, however; and now, my loves, for Europe, ho!

Live. Ay, ay, now or never. (All hurrying off.)

Hunks. Lively! (Lively starts and looks back.)

Gripe. (From the window at the same time.) Harriot! (Harriot starts.)

Har. (Fainting.) Our uncles! good heavens!

Jenny and Live. (Supporting her.) Away, away, away! (Going.)

Hunks. Ah! Lively, can you forsake me thus?

Gripe. My dear Harriot! won't you stay and help me? (Harriot and Lively stand amazed; Jenny bursts into a fit of laughter.)

Jenny. Ha, ha, ha! was ever sight so ridiculous? Ha, ha! Look at 'em! this owl in his cage, and that dried mummy in his niche! Ha, ha, ha!

Gripe. Dear niece, come and take me down. (To Harriot.)

Live. How got you there? (To Gripe.)

Hunks. Take me out first. (To Lively.)

Live. What brought you there? (To Hunks.)

Har. Haste, my dear Lively, to relieve them.

Jenny. What, set them free without conditions? No, no; make terms first; bind them now, you'll never have them at such another hold.

Gripe. Niece, my dear niece, do but persuade your favourite gallant there to help me down, and I'll restore every shilling of your fortune.

Jenny. And give your consent to her marriage with him?

Gripe. Ay, with anybody.

Jenny. So much for the gentleman above stairs; now what says the gentleman below.

Hunks. Anything, anything. I'll render up my trust.

Jenny. Make your nephew your whole and sole heir?

Hunks. Willingly.

Jenny. And you both swear to keep your words?

Gripe and Hunks. We swear.

Jenny. Never to go from your agreement?

Gripe and Hunks. Never.

Jenny. Or we deliver you over to the Cadi for perjury.

Gripe and Hunks. And his janizaries shall carbo-nado us.

Har. Enough. Jenny, there's a ladder; I'll raise it; and do you relieve one, while I attend the other.

Gripe. Pise on't! girls, don't be in such a hurry.—(Harriot and Jenny rear up the ladder to Gripe; Lively goes to assist Hunks.) Pise on't! Girls, make haste—I'm in such a tremor—the cadi—(Scrambles down.)

Hunks. Quick, quick, dear lad—up with it! I'll help—(To Lively.—The grate is raised; and Hunks stepping forth, claps it down again; he embraces Lively.)

Gripe. (Pushes down the ladder, and comes forward.) Lord be praised, I'm once more on terra-firma!

Hunks. (Advances, capering for joy.) Huzza! I'm disentombed. Ah! gossip! we who thought to have been so rich! (Shakes his head at Gripe.)

FINALE.—HUNKS, GRIPE, HARRIOT, LIVELY, and JENNY.

Hunks. 'Tis past—now, gossip, let's count our gains,
We've had our labour for our pains.

If henceforth e'er I'm caught,

Gold-finding in a vault,

You may keep me there,

I vow and swear,

I'll own it my own fault. (To Gripe.)

Gripe. 'Tis you, y' old devil in human shape!

Who beguil'd your gossip into this scrape!

Who his greedy hopes cajol'd,

Wi' your mufti's heaps untold;

Your golden dreams

Of ingots, gems—

To hell you'd trot for gold. (To Hunks.)

Hunks. My love of gold I for ever renounce.

Gripe. And my avarice I lay aside at once.

Hunks. } To my { nephew I } restore,
Gripe. } } niece I now }

Hunks. } My love, } and give my ore,
Gripe. } Her own, }

Hunks. } My mind's at rest.
Gripe. } While they are blest,
We never can be poor.

Live. } With duteous gratitude thus I bend. (Kneels)
Har. } In the parent happy to find a friend.

To shield you from annoy
Shall be our sole employ.

Gripe. } Content.
Hunks. }

Jenny. Of this event,
Genteels, I wish you joy,

Hunks. } But there's one treasure, whereof we still Gripe. } Must misers be, which is—

Ali. Your good will.
(To the audience.)

Har. } Such welcome guests to bring,
Live. } We'll strain both voice and string.
Jenny. }

Ali. With a twinkum twankum,
We will thank 'em,
Twinkum, twankum, twing.

Chorus. Such welcome guests to bring,
We'll strain both voice and string,
With a twinkum, twankum,
We will thank 'em,
Twinkum, twankum, twing. [Exeunt.]

TANCRED AND SIGISMUNDA;

A TRAGEDY, IN FIVE ACTS.—BY JAMES THOMSON.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Enter SIGISMUNDA and LAURA.

Sig. Ah! fatal day to Sicily! the king
Touches his last moments.

Lau. So 'tis fear'd. [charg'd

Sig. Laura, 'tis said, the heart is sometimes
With a prophetic sadness: such, methinks,
Now hangs on mine. The king's approaching death Suggests a thousand fears. What troubles thence
May throw the state once more into confusion;
What sudden changes in my father's house
May rise, and part me from my dearest Tancred,
Alarm my thoughts.

Lau. The fears of love-sick fancy!
Perversely busy to torment itself.
But be assur'd your father's steady friendship,
Join'd to a certain genius, that commands,
Not kneels to fortune, will support and cherish,
Here in the public eye of Sicily,
This, I may call him, his adopted son,
The noble Tancred, form'd to all his virtues.

Sig. Ah! form'd to charm his daughter. This fair morn
Has tempted far the chase. Is he not yet
Return'd?

Lau. No. When your father to the king,
Who now expiring lies, was call'd in haste,
He sent each way his messengers to find him;
With such a look of ardour and impatience,
As if this near event was to Count Tancred
Of more importance than I comprehend. [birth,

Sig. There lies, my Laura, o'er my Tancred's
A cloud I cannot pierce. With princely accost,
Nay, with respect, which oft I have observ'd,
Stealing at times submissive o'er his features,
In Belmont's woods my father rear'd this youth.

Ah! woods, for ever dear! where first my artless bosom learn'd

The sighs of love. He gives him out the son
Of an old friend, a baron of Apulia,
Who in the late crusado bravely fell;
But then, 'tis strange; is all his family,
As well as father, dead? and all their friends,
Except my sire, the gen'rous, good Siffredi?
Had he a mother, sister, brother left,
The last remain of kindred, with what pride,
What rapture, might they fly o'er earth and sea,
To claim this rising honour of their blood!
This bright unknown! this all-accomplish'd youth!
Who charms too much the heart of Sigismunda.
What says Rodolpho? Does he duly credit
The story of his birth?

Lau. He has sometimes,
Like you, his doubts; yet, when maturely weigh'd,
Believes it true. As for lord Tancred's self,
He never entertain'd the slightest thought
That verg'd to doubt; but oft laments his state,
By cruel fortune so ill pair'd to your's.

Sig. Merit like his, the fortune of the mind,
Beggars all wealth. Then, to your brother, Laura,
He talks of me?

Lau. Of nothing else. Howe'er
The talk begin, it ends with Sigismunda;
Their morning, noon-tide, and their ev'ning walks,
Are full of you; and all the woods of Belmont
Enamour'd with your name—

Sig. Away, my friend;
You flatter: yet the dear delusion charms.

Lau. No, Sigismunda; 'tis the strictest truth,
Nor half the truth, I tell you. Ev'n with fondness
My brother talks for ever of the passion [him
That fires young Tancred's breast. So much it strikes
He praises love as if he were a lover.
Heaven, he says,

In lavish bounty form'd the heart for love;
In love included all the finer seeds
Of honour, virtue, friendship, purest bliss—

Sig. Virtuous Rodolpho!

Lau. Then his pleasing theme
He varies to the praises of your lover.

Sig. And what, my Laura, says he on the subject?

Lau. He says that though he was not nobly born,
Nature has form'd him noble, gen'rous, brave.
Chiefly one charm
He in his graceful character observes;
That though his passions burn with high impatience,
And sometimes, from a noble heat of nature,
Are ready to fly off; yet the least check
Of ruling reason brings them back to temper,
And gentle softness.

Sig. True! oh! true, Rodolpho!
Blest be thy kindred worth for loving his!
He is all warmth, all amiable fire,
All quick, heroic ardour! temper'd soft
With gentleness of heart, and manly reason!
If virtue were to wear a human form,
To light it with her dignity and flame,
Then soft'ning mix her smiles and tender graces;
Oh! she would choose the person of my Tancred.
Go on, my friend; go on, and ever praise him;
The subject knows no bounds, nor can I tire,
While my breast trembles to that sweetest music.
The heart of woman tastes no truer joy,
Is never flatter'd with such dear enchantment,
As when she hears the praises of the man she loves.

Lau. Madam, your father comes.

Enter SIFFREDI.

Sif. (To an Attendant as he enters.) Lord Tancred is found?

Atten. My lord, he quickly will be here.

Sif. 'Tis well; retire. You, too, my daughter, leave me.

Sig. I go, my father. But how fares the king?

Sif. He is no more. Gone to that awful state,
Where kings the crown wear only of their virtues.

Sig. How bright must then be his. This stroke is sudden;
He was this morning well, when to the chase
Lord Tancred went.

Sif. 'Tis true. But at his years
Death gives short notice. Drooping nature then,
Without a gust of pain to shake it, falls.
His death, my daughter, was that happy period
Which few attain. The duties of his day
Were all discharg'd, calm as evening skies
Was his pure mind, and lighted up with hopes
That open heaven; when for his last long sleep
Timely prepar'd, a lassitude of life,
A pleasing weariness of mortal joy,
Fell on his soul, and down he sunk to rest.
Oh! may my death be such! He but one wish
Left unfulfill'd, which was to see Count Tancred.

Sig. To see Count Tancred! Pardon me, my lord—

Sif. For what, my daughter? But with such emotion—
Why did you start at mention of Count Tancred?

Sig. Nothing—I only hop'd the dying king
Might mean to make some generous, just provision
For this your worthy charge, this noble orphan.

Sif. And he has done it largely. Leave me now;
I want some private conference with Lord Tancred.

[Exeunt Sigismunda and Laura.]

My doubts are but too true. If these old eyes
Can trace the marks of love, a mutual passion
Has seiz'd, I fear, my daughter, and this prince,
My sovereign now. Should it be so? Ah! there,
There lurks a brooding tempest, that may shake
My long concerted scheme, to settle firm
The public peace and welfare, which the king
Has made the prudent basis of his will.
Away, unworthy views, you shall not tempt me!
Nor interest, nor ambition shall seduce
My fix'd resolve. Perish the selfish thought,

Which our own good prefers to that of millions!
He comes, my king, unconscious of his fortune.

Enter TANCRED.

Tan. My Lord Siffredi, in your looks I read,
Confirm'd, the mournful news that fly abroad
From tongue to tongue: we, then, at last, have lost
The good old king.

Sif. Yes, we have lost a father;
The greatest blessing heaven bestows on mortals
A good, a worthy king! Hear me, my Tancred,
And I will tell thee, in a few plain words,
How he deserv'd that best, that glorious title.
He lov'd his people, deem'd them all his children;
The good exalted, and depress'd the bad.
He sought alone the good of those for whom
He was entrusted with the sovereign power:
Well knowing that a people in their rights
And industry protected, living safe
Beneath the sacred shelter of the laws,
Are ne'er ungrateful. With unsparing hand
They will for him provide: their filial love
And confidence are his unfailing treasure,
And every honest man his faithful guard.

Tan. A general face of grief o'erspreads the city.
I mark'd the people, as I hither came,
In crowds assembled, struck with silent sorrow,
And pouring forth the noblest praise of tears.
A mingled murmur ran

Along the streets; and from the lonely court
Of him who can no more assist their fortunes,
I saw the courtier-fry, with eager haste,
All hurrying to Constantia.

Sif. Noble youth!

I joy to hear from thee these just reflections,
Worthy of riper years. But if they seek Constantia, trust me, they mistake their course.

Tan. How! Is she not, my lord, the late king's sister?

Heir to the crown of Sicily? the last
Of our fam'd Norman line, and now our queen?

Sif. Tancred, 'tis true, she is the late king's sister,
The sole surviving offspring of that tyrant,
William the Bad; born some months
After the tyrant's death, but not next heir.

Tan. You much surprise me. May I, then, presume
To ask who is?

Sif. Come nearer, noble Tancred,
Son of my care. I must, on this occasion,
Consult thy generous heart, which, when conducted
By rectitude of mind and honest virtues,
Gives better counsel than the hoary head.
Then know, there lives a prince, here in Palermo,
The lineal offspring of our famous hero,
And rightful heir of Sicily.

Tan. Great heaven! How far remov'd
From that our mighty founder?

Sif. His great grandson:
Sprung from his eldest son, who died untimely,
Before his father.

Tan. Ha! the prince you mean,
Is he not Manfred's son? The generous, brave,
Unhappy Manfred! whom the tyrant William,
You just now mention'd, not content to spoil
Of his paternal crown, threw into fetters,
And infamously murder'd?

Sif. Yes, the same.

Tan. But this prince,
Where has he lain conceal'd?

Sif. The late good king,
By noble pity mov'd, contriv'd to save him
From his dire father's unrelenting rage,
And had him rear'd in private, as became
His birth and hopes, with high and princely nurture.
Till now, too young to rule a troubled state,
By civil broils most miserably torn,
He in his safe retreat has lain conceal'd,
His birth and fortune to himself unknown;
But when the dying king to me intrusted,

As to the chancellor of the realm, his will,
He nam'd him his successor.

Tan. Happy youth!

He then will triumph o'er his father's foes,
O'er haughty Osmond, and the tyrant's daughter.

Sif. Ay, that is what I dread—the heat of youth;
There lurks, I fear, perdition to the state;
I dread the horrors of rekindled war:
Though dead, the tyrant still is to be fear'd;
His daughter's party still is strong and numerous;
Her friend, earl Osmond, constable of Sicily,
Experienc'd, brave, high-born, of mighty interest.
Better the prince and princess should by marriage
Unite their friends, their interest, and their claims.
Then will the peace and welfare of the land
On a firm basis rise.

Tan. My lord Siffredi,
If by myself I of this prince may judge,
That scheme will scarce succeed. Your prudent age
In vain will counsel, if the heart forbid it.
But wherefore fear? The right is clearly his;
All Sicily will rouse, all faithful hearts,
Will range themselves around prince Manfred's son.
For me, I here devote me to the service
Of this young prince; I every drop of blood
Will lose with joy, with transport, in his cause—
Pardon my warmth—but that, my lord, will never
To this decision come. Then find the prince;
Lose not a moment to awaken in him
The royal soul. Perhaps he, now desponding,
Pines in a corner, and laments his fortune
That in the narrow bounds of private life
He must confine his aims, those swelling virtues
Which, from his noble father, he inherits.

Sif. Perhaps, regardless, in the common bane
Of youth he melts, in vanity and love.
But if the seeds of virtue glow within him,
I will awake a higher sense, a love
That grasps the loves and happiness of millions.

Tan. Why that surmise? Or should he love,
Siffredi,

I doubt not, it is nobly, which will raise
And animate his virtues. Oh! permit me
To plead the cause of youth: their virtue oft,
In pleasure's soft enchantment lull'd awhile,
Forgets itself; it sleeps and gaily dreams,
Till great occasion rouse it; then, all flame,
It walks abroad, with heighten'd soul and vigour,
And by the change astonishes the world. [thers!]

Sif. Hear him, immortal shades of his great fa-
Forgive me, sir, this trial of your heart.
Thou, thou art he!

Tan. Siffredi!

Sif. Tancred, thou!

Thou art the man, of all the many thousands
That toil upon the bosom of this isle,
By heaven elected to command the rest,
To rule, protect them, and to make them happy.

Tan. Manfred, my father! I the last support
Of the fam'd Norman line, that awes the world?
I, who, this morning, wander'd forth an orphan,
Outcast of all but thee, my second father!

Thus call'd to glory! to the first great lot
Of humankind! Oh! wonder-working hand,
That in majestic silence sways at will
The mighty movements of unbounded nature!
Oh! grant me, heaven, the virtues to sustain
This awful burden of so many heroes!

Let me not be exalted into shame;
Set up the worthless pageant of vain grandeur.
Meantime, I thank the justice of the king,
Who has my right bequeath'd me. Thee, Siffredi,
I thank thee! Oh! I ne'er enough can thank thee.
Yes, thou hast been—thou art—shalt be my father!
Thou shalt direct my inexperience'd years;
Shalt be the ruling head, and I the hand.

Sif. It is enough for me to see my sov'reign
Assert his virtues, and maintain his honour.

Tan. I think, my lord, you said the king committed

To you his will? I hope it is not clogg'd
With any base conditions, any clause,
To tyrannise my heart, and to Constantia
Enslave my hand devoted to another.
The hint you just now gave of that alliance,
You must imagine, wakes my fear. But know,
In this alone I will not bear dispute,
Not ev'n from thee, Siffredi. Let the council
Be straight assembled, and the will there open'd:
Thence issue speedy orders to convene,
This day, ere noon, the senate, where those barons,
Who now are in Palermo, will attend,
To pay their ready homage to the king.

Sif. I go, my liege. But once again permit me
To tell you, now is the trying crisis
That must determine of your future reign.
Oh! with heroic rigour watch your heart;
And to the sovereign duties of the king,
Th' unequall'd pleasures of a god on earth,
Submit the common joys, the common passions,
Nay, even the virtues of the private man.

Tan. Of that no more. They not oppose, but aid,
Invigorate, cherish, and reward each other.

[Exit Sif.]

Now, generous Sigismunda, comes my turn,
To shew my love was not of thine unworthy,
When fortune bade me blush to look to thee.
But what is fortune to the wish of love?

A miserable bankrupt!
Quick, let me find her; taste that highest joy,
Th' exalted heart can know, the mix'd effusion
Of gratitude and love! Behold, she comes!

Re-enter SIGISMUNDA.

My flutt'ring soul was on the wing to find thee,
My love, my Sigismunda!

Sig. Oh! my Tancred,
Tell me what means this mystery and gloom,
That lowers around? Just now involv'd in thought,
My father shot athwart me—You, my lord,
Seem strangely mov'd—I fear, some dark event
From the king's death, to trouble our repose;
That tender calm we in the woods of Belmont
So happily enjoy'd. Explain this hurry;
What means it? say.

Tan. It means that we are happy!
Beyond our most romantic wishes happy!

Sig. You but perplex me more.

Tan. It means, my fairest,
That thou art queen of Sicily; and I
The happiest of mankind!
Because with thee, I can adorn my throne.
Manfred, who fell by tyrant William's rage,
Was my father. (Pausing.)

You droop, my love; dejected on a sudden;
You seem to mourn my fortune. The soft tear
Springs in thy eye: oh! let me kiss it off.
Why this, my Sigismunda?

Sig. Royal Tancred,
None at your glorious fortune can like me
Rejoice; yet me alone, of all Sicilians,
It makes unhappy.

Tan. I should hate it, then!
Should throw, with scorn, the splendid ruin from me.
No, Sigismunda, 'tis my hope with thee
To share it, whence it draws its richest value.

Sig. You are my sov'reign; I at humble distance—

Tan. Thou art my queen! the sovereign of my soul!

The dear, the tender, gen'rous Sigismunda!

Sig. Your heart, I know, disdains the little thought
Of changing with the vain, external change
Of circumstance and fortune.

But, ah! the hearts of kings are not their own.
Some high descended princess, who will bring
New power and interest to your throne, demands
Your royal hand; perhaps, Constantia—

Tan. She!

Oh! name her not: were I this moment free
And disengag'd as he who never sigh'd

For matchless worth like thine, I should abhor
 All thoughts of that alliance. Her fell father
 Most basely murder'd mine;
 And canst thou deem me, then, so poorly tame,
 So cool a traitor to my father's blood,
 As from the prudent cowardice of state
 E'er to submit to such a base proposal;
 They whom just heaven has to a throne exalted,
 To guard the rights and liberties of others,
 What duty binds them to betray their own?
 Or if, indeed, my choice must be directed
 By views of public good, whom shall I choose
 So fit to grace, to dignify a crown,
 And beam sweet mercy on a happy people,
 As thee, my love? Whom place upon my throne
 But thee, descended from the good Siffredi?

Sig. Cease, cease to raise my hopes above my duty;

Charm me no more, my Tancred! Oh! that we
 In those blest woods, where first you won my soul,
 Had pass'd our gentle days; far from the toil
 And pomp of courts! Such is the wish of love:
 'Tis all in vain; you cannot hush a voice
 That murmurs here—I must not be persuaded.

Tan. (Kneeling.) Hear me, thou soul of all my hopes and wishes!
 And witness, heaven, prime source of love and joy!
 Not a whole warring world combin'd against me,
 Shall ever shake my faith to Sigismunda!

(Trumpets and acclamations heard.)

But, hark! the public voice to duties call me,
 Which with unwearied zeal I will discharge;
 And thou, yes, thou shalt be my bright reward.
 Yet, ere I go, to hush thy lovely fears, [blank,
 Thy delicate objections, (writes his name) take this
 Sign'd with my name, and give it to thy father:
 Tell him 'tis my command it be fill'd up
 With a most strict and solemn marriage contract.
 How dear each tie! how charming to my soul!
 That more unites me to my Sigismunda.
 For thee, and for my people's good to live,
 Is all the bliss which sov'reign power can give.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A grand Saloon.

Enter SIFFREDI.

Sif. So far 'tis well. The late king's will proceeds
 Upon the plan I counsell'd; that prince Tancred
 Shall make Constantia partner of his throne.
 Oh! great, oh! wish'd event!
 But how this mighty obstacle surmount,
 Which love has thrown betwixt? My daughter owns
 Her passion for the king; she trembling own'd it,
 With prayers, and tears, and tender supplications,
 That almost shook my firmness. And this blank,
 Which his rash fondness gave her, shews how much,
 To what a wild extravagance he loves.
 I see no means—it foils my deepest thought
 How to controul this madness of the king,
 That wears the face of virtue, and will thence Disdain restraint. The crowding barons
 Here summon'd to the palace, meet already,
 To pay their homage, and confirm the will.
 On a few moments hangs the public fate,
 On a few hasty moments—Ha! there shone
 A gleam of hope. Yes, with this very paper
 I yet will save him. Here is the royal hand;
 I will beneath it write a perfect, full,
 And absolute agreement to the will;
 Which read before the nobles of the realm
 Assembled, in the sacred face of Sicily,
 Constantia present, every heart and eye
 Fix'd on their monarch, every tongue applauding,
 He must submit; his dream of love must vanish.
 It shall be done. To me, I know, 'tis ruin;
 But safety to the public, to the king.
 I will not reason more. No; 'tis fix'd!
 I here devote me for my prince and country;

Let them be safe, and let me nobly perish!
 Behold, earl Osmond comes, without whose aid
 My schemes are all in vain.

Enter OSMOND.

Osm. My lord Siffredi,
 I from the council hasten'd to Constantia,
 And have accomplish'd what we there propos'd.
 The princess to the will submits her claims.
 She with her presence means to grace the senate,
 And of your royal charge, young Tancred's hand,
 Accept. Methought, besides,
 I could discern, that not from prudence merely
 She to his choice submitted.

Sif. Noble Osmond,
 You have in this done to the public great
 And signal service. Yes, I must avow it;
 This frank and ready instance of your zeal,
 In such a trying crisis of the state,
 Upbraids the rashness of my former judgment.

Osm. Siffredi, no. To you belongs the praise;
 'Tis you, my lord, to whom the many thousands,
 That by the barbarous sword of civil war
 Had fallen inglorious, owe their lives.
 I blush to think

I have so long oppos'd the best good man
 In Sicily:

To your's I join my hand; with you will own
 No int'rest and no party but my country.
 Nor is your friendship only my ambition:
 There is a dearer name, the name of father,
 By which I should rejoice to call Siffredi.
 Your daughter's hand would to the public weal
 Unite my private happiness.

Sif. My lord,
 You have my glad consent. To be allied
 To your distinguish'd family and merit,
 I shall esteem an honour. From my soul
 I here embrace earl Osmond as my friend
 And son.

Osm. You make him happy.
 I from this moment vow myself the friend
 And zealous servant of Siffredi's house.

Enter an Officer belonging to the Court.

Offi. (To Siffredi.) The king, my lord, demands your speedy presence.

Sif. I will attend him straight. Farewell, my lord;
 The senate meets: there, a few moments hence,
 I will rejoin you.

Osm. There, my noble lord,
 We will complete this salutary work;
 Will there begin a new, auspicious era.

[Exeunt Siffredi and Officer.]

Siffredi gives his daughter to my wishes,
 But does she give herself? Gay, young, and flatter'd,

Perhaps, engag'd, will she her youthful heart
 Yield to my harsher, uncomplying years?
 I am not form'd, by flattery and praise,
 By sighs and tears, and all the whining trade
 Of love, to feed a fair one's vanity;
 To charm at once and spoil her. These soft arts
 Nor suit my years nor temper; these be left
 To boys and doting age. A prudent father,
 By nature charg'd to guide and rule her choice,
 Resigns his daughter to a husband's power,
 Who with superior dignity, with reason,
 And manly tenderness will ever love her;
 Not first a kneeling slave, and then a tyrant. [Exit.]

Enter RODOLPHO from the Senate.

Rod. This will perplexes all. No, Tancred never Can stoop to these conditions, which at once
 Attack his rights, his honour, and his love.
 Th' unjust, the base conditions of the will!
 Uncertain, toss'd in cruel agitation,
 He oft, methought, address'd himself to speak,
 And interrupt Siffredi, who appear'd,
 With conscious haste to dread that interruption,

And hurry'd on—But, hark! I hear a noise,
As if the assembly rose.

[Sigismunda and Attendants pass through the back scene.

Enter LAURA.

Lau. Your high prais'd friend, the king,
Is false, most vilely false. The meanest slave
Had shewn a nobler heart.
He Manfred's son! away! it cannot be!
The son of that brave prince could never sacrifice
All faith, all honour, gratitude, and love,
All in a moment. And for what? why, truly,
For kind permission, gracious leave, to sit
On his own throne with tyrant William's daughter!

Rod. I stand amaz'd. You surely wrong him,
Laura;

There must be some mistake.

Lau. There can be none:
Siffredi read his full and free consent
Before th' applauding senate. True, indeed,
A small remain of shame, a timorous weakness,
Even dastardly in falsehood, made him blush
To act this scene in Sigismunda's eye,
Who sunk beneath his perfidy and baseness.
Hence, till to-morrow he adjourn'd the senate;
To-morrow fix'd, with infamy to crown him;
Then, leading off his gay, triumphant princess,
He left the poor unhappy Sigismunda
To bend her trembling steps to that sad home
His faithless vows will render hateful to her.
He comes. Farewell! I cannot bear his presence.

[Exit.

Enter TANCRED and SIFFREDI.

Tan. Avoid me, hoary traitor! Go, Rodolpho,
Give orders that all passages this way
Be shut. Defend me from the hateful world,
The bane of peace and honour; then return.

[Exit Rodolpho.

What! dost thou haunt me still? Oh! monstrous insult!

Unparallel'd indignity! Just heaven!
Was ever king, was ever man so treated?
So trampled into baseness?

Sif. Here, my liege,
Here strike! I nor deserve, nor ask for mercy.

Tan. All, all but this I could have borne: but this!

This daring insolence beyond example!
This murder's stroke, that stabs my peace for ever!
That wounds me there—there, where the human heart

Most exquisitely feels—

Sif. Oh! bear it not,
My royal lord; appease on me your vengeance!

Tan. Did ever tyrant image aught so cruel?
The lowest slave that crawls upon the earth,
Robb'd of each comfort heav'n bestows on mortals,
On the bare ground has still his virtue left,
The sacred treasure of an honest heart,
Which thou hast dar'd, with rash, audacious hand,
And impious fraud, in me to violate—

Sif. Behold, my lord, that rash, audacious hand,
Which not repents its crime. Oh! glorious, happy!
If by my ruin I can save your honour. [scorn

Tan. Such honour I renounce; with sovereign
Greatly detest it, and its mean adviser!
Hast thou not dar'd beneath my name to shelter,
Beneath thy sovereign's name, basely presum'd
To shield a lie—a lie, in public utter'd,
To all deluded Sicily? But know,

This poor contrivance is as weak as base.
What, marry her! Constantia! her! the daughter
Of the fell tyrant who destroy'd my father!
The very thought is madness! Ere thou seest
The torch of Hymen light these hated nuptials,
Thou shalt behold Sicilia wrapp'd in flames,
Her cities raz'd, her valleys drench'd with slaughter.
Love set aside, my pride assumes the quarrel;
My honour now is up; in spite of thee,

A world combin'd against me, I will give
This scatter'd will in fragments to the winds,
Assert my rights, the freedom of my heart,
Crush all who dare oppose me to the dust,
And heap perdition on thee!

Sif. Sir, 'tis just.

Exhaust on me thy rage; I claim it all.
But for these public threats thy passion utters,
'Tis what thou canst not do.

Tan. I cannot! ha!

Who shall arrest my vengeance? Who?

Sif. Thyself.

Tan. Away! Dare not to justify thy crime:
That, that alone can aggravate its horror;
Add insolence to insolence—perhaps,
May make my rage forget—

Sif. Oh! let it burst

On this grey head, devoted to thy service!
But when the storm has vented all its fury,
Thou then must hear; nay, more, I know thou wilt;
Wilt hear the calm, yet stronger voice of reason.
Thou must reflect that there are other duties;
Yes, thou must,
In calmer hours, divest thee of thy love,
These common passions of the vulgar breast,
This boiling heat of youth, and be a king,
The lover of thy people!

Tan. Yes, I will be a king, but not a slave;
In this will be a king; in this my people
Shall learn to judge how I will guard their rights,
When they behold me vindicate my own.
But have I, say, been treated like a king?
Heav'ns! could I stoop to such outrageous usage,
I were a mean, a shameless wretch, unworthy
To wield a sceptre in a land of slaves;
A soil abhorr'd of virtue; should belie
My father's blood; belie those very maxims,
At other times you taught my youth,—Siffredi!

Sif. Behold, my prince, thy poor old servant,
Whose darling care, these twenty years, has been
To nurse thee up to virtue; behold him here,
Bent on his feeble knees, to beg, conjure thee,
With tears to beg thee, to controul thy passion,
And save thyself, thy honour, and thy people!
Kneeling with me, behold the many thousands
To thy protection trusted; fathers, mothers,
The sacred front of venerable age,
The tender virgin, and the helpless infant;
See them all
Here at thy feet conjuring thee to save them
From misery and war, from crimes and rapine!
Turn not away: oh! is there not some part
In thy great heart, so sensible to kindness,
And generous warmth, some nobler part, to feel
The prayers and tears of these, the mingled voice
Of heaven and earth?

Tan. There is, and thou hast touch'd it.
Rise, rise, Siffredi. Oh! thou hast undone me!
Unkind old man! Oh! ill-entreated Tancred!
Which way so'er I turn, Dishonour rears
Her hideous front, and misery and ruin.
Why have you rais'd this miserable conflict
Betwixt the duties of the king and man?
Set virtue against virtue? But, hold, my soul,
Thy steady purpose; toss'd by various passions
To this eternal anchor keep: there is,
Can be no public without private virtue.
Then, mark me well, observe what I command;
To-morrow, when the senate meets again,
Unfold the whole; unravel the deceit:
Start not, my lord—this must and shall be done,
Or here our friendship ends. Howe'er disguis'd,
Whatever thy pretence, thou art a traitor.

Sif. I should, indeed, deserve the name of traitor,
And ev'n a traitor's fate, had I so slightly,
From principles so weak, done what I did,
As e'er to disavow it.

Tan. Ha!

Sif. My liege,

Expect not this: though practis'd long in courts,
I have not so far learn'd their subtle trade,
To veer obedient with each gust of passion.
I honour thee, I venerate thy orders,
But honour more my duty. Nought on earth
Shall ever shake me from that solid rock,
Nor smiles, nor frowns—

Tan. You will not, then?

Sif. I cannot.

Tan. Away! begone! Oh! my Rodolpho, come,
And save me from this traitor. Hence, I say!
No reply! Away! [Exit Siffredi.]

Be-enter RODOLPHO.

Rod. What can incense my prince so highly Against his friend Siffredi?

Tan. Friend, Rodolpho!
When I have told thee what this friend has done,
How play'd me like a boy, a base-born wretch,
Who had nor heart nor spirit, thou wilt stand
Amaz'd, and wonder at my stupid patience.

Rod. Nothing so mean
As weak, insulted power, that dares not punish.
And how would that have suited with your love;
His daughter present, too? Trust me, your conduct,
Howe'er abhorrent to a heart like your's,
Was fortunate and wise. Not that I mean
E'er to advise submission—

Tan. Heav'ns! submission!
Could I descend to bear it, ev'n in thought,
Despise me, you, the world, and Sigismunda!
Submission! No! To-morrow's glorious light
Shall flash discovery on the scene of baseness.
Whatever be the risk, by heav'ns! to-morrow,
I will o'erturn the dirty, lie-built schemes
Of these old men, and shew my faithful senate,
That Manfred's son knows to assert and wear,
With undiminish'd dignity, that crown
This unexpected day has plac'd upon him.
But this, my friend, these stormy gusts of pride
Are foreign to my love. Till Sigismunda
Be disabus'd, my breast is tumult all,
And can obey no settled course of reason.
I see her still, I feel her pow'ful image,
That look, where with reproach complaint was mix'd,
Big with soft woe, and gentle indignation,
Which seem'd at once to pity and to scorn me.
Oh! let me find her. I too long have left
My Sigismunda to converse with tears,
A prey to thoughts that picture me a villain.
But ah! how, clogg'd with this accursed state,
A tedious world, shall I now find access?
Her father, too—ten thousand horrors crowd
Into the wild, fantastic eye of love—
Who knows what he may do? Come, then, my friend,
And by thy sister's hand, oh! let me steal
A letter to her bosom. I no longer
Can bear her absence, by the just contempt
She now must brand me with, inflam'd to madness.
Fly, my Rodolpho, fly! engage thy sister
To aid my letter. And this very evening
Secure an interview. I would not bear
This rack another day, not for my kingdom.
Till then, deep plung'd in solitude and shades,
I will not see the hated face of man.
Thought drives on thought, on passions passions roll;
Her smiles alone can calm my raging soul. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

SIGISMUNDA discovered.

Sig. Ah! tyrant prince! ah! more than faithless
Tancred!

Ungen'rous and inhuman in thy falsehood!
Hadst thou this morning, when my hopeless heart,
Submissive to my fortune and my duty,
Had so much spirit left, as to be willing
To give thee back thy vows; ah! hadst thou then
Confess'd the sad necessity thy state
Impos'd upon thee, and with gentle friendship,

Since we must part at last, our parting soften'd;
I should, indeed—I should have been unhappy,
But not to this extreme.
Is there, kind heav'n, no constancy in man?
No steadfast truth, no gen'rous, fix'd affection,
That can bear up against a selfish world?
No, there is none; ev'n Tancred is inconstant!
Hence! let me fly this scene! Whate'er I see,
These roofs, these walls, each object that surrounds
me,

Are tainted with his vows. But whither fly?
The groves are worse, the soft retreat of Belmont,
Its deep'ning glooms, gay lawns, and airy summits,
Will wound my busy memory to torture,
And all its shades will whisper—Faithless Tancred!
My father comes. How, sunk in this disorder,
Shall I sustain his presence?

Enter SIFFREDI.

Sif. Sigismunda,
My dearest child! I grieve to find thee thus
A prey to tears.

Awake to reason from this dream of love,
And shew the world thou art Siffredi's daughter.

Sig. Alas! I am unworthy of that name.

Sif. Thou art, indeed, to blame; thou hast too rashly

Engag'd thy heart, without a father's sanction.
But this I can forgive; and if thy heart
Will now resume its pride, assert itself,
And greatly rise superior to this trial,
I to my warmest confidence again
Will take thee, and esteem thee more my daughter.

Sig. Oh! you are gentler far than I deserve.
It is, it ever was, my darling pride,
To bend my soul to your supreme commands,
Your wisest will; and though by love betray'd,
(Alas! and punish'd, too,) I have transgress'd
The nicest bounds of duty, yet I feel
A sentiment of tenderness, a source
Of filial nature springing in my breast,
That, should it kill me, shall controul this passion,
And make me all submission and obedience
To you, my honour'd lord, the best of fathers.

Sif. Come to my arms, thou comfort of my age!
Thou only joy and hope of these grey hairs!
Come, let me take thee to a parent's heart;
There, with the kindly aid of my advice,
Ev'n with the dew of these paternal tears,
Revive and nourish this becoming spirit;
Then thou dost promise me, my Sigismunda—
Thy father stoops to make it his request—
Thou wilt resign thy fond, presumptuous hopes,
And henceforth never more indulge one thought
That in the light of love regards the king.

Sig. Hopes I have none! Those by this fatal day
Are blasted all. But from my soul to banish,
While weeping mem'ry there retains her seat,
Thoughts which the purest bosom might have che-
rish'd,

Once my delight, now ev'n in anguish charming,
Is more, my lord, than I can promise. [sions,

Sif. Absence and time, the soft'ner of our pas-
Will conquer this. Meantime, I hope from thee
A great, a gen'rous effort; that thou wilt now
Exert thy utmost force, nor languish thus
Beneath the vain extravagance of love.
Let not thy father blush to hear it said,
His daughter was so weak e'er to admit
A thought so void of reason, that a king
Should to his rank, his honour, and his glory,
The high, important duties of a throne,
Ev'n to his throne itself, madly prefer
A wild, romantic passion, the fond child
Of youthful dreaming thought and vacant hours;
That he should quit his heav'n-appointed station,
Desert his awful charge, the care of all.
What! must for thee,
To make thee blest, Sicilia be unhappy?
Rouse thee, for shame! and if a spark of virtue

Lies slumb'ring in thy soul, bid it blaze forth;
Nor sink unequal to the glorious lesson,
This day thy lover gave thee from his throne.

Sig. Ah! that was not from virtue. Had, my father,
That been his aim, I yield to what you say.
Why did you drag me to a sight so cruel?

Sif. It was a scene to fire thy emulation.

Sig. It was a scene of perfidy! But know,
I will do more than imitate the king;
For he is false: I, though sincerely pierc'd
With the best, truest passion, ever touch'd
A virgin's breast, here vow to heav'n and you,
Though from my heart I cannot, from my hopes
To cast this prince. What would you more, my father? [happy:]

Sif. Yes, one thing more; thy father then is
This world from thee, my honour, and thy own,
Demands one step; a step, by which, convinc'd,
The king may see thy heart disdains to wear
A chain which his has greatly thrown aside.
But above all, thou must root out for ever
From the king's breast the least remain of hope,
And henceforth make his mention'd love dishonour.
These things, my daughter, that must needs be done,
Can but this way be done—by the safe refuge,
The sacred shelter of a husband's arms.

And there is one—

Sig. Good heav'ns! what means my lord?

Sif. One of illustrious family, high rank,
Yet still of higher dignity and merit,
Who can and will protect thee; one to awe
The king himself—nay, hear me, Sigismunda—
The noble Osmond courts thee for his bride,
And has my plighted word. This day—

Sig. (Kneels.) My father!

Let me with trembling arms embrace thy knees.
Oh! if you ever wish to see me happy;
If e'er in infant years I gave you joy,
When, as I prattling twin'd around your neck,
You snatch'd me to your bosom, kiss'd my eyes,
And melting said you saw my mother there;
Oh! save me from that worst severity
Of fate! Oh! outrage not my breaking heart
To that degree! I cannot—'tis impossible—
So soon withdraw it, give it to another—
Or I shall die; shall, by the sudden change,
Be to distraction shock'd. Let me wear out
My hapless days in solitude and silence,
Far from the malice of a prying world;
At least—you cannot, sure, refuse me this—
Give me a little time; I will do all,
All I can do, to please you.

Sif. My daughter! you abuse
The softness of my nature—

Sig. Here, my father,
Till you relent, here will I grow for ever!

Sif. Rise, Sigismunda. Though you touch my heart,

Nothing can shake the inexorable dictates
Of honour, duty, and determin'd reason.
Then by the holy ties of filial love,
Resolve, I charge thee, to receive Earl Osmond,
As suits the man who is thy father's choice,
And worthy of thy hand—I go to bring him—

Sig. Spare me, my dearest father!

Sif. I must rush
From her soft grasp, or nature will betray me!
(Aside.)

Quit me, my child!

Sig. You cannot, oh, my father!
You cannot leave me thus!

Sif. Come hither, Laura,
Come to thy friend. Now show thyself a friend.
Combat her weakness, dissipate her tears,
Cherish, and reconcile her to her duty. [Exit.]

Enter LAURA.

Sig. Oh, woe on woe! distress'd by love and duty!

Oh, every way unhappy Sigismunda!

Lau. Forgive me, madam, if I blame your grief.
How can you waste your tears on one so false?

Unworthy of your tenderness; to whom
Nought but contempt is due, and indignation?

Sig. You know not half the horrors of my fate!
I might, perhaps, have learn'd to scorn his false-
hood;

Nay, when the first sad burst of tears was past,
I might have rous'd my pride and scorn'd himself—
But 'tis too much, this greatest, last misfortune—
Oh, whither shall I fly? Where hide me, Laura,
From the dire scene my father now prepares?

Lau. What thus alarms you, madam?

Sig. Can it be?

Can I—ah, no!—at once give to another
My violated heart? in one wild moment!
He brings Earl Osmond to receive my vows.
Oh, dreadful change! for Tancred, haughty Os-
mond. [heart]

Lau. Now, on my soul, 'tis what an outrag'd
Like yours should wish!—I should, by heav'ns, esteem it

Most exquisite revenge!

Sig. Revenge! on whom?

On my own heart, already but too wretched!

Lau. On him! this Tancred! who has basely sold,
For the dull form of despicable grandeur,
His faith, his love!—At once a slave and tyrant!

Sig. Oh, rail at me, at my believing folly,
My vain, ill-founded hopes, but spare him, Laura.

Lau. Who rais'd these hopes? who triumphs o'er that weakness?

Pardon the word—You greatly merit him;
Better than him, with all his giddy pomp;
You rais'd him by your smiles when he was nothing.
Where is your woman's pride, that guardian spirit
Giv'n us to dash the perfidy of man? [ence—
Ye pow'rs! I cannot bear the thought with pati-
Before the public thus, before your father,
By an irrevocable, solemn deed,
With such inhuman scorn, to throw you from him:
To give his faithless hand, yet warm from thine,
With complicated meanness, to Constantia.
And to complete his crime, when thy weak limbs
Could scarce support thee, then, of thee regardless,
To lead her off!

Sig. That was indeed a sight
To poison love; to turn it into rage [ness
And keen contempt. What means this stupid weak-
That hangs upon me? Hence, unworthy tears!
Disgrace my cheek no more! No more, my heart,
For one so coolly false, or meanly fickle,
Dare to suggest

The least excuse! Yes, traitor, I will wring
Thy pride, will turn thy triumph to confusion!
Sicilia's daughters

Shall wond'ring see in me a great example
Of one who punish'd an ill-judging heart,
Who made it bow to what it most abhorr'd,
Crush'd it to misery, for having thus
So lightly listen'd to a worthless lover.

Lau. At last it mounts, the kindling pride of virtue;

Trust me, thy marriage will embitter his.

Sig. Oh, may the furies light his nuptial torch!
Be it accurs'd as mine! For the fair peace,
The tender joys of hymeneal love,
May jealousy awak'd, and fell remorse,
Pour all their fiercest venom through their breast!
Where the fates lead, and blind revenge, I follow—
Let me not think—By injur'd love! I vow,
Thou shalt, base prince! perfidious and inhuman!
Thou shalt behold me in another's arms;
In his thou hatest! Osmond's!

Lau. Ay, that will sting
His soul to madness.

Your cooler thought besides will of the change
Approve, and think it happy.

Sig. Talk not of Osmond, but perfidious Tancred!

Rail at him, rail! invent new names of scorn!
 Assist me, Laura, lend my rage fresh fuel;
 Support my stagg'ring purpose, which already
 Begins to fail me—Ah, my vaunts, how vain!
 How have I lied to my own heart!—Alas,
 My tears return, the mighty flood o'erwhelms
 me!

Lau. If thy own peace and honour cannot keep
 Thy resolution fix'd, yet, Sigismunda,
 Oh, think how deeply, how beyond retreat,
 Thy father is engag'd.

Sig. Ah, wretched weakness!
 That thus enthrals my soul;
 And have I then no tears for thee, my father?
 Can I forget thy cares, from helpless years,
 Thy tenderness for me? Shall I for these Repay thy stooping, venerable age,
 With shame, disquiet, anguish, and dishonour?
 It must not be!—Thou first of angels! come,
 Sweet filial piety, and firm my breast!
 Yes, let one daughter to her fate submit,
 Be nobly wretched—but her father happy!
 Laura!—they come! Oh, heav'ns, I cannot stand
 The horrid trial!—Open, open, earth!
 And hide me from their view.

Lau. Madam.

Re-enter SIFFREDI and OSMOND.

Sif. My daughter,
 Behold my noble friend who courts thy hand,
 And whom to call my son I shall be proud.

Osm. Think not, I presume,
 Madam, on this, your father's kind consent,
 To make me blest. I love you from a heart,
 That seeks your good superior to my own;
 And will by ev'ry art of tender friendship,
 Consult your dearest welfare. May I hope,
 Yours does not disavow your father's choice?

Sig. I am a daughter, sir—and have no pow'r
 O'er my own heart—I die—Support me, Laura.
(Faints.)

Sif. Help—Bear her off—She breathes—my daughter!

Sig. Oh!
 Forgive my weakness—soft—my Laura, lead me—
 To my apartment. [Exeunt Sig. and Lau.]

Sif. Pardon me, my lord,
 If by this sudden accident alarm'd,
 I leave you for a moment. [Exit.]

Osm. Let me think—
 What can this mean? Is it to me aversion?
 Or is it, as I fear'd she loves another?
 Ha!—yes; perhaps the king, the young Count
 Tancred,

They were bred up together—Surely that,
 That cannot be—Has he not giv'n his hand,
 In the most solemn manner, to Constantia?
 Does not his crown depend upon the deed?
 What is it then? I care not what it be.
 My honour now, my dignity demands,
 That my propos'd alliance, by her father,
 And ev'n herself accepted, be not scorn'd.
 I love her too—I never knew till now
 To what a pitch I love her. Oh, she shot
 Ten thousand charms into my inmost soul!
 She look'd so mild, so amiably gentle,
 She bow'd her head, she glow'd with such confusion,

Such loveliness of modesty! She is,
 In gracious mind, in manners, and in person,
 The perfect model of all female beauty!
 She must be mine—She is!—If yet her heart
 Consents not to my happiness, her duty,
 Join'd to my tender cares, will gain so much
 Upon her gen'rous nature—That will follow.

The man of sense, who acts a prudent part,
 Not flatt'ring steals, but forms himself the heart.
[Exit.]

SCENE I.—*The Garden belonging to Siffredi's
 house.*

Enter SIGISMUNDA and LAURA. Sigismunda with a letter in her hand.

Sig. 'Tis done!—I am a slave! The fatal vow
 Has pass'd my lips! Methought in those sad moments,

The tombs around, the saints, the darken'd altar,
 And all the trembling shrines with horror shook.
 But here is still new matter of distress.

Oh, Tancred, cease to persecute me more!
 Oh, grudge me not some calmer state of woe;
 Some quiet gloom to shade my hopeless days,
 Where I may never hear of love and thee!
 Has Laura too conspir'd against my peace?
 Why did you take this letter? Bear it back—
 I will not court new pain. (Gives her the letter.)

Lau. Madam, Rodolpho [me,
 Urg'd me so much, nay, ev'n with tears conjur'd
 But this once more to serve the unhappy king—
 For such he said he was—that though enrag'd,
 Equal with thee, at his inhuman falsehood,
 I could not to my brother's fervent pray'r
 Refuse this office—Read it—His excuses
 Will only more expose his falsehood.

Sig. No:
 It suits not Osmond's wife to read one line
 From that contagious hand—she knows too well!

Lau. He paints him out distress'd beyond expression,

Ev'n on the point of madness.
 He dies to see you, and to clear his faith.

Sig. Save me from that! That would be worse than all! [then]

Lau. I but report my brother's words; who Began to talk of some dark imposition,
 That had deceiv'd us all; when interrupted,
 We heard your father and Earl Osmond near,
 As summon'd to Constantia's court they went.

Sig. Ha! imposition? Well, if I am doom'd
 To be, o'er all my sex, the wretch of love,
 In vain I would resist—Give me the letter—
 To know the worst is some relief—Alas!
 It was not thus, with such dire palpitations,
 That, Tancred, once I us'd to read thy letters.

(Attempts to read the letter, but gives it to Laura.)
 Ah, fond remembrance blinds me! Read it, Laura.

Lau. (Reads.) "Deliver me, Sigismunda, from that most exquisite misery which a faithful heart can suffer —to be thought base by her, from whose esteem even virtue borrows new charms. When I submitted to my cruel situation, it was not falsehood you beheld, but an excess of love. Rather than endanger that, I for awhile gave up my honour. Every moment till I see you stabs me with severer pangs than real guilt itself can feel.
 Let me then conjure you to meet me in the garden, towards the close of the day, when I shall explain the mystery. We have been most inhumanly abused; and that by the means of the very paper which I gave you, from the warmest sincerity of love, to ensure you the heart and hand of
 TANCRED."

Sig. There, Laura, there, the dreadful secret sprung!

That paper! ah, that paper! it suggests
 A thousand horrid thoughts—I to my father
 Gave it! and he perhaps—I dare not cast
 A look that way—If yet indeed you love me,
 Oh, blast me not, kind Tancred, with the truth!
 Oh, pitying keep me ignorant for ever.
 What strange, peculiar misery is mine!
 Reduc'd to wish the man I love were false!

Lau. Madam,
 Behold he comes—the king—

Sig. Heav'ns! how escape?
 No—I will stay—This one last meeting—Leave me.
[Exit Laura.]

Enter TANCRED.

Tan. And are these long, long hours of torture past!

My life! my Sigismunda!

(Throws himself at her feet.)

Sig. Rise, my lord.

To see my sov'reign thus no more becomes me.

Tan. Oh, let me kiss the ground on which you tread!

Let me exhale my soul in softest transport!

Since I again behold my Sigismunda! (Rises.)

Unkind! how couldst thou ever deem me false?

How thus dishonour love? After the vows,
The fervent truth, the tender protestations,
Which mine has often pour'd, to let thy breast,
Whate'er th' appearance was, admit suspicion?

Sig. How! when I heard myself your full consent
To the late king's so just and prudent will?
Heard it before you read, in solemn senate?
When I beheld you give your royal hand,
To her, whose birth and dignity of right
Demands that high alliance? Yes, my lord,
You have done well. The man whom heav'n appoints

To govern others, should himself first learn
To bend his passions to the sway of reason.
In all, you have done well; but when you bid
My humbled hopes look up to you again,
And sooth'd with wanton cruelty my weakness—
That too was well—My vanity deserv'd
The sharp rebuke. [now,

Tan. Chide on, chide on. Thy soft reproaches
Instead of wounding, only sooth my fondness.
No, no, thou charming consort of my soul!
I never lov'd thee with such faithful ardour,
As in that cruel, miserable moment
You thought me false.

It was thy barb'rous father, Sigismunda,
Who caught me in the toil. He turn'd that paper,
Meant for th' assuring bond of nuptial love,
To ruin it for ever; he, he wrote
That forg'd consent, you heard, beneath my name,
Had he not been thy father—Ha! my love!
You tremble, you grow pale!

Sig. Oh, leave me, Tancred! [set

Tan. No!—Leave thee!—Never! never till you
My heart at peace, till these dear lips again
Pronounce thee mine! Without thee, I renounce
Myself, my friends, the world—Here on this hand—

Sig. My lord, forget that hand, which never now
Can be to thine united—

Tan. Sigismunda!

What dost thou mean?

Sig. Inquire no more—I never can be thine.

Tan. What, who shall interpose? Who dares attempt

To brave the fury of an injur'd king,
Who, ere he sees thee ravish'd from his hopes,
Will wrap all blazing Sicily in flames?

Sig. In vain your pow'r, my lord—'Tis fatal error,
Join'd to my father's unrelenting will,
Has plac'd an everlasting bar betwixt us—
I am—Earl Osmond's—wife.

Tan. Earl Osmond's wife!

(After a long pause, during which they look at one another with the highest agitation, and most tender distress.)

Heav'ns! did I hear thee right? What! marry'd?
marry'd!

Lost to thy faithful Tancred? lost for ever!
Couldst thou then doom me to such matchless woe,
Without so much as hearing me? Distraction!
Alas! what hast thou done? Ah, Sigismunda!
Thy rash credulity has done a deed,
Which, of two happiest lovers that e'er felt
The blissful pow'r, has made two finish'd wretches!
But—madness!—Sure thou know'st it cannot be!
This hand is mine! a thousand thousand vows—
Enter OSMOND.

Osm. (Snatches her hand from the king.) Madam,
this hand, by the most solemn rites,
A little hour ago, was giv'n to me,

And did not sov'reign honour now command me,
Never but with my life to quit my claim,
I would renounce it—thus!

Tan. Ha, who art thou?

Presumptuous man!

Sig. (Aside.) Where is my father? Heav'ns!

Osm. One thou shouldst better know—Yes—view me, one

Who can and will maintain his rights and honour,
Against a faithless prince, an upstart king,
Whose first base deed is what a harden'd tyrant
Would blush to act.

Tan. Insolent Osmond! know,
This upstart king will hurl confusion on thee,
And all who shall invade his sacred rights,
Prior to thine—thine, founded on compulsion,
On infamous deceit!—I will annul,
By the high pow'r with which the laws invest me,
Those guilty forms in which you have entrapp'd,
My queen betroth'd, who has my heart, my hand,
And shall partake my throne—if, haughty lord,
If this thou didst not know, then know it now;
And know, besides, as I have told thee this,
Shouldst thou but think to urge thy treason further—
Thy life shall answer for it.

Osm. Ha! my life!—

It moves my scorn to hear thy empty threats.
When was it that a Norman baron's life
Became so vile, as on the frown of kings
To hang?—Of that, my lord, the law must judge;
Or, if the law be weak, my guardian sword—

Tan. Dare not to touch it, traitor, lest my rage
Break loose, and do a deed that misbecomes me.

Enter SIFFREDI.

Sif. My gracious lord, what is it I behold?
My sov'reign in contention with his subject?
Surely this house deserves from royal Tancred
A little more regard, than to be made
A scene of trouble, and unseemly jars.
Heavens! can your highness
From your exalted character descend,
Unkindly thus disturb the sweet repose,
The secret peace of families, for which Alone the free-born race of man to laws
And government submitted?

Tan. My lord Siffredi,
Spare thy rebuke. The duties of my station
Are not to me unknown. But thou, old man,
Dost thou not blush to talk of rights invaded;
And of our best our dearest bliss disturb'd?
Thou, who with more than barbarous perfidy
Hast trampled all allegiance, justice, truth,
Humanity itself, beneath thy feet?
Thou know'st thou hast—I could, to thy confusion,
Return thy hard reproaches; but I spare thee
Before this lord, for whose ill-sorted friendship
Thou hast most basely sacrific'd thy daughter.
Farewell, my lord. For thee, lord constable,
Who dost presume to lift thy surly eye
To my soft love, my gentle Sigismunda,
I once again command thee on thy life—
Yes, chew thy rage, but mark me, on thy life,
No further urge thy arrogant pretensions! [Exit.

Osm. Ha! Arrogant pretensions! Heaven and earth!

What! arrogant pretensions to my wife?
My wedded wife! Where are we? in a land
Of civil rule, of liberty and laws?
Not, on my life, pursue them? Giddy prince!
My life disdains thy nod. It is the gift
Of parent heaven, who gave me to an arm,
A spirit to defend it against tyrants.
Mine is a common cause. My arm shall guard,
Mix'd with my own, the rights of each Sicilian;
Ere to thy tyrant rage they fall a prey,
I shall find means to shake thy tottering throne,
And crush thee in the ruins!
Constantia is my queen!

Sif. Lord constable,
Let us be stedfast in the right; but let us
Act with cool prudence, and with manly temper,
As well as manly firmness. Remember that my house

Protects my daughter still; and ere I saw her
Thus ravish'd from us by the arm of power,
This hand should act the Roman father's part.
Fear not; be temperate; all will yet be well.
I know the king. Trust me, to reason
He will return.

Osm. He will! By heavens, he shall!
You know the king—I wish, my Lord Siffredi,
That you had deign'd to tell me all you knew—
And would you have me wait, with duteous patience,

Till he return to reason? Ye just powers!

When he has planted on our necks his foot,
And trod us into slaves; when his vain pride
Is cloy'd with our submission.

No, no, my lord! there is a nobler way,
To teach the blind oppressive fury reason:
Oft has the lustre of avenging steel
Unseal'd the stupid eyes—The sword is reason!

Enter RODOLPHO, with Guards.

Rod. My lord high constable of Sicily.
In the king's name, and by his special order,
I here arrest you prisoner of state.

Osm. What king? I know no king of Sicily,
Unless he be the husband of Constantia. [orders]

Rod. Then know him now—behold his royal
To bear you to the castle of Palermo.

Sif. Let the big torrent foam its madness off.
Submit, my lord—No castle long can hold
Our wrongs. This, more than friendship or alliance,

Confirms me thine; this binds me to thy fortunes,
By the strong tie of common injury,
Which nothing can dissolve. I grieve, Rodolpho,
To see the reign in such unhappy sort
Begin.

Osm. The reign! the usurpation call it!
This meteor king may blaze awhile, but soon
Must spend his idle terrors—sir, lead on—
Farewell, my lord—more than my life and fortune,
Remember well, is in your hands—my honour!

Sif. Our honour is the same. My son, farewell—
We shall not long be parted. On these eyes
Sleep shall not shed his balm, till I behold thee
Restor'd to freedom, or partake thy bonds.

[Exeunt]

ACT V.—SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter SIFFREDI.

Sif. The prospect lowers around. I found the king,
Though calm'd a little, with subsiding tempest,
As suits his generous nature, yet in love
Abated nought, most ardent in his purpose;
Inexorably fix'd, whate'er the risk,
To claim my daughter, and dissolve this marriage—
I have embark'd, upon a perilous sea,
A mighty treasure.

Bear witness, heaven! thou mind-inspecting eye!
My breast is pure. I have prefer'd my duty,
The good and safety of my fellow-subjects,
To all those views that fire the selfish race
Of mortal men, and mix them in eternal broils.

Enter an Officer belonging to Siffredi.

Offi. My lord, a man of noble port, his face
Wrapt in disguise, is earnest for admission.

Sif. Go, bid him enter— [Exit Offi.]
Ha! wrapt in disguise!
And at this late unseasonable hour!
Who can it be?

Enter OSMOND, discovering himself.

Sif. Earl Osmond, you? Welcome, once more,
To this glad roof! But why in this disguise?
Would I could hope the king exceeds his promise!
I have his faith, soon as to-morrow's sun

Shall gild Sicilia's cliffs, you shall be free—
Has some good angel turn'd his heart to justice?

Osm. It is not by the favour of Count Tancred
That I am here. As much I scorn his favour,
As I defy his tyranny and threats—
Our friend Goffredo, who commands the castle,
On my parole, ere dawn to render back
My person, has permitted me this freedom.
Know then, the faithless outrage of to-day,
By him committed whom you call the king,
Has rous'd Constantia's court. Our friends, the friends

Of virtue, justice, and of public faith,
Ripe, for revolt, are in high ferment all.
I thence of you, as guardian of the laws,
As guardian of this will, to you entrusted,
Desire, nay more, demand your instant aid,
To see it put in vig'rous execution. [rence.]

Sif. You cannot doubt, my lord, of my concur-
Who, more than I, have labour'd this great point?
'Tis my own plan; and if I drop it now,
I should be justly branded with the shame
Of rash advice, or despicable weakness.
But let us not precipitate the matter.

Constantia's friends are numerous and strong;
Yet Tancred's, trust me, are of equal force:

E'er since the secret of his birth was known,
The people all are in a tumult hurl'd,
Of boundless joy. Oh! if our prattling virtue
Dwells not in words alone—Oh, let us join,
My generous Osmond, to avert these woes,
And yet sustain our tott'ring Norman kingdom!

Osm. But how, Siffredi, how? If by soft means
We can maintain our rights, and save our country,
May his unnatural blood first stain the sword,
Who with un pitying fury first shall draw it!

Sif. I have a thought—The glorious work be thine.

Suppose my daughter, to her God devoted,
Were plac'd within some convent's sacred verge,
Beneath the dread protection of the altar—

Osm. Ere then, by heavens! I would Turn whining monk myself.

And pray incessant for the tyrant's safety.
What! how! because an insolent invader,
A sacrilegious tyrant, demands my wife;
What! shall I tamely yield her up,
Even in the manner you propose? Oh, then
I were supremely vile! degraded! sham'd!
The scorn of manhood! and abhorr'd of honour!

Sif. There is, my lord, an honour, the calm child
Of reason, of humanity, and mercy,
Superior far to this punctilious demon,
That singly minds itself, and oft embroils
With proud barbarian niceties the world.

Osm. My lord, my lord, I cannot brook your prudence;

It holds a pulse unequal to my blood—
Unblemish'd honour is the flower of virtue!
The vivifying soul! and he who slights it,
Will leave the other dull and lifeless dross.

Sif. No more, you are too warm.

Osm. You are too cool.

Sif. Too cool, my lord? I were indeed too cool,
Not to resent this language, and to tell thee—
I wish Earl Osmond were as cool as I
To his own selfish bliss—ay, and as warm
To that of others—But of this no more—
My daughter is thy wife—I gave her to thee,
And will, against all force, maintain her thine.
But think not I will catch thy headlong passions,
Whirl'd in a blaze of madness o'er the land;
Or, till the last extremity compell'd me,
Risk the dire means of war—The king, to-morrow,
Will set you free; and, if by gentle means
He does not yield my daughter to your arms,
And wed Constantia, as the will requires,
Why then expect me on the side of justice—
Let that suffice.

Osm. It does—Forgive my heat,
My rankled mind, by injuries inflam'd,
May be too prompt to take and give offence.

Sif. 'Tis past—Your wrongs, I own, may well transport

The wisest mind—But henceforth, noble Osmond,
Do me more justice, honour more my truth,
Nor mark me with an eye of squint suspicion—
Return, my son, and from your friend Goffredo
Release your word. There try, by soft repose,
To calm your breast.

Osm. Bid the vex'd ocean sleep,
Swept by the pinions of the raging north—
But your frail age, by care and toil exhausted,
Demands the balm of all-repairing rest. [skies,

Sif. Soon as to-morrow's dawn shall streak the
I, with my friends in solemn state assembled,
Will to the palace, and demand your freedom.
Then by calm reason, or by higher means,
The king shall quit his claim, and in the face
Of Sicily, my daughter shall be yours.
Farewell.

Osm. My lord, good night. [Exit Sif.

(After a long pause.) I like him not—
Yes, I have mighty matter of suspicion.
My honour is not safe, while here my wife
Remains. Who knows but he this very night
May bear her to some convent, as he mention'd.
The king too, though I smother'd up my rage,
I mark'd it well—will set me free to-morrow.
Why not to-night? He has some dark design—
By heav'ns, he has! I'm abus'd most grossly;
Made the vile tool of this old statesman's schemes;
I will not wait his crawling timid motions,
I will convince him that Earl Osmond never
Was form'd to be his dupe—I will bear her off
This night, and lodge her in a place of safety:
I have a trusty hand that waits not far.
Hence! let me lose no time—One rapid moment
Should ardent form, at once, and execute
A bold design—'Tis fix'd—The mine is laid,
And only wants my kindling torch to spring.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—Sigismunda's Apartment.

Thunder. SIGISMUNDA and LAURA discovered.

Lau. Heavens! 'tis a fearful night!

Sig. Ah! the black rage
Of midnight tempest, or th' assuring smiles
Of radiant morn, are equal all to me.
Nought now has charms or terror to my breast.
The seat of stupid woe! Leave me, my Laura.
Kind rest, perhaps, may hush my woes a little.
Oh, for that quiet sleep that knows no morning!

Lau. Madam, indeed I know not how to go.
Indulge my fondness—Let me watch awhile
By your sad bed, 'till these dread hours shall pass.

Sig. Alas! what is the toil of elements, (Thunder.)
This idle perturbation of the sky,
To what I feel within? Oh, that the fires
Of pitying heaven would point their fury here!
Good night, my dearest Laura.

Lau. Oh, I know not
What this oppression means—But 'tis with pain,
With tears, I can persuade myself to leave you—
Well then—Good night, my dearest Sigismunda.

[Exit.

Sig. And am I then alone? The most undone,
Most wretched being now beneath the cope
Of this affrighting gloom that wraps the world—
I said I did not fear—Ah, me! I feel
A shiv'ring horror run through all my powers!
Oh, I am nought but tumult, fears, and weakness!
And yet how idle fear, when hope is gone,
Gone, gone for ever! Oh, thou gentle scene

(Looking towards her bed.)

Of sweet repose, where, by the oblivious draught
Of each sad toilsome day, to peace restor'd,
Unhappy mortals lose their woes awhile,—
Thou hast no peace for me! What shall I do?

How pass this dreadful night, so big with terror?
Here with the midnight shade, here will I sit,
(Sitting down.)

A prey to dire despair, and ceaseless weep
The hours away—Bless me—I heard a noise—
(Starting up.)

No, I mistook; nothing but silence reigns,
And awful midnight round. Again! Oh, heav'ns!
My lord the king!

Enter TANCRED.

Tan. Be not alarm'd, my love!

Sig. My royal lord, why, at this midnight hour—
How came you hither?

Tan. By that secret way
My love contriv'd, when we, in happier days,
Us'd to devote these hours, so much in vain,
To vows of love, and everlasting friendship.

Sig. Why will you thus persist to add new stings
To her distress, who never can be thine?
Oh, fly me! fly! you know—

Tan. I know too much.
Oh, how I could reproach thee, Sigismunda!
Pour out my injur'd soul in just complaints!
But now the time permits not; these swift moments—

I told thee how thy father's artifice
Forc'd me to seem perfidious in thy eyes.
Ever since—a dreadful interval of care!
My thoughts have been employ'd, not without hope,
How to defeat Siffredi's barb'rous purpose.
But thy credulity has ruin'd all,
Thy rash, thy wild—I know not what to name it—
Oh, it has prov'd the giddy hopes of man
To be delusion all, and sick'ning folly!

Sig. Ah, gen'rous Tancred! ah, thy truth destroy me!

Yes, yes, 'tis I, 'tis I alone am false!
My hasty rage, join'd to my tame submission,
More than the most exalted filial duty
Could e'er demand, has dash'd our cup of fate
With bitterness unequal'd. But, alas!
What are thy woes to mine?—to mine! just heaven! [me!

Now is thy turn of vengeance—hate, renounce
Oh, leave me to the fate I well deserve,
To sink in hopeless misery! At least,
Try to forget the worthless Sigismunda!

Tan. Forget thee! No! Thou art my soul itself!
I have no thought, no hope, no wish but thee!
Ah, how forget thee! Much must be forgot,
Ere Tancred can forget his Sigismunda!

Sig. But you, my lord, must make that great effort.

Tan. Can Sigismunda make it?

Sig. Ah, I know not
With what success—But all that feeble woman
And love-entangl'd reason can perform,
I to the utmost will exert to do it.

Tan. Oh, barbarous Sigismunda!
And canst thou talk thus steadily; thus treat me
With such unpitying, unrelenting rigour?
Poor is the love, that rather than give up
A little pride, a little formal pride,
The breath of vanity, can bear to see
The man, whose heart was once so dear to thine,
By many a tender vow so mix'd together,
A prey to anguish, fury, and distraction!
Thou canst not surely make me such a wretch,
Thou canst not, Sigismunda! Yet relent,
Oh, save us yet! Rodolpho, with my guards,
Waits in the garden—Let us seize the moments
We ne'er may have again. With more than power
I will assert thee mine, with fairest honour.
The world shall ev'n approve; each honest bosom
Swell'd with a kindred joy to see us happy.

Sig. The world approve! what is the world
to me?

The conscious mind is its own awful world—
And mine is fix'd—Distress me, then, no more;

Not all the heart can plead (and it, alas!
Pleads but too much)
Shall ever shake th' unalterable dictates
That tyrannize my breast.

Tan. 'Tis well—no more—
I yield me to my fate. Yes, yes, inhuman!
Since thy barbarian heart is steel'd by pride,
Shut up to love and pity, here behold me
Cast on the ground, a vile and abject wretch!
Lost to all cares, all dignities, all duties!
Here will I grow, breathe out my faithful soul,
Here at thy feet—Death, death alone shall part us!

Sig. Have you then vow'd to drive me to perdition!

What can I more? Yes, Tancred! once again
I will forget the dignity my station
Commands me to sustain—for the last time
Will tell thee, that, I fear no ties, no duty,
Can ever root thee from thy hapless bosom.
Oh, leave me! fly me! were it but in pity!
To see what once we tenderly have lov'd,
Cut off from every hope—cut off for ever!
Is pain thy generosity should spare me.
Then rise, my lord; and if you truly love me,
If you respect my honour, nay, my peace,
Retire! for though th' emotions of my heart
Can ne'er alarm my virtue; yet, alas!
They tear it so, they pierce it with such anguish—
Oh, 'tis too much! I cannot bear the conflict!

Enter OSMOND.

Osm. Turn, tyrant, turn! and answer to my honour,
For this thy base insufferable outrage!

Tan. Insolent traitor! Think not to escape
Thyself my vengeance! (They fight, Osm. falls.)

Sig. Help, here, help! Oh, heavens!
(Throwing herself down by him.)

Alas, my lord, what meant your headlong rage?
That faith, which I this day, upon the altar,
To you devoted, is unblemish'd, pure
As vestal truth; was resolutely yours,
Beyond the power of aught on earth to shake it.

Osm. Perfidious woman! die! (Shortening his sword, he plunges it into her breast.) and to the grave

Attend a husband, yet but half aveng'd!

Tan. Oh, horror! horror! execrable villain!

Osm. And, tyrant! thou!—thou shalt not o'er my tomb

Exult—'Tis well—'Tis great!—I die content!
(Dies.)

Enter RODOLPHO and LAURA.

Tan. (Throwing himself down by Sig.) Quick!
here! bring aid! Ah, that gentle bosom
Pours fast the streams of life.

Sig. All aid is vain,
I feel the powerful hand of death upon me—
But, oh! it sheds a sweetness through my fate,
That I am thine again; and without blame
May in my Tancred's arms resign my soul!

Tan. Oh, death is in that voice so gently mild,
So sadly sweet, as mixes even with mine
The tears of hovering angels! Mine again!
And is it thus the cruel fates have join'd us?
Are these the horrid nuptials they prepare
For love like ours? Yes, death shall soon unite us.

Sig. Live, live, my Tancred! Let my death suffice

To expiate all that may have been amiss.
May it appease the fates, avert their fury
From thy propitious reign!

Enter SIFFREDI, fixed in astonishment and grief.

My father! Oh, how shall I lift my eyes
To thee, my sinking father?

Sif. Awful heaven!
I am chastis'd—My dearest child!

Sig. Where am I?
A fearful darkness closes all around—

My friends! We needs must part—I must obey
Th' impetuous call. Farewell, my Laura!
Oh, my dear father, bow'd beneath the weight
Of age and grief—the victim ev'n of virtue,
Receive my last adieu! Where art thou, Tancred?
Give me thy hand—But, ah—it cannot save me
From the dire king of terrors, whose cold pow'r
Creeps o'er my heart—Oh!

Tan. How these pangs distract me!
Oh, lift thy gracious eyes;—Thou leav'st me then!
Thou leav'st me, Sigismunda!

Sig. Yes, but thy love and tenderness for me,
Sure makes it needless—Harbour no resentment
Against my father, venerate his zeal,
That acted from a principle of goodness,
From faithful love to thee. Live, and maintain
My innocence embalm'd, with holiest care—
Preserve my spotless memory! Oh—I die—
Eternal Mercy take my trembling soul!
Oh, 'tis the only sting of death to part
From those we love—from thee—farewell, my Tancred! (Dies.)

Tan. Thus then!

(Flies to his sword, is held by Rodolpho.)

Rod. Hold, hold, my lord! Have you forgot
Your Sigismunda's last request already?

Tan. Off! set me free! Think not to bind me
down,

With barb'rous friendship, to the rack of life!
What hand can shut the thousand thousand gates
Which death still opens to the woes of mortals?
I shall find means—No pow'r in earth or heav'n
Can force me to endure the hateful light,
Thus robb'd of all that lent it joy and sweetness!
Off, traitors, off! or my distracted soul
Will burst indignant from the gaol of nature,
To where she beckons yonder. No, mild seraph,
Point not to life—I cannot linger here,
Cut off from thee, the miserable pity,
The scorn of humankind! A trampled king!
Who let his mean, poor-hearted love, one moment,
To coward prudence stoop! who made it not
The first undoubting action of his reign,
To snatch thee to his throne, and there to shield
Thy helpless bosom from a ruffian's fury!
Oh, shame! Oh, agony! Oh, the fell stings
Of late, of vain repentance! Ha! my brain
Is all on fire! a wild abyss of thought!
Th' infernal world discloses! See! Behold him!
Lo! with fierce smiles he shakes the bloody steel,
And mocks my feeble tears. Hence, quickly hence!
Spurn his vile carcass! give it to the dogs!
Expose it to the winds and screaming ravens!
Or hurl it down that fiery steep to hell,
There with his soul to toss in flames for ever.
Ah, impotence of rage!

Rod. Preserve him, heaven!

Tan. What am I? Where?

Sad, silent, all? The forms of dumb despair,
Around some mournful tomb. What do I see?
This soft abode of innocence and love
Turn'd to the house of death! a place of horror!
Ah, that poor corse! pale! pale! deform'd with murder!

Is that my Sigismunda?

(Throws herself down by her.)

Sif. (After a pathetic pause, looking on the scene before him.) Have I liv'd

To these enfeebled years, by heav'n reserv'd
To be a dreadful monument of justice?

Taught hence, ye parents, who from nature stray,
And the great ties of social life betray;
Ne'er with your children act a tyrant's part:
'Tis yours to guide, not violate the heart.
Ye vainly wise, who o'er mankind preside,
Behold my righteous woes, and drop your pride;
Keep virtue's simple path before your eyes,
Nor think from evil good can ever rise.

[Exeunt.]

EDWARD, THE BLACK PRINCE;

OR, THE BATTLE OF POICTIERS:

AN HISTORICAL TRAGEDY, IN FIVE ACTS.—BY WILLIAM SHIRLEY.

Act V.—Scene 5.

CHARACTERS.

EDWARD, PRINCE OF WALES	LORD CHANDOS	CARDINAL PERIGORT	LORD RIBEMONT
EARL OF WARWICK	ARNOLD	ARCHBISHOP OF SENS	LORD CHARNEY
EARL OF SALISBURY	JOHN, KING OF FRANCE	DUKE OF TOURAIN	MARIANA
LORD AUDLEY	DAUPHIN	DUKE OF ATHENS	LOUISA

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Prince of Wales's Tent.

PRINCE EDWARD discovered, seated; EARL OF WARWICK, EARL OF SALISBURY, LORD AUDLEY, LORD CHANDOS, and others, standing.

P. Edw. My lords, I summon'd ye in haste to Intelligence is brought me that our foes [council.
Have levied, to oppose us, such a strength
As almost staggers credibility.

What's to be done? To tarry longer here,
And brave their fury in the heart of France,
Would be a rashness that may hazard all.
Consider, therefore, well, my fellow-warriors,
And aid my judgment with your good advice;
Speak, Warwick, your opinion.

War. Royal sir,
It is for marching back, with speed, to Bourdeaux.
Our little army, harass'd with fatigue,
And heavy-laden with the spoils of war,
Should, like the careful bees, ere storm o'ertake us,
Secure our treasures, and prepare for rest.
Hayock has wanton'd in our hard campaign,
And manly daring won increase of glory:
Then let not now presumption madly risk
Reprisals from such force. Be timely prudent:
The voice of wisdom urges our retreat,
Obey it and be happy.

Aud. Shameful thought!
What, spirit dastards, by inglorious flight?
No; never let it, mighty prince, be said,
That we who, two succeeding summers, chas'd

From shore to shore of their extensive realm
Collected armies, doubling each our own,
Should here, at length, discover abject fear,
And skulk for coward safety. What are numbers?
Let all their kingdom's millions arm at once,
And crowding, clust'ring, cram the field of fight!
Such timid throngs, with multiply'd dismay,
Would make confusion do the task of valour,
And work out their destruction.

Sal. Audley's thoughts
Accord with mine: while Salisbury has breath,
His tongue shall hurl defiance at their force.
Remember, princely Edward, Cressy's field:
Remember ev'ry battle we have fought,
How much out-counted, yet how greatly victors!
Loud were the calls that broke our sleep of peace,
And bade us rouse and buckle on our arms:
A throne usurp'd, your royal father's right;
A violated truce, a vile attempt
To filch away the fruits of painful conquest,
By basely bribing servants from their duty.
Assaults so infamous, such rank dishonour,
At last awoke our monarch's high resentment;
Oh! give it glorious scope. Unhinge, destroy
Their very pow'r of doing future wrongs:
So shall the rescu'd world pour forth its blessings,
And kings and kingdoms thank our arm for safety.

Chan. If Chandos gives his voice for our retreat,
'Tis not from coward motives: all can witness
I have met danger with as firm a spirit
As any in our host. But as success
Hath crown'd our arms with ample spoils and glory,

Why, when the season is so far advanc'd,
(Hopeless of profit,) should we longer stay,
By soothing pride, to brave adversity?
Consider, gracious prince, and you, my lords,
What difficulties clog a winter march
In hostile countries; parties harassing,
And want of all convenience and supplies.
I do confess, the wrongs that urg'd us hither
Were such as merited severe revenge:
And vengeance we have had. Their burning towns
Have lighted us on many a midnight march,
While shrieks and groans, and yellings echo'd round.
Fear and confusion were our harbingers,
And death and desolation our attendants. [paings,
Such have their suff'rings been through two cam-
And that a third may rise with added horrors,
And carry indignation to his goal,
Now homeward let us look; and wisely there
Recruit, in time, our vigour and our numbers;
Thence, with the cheerful spring, to issue forth,
Again to labour in the field of fame. [tongue,

P. Edw. True wisdom, Chandos, dictates to your
And modest, manly eloquence adorns it.
My lords of Salisbury and Audley, you,
Who cherish truth and candour in your minds,
Must yield to arguments so clear and strong.
Believe me, friends and brothers of the war,
A momentary ruin may involve us:
Such mighty hosts are rais'd, and now in motion,
As well will task our utmost skill to 'scape.
Upon the plains of Poitiers are encamp'd,
Th' extensive plains that our retreat must skirt,
An army double ours.

Aud. And shall we pass?
Go tamely by? And give 'em cause for vaunting,
That Englishmen avoided once a battle?
No; never let us merit such a stain;
But boldly seek 'em, dare their double numbers,
And drive 'em, if a combat they decline,
To skip and wanton at a safer distance.

Sal. Give us, my prince, the pleasure but to spring
This gaudy flight of prating popinjays,
And we'll retire contented.

Chan. There my voice
Shall join ye, lords: to force them from their home
At such a juncture will be doubly glorious!
Or should they venture battle, their discomfit
Will render our retreat to Bourdeaux safe,
And end our labours with a noble triumph.

P. Edw. Then be it so: for Poitiers we'll prepare. (Rising.)
Give instant orders, good my lords, for marching:
To-morrow's sun shall see us face our foes.
There, if they wait our coming, we once more
Will dress contention in her Gorgon horrors:
Drive fear and slaughter through their shudd'ring
ranks,
Stalk o'er their mangled heaps, and, bath'd in blood,
Seize with red hands the wreath of victory.
Here break we off; go each where duty calls.

[Exeunt Lords.]
Now for an office is most grateful to me.
Who waits? Let Arnold know that I expect him.
(A Gentleman appears and retires again.)
How poor the pomps and trophies of the field,
The blaze of splendour, or that bubble praise,
Compar'd with what the sympathizing heart
Feels from a gen'rous action!

Enter ARNOLD.

Welcome, Arnold.
I ne'er behold thy face, but pleasure springs
With the remembrance of those sprightly days,
Which led through early youth our happy friendship.
Thou wert my brother then; familiar ease
Season'd our sports, and doubled each delight.
Thither my soul, from ceremonious pomp,
And all the heavy toils of high command,
Oft backward looks, with wishes to renew

Those lively transports, unallay'd by care,
Our boundless happiness, our bursts of joy.

Arn. So honour'd, gracious prince, as I have been,
From humble fortune rais'd to envy'd greatness,
And still with ev'ry grace each gift made precious,
Oh! what are words in payment of such blessings?
What, ev'n my life? were life itself laid down
In gratitude for such transcendent goodness.

P. Edw. If there's a transport tow'ring to divine;
If, in atonement for its load of cares,
One vast enjoyment is the gift of greatness,
'Tis that we can bestow where merit claims,
And with our favours cheer or charm the soul.
Thine is the vacant military post,
By Mountford's death reverted to my gift;
And keep thy office in my household still:
I must not lose the servant in the soldier.
Be henceforth both, and, what is more, my friend.

Arn. How shall I praise—

P. Edw. Arnold, I merit none.
If thou hast kindness done thee, I have pleasure:
There is no joy a gen'rous mind can know,
Like that of giving virtue its reward;
Nor ought such payment be esteem'd a bounty;
For to deserve and give is equal favour.
But let me ask thee of thy beauteous charge:
How has the noble Mariana borne
Captive calamity?

Arn. With resignation
Worthy her birth and dignity of spirit.
Forgetting her misfortunes, all her talk
Turns on the topic of your kind protection.

P. Edw. Let it extend to all that can relieve
The mind from harsh reflections on her state.
We're now preparing for the plains of Poitiers:
Accommodate her on the wearying way
With thy best care. Remember, I request it. [Exit.

Arn. Rely, my royal master, on my duty.
Needless injunction: Mariana's charms
Have given her here such absolute command,
My very soul, my ev'ry pow'r, is hers.
But the cold maid, whene'er I plead my passion,
Chills me with sighs, and stifles all my flame
Of love with streaming tears. Benignant heav'n!
Bless'd as I am with royal Edward's favour,
And Mariana's charms: and all beyond
Let mad ambition grapple for and gain. [Exit.

SCENE II.—The French Camp.

Enter LORD CHARNEY and the ARCHBISHOP OF SENS.

Char. My lord of Sens, I gladly give your grace
A joyful welcome to the plains of Poitiers.
You come the happy harbinger of comfort,
Returning to old Charney's woe-worn mind.
The king's approach revives my drooping spirits,
It feeds the dying lamp of life with hope
That I shall live to riot in revenge.
Those English locusts, who devour our wealth,
Who spoil and slaughter with so wild a fury—
Grant, ye good pow'rs! these eyes may see de-
And I shall die contented. [stroy'd,

Sens. Ev'ry tongue
Joins that petition: your misfortunes, lord,
Most nearly touch the king.

Char. Oh! they are great:
The pride of ancient lineage treasur'd up,
Trophies of war and ornaments of pomp,
These won by valour, those with honour worn;
Favours of monarchs, and the gifts of heaven;
The relics of a glorious ancestry,
Are, with the mansion of my great forefathers,
A heap of ashes now; a wide-spread ruin.
My age's blessing, too, an only daughter,
Torn from her home to hard captivity,
The prey, the victim of a fell revenge.
Oh, matchless misery! Oh, Mariana!

Sens. Your sorrows have been wept by ev'ry eye:

And all have wonder'd what should mark you out
For such peculiar vengeance.

Char. Nothing but
The service done our master, when I brib'd
Their governor to give up Calais to us:
Who, like a villain, broke his plighted faith,
And sacrific'd the gallant troops I led
To Edward's fury: slaughter'd all or taken,
I was amongst the train who grac'd his triumph.
There the proud king insulted me with taunts;
He call'd our undertaking vile and base:
With low'ring brow and bitterness of speech,
Adding, he hop'd the fortune of his arms
Would give him to reward my treachery.
The father's wishes hath the son accomplish'd:
For which, may all the rage of ev'ry curse,
Flames, famines, pestilences, slaughters, join
To root from nature the detested race.

Sens. Grant it, good heav'n! But see, the Duke of Athens.

Enter DUKE OF ATHENS.

Char. Lord constable, most welcome to my arms.

Ath. I thank you, noble Charney.

Char. Are the train
Of royal warriors, sir, arriv'd?

Ath. They are.

Char. Oh! joyful tidings! Sir, another hour
Shall speak, at large, my pleasure to behold you:
The present claims my duty to the king. [Exit.]

Ath. My lord of Sens, these secret marches made
From different parts by our divided host,
May steal us on our unprepared foes,
And give our arms, at length, an ample vengeance.

Sens. I greatly hope it. As I think, to-morrow,
Or I mistook the king, they'll all be here?

Ath. With early day, the instant we arriv'd,
A numerous party, led by Ribemont,
Came up and join'd us. Those the dauphin brings,
Our last division, are to march by night;
We may expect them with to-morrow's dawn.

Sens. See, Ribemont is here.

Enter LORD RIBEMONT.

Rib. Why, this looks well!

Here's bustle, expedition! Once again
We shine in arms, and wear a face of war.

Sens. Oh! may they never be again laid down
Till England is repaid with all the plagues
Her sons have brought on France. My eager soul,
As does the fever'd lip for moisture, longs
To see destruction overwhelm that people.

Rib. Indulge no guilty hatred, rev'rend lord;
For fair report, and, let me add, experience,
Picture them lovely to impartial judgment.
The world allows they're valiant, gen'rous, wise;
Endow'd with all that dignifies our nature:
While for their monarch, we'll appeal to facts,
And, sure, they speak him wonderful indeed!
Did not Germania's ermin'd princes meet,
And, as the most renown'd, the first of men,
Elect great Edward to imperial sway?

While he, sublime in ever-conscious glory,
Disdaining rule but on his native throne,
Saw sovereigns offer vassalage in vain.
Then, to his court, from ev'ry peopled realm,
Ev'n from our own, did not the fam'd in arms,
The harness'd knights repair to fill his lists?
To take his judgment in all martial strife?
Submitting int'rest, honour, all was precious,
And ev'n beyond appeal: owning his voice,
Like that of heav'n, incapable of error.

Sens. It grates my soul to hear a Frenchman talk
Of greater glories than he finds at home.
Is not this monarch you would make a god,
Our master's enemy, our country's foe?

Rib. A foe he is, but he's a noble foe.
I know his worth, and therefore will I speak it.
At our attack of Calais, 'twas my fortune
To meet in fight this third king Edward's sword.
I found him all that heathens held their gods,

Artful and mighty; (pardon the proud vaunt)
Too much for me to conquer. Long we stood
Buckler to buckler, clashing steel to steel,
Till by superior soldiership o'ercome,
I yielded to a monarch; but so well,
With hardy vigour, I sustain'd the combat,
That freedom, ransomless, was my reward.
The royal victor, when he bade me go,
Took from his brow this string of orient wealth,
Around my temples twin'd the glittering wreath,
And cry'd, "Shine there, my token of applause."
Oh! if his valour wing'd amazement high,
Where was its flight, when his heroic soul,
Forgetting that my sword had aim'd his slaughter,
O'erlook'd all low regards, all partial ties,
And gave a vanquish'd enemy renown.

Sens. Detested boast! Ambition's taint, my lord,
So warps, so biasses the soldier's judgment—

Rib. Ah! biasses! I tell thee, priest, ambition—
When was it wanting in a churchman's soul?
More odious there, and more pernicious far,
Than when it fires the warrior's breast to glory.
But, down my rage: your office should be peaceful;
Your habit's sacred—let your speech be suited.

Sens. Reproving sir, you think you rail secure,
And so secure remain—howe'er your cause
Might bring ev'n your allegiance into question.

Rib. Said'st thou allegiance? what a vile resort!
And would thy jaundic'd malice stain my fame?
But loyalty, long prov'd, dares bid defiance
To all the base perversion of thy tongue.

I praise my foes, because they merit praise:
I'll praise them to the king—and after fight 'em.
My soul disdains such narrow-hearted spleen,
As owns no excellence beyond a tribe,
Or hates, from envy, all superior merit.

Ath. Forbear, my lord, consider you're enrag'd
With one whose function does forbid revenge.

Rib. Why does the meddling priest provoke resentment?

Let him obey that function: preach repentance
To money-scraping misers, sordid slaves,
The cringing minions of corrupted courts,
The dregs of stews and tyrants of the gown.
There let his zeal be vehement and loud,
But not come here to sap the soldier's honour,
And teach inglorious lessons in a camp. [Exit.]

Ath. Forgive him, good my lord; brave Ribe-
Is all the warrior, bold above restraint, [mont
Of nature noble, but unpolish'd manners.

Sens. I do forgive him. Yet a time may come—
(Aside.)

Ath. Sir, go we to the presence?

Sens. I attend you. [procure]

Ath. There grant, ye pow'rs! our counsels may
The kingdom's safety, and its peace ensure:
In one brave action may our arms succeed,
And in their turn the daring English bleed. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The English Camp.

Enter EARL OF SALISBURY and LORD CHANDOS, meeting.

Chan. Good-morrow, Salisbury; yon rising sun,
As was your wish, beholds us here encamp'd
Upon the plains of Poitiers.

Sal. Noble Chandos,
It was my wish; a wish for England's honour.
To Frenchmen, whom so much we've aw'd and humbled,
Methinks I would not give the least pretence
For arrogance and boasting.

Enter EARL OF WARWICK.

War. Valiant lords,
Wild consternation reigns! Our scouts have brought Intelligence the enemy surrounds us.
By sudden, secret marches, they have drawn

Their troops from ev'ry fertile province hither,
And cut off our retreat.

Sal. Why, then, we'll fight them.

War. Most fatal was our yesterday's advice;
But 'tis his highness' will we straight to council:
Haste, good my lords, for on a single hour,
Perhaps a minute, now our fate depends. [us,

Sal. I'll not believe the French will dare attack
How great soe'er their numbers. But with words
We will not waste the time that may be precious;
Then to the prince's tent, my lords, away. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A private Tent.

Enter ARNOLD, leading MARIANA.

Arn. Now, lovely captive, wilt thou doubly triumph:

The happier cause of France at length prevails,
And we are all undone.

Mar. What mean you, Arnold?

Arn. Encircled here by thy whole country's force,
Unable to sustain their fierce assault,
And all retreat cut off, we have no prospect
But that of total slaughter.

Mar. Hear me, heav'n,
Who oft hast witness'd to the silent tears,
Stream'd down in gratitude for gen'rous treatment.
Now witness (spite of all my country suffers)
That these descend in pity for my foes.

Arn. The fatal accident again restores thee
To liberty, and safety, while from me
It cuts away all hopes of happiness.
I wish not to outlive the bloody hour
Must give thee to thy father, whose abhorrence
Of all that's English, soon will interpose,
And plunge my soul for ever in despair.
Let then thy fancy image what I feel!
Grief chokes the very passages of vent,
And I want utterance for—

Mar. There is no need.
I know thy heart, know all its tender feelings,
Know what sad tumults doubts and fears create,
Whose mingling agonies, in wounded minds,
Sharpen a torture poignant ev'n to madness.
If to thy eloquence of words and looks,
My virgin modesty and captive state
Have hitherto forbid my tongue to answer,
Yet sure my eyes have told my heart was thine.
But now, away with fears and forms; distress
Bears me above restraint, and I will own
To heav'n, to earth, to thee, my father, country,
That Arnold is most dear, most precious to me.

Arn. Hold, my transported heart! Thou heav'nly maid!
What raptures rush at that enchanting sound!
Happy as I am now, destruction, come,
O'erwhelm me in this moment of my bliss;
Ne'er let me pine in hopeless anguish more,
But die thus clasp'd in Mariana's arms.

Mar. And will our fate—will cruel fate divide
us?

Arn. Oh! do not name it: with the very thought Frenzy assaults me. No, we must not, cannot,
Will not be parted. No—

Mar. Alas! I fear
The choice will not be ours. A father's pow'r,
If France prevails, for ever tears thee from me.
And must they conquer? Oh! I find, I feel
I've lost already all regard for France:
England's my country; any country's mine,
That gives me but my safety and my love.
Inform me, tell me, is there no escaping? [rest,

Arn. Thou wilt need none. For me and for the
We have, alas! no prospect but of—

Mar. Stop!
Nor dare inflame a wild imagination,
Lest madness follow: 'midst relentless foes,
Methinks I see thee fall! Behold 'em strike!
I hear thy groans! I see thy gushing blood!
Thy writhing body trampled in the dust!

Oh! save me from the horror. Let us fly;
Let us away this moment: Let us—

Arn. Whither?

Where can we fly? All hope of flight is lost;
There is no possibility—

Mar. There is.

Let us, while yet occasion will permit,
Fly to my father.

Arn. Father!

Mar. He'll protect us.

Arn. Protect us! Dire protection! at the thought
My blood runs chill, and horror quite unmans me.

Mar. Think on the dangers that you brave by staying. [merit

Arn. Think, rather, on the hell that I should
By such desertion—dire and damning guilt!
How dreadfully it shakes me!

Mar. Dost thou tremble?

Then, what should I, a helpless woman, do?
Imagine that, and if thou art a man,
Feel for what I may suffer.

Arn. Suffer! Thou?

Mar. Yes, Arnold, I! The woes that I may suffer—
Amongst the deadly dealings of the field,
Some well-aim'd weapon, through a bleeding wound,
May set thy soul at liberty for ever.
While I, (of mortals though the most undone)
Wanting all means of honourable death,
Must suffer woes beyond description dreadful.
What are my friends, my father, or my country?
Cold are the comforts that they all can give,
When thou, dear darling of my heart, art lost.
Pleasure, and hope, and peace will perish with thee,
And this forlorn, this joyless bosom, then
Become the dreary mansion of despair.
Shall not I rave, blaspheme, and rend my locks?
Devote the hour that gave me birth? and curse
The sun and time, the world, myself, and thee?
Till frenzy prompting, 'gainst some dungeon wall
I dash my burning brains to finish torture.

Arn. Do not awake, thou lovely pleader, do not,
Such tumult-working thoughts within a mind
On madness verging.

Mar. Let us, then, away. [me to it.

Arn. Oh! not for worlds! Not worlds should bribe

Mar. And wilt thou urge thou lov'st me?

Arn. More than life! [thee,

Mar. By heav'n, 'tis false! The spirit that's within
Is not of worth to hazard aught so noble.

Arn. Will daring ev'n to die convince thee?

Mar. No;

Death is a coward's refuge. Dare to live;
Dare wretchedness, reproach—

Arn. No more, no more;

Tempt me no more in vain.

Mar. Art thou so fix'd?

Arn. As fate.

Mar. I've done.

Arn. Then why that angry look?

Mar. It is a curse entail'd upon the sex
To have our counsel scorn'd, our love despis'd.
Go to thy ruin; to my ruin go:
I give thee up—and all my hopes for ever. [dew?

Arn. Why wilt thou blast me with that baleful
Each tender tear that falls in sorrow from thee
(Like melted ore fast dropping on my heart)
Drives life before it with excess of pain.
Come, friendly slaughter, now my only hope,
Free me from sufferings not to be endur'd.

Mar. What, in the hour of trial wouldst thou shrink?

Steal to the shelter of a timeless grave,
And leave me on the rack of dire despair?
Is this a proof of that superior spirit
Asserted by the lordly boaster, man?

Oh! shame upon thee!

Arn. Hear me—

Mar. Not the winds,
That hang the curling billows in the clouds,

Are more impetuous than the rage of scorn
That rises in my bosom.

Arn. Let but reason

Weigh the dire consequence of such a flight.

Mar. The consequence! Why, what do you for-
But certain slaughter? [sake]

Arn. Horrid, damning thought!

Mar. I hop'd my risking wretchedness for love
Would have provok'd some emulation—

Arn. Oh!

Mar. But thou art poor, the hero of pretence;
And, therefore, thus, for ever—

Arn. Take me, lead—

No, stop! it surely was some syren's voice
Would lure me to destruction. Off! stand off!
Thou, thou art she that would ensnare my soul,
Ruin my peace, and sacrifice my fame.
But timely be advis'd: forbear to urge
A deed that all the earth would scorn me for,
All hell want plagues to punish.

Mar. Be undone—

Arn. Undone I am, whatever course I take.
Dreadful alternative! despair, or death,
Or everlasting shame.

Mar. I did not pause;
I chose for Arnold's love to hazard all:
To suffer, if misfortune were our lot,
And never once reproach him or repine.
But he rejects such truth, such tenderness.

Arn. Oh! hear me, help me, save me, sacred

Mar. Deserts a woman in adversity! [powers!
And seeks, in death, a rescue from the woes
Her fortitude encounters!

Arn. 'Tis too much—

It tears my brain—my bosom! oh!

Mar. Thou'rt pale! [me;

Arn. Dizzy and sick—the objects swim before
Reach out thy hand to save me ere I sink:
Oh! what a deprivation of all pow'rs!
Lead me to my tent, I beg thee lead.

Mar. I will.

Lean fearless on my arm, it can sustain thee.

Arn. Oh! boasted manhood, how I feel thy weakness! [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—*A magnificent Pavilion, in which KING
JOHN appears seated in state. On stools, below him, sit the DAUPHIN, DUKES OF BERRY, AN-
JOU, TOURAIN, ORLEANS, and ATHENS, ARCH-BISHOP OF SENS, LORDS RIBEMONT, and CHARNEY, Attendants and Guards all standing.*

K. John. At length, we've caught these lions in our toils,
These English spoilers, who through all our realm
Have mark'd their way with rapine, flames, and slaughter:

Now, by my sacred diadem, I swear,
Beyond a conqueror's joy my pleasure swells,
For that my foes have wrought their own confusion,
And found misfortunes where they meant to deal 'em.
What say you, lords, must soft'ning pity sway?
Or shall we glut our vengeance with their blood?

Char. Heav'n gives them up the victims of your wrath;

Indulge it, then, to their destruction. Mercy
Would mark your majesty the foe of France.
Your bleeding country cries for retribution:
I join it, with a voice by woes enfeebled;
Hear, feel, and strike in such a moving cause,
The cause of wrongs, of wounds, of weeping age.
The widow'd bride, the childless father calls:
The helpless, parentless, unshelter'd babe!
Matrons, bewailing their whole race cut off;
And virgins panting from the recent rape!
Oh! hear, redress, revenge us, royal sir,
For vengeance now is in your pow'r to grant.

Rib. Anger and hatred are disgraceful motives;
Calm dignity should ever counsel kings,
And govern all their actions. When they strike,

It ne'er should be to gratify resentment,
But, like the arm omnipotent of heav'n,
To further justice; to create an awe
May terrify from evil; better minds,
And benefit society.

Ath. The nuncio,
Who follow'd fast your majesty to Poitiers,
Hath sent to claim an audience in behalf
Of yon endanger'd English.

Sens. Do not hear him. [we not?

K. John. Say, lord archbishop, wherefore should

Sens. Knowing your godlike and forgiving nature,
I fear 'twill rob you of much martial glory:
Else might your fame in arms, for this day's action,
Rival the boasts of Macedon or Rome.
And sure your valiant soldiers will repine,
To have the laurels, now so near their grasp,
Snatch'd from their hopes for ever.

Rib. Abject minion!

How shameful to that habit are such flatteries.

(Aside.)

K. John. Yes, I well know my soldiers pant, impatient

To seize this feeble quarry. But our foes,
I must remind you, are so close beset,
That famine soon will throw 'em on our mercy.
Princes and lords, what cause have we to fight?
Why should we waste a drop of Gallic blood,
When conquest may be ours on cheaper terms?

Dauph. But will it suit the glory of your arms
To wait their inclination to surrender?

Or ev'n to grant such parley, as might plume
Their saucy pride t' expect capitulation?

Oh! no, my royal father, rush at once,
O'erwhelm 'em, crush 'em, finish them by slaughter.

Rib. Think not, prince Dauphin, they'll e'er stoop for terms:

Believe me, we have rather cause to expect
A fierce attack, to cut their passage through,
Or perish in the attempt. I know them well,
In many a field have try'd their stubborn spirit;
Have won some honour, by their king, though van-
quish'd;

And when I ponder their intrepid courage,
How much they dare to suffer and attempt,
I'm lost in wonder; and no Cressy need
To make me tremble to provoke their fury.

Dauph. Your tongue, the herald of your vanity,
Methinks, is loud in what were better lost
To all remembrance—a disgraceful tale.
To boast of honours from a victor's bounty,
Is stooping low; is taking abject fame.
If you have valour, give it manly sway,
Busy your sword, but let your tongue be silent.

Rib. My talent never 'twas to idly vaunt—

K. John. No more of this, presumptuous Ribemont,

My lords, we will determine yet on nothing.
I've sent a spy, of known abilities,
To find out the condition of our foes;
From whose report, in council, we'll resolve
On measures that may promise most success.
Meantime, do you inform the nuncio, Athens,
His audience shall be granted. Lords, lead on:
We'll make our morning's progress through the camp. [Exeunt all but Athens and Rib.]

Rib. What boasts made I?

I told the truth, and wherefore, then, this taunt?
Shame on such modesty! The king, just now,
Nice as he seems in breeding and in forms,
With patience heard a supple, fawning priest
Strip all the shrines of fam'd antiquity,
Ev'n make great Cæsar and the son of Philip Resign their laurels to his nobler claim:
Nay, thought him sparing, doubtless, that he left
Great Hercules and Jove unspoil'd to grace him.
By my good sword, an oath with soldiers sacred,
I swear 'twould make an honest stomach heave
To see a throat, so squeamish for another,

Open and gulp a potion down, enough
To poison half mankind.

Ath. Brave Ribemont,
The king's distaste was that you prais'd his foes.
To talk of Cressy and of Edward's feats,
Was to remind him of our crown's disgrace:
'Twas to proclaim what we should wish forgotten,
Our slaughter'd armies, and our monarch's flight.

Rib. What, are our ears too delicate for truth?
If English valour has disgrac'd our arms,
Instead of mean forgetting, we should stamp
The hated image stronger on our minds;
For ever murmur and for ever rage,
Till thence eras'd by nobler feats of arms.
Such are my thoughts, and such my resolution:
I share our country's scandal, and would join
My sword, my blood, to purge away the stain.

Ath. Here, then, occasion meets that patriot-
wish;

Here you may help to blanch our sully'd glory.

Rib. I differ, Athens, widely in opinion;
The harvest is too thin, the field too bare,
To yield the reapers honour. On my soul,
I pity the brave handful we encircle,
And almost wish myself an Englishman
To share a fate so noble.

Ath. Gallant spirit!

Rib. Would our exulting king acquire renown,
Let him reduce his numbers down to theirs.
Then sword to sword, and shield to shield, oppose,
In equal strife, these wondrous sons of war.
There conquest would be glorious! but, as now,
With all our thousands and ten thousands join'd,
By heav'n! 'tis most infamous to fight.

Ath. I must away; my duty calls me hence.
I must applaud this generous regard
For a brave people that have done you honour;
Convinc'd, whene'er you face these fearless foes,
You'll fight 'em warmly as you've prais'd.

Rib. Farewell. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—The English Camp.

Enter LORD AUDLEY and LORD CHANDOS, meeting.

Aud. You're well encounter'd, Chandos; where's the prince?

Chan. Directing the entrenchments: ev'ry duty
His active ardour leads him to engross.
Such heav'nly fortitude inflames his soul,
That all beholders catch new courage from it,
And stifle with astonishment their fears.
From cool unruffled thoughts his orders issue,
While with the meanest soldier he partakes
In ev'ry toil; inspiring, by example,
A glorious zeal and spirit through the camp.

Aud. Yet feels he, as the father of our host,
For ev'ry man's misfortune, but his own.
Thrice have I seen him in successive rounds,
Kindle new courage in each drooping heart,
And drive all fear, all diffidence away.
Yet on the task would tenderness intrude,
As dangers stole and imag'd on his mind:
When, pausing, he would turn his head aside,
Heave a sad sigh, and drop a tender tear.

Enter EARL OF SALISBURY.

Chan. Well, what says Salisbury?

Sal. Why, 'faith! but little:

It is yon Frenchmen's place to talk at present.

Aud. How stand the troops?

Sal. Believe me, not so firm,
But our light-footed enemies, if dext'rous,
May trip up all their heels.

Chan. True to his humour:
My good Lord Salisbury will have his gibe,
Howe'er affliction wrings.

Sal. And wherefore not?

Will burial faces buy us our escape?
I wish they would: then no Hibernian hag,
Whose trade is sorrow, should out-sadden me.
But, as the business stands, to weep or laugh,

Alike is bootless; here is our dependance.

(Touching his sword.)

Aud. What are their numbers?

Chan. Full a hundred thousand. [no matter;

Sal. Ours but some eight: great odds, my friends:
The more will be our glory when we've beat them.

Aud. What swells their host so mightily's (I'm told)

The Earls of Neydo, Saltsburg, and Nassau,
Have join'd their troops. The Earl of Douglas, too,
Assist them with three thousand hardy Scots,
Their old and sure allies.

Chan. I hear the same. [our pris'ner.

Sal. What! Scotchmen here? whose monarch is

Aud. Ta'en by a priest and woman; at the head
Of such raw numbers as their haste could gather,
When all our vet'ran warriors, with their king,
Were winning laurels on the fields of France.

Chan. And hither now, perhaps, his subjects come
To fight for captives to exchange against him. [get,

Sal. For captives! This poor carcass they may
When 'tis fit booty for their kites and crows:
But while this tongue can speak, I'd root it out
Ere Scot or Frenchman it should own my master.

Chan. The prince approaches, lords.

Enter PRINCE EDWARD, EARL OF WARWICK,
and Attendants.

P. Edw. Ah! saidst thou, Warwick,
Arnold gone over to the foe?

War. He is.

A trusty spy brought the intelligence,
Who saw him enter in the adverse camp,
Leading his captive charge.

P. Edw. Impossible; [there

War. I've search'd his quarters since, myself, and Nor he or Mariana can be found. [bind

P. Edw. What has a prince that can attract or
The faith of friends, the gratitude of servants?
Blush, greatness, blush! Thy pow'r is all but poor,
Too impotent to bind one bosom to thee!
A blow like this I was not arm'd to meet;
It pierces to my soul.

Sal. All-righteous heav'n,
Reward the villain's guilt! Believe not, prince,
Throughout our host, another can be found
That worlds would buy to such a base revolt.

P. Edw. I hope it, will believe it, Salisbury;
Yet must lament that one has prov'd so worthless.
I lov'd him too: but since he has forgot
The ties of duty, gratitude, and honour,
Let us forget an Englishman could break 'em,
And, losing his remembrance, lose the shame.
My lords, I have despatches in my hand,
Advising that the nuncio cardinal,
Good Perigort, is now arriv'd at Poitiers,
And means to interpose in our behalf.

Aud. His interposing is a gen'rous office,
And I applaud it; but, believe me, prince,
Our foes will rate their mercy much too high.
I'd hope as soon a tiger, tasting blood,
Can feel compassion, and release his prey,
As that a Frenchman will forego advantage.

P. Edw. I've by the messenger that brought my letters,

Sent him the terms on which I warrant treating.
The sum is, my consent to render back
The castles, towns, and plunder we have taken,
Since marching out of Bourdeaux; and to plight
My faith, that I, for sev'n succeeding years,
Will wield no hostile sword against their crown.

Sal. It is too much, my prince, it is too much.
Give o'er such traffic for inglorious safety.
Or let us die or conquer.

P. Edw. Salisbury,
Rely upon a prince and soldier's promise,
That caution sha'n't betray us into meanness.
Heav'n knows, for me, I value life so little,
That I would spend it as an idle breath,

To serve my king, my country, nay, my friend.
To calls like these our honour bids us answer,
Where ev'ry hazard challenges renown.
But sure the voice of heav'n, and cry of nature,
Are loud against the sacrifice of thousands
To giddy rashness. Oh! reflect, my friends,
I have a double delegated trust,
And must account to heaven and to my father,
For lives ignobly sav'd, or madly lost.
Till Perigort shall, therefore, bring their terms,
Suspend we all resolves; but those receiv'd,
Determination must be expeditious:
For, know, our stock of stores will barely reach
To furnish out the present day's subsistence.

Aud. If so, necessity, the last sad guide
Of all misfortune's children, will command.

Chan. We must submit to what wise heav'n decrees.

P. Edw. Let that great duty but direct the mind,
And men will all be happily resign'd:
Accept whate'er th' Almighty deigns to give,
And die contented, or contented live:
Embrace the lot his Providence ordains,
If deck'd with laurels, or depress'd with chains,
Inur'd to labour, or indulg'd with rest,
And think each movement he decrees the best.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The French Camp.

Enter DUKE OF ATHENS and LORD RIBEMONT.

Rib. Lord constable, I was not in the presence
When Perigort had audience with the king:
Inform me, for I wish to know, does peace
Her olive-garland weave? or must the sword
Be kept unsheath'd, and blood-fed vengeance live?

Ath. The king expecting me, I cannot tarry
To let your lordship know particulars;
But the good father, who ev'n now set forward,
Carries such terms as, from my soul, I wish
Young Edward may accept: for 'tis resolv'd,
If they're rejected, instant to attack 'em.
Yonder's the fugitive, I see, advancing,
Who left their camp this morning. If we fight,
And you have there a friend you wish to save,
This man may point you to his post. Farewell.

[Exit.]

Rib. This man—by heav'n, there's treason in his aspect!
That cheerless gloom, those eyes that pore on earth,
That bended body, and those folded arms,
Are indications of a tortur'd mind,
And blazon equal villany and shame.
In what a dire condition is the wretch,
Who, in the mirror of reflexion, sees
The hideous stains of a polluted soul!
To corners, then, as does the loathsome toad,
He crawls in silence: there sequester'd chews
The foamy ferment of his pois'nous gall,
Hating himself, and fearing fellowship.

Enter ARNOLD, musings.

Arn. Whathave I done? And where is my reward?
Charney withholds his daughter from my arms,
My flatter'd recompense for—Hold, my brain!
Thought that, by timely coming, might have sav'd
Is now too late, when all its office serves [me,
But to awaken horror. (Aside.)

Rib. I'll accost him.

Are you an Englishman?

Arn. I had that name,
(Oh! killing question!) but have lost it now.

Rib. Lost it, indeed!

Arn. Illustrious Ribemont!
(For was your person less rever'd and known
By ev'ry son of Britain, on your brow
That splendid token of renown you wear,
Would be your herald,) pity, if you can,
A wretch, the most undone of all mankind.

Rib. I much mistake your visage, or I've seen
In near attendance on the Prince of Wales. [you

Arn. I was, indeed; (oh! scandal to confess it!)
I was his follower, was his humble friend;
He favour'd, cherish'd, lov'd me—heav'nly pow'rs!
How shall I give my guilty story utterance?
Level your fiery bolts, transfix me here,
Or hurl me howling to the hell I merit.

Rib. Invoke no pow'r; a conscience such as thine
Is hell enough for mortal to endure.
But let me ask thee, for my wonder prompts me,
What bait affords the world, that could induce thee
To wrong so godlike and so good a master?

Arn. True, he is all, is godlike, and is good.

Edward, my royal master, is, indeed,
A prince beyond example. Yet your heart,
If it has ever felt the power of beauty,
Must mitigate the crime of raging love. [a fire

Rib. Love! Thou lost wretch! And could so frail
Consume whate'er was great and manly in thee?
Blot virtue out, and root each nobler passion
Forth from thy mind? The thirst of bright renown?
A patriot fond affection for thy country?
Zeal for thy monarch's glory? And the tie
Of sacred friendship, by thy prince ennobled?
Begone, and hide thy ignominious head,
Where human eye may never penetrate;
Avoid society, for all mankind
Will fly the fellowship of one like thee.

Arn. Heav'n! wherefore saidst thou that we must
And yet made woman? [not err,

Rib. Why accuse you heav'n?
Curse your inglorious heart for wanting fire,
The fire that animates the nobly brave!
The fire that has renown'd the English name,
And made it such as ev'ry age to come
Shall strive to emulate, but never reach.
There thou wert mingled in a blaze of glory,
Great—to amazement great! But now how fall'n!
Ev'n to the vilest of all vassal vileness,
The despicable state of female thralldom.

Arn. From letter'd story single out a man,
However great in council or in fight,
Who ne'er was vanquish'd by a woman's charms.

Rib. Let none stand forth, there is no cause they Beauty's a blessing to reward the brave; [should:
We take its transports in relief from toil,
Allow its hour, and languish in its bonds:
But that once ended, dignity asserts
Its right in manhood, and our reason reigns.

Arn. Untouch'd by passion, all may talk it well;
In speculation who was e'er unwise?
But appetites assault like furious storms,
O'erbearing all that should resist their rage,
Till vigour is worn down; and then succeeds
A gloomy calm, in which reflexion arms
Her scorpion brood—remorse, despair, and horror!

Rib. But could contrition ever yet restore
To radiant lustre a polluted fame?
Or man, however merciful, forget
That justice brands offenders for his scorn?
Truth, the great touchstone of all human actions,
The fair foundation of applause or blame,
Has ting'd thy honour with too foul a stain,
For all repentant tears to wash away.
All eyes 'twill urge to dart their keen reproaches,
Each tongue to hiss, and ev'ry heart to heave
With indignation at thee.

Arn. All the pride,
That here should kindle into high resentment,
I find is gone. My spirit's sunk, debas'd;
My guilt unmans me, and I'm grown a coward. (Aside.)

Rib. The trumpets may awake, the clarions swell,
That noble ardour thou no more canst feel,
Disgrac'd from soldier to a renegade.
Anon, while o'er the dreadful field we drive,
Or dealing deaths, or daring slaught'ring swords,
Do thou at distance, like the dastard hare,

All trembling, seek thy safety. Thence away,
As fortune, or thy genius may direct,
Thy conscience thy companion. But be sure,
Whatever land you burden with your weight,
Whatever people you hereafter join,
Tell but your tale, and they will all, like me,
Pronounce you abject, infamous, and hateful. [Exit.]
Arn. Abject and hateful! Infamous! I'm all!
The world has not another monster like me:
Nor hell, in all its store of horrid evils,
Beyond what I deserve. Already here
I feel the shafts, they rankle in my bosom;
And active thought anticipates damnation.

Enter MARIANA and LOUISA.

Mar. He's here! I've found my heart's companion
Rejoice, my Arnold, for my father softens; [out.]
He half forgets his hatred to thy country,
And hears with temper while I praise thy virtues:
We soon shall conquer. Ah! what mean those tears?
Why art thou thus?

Arn. And canst thou ask that question?
Thou soft seducer, thou enchanting mischief,
Thou blaster of my virtue. But, begone!
By heav'n, the poison looks so tempting yet,
I fear to gaze myself in love with ruin.
Away, away! enjoy thy ill-got freedom.
And leave a wretch devoted to destruction.

Mar. Destruction! how the image strikes my soul,
As would the shaft of death, with chilling horror!
Hear me—but hear me! 'tis the cause of love!
Your Mariana pleads. For Arnold's peace,
For mine, for both—nay, do not turn away,
And with unkindness dash the rising hope,
That strives for birth, and struggles with despair.

Arn. Oh! yes, despair; it is most fit you should,
As I must ever do.

Mar. Wherefore? Why?
How are you alter'd, or myself how chang'd,
That all our blessings are transform'd to curses?
Have you not sworn (you did, and I believ'd you)
My flatter'd beauties and my faithful love,
Were all that Arnold wish'd to make him happy?

Arn. Curs'd be your love, and blasted all your beauties,
For they have robb'd me of my peace and honour.
Looks not my form as hideous as my soul,
Begrin'd like hell, and blacken'd to a fiend?
Go, get thee hence, thou blaster of my fame,
Bear thy bewitching eyes where I no more
May gaze my—but I've nothing now to lose,
Nought but a hated life, which any hand
Would be most merciful to rid me of.

Mar. If I am guilty, 'tis the guilt of love,
And love should pardon what himself inspir'd.
Oh! smooth the horrors of that anguish'd brow,
Thy tortur'd visage fills me with affright.
Look on me kindly, look as you were wont;
Or ease my bursting heart, or strike me dead.

Arn. Give me again my innocence of soul,
Give me my forfeit honour blanch'd anew,
Cancel my treasons to my royal master,
Restore me to my country's lost esteem,
To the sweet hope of mercy from above,
And the calm comforts of a virtuous heart.

Mar. Sure kindness should not constrne into guilt
My fond endeavours to preserve thee mine:
Life, love, and freedom are before you all,
Embrace the blessings, and we yet are happy.

Arn. What! with a conscience sore and gall'd like mine?

To stand the glance of scorn from ev'ry eye?
From ev'ry finger the indignant point?
In ev'ry whisper hear my spreading shame?
And groan and grovel, a detested outcast?
A taunting Frenchman, with opprobrious tongue,
Pronounc'd me abject, infamous, and hateful,
And yet I live! And you yet counsel life.
The damn'd beneath might find or fancy ease,

And fear to lose existence soon as I!
No, die I must—I will—but how—how—how—
Nay, loose my arm, you strive in vain to hold me.
Mar. Upon my knees—see, see these speaking tears—

Arn. Be yet advis'd, nor urge me to an outrage:
Thy pow'r is lost; unhand me! then, 'tis thus,
Thus I renounce thy beauties; thus thy guilt;
Life, love, and treason I renounce for ever. [Exit.]

Mar. Then welcome death, distraction, ev'ry curse! [ders!]
Blast me, ye lightnings! strike me, roaring thun-
Or let me tear, with my outrageous bands,
The peaceful bosom of the earth, and find
A refuge from my woes and life together.

(Flinging herself on the ground.)

Stand off! away! I will not be withheld;
I will indulge my frenzy. Loss of reason
Is now but loss of torment. Cruel Arnold!

Enter LORD CHARNEY.

Char. Whence is this voice of woe? This frantic
Why is my child, my Mariana thus? [posture?]

Mar. Thy flinty heart can best resolve the question: (Rising.)

Thou that relentless saw'st my tears descend,
And, urg'd by stubborn haughtiness and hatred,
Hast given me up to endless agonies.
The man that merited thy best regard,
The man I lov'd, thy cruelty has made
Alike implacable. He's gone, he's lost.
Arnold is lost, and my repose for ever. [ruins,]

Char. Why, let him go, and may th' impending
The hov'ring mischiefs that await their arms,
Him, them, and all of their detested race,
Involve in one destruction.

Mar. No, let ruin
O'er take the proud, severe, and unforgiving;
Crimes that are strangers to an English nature.
They are all gentle. He was mild as mercy,
Soft as the smiles that mark a mother's joy,
Clasping her new-born infant. Shield him, heav'n!
Protect him, comfort him. Thou cruel father,
Thou cause of all my sufferings, all my woes;
Give him me back, restore him to my arms,
My life, my lord, my Arnold! Give him to me,
Or I will curse my country, thee, myself,
And die the victim of despairing love. [Exit.]

Char. Follow her, watch her, guard her from her fury. [Exit Louisa.]

Oh! dire misfortune! this unhappy stroke
Surpasses all the sorrows I have felt,
And makes me wretched to the last extreme. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The PRINCE OF WALES discovered, seated in state in his tent; at the entrance to which his standard stands displayed: the device, three ostrich feathers, with the motto of "Ich Dien:"
EARLS OF WARWICK and SALISBURY, LORDS
AUDLEY and CHANDOS, Nobles, Officers, and Guards standing.

P. Edw. I've sent my Lords of Oxford, Suffolk,
 Cobham,
To meet the nuncio, and conduct him hither:
From whom we may expect to hear the terms
On which the French will deign to give us safety.

(Trumpets.)

Chan. Those trumpets speak the cardinal's arrival:

And see, the lords conduct him to your presence.
(Trumpets.)

*Enter three English Lords, preceding CARDINAL
PERIGORT and his retinue. On the Nuncio's bowing, the Prince advances from his seat and embraces him.*

P. Edw. Lord cardinal, most welcome to my arms:
I greet you thus, as England's kindest friend,
Misfortune's refuge, and affliction's hope.
It is an office worthy of your goodness,

To step betwixt our danger and destruction,
Striving to ward from threatened thousands here
The blow of fate.

Per. Grant, gracious heaven, I may!
For from my soul, great prince, I wish you rescue;
And have conditions from your foes to offer,
Which, if accepted, save ye.

P. Edw. We attend. (Takes his seat.)

Per. No art for mild persuasion in your cause
Have I omitted: but imperious France,
Too fond of vengeance, and too vain of numbers,
Insists on terms, which only could be hop'd
From such a scanty unprovided host;
And prudence will direct, from many evils
To choose the lightest. Their conditions are,
"That, to the castles, towns, and plunder taken,
And offer'd now by you to be restor'd,
Your royal person, with an hundred knights,
Are to be added pris'ners at discretion."

P. Edw. Ah! pris'ners!

Aud. Oh! insolent, detested terms!

Sal. An hundred thousand first of Frenchmen fall,
And carrion taint the air! I cannot hold. (Aside.)

P. Edw. (After a pause.) My good lord cardinal, what act of mine

Could ever usher to their minds a thought,
That I would so submit?

Per. Could I prescribe,
You should yourself be umpire of the terms;
For well I know your noble nature such,
That int'rest would be made the slave of honour.
But to whate'er I urg'd, the king reply'd,
Remember Cressy's fight! to us as fatal,
As that of Cannæ to the Roman state.
There fell two mighty kings, three sovereign princes,
Full thirty thousand valiant men of arms,
With all the flower of French nobility,
And of their firm allies; for which (he cried)
What can redeem the glory of my crown,
But to behold those victors in our chains?
It is a bitter potion; but reflect,
That royal John is noble, and will treat
Such foes with dignity; while fortune pays
Less than the stock of fame his father lost.

P. Edw. Yes, Philip lost the battle with the odds
Of three to one. In this, if they obtain it,
They have our numbers more than twelve times told,
If we can trust report. And yet, my lord,
We'll face these numbers, fight 'em, bravely fall,
Ere stoop to linger loathsome life away
In infamy and bondage. Sir, I thank you—
I thank you from my soul, for these, for me,
That we have met your wish to do us kindness:
But for the terms our foes demand, we scorn
Such vile conditions, and defy their swords.
Tell 'em, my lord, their hope's too proudly plum'd;
We will be conquer'd ere they call us captives.

Per. Famine or slaughter—

P. Edw. Let them both advance
In all their horrid, most tremendous forms; [die,
They'll meet, in us, with men who'll starve, bleed,
Ere wrong their country, or their own renown.
Sound there to arms! My pious friend, farewell.
Disperse, my lords, and spirit up the troops;
Divide the last remains of our provision,
We shall require no more; for who survives
The fury of this day will either find
Enough from booty or a slave's allowance.

Per. How much at once I'm melted and amaz'd!
Stop, my lords, and give a soul of meekness scope,
In minutes of such peril. By the host
That circles heav'n's high throne, my bleeding heart
Is touch'd with so much tenderness and pity,
I cannot yield ye to the dire decision.
Let me, once more, with ev'ry moving art,
Each soft persuasion, try the Gallic king:
Perhaps he may relent. Permit the trial:
I would preserve such worth, heav'n knows I would,
If hazard, labour, life, could buy your safety.

P. Edw. Lord cardinal, your kindness quite un-
mans me,

My mind was arm'd for ev'ry rough encounter;
But such compassion saps my fortitude,
And forces tears. They flow not for myself,
But these endanger'd followers of my fortunes:
Whom I behold as fathers, brothers, friends,
Here link'd together by the graceful bonds
Of amity and honour: all to me
For ever faithful, and for ever dear.
The worth that rooted while my fortune smil'd,
You see not ev'n adversity can shake:
Think it not weakness, then, that I lament them.

Per. It is the loveliest mark of royal virtue,
'Tis what demands our most exalted praise,
Is worthy of yourself, and must endear
The best of princes to the best of people.
Till my return be hope your comforter:
If 'tis within the scope of human means,
I'll ward the blow.

P. Edw. Good heav'n repay you, sir: [them
Though acts of kindness bear such blessings with
As are their full reward. My lord, farewell.

[Exit Perigort, attended as he came in.]

Aud. Well, sir, how fare you now?

P. Edw. Oh! never better:

If I have frailty in me, heav'n can tell,
It is not for myself, but for my friends.
I've run no mean inglorious race, and now,
If it must end, 'tis no unlucky time.
As yon great planet, through its radiant course,
Shoots, at his parting, the most pleasing rays;
So to high characters a gallant death
Lends the best lustre, and ennobles all.

Aud. Why, there, my prince, you reach even virtue's summit:

For this I love you with a fonder flame,
Than proud prosperity could e'er inspire.
'Tis triumph, this, o'er death.

P. Edw. And what is death,
That dreadful evil to a guilty mind,
And awe of coward natures? 'Tis but rest:
Rest that should follow every arduous toil;
Relieve the valiant, and reward the good:
Nor find we aught in life to wish it longer,
When fame is once establish'd.

War. That secure,

Our foes, who wail its loss, can ne'er recover
The glory ravish'd from 'em.

P. Edw. Who can tell?

Has fortune been so badly entertain'd,
That she should leave us? No, my noble friends;
Her smiles and favours never were abus'd:
Then what we merit we may yet maintain.

Chan. An hundred of us, with your royal person,
Deliver'd up their pris'ners at discretion!
The French have surely lost all modesty,
Or the remembrance of themselves and us.

Aud. But here, in my mind's tablet, there remains
A memorandum, that might make 'em start
In this career of their presumptuous hope.
Nine times the seasons scarce have danc'd their rounds,

Since the vain father of their present king,
Philip, who styl'd himself his country's fortune,
Gaudy and garnish'd, with a numerous host,
Met our great Edward in the field of fight.
I was one knight in that illustrious service,
And urge I may (for 'tis a modest truth)
We made the Frenchmen tremble to behold us:
Their king himself turn'd pale at our appearance,
And thought his own trim troops, compar'd with ours,
Effeminated cowards. Such they prov'd;
And since that day, what change in them or us
Can ground security on wondrous odds?
The same undaunted sprits dare the combat;
The same tough sinews and well-temper'd blades,
Again shall mow them down, like autumn corn,
Another harvest of renown and glory.

Cham. There the brave monarch of Bohemia
In vain, to kindle valour in their hearts: [strove,
He fought, he fell; when our victorious prince
Seiz'd his gay banner with yon boast, "I serve."
(Pointing to the Prince's standard.)

Which now more suited to his princely charge,
Triumphantly, as conqueror, he wears;
And in his honour England's eldest hope
Shall ever wear it, to the end of time.

Sal. Now as I live, I wish we were at work,
And almost fear the nuncio may succeed.
Methinks we should not lose the blest occasion,
Or for surpassing ev'ry former conquest,
Or gaining glorious death, immortal fame.

P. Edw. Then set we here ill fortune at defiance,
Secure, at least, of never-fading honour.

(They all embrace.)

Oh! my brave leaders, in this warm embrace,
Let us infuse that fortitude of soul,
To all but England's daring sons unknown;
Firm as the stately oak, our island's boast,
Which fiercest hurricanes assault in vain,
We'll stand the driving tempest of their fury.
And who shall shake our martial glories from us?
Yon puny Gauls! They ne'er have done it yet,
Nor shall they now. Oh! never will we wrong
So far ourselves, and our renown'd forefathers.
Here part we, lords; attend your sev'ral duties.
Audley, distribute through the camp provisions;
Keep ev'ry soldier's spirits in a glow,
Till from the French this final message comes:
Then if their pride denies us terms of honour,
We'll rush outrageous on their vaunting numbers;
And teach them that with souls resolv'd, like ours,
Ev'n desperation points the way to conquest.
When (in defiance of superior might)
Plung'd in the dreadful storm of bloody fight,
Shall ev'ry Briton do his country right. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The French Camp.

Enter LORD RIBEMONT.

Rib. The troops array'd, stand ready to advance.
And this short pause, this silent interval,
With awful horror strikes upon my soul;
I know not whence it comes, but till this moment,
Ne'er did I feel such heaviness of heart.
Fear! thou art still a stranger here; and death
Have I not seen in ev'ry form he wears?
Defy'd him, fac'd him, never fled him yet:
Nor has my conscience since contracted guilt,
The parent of dismay: then whence is this?
Perhaps 'tis pity for yon hopeless host.
Pity! for what! the brave despise our pity;
For death, encounter'd in a noble cause,
Comes, like the gracious lord of toiling hinds,
To end all labours and bestow reward.
Then let me shake this lethargy away.
By heav'n, it wo'not off! The sweat of death
Is on me! a cold tremor shakes my joints!
My feet seem riveted! my blood congeals!
Almighty pow'rs! Thou ever awful form!
Why art thou present? Wherefore—what, a sigh!
Oh! smile of sweet relief! if aught from heav'n
A mortal ear be worthy to—again
That piteous action, that dejected air!
Speak out the cause; I beg thee speak—'tis gone!
Yet would I gaze, by such enchantment bound—
Thou pleasing, dreadful vision! Oh! return,
Unfold thy errand, though I die with hearing.

Enter DUKE OF ATHENS.

Ath. You're well encounter'd, Ribemont; the Ere this, has Edward's answer; as I past [king,
The boundaries of our camp on yonder side,
In this my progress to equip the field,
I saw the nuncio posting like the wind;
He and his train, on horses white with foam,
Their course directed to our monarch's tent.

What means this, Ribemont? thou'rt lost in thought.

Rib. Athens, I am unsoldier'd, I'm unmann'd!
Wonder you may, my noble friend, for see,
I shake, I tremble.

Ath. Say, at what?

Rib. Why, nothing. [battle,

Ath. Should the vast host that here are rang'd for (Warm with impatience, eager for the fray,)

Behold that Ribemont alone has fear,
What wonder would it cause! for thou, of all,
Art sure deservingly the most renown'd.
Come, be thyself—for shame!

Rib. Believe me, Athens,
I am not stricken with a coward's feeling:
Not all yon army to this sword oppos'd,
Should damp my vigour, or depress my heart:
'Tis not the soldier trembles, but the son.

Just now a melancholy seiz'd my soul,
A sinking, whence I knew not, till, at length,
My father's image to my sight appear'd,
And struck me motionless.

Ath. 'Twas only fancy.

Rib. Oh! no, my Athens, plainly I beheld
My father in the habit that he wore,
When, with paternal smiles, he hung this weapon
Upon my youthful thigh, bidding me use it
With honour—only in my country's cause.
Within my mind I treasur'd up the charge,
And sacred to the soldier's public call
Have worn it ever. Wherefore, then, this visit?
Why in that garb in which he fix'd my fortune,
And charg'd me to repay his care with glory?
If 'tis an omen of impending guilt,
Oh! soul of him I honour, once again
Come from thy heav'n, and tell me what it is,
Lest erring ignorance undo my frame. [brain.

Ath. Nought but a waking dream—a vapour'd

Rib. Once his pale visage seem'd to wear a smile,
A look of approbation, not reproof.
But the next moment, with uplifted hands
And heaving bosom, sadly on the earth
He turn'd his eyes, and sorely seem'd to weep:
I heard, or fancy'd that I heard a groan,
As from the ground his look was rais'd to me;
Then, shaking with a mournful glance his head,
He melted into air.

Ath. Pr'ythee, no more;
You talk'd of melancholy, that was all;
Some sickness of the mind: occasion'd, oft,
Ev'n by the fumes of indigested meals.
To-morrow we will laugh at this delusion.

Rib. To-morrow! Oh! that mention of to-morrow—

There are opinions, Athens, that our friends
Can pass the boundaries of nature back,
To warn us when the hour of death is nigh.
If that thy business was, thou awful shade,
I thank thee, and this interval of life,
However short, which heaven vouchsafes me yet,
I will endeavour as I ought to spend.

Ath. See, through yon clouds of dust, with how much speed

The nuncio hastens to the English camp!
Perhaps the terms for safety are agreed,
Then where's a meaning for thy fancy'd vision?

Rib. No matter where, my spirits are grown light:
Returning vigour braces up again
My nerves and sinews to their wonted tone.
My heart beats freely, and, in nimble rounds,
The streams of life pursue their ready course:
Lead on; our duty calls us to the king. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Prince of Wales's Tent.

Enter PRINCE EDWARD, LORD CHANDOS, and Attendants, meeting LORD AUDLEY.

P. Edw. Well, Audley, are the soldiers all re-
fresh'd? [meals,

Aud. All: and although, perchance, their last of

It seem'd so cheerful as surpass'd my hope;
 Still joining hands, as off they drain'd the bowl,
 Success to England's arms was all the cry.
 At length a hoary vet'ran rais'd his voice, [thers!
 And thus address'd his fellows: "Courage, bro-
 The French have never beat us, nor shall now.
 Our great third Edward's fortune waits our arms;
 And his brave son, whose formidable helmet
 Nods terror to our foes, directs the fight;
 In his black armour, we will soon behold him
 Piercing their throng'd battalions. Shall not we,
 At humble distance, emulate his ardour,
 And gather laurels to adorn his triumph?"
 Then did they smile again, shake hands, and shout,
 While, quite transported at the pleasing sight,
 I wept, insensibly, with love and joy. [there,
P. Edw. I too could weep! Oh! Audley, Chandos,
 There rest I all my hope. My honest soldiers,
 I know, will do their duty.

Enter a Gentleman.

Gent. Royal sir,
 A person muffled in a close disguise,
 Arriv'd, this instant, from the adverse camp,
 As he reports, solicits to receive
 An audience of your highness, and alone.

P. Edw. Retire, my lord. Conduct him straightway in. [Exit Gentleman.

Chan. Your highness will not trust yourself
 unguarded:

It may be dangerous. Consider, sir. [scorn:

P. Edw. Caution is now my slave, and fear I
 This is no hour for idle apprehensions.

[Exeunt Lords, &c.

Enter ARNOLD in a disguise, which he throws off.

Your business, sir, with—Arnold! Get thee hence.

Arn. Behold a wretch laid prostrate at your feet,
 His guilty neck ev'n humbled to the earth;
 Tread on it, sir; it is most fit you should.
 I am unworthy life, nor hope compassion,
 But could not die till here I stream'd my tears
 In token of contrition, pain, and shame. [move,

P. Edw. Up, and this instant from my sight re-
 Ere indignation urges me to pay
 Thy horrid treasons with a traitor's fate. [ther;

Arn. Death if I'd fear'd, I had not ventur'd hi-
 Conscious I merit all you can inflict:
 But doom'd to torture, as by guilt I am,
 I hop'd some ease in begging here to die;
 That I might manifest, where most I ought,
 My own abhorrence of my hated crime.
 Thus, on my knees, lay I my life before you;
 Nor ask remission of the heavy sentence,
 Your justice must pronounce. Yet, royal sir,
 One little favour let me humbly hope:
 (And may the blessings of high heav'n repay it:)
 'Tis, when you shall report my crime and suffering,
 Only to add, he gave himself to death,
 The voluntary victim of remorse.

P. Edw. I shall disgrace my soldiership, and melt
 To woman's weakness, at a villain's sorrow.
 Oh! justice, with thy fillet seal my eyes;
 Shut out at once, his tears, and hide my own. (Aside.)

Arn. Am I rejected in my low petition
 For such a boon? Nor can I yet complain;
 Your royal favours follow approbation,
 And I of all mankind have least pretence
 To hope the bounty of a word to ease me.

P. Edw. Rise, Arnold. Thou wert long my chosen
 servant;

An infant-fondness was our early tie:
 But with our years (companions as we liv'd)
 Affection rooted, and esteem grew love.
 Nor was my soul a niggard to thy wishes:
 There set no sun but saw my bounty flow,
 No hour scarce pass'd unmark'd by favour from me.
 The prince and master yet I set apart,
 And singly here arraign thee in the friend.
 Was it for thee, in fortune's first assault,

Amidst these thousands, all by far less favour'd,
 To be the first, the only to forsake me?

Was it for thee, for thee to seek my foe,
 And take thy safety from the means that sunk
 The man of all the world that lov'd thee most?
 In spite of me my eyes will overflow,
 And I must weep the wrongs I should revenge.

Arn. Tears for such guilt as mine! Oh! blasting sight!

Cover me, mountains! hide me and my shame!
 A traitor's fate would here be kind relief
 From the excessive anguish I endure.

P. Edw. Having thus fairly stated our account,
 How great's the balance that appears against thee!
 And what remains? I will not more reproach thee.
 Love thee I must not, and 'twere guilt to pity.

All that with honour I can grant is this:
 Live—but remove for ever from my sight.
 If I escape the dangers that surround me,
 I must forget that Arnold e'er had being:
 I must forget, in pity to mankind

(Lest it should freeze affection in my heart,)

That e'er such friendship met with such return.

Arn. Oh! mercy more afflicting than ev'n rage!
 That I could answer to with tears and pray'rs;
 But conscious shame, with kindness, strikes me
 mute.

Great sir, (forgive intrusion on your goodness,)
 My boon you have mistaken, life I ask'd not;

'Twas but to witness to the deep remorse,
 That with a harpy's talons tears my bosom.
 Love, the pernicious pois'ner of my honour,
 In poor atonement's sacrific'd already;
 And life, devoted as the all I've left,
 I'm ready now and resolute to pay.

But as my miseries have touch'd your soul,
 And gain'd remission of a traitor's fate,
 Oh! add one favour, and complete my wishes.
 To the dear country that must scorn my name,
 (Though I still love it as I honour you,)
 Permit my sword to lend its little aid,
 To pay a dying tribute. Grant but that,
 And I will weep my gratitude with blood. [thee,

P. Edw. Stain'd and polluted as my eyes behold
 Honour no longer can endure thy sight.

If 'tis in valour to accomplish it,
 Redeem thy reputation; but if not,
 To fall in fight will be thy happiest hope.
 Away, nor more reply.

Arn. Exalted goodness! [Exit.

P. Edw. If passions conquer'd are our noblest Misruling anger, ever mad revenge, [boasts,
 And thou, too partial biasser, affection;
 Confess I once have acted as I ought. (Trumpets.)
 Ah! by those trumpets, sure, the nuncio's come!

[A Gentleman appears and retires.

Who's there? Acquaint the lords I wish to see 'em.
 Now does the medley war begin to work:
 A thousand hopes and fears all crowd upon me!

*Enter EARLS OF WARWICK and SALISBURY,
 LORDS AUDLEY, CHANDOS, and other, and Attendants.*

Oh! welcome, friends! But see, the cardinal.
 (Trumpets.)

Enter CARDINAL PERIGORT, attended.

Well, gen'rous advocate, we wait our doom.

Per. Prepare, prepare, for an immediate battle:
 Inflexible is France in her demands,
 And all my pray'rs and tears have prov'd in vain.

P. Edw. Lord Cardinal, may righteous heav'n reward

The pious charity of soul you've shewn.
 If France insists so high, it shall be try'd;
 The desp'rate chance of battle shall be try'd.
 The fates attend, the balance is prepar'd;
 And whosoe'er shall have the lot to mount,
 May heav'n stretch wide its everlasting doors,
 And give them happy entrance all.

Per. Amen!

Illustrious prince, and you his noble followers,
Remains there aught that I can do to serve ye?
My function suits not with a field of slaughter;
In Poitiers, therefore, must I seek my safety.
There, while the battle rages, round and round
My beads shall drop to pray'rs, that ev'ry saint
Will succour and support the English arms.
But should the fortune of your foes prevail,
And leave ye victims to immortal honour,
The pious offices I'll make my own,
O'er ev'ry grave to breathe a thousand blessings,
And water all your ashes with my tears.

P. Edw. My gentle friend, such goodness will renown you.

Per. Take from my hand, my heart, my very soul,
My amplest benediction to you all. (They bow.)
I now can stifle in my tears no longer—

Oh! gallant prince, farewell. Farewell to all.

Heav'n guard your lives, and give your arms success!

[Exit with his Attendants. On the Cardinal's going out, the Prince and Lords continue for some time fixed and mute.]

Aud. You loiter, sir; our enemies advance,
And we're in no array.

P. Edw. Away, despatch;
Marshal the army by the plan I gave;
Then march it straight to yonder eminence:
Whence I'll endeavour to inflame their zeal,
And fit them for the toils this day demands.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Another part of the English Camp.

Enter MARIANA and LOUISA.

Lou. Thus, madam, has obedience prov'd my
The hurry and confusion of the field [duty:
Giving us opportunity to 'scape,
We've reach'd the English camp. But whither now?
Where would you bend your course? Behold, around,

How the arm'd soldiers, as they form in ranks,
Dart from impassion'd looks ten thousand terrors!
The scene is dreadful!

Mar. Then it suits my mind,
The seat of horrors terrible to bear.
On—let us find him.

Lou. Dearest lady, think;
Nor follow one that rudely spurn'd you from him.

Mar. It was not Arnold spurn'd me, 'twas his guilt,
The guilt I plang'd him in. Louisa, thou
Hast ne'er experienc'd passions in extremes,
Or thou wouldst know that love, and hate, and scorn,
All opposites together meet, and blend
In the wild whirl of a distracted soul.

Lou. Behold, he comes!

Mar. Support me, gracious pow'rs!

Enter ARNOLD.

Arn. Ah! Mariana! When will torture end?
(Aside.)

Mar. How shall I stand the shock of his re-proaches? (Aside.)

Arn. Why art thou here? Oh! why, unhappy
maid? [ruin,

Mar. Since my too fatal rashness wrought thy
'Tis fit, at least, that I should share it with thee.
Therefore, my friends, my father, and my country,
I have forsook for ever; and am come
To claim a portion here in all you suffer.

Arn. Return again, I beg thee; I conjure thee,
By all the wondrous love that fir'd our hearts,
And wrought—but let not that be more remember'd.
If thou hast wish for happiness or peace,
Go to thy father back, and think no more
Of a lost wretch who hastens to oblivion.

Mar. Request it not; I never will forsake thee:
One fortune shall conduct, one fate involve us:
I'll shew the world that my unhappy crime
Was neither child of treachery or fear,

But love, love only! and the guilt it caus'd,
As I inspir'd, I'll share its punishment.

Arn. You cannot, nay, you must not think of it:
You broke no faith; I only was to blame:
And, to engage thee to secure thy safety,
Know the dire state of my determin'd soul:—
Heav'n and my prince permitting, I have sworn
To brave all dangers in the coming fight;
And when my sword has done its best for England,
To lay my load of misery and shame
Together down for ever; death I'll hunt
So very closely that he sha'n't escape me.
Be timely, then, in thy retreat; and heav'n
And all good angels guard thee! On thy lips
I'll seal my fervent pray'rs for blessings on thee.

(Kisses her.)

Oh! what a treasure does my soul give up
A sacrifice to honour! (Going.)

Mar. Stop a moment:

One single moment, Arnold: let me gather
A little strength to bear this dreadful parting.
And must it be—hold, hold, my heart—for ever?
Oh! bitter potion! kind physician, pour
One drop of hope to sweeten it a little. [give,

Arn. Hope ev'ry thing: hope all that earth can
Or heav'n bestow on virtues such as thine.

(Trumpet.)

That trumpet summons me: I must away!
Oh! measure by thy own the pangs I feel. [Exit.]

Mar. Then they are mighty; not to be express'd,
Not to be borne, nor ever to be cur'd.
My head runs round! my bursting brain divides!
Oh! for an ocean to ingulph me quick;
Or flames capacious as all hell's extent!
That I might plunge, and stifle torture there.

Lou. Hence, my dear lady; for your peace, go
hence. [eyes,

Mar. I'll dig these eyes out; these pernicious
Enslaving Arnold, have undone him.—Ah!

(Trumpet.)

That raven trumpet sounds the knell of death!
Behold, the dreadful, bloody work begins!
What ghastly wounds! what piteous, piercing
Oh! stop that fatal falchion! if it fall, [shrieks!]
It kills my Arnold!—Save him, save him, save—
Exit, running; Louisa follows.

SCENE IV.—A rural Eminence, with the distant prospect of a camp.

Enter PRINCE EDWARD.

P. Edw. The hour advances, the decisive hour,
That lifts me to the summit of renown,
Or leaves me on the earth a lifeless corse.
The buz and bustle of the field before me,
The twang of bow-strings, and the clash of spears,
With ev'ry circumstance of preparation,
Strike a tremendous awe!—Hark! Shouts are echo'd

To drown dismay, and blow up resolution
Ev'n to its utmost swell! From hearts so firm,
Whom dangers fortify, and toils inspire,
What has a leader not to hope! And yet
The weight of apprehension weighs me down.
Oh! Soul of nature! great eternal Cause! (Kneels.)
Who gave and govern'd all that's here below;
'Tis by the aid of thy Almighty arm
The weak exist, the virtuous are secure.
If to your sacred laws obedient ever,
My sword, my soul, have own'd no other guide;
Oh! if your honour, if the rights of men,
My country's happiness, my king's renown,
Were motives worthy of a warrior's zeal;
Crown your poor servant with success this day,
And be the praise and glory all thy own. (Rises.)

Enter LORD AUDLEY.

Aud. Now, royal Edward, is the hour at hand,
That shall, beyond the boast of ancient story,
Ennoble English arms; forgive, my hero,

That I presume so far, but I have sworn
To rise your rival in the common fight.
We'll start together for the goal of glory,
And work such wonders that our fear-struck foes
Shall call us more than mortals! As of old,
Where matchless vigour mark'd victorious chiefs!
The baffl'd host, to cover their disgrace,
Cry'd out the gods assum'd commanders' forms,
And partial heav'n had fought the field against them!

P. Edw. Audley, thy soul is noble: then toge-
(Safe from the prying eye of observation) [ther
Let us unmask our hearts. Alas! my friend,
To such a dreadful precipice we're got,
It giddies to look down. No hold, no hope,
But in the succour of Almighty Pow'r!
For nothing but a miracle can save us.

Aud. I stifle apprehensions as they rise,
Nor e'er allow myself to weigh our danger.

P. Edw. 'Tis wisely done: and we'll at least endeavour

(Like the brave handful at Thermopylæ)
To make such gallant sacrifice of life
As shall confound our enemies. Oh! think
On the great glory of devoted heroes,
And let us emulate the godlike flame,
That dignify'd the chiefs of Greece and Rome!
Souls greatly rais'd, above all partial bonds,
Who knew no tie, no happiness distinct,
But made the general weal their only care:
That was their aim, their hope, their pride; the end
For which they labour'd, suffer'd, conquer'd, bled!

Aud. Exalted, great incitement!

P. Edw. What may happen,
Since none can say, prepare we for the worst.
Then as a man whom I have lov'd and honour'd,
Come to my arms, and take a kind farewell:

(They embrace.)

If we survive, we will again embrace,
And greet each other's everlasting fame;
If not, with him whose justice never errs,
Remains our fit reward.

Aud. You melt me, sir!

I thought my nature was above such weakness;
But tears will out.

P. Edw. They're no reproach to manhood:
But we've not leisure now for their indulgence.

Aud. True, glorious leader; to more active duties
The sev'ral functions of our souls are summon'd.
Safety and honour, liberty, renown!
Hope's precious prospect, and possession's bliss!
All that are great and lovely; urg'd together,
The arm of valour in their dear defence.

P. Edw. And valour well shall answer the demand;

Our foes, to wear the trophies of the day, [tell
Must wade through blood to win 'em. Heav'n can
How many souls may pay the fatal price,
Or whose may be the lot: if mine be one,
Say, Audley, to my father, to my country,—
Living, they had my service; at my death,
My pray'rs and wishes for eternal welfare.

Aud. Request not that which, if the day be lost,
I ne'er shall execute.—I have to ask
A favour, which I hope you'll not refuse.

P. Edw. Nothing that suits my Audley to solicit.

Aud. It is that I may be the first to charge:
I think I can rely upon my courage
To set a good example.

P. Edw. Be it thine.—

And see, the troops approach! (Trumpets.)

Aud. Each upright form
Darting defiance, as they move, to France!
Where is the pow'r can cope with souls like these?
Resolv'd on conquest or a glorious fate!
Unmoveable as rocks, they'll stand the torrent
Of rushing fury, and disdain to shrink:
But let yon panting wasps discharge their stings,
And then in clusters crush 'em. (Trumpets.)

Enter EARLS OF WARWICK and SALISBURY,
LORD CHANDOS, and other Commanders. Parties of Soldiers appear between all the side scenes, with Officers leading them, so seeming as if the whole of the army was drawn up.

P. Edw. Countrymen,
We're here assembled for the toughest fight
That ever strain'd the force of English arms.
See yon wide field with glittering numbers gay,
Vain of their strength, they challenge us for slaves,
And bid us yield their pris'ners at discretion.
If there's an Englishman amongst ye all,
Whose soul can basely truckle to such bondage;
Let him depart. For me, I swear by heav'n,
By my great father's soul, and by my fame,
My country ne'er shall pay a ransom for me,
Nor will I stoop to drag out life in bondage,
And take my pittance from a Frenchman's hands:
This I resolve, and hope, brave countrymen,
Ye all resolve the same.

Soldiers. All, all resolve it.

Sal. Conquest or death is ev'ry Briton's choice.

P. Edw. Oh! glorious choice! And know, my gallant soldiers,

That valour is superior far to numbers,
There are no odds against the truly brave:
Let us resolve on conquest, and 'tis ours.
But should the worst that can befall us—death,
'Twill be a fate to envy more than pity.
And we have fathers, brothers, sons, or friends,
That will revenge our slaughter.

Soldiers. On, lead on.

P. Edw. I see the gen'rous indignation rise,
That soon will shake the boasted pow'r of France:
Their monarch trembles midst his gaudy train,
To think the troops he now prepares to meet,
Are such as never faint'd yet with toil.
They're such as yet no pow'r on earth could awe,
No army baffle, and no town withstand.
Heav'n's! with what pleasure, with what love I gaze,
In ev'ry face to view his father's greatness!
Those fathers, those undaunted fathers, who
In Gallic blood have dy'd their swords.
Those fathers who in Cyprus wrought such feats,
Who taught the Syracusians to submit,
Tam'd the Calabrians, the fierce Saracens,
And have subdu'd, in many a stubborn fight
The Palestinean warriors. Scotland's fields,
That have so oft been drench'd with native gore,
Bear noble record; and the fertile isle,
Of fair Hibernia, by their swords subjected,
An ample tribute and obedience pays.
On her high mountains Wales receiv'd their laws,
And the whole world has witness'd to their glory.

Aud. Lead us to action, and each Briton here
Will prove himself the son of those brave fathers.

P. Edw. View all yon glitt'ring grandeur as your spoils,
The sure reward of this day's victory.
Strain ev'ry faculty, and let your minds,
Your hopes, your ardours, reach their utmost bounds.

Follow your standards with a fearless spirit;
Follow the great examples of your sires;
Follow the noble genius that inspires ye;
Follow this train of wise and valiant leaders,
Follow, in me, your brother, prince, and friend.
Draw, fellow-soldiers; catch th' inspiring name!
We fight for England, liberty, and fame!

[They draw their swords and go out. Trumpets sounding.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An extensive Plain, with the distant view of a Town.

Enter PRINCE EDWARD, EARL OF WARWICK,
LORD CHANDOS, and Attendants.

P. Edw. Haste to my Lord of Oxford, and re-
He ply his archers with redoubled vigour: [quest
[An Attendant bows, and goes out.]

I see already they've confus'd the foe;
Their ranks are broken, and they seem to doubt
If they should stand or fly!

Chan. Then now's the time
To press 'em with the weight of all our force;
For Frenchmen, if they're once dismay'd, are lost.

War. Excess of fury marks the battle yonder!
Lord Salisbury there sustains a heavy charge.

P. Edw. Warwick, away and reinforce his party,
Or numbers may o'erbear him. Fly this instant.
[Exit Warwick.]

Oh! for an arm of iron, but to answer
The mighty ardour that inflames my soul! [Exeunt.]

Enter ARNOLD, bleeding.

Arn. Yet more of Gallic blood, I must have
To wash my stains of infamy away. [more,
What, are the multitudes o'erthrown already?

Greater must down to gratify my rage,
And in my country's vengeance crown my own.
Ah! what! retreating!—Cowards—Follow me—

[He joins an English Party who were giving way, and they beat the French off.]

SCENE II.—Another Part of the Field.

Enter KING JOHN, DUKE OF TOURAIN, DUKE OF ATHENS, and Attendants.

K. John. By heav'n! a panic seizes all my troops.
Inform me, Athens, what's the cause of this?

Ath. Some parties that the Prince of Wales detach'd

Round yonder mountain, have attack'd our rear;
And the division which the Dauphin led,
Dispersing in confusion; they have pierc'd
With fury to the centre of our host! [mand

K. John. Fly, Athens, to my son, with my com-
That he collect again his scatter'd men,
And lead them to our succour. Shameful sight!

[Exit Athens.]
That such a handful should confound us thus.

Enter ARCHBISHOP OF SENS, with a drawn sword.

Sens. Confusion seize! but there's no need to
Too much it rages in our host already. [wish it,
I got this weapon from a feather'd wretch,
Who cast it down, and skipp'd like any deer!
I wish the villain had it in his heart.

Howe'er, I took the keen incumbrance up,
And us'd it better than his master could;
For with this arm, unpractis'd in the office,
I clove a brawny Briton to the chine!

Tour. Heav'n's! how we're press'd. No party
but gives way! [my boy,

K. John. Perdition seize the cowards!—Come,
We'll do our duty, tho' they all desert us. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Enter ARNOLD.

Arn. My arm begins to weary with the fight;
Death, I have cramm'd thy rav'nous jaws with offal;
Now, turn, my friend, and give me timely rescue.

Enter RIBEMONT.

Rib. Thou double traitor! must I stain my sword
With the foul streams that circle in thy veins,
Who art so base, so branded? Infamous!
By heav'n, it almost is a guilt to fight thee!

Arn. Here I can answer, for my cause is good:
It is my country's! And thou, haughty lord,
Think not thou e'er again shalt awe my soul,
Or, unchastis'd, reproach me with a crime
I loathe, and here am come to expiate.
The earth I've crimson'd with thy country's blood:
And if the pow'rs, to what is shed already,
Will add but Ribemont's, I ask no more:
The foe I next may meet to mine is welcome.

Rib. Can aught in valour purge thy Æthiop soul,
Expunge thy blots, and rank thee with the brave?
Dar'st thou assert the cause thou hast betray'd?
Or hope a second guilt atones the first?

No; the joint vengeance of wrong'd France and England [thy due;

I send in this! (Arnold falls.) There's something of
To infamy, and hell, I leave the rest. [Exit.]

Arn. Death I have caught—his shaft is in my heart—

It tugs with nature—When shall I get free?

Enter PRINCE EDWARD, LORD CHANDOS, and Attendants.

P. Edw. Slaughter hath wanton'd here! What stream of blood!

What heaps of mangled bodies strew the ground!
Death hath had able ministers at work;

A pompous tribute they have paid, indeed!
Arnold, hast thou done this?

Arn. Offended prince,
You find my fluttering soul upon the wing:
All a poor, desp'rate, and despairing wretch
Could do, this arm has wrought.

P. Edm. Thrice have I mark'd
Thy valour wonderful!

Arn. All worthless quite:
That I could pay a hundred thousand lives
In gratitude to you, and love for England;
But feeble nature fail'd my better wish,
So here I render up a loathsome life—

P. Edw. As heav'n may pardon me, thy orime's forgot.

Arn. Then I am happy. Hear it, sacred pow'rs!
And give him glory great, as is his goodness.

I go. Methinks the gloomy way before me
Is stripp'd of half its horrors. Friendly death,
Receive a parting—pity'd—pardon'd—Oh! (Dies.)

Chan. He dies!—Is gone!

P. Edw. Proving, my noble friend,
His soul was genuine English; and could tow'r
O'er all calamities but conscious guilt.

Chan. Heav'n's pardon greet him! Mighty prince, behold

Where gallant Audley, like a tempest, pours
Destruction through the thickest ranks of foes!

P. Edw. Oh! Chandos, with astonishment, my eye
Hath mark'd his valiant wonder-working sword!
Come, let us kindle at the great example,
And emulate the ardour we admire! [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—*Enter KING JOHN, DUKE OF TOU-
RAIN, and Attendants.*

K. John. (Turning back.) Rally our men, my valiant lord of Ewe,

Or we are all undone. Oh! gracious heav'n,
How has a kingdom crumbled from my grasp!

Tour. Let us preserve ourselves by timely flight,
Our broken army is dispersing. See!—
Behold the dastards how they run in thousands,
Oh, shame! almost before a single foe.

K. John. My dear Tourain, to what have I re-duc'd thee?

A ruin now of pomp! A royal wretch!
For thee I could weep blood; for thee I fear

To lose a life no longer worth my care,
Stripp'd as I am of dignity and fame. [tune:

Tour. I ask of heav'n but to partake your for-
Not wasting on myself a single care,
I send out all attendant on my king.

K. John. Tears will have way. Oh! majesty, give place,

For nature governs now. Almighty Pow'rs!
Must children and must kingdoms suffer thus?
Because my pride to reason shut my ears,
When dazzled with the gilded phantom, glory?
I scorn'd the terms that might have bless'd us all!
Too late—It is the curse of giddy mortals
To see their errors, and repent too late.

Enter ARCHBISHOP OF SENS.

Sens. The Dauphin, Dukes of Anjou, Berry, Orleans,

Have led the way in flight! Earl Douglas follows,

Fainting with many wounds, and all his Scots
Have, like our French and the auxiliar troops,
Forsook their posts. For safety, sir, away.

K. John. Dare not to urge it! I disdain the thought.

Go, like my coward sons and brother, go!
Though all desert me, singly will I stand
And face my foes, till, cover'd o'er with wounds,
I gain a fate becoming of a king.

Enter LORD CHARNEY, bleeding and faint.

Char. Embrace this moment as your last for flight:

The field is lost! I have not breath for more.
This honest wound came timely to my rescue,
Or I'd been curs'd to wail the dregs of life
Away in anguish. Parent earth, receive me.

(Lies down.)

This is the goal to which all nature runs,
And I rejoice to reach it. All is lost!
My country, monarch, daughter, life, and—oh!—

(Dies.)

K. John. Thou, Charney, hast escap'd—(A shout)
What noise is that? [no retreating,

Tour. The sound of triumph. Now there is
For, see! they have beset us all around.

K. John. Come, then, thou darling of thy father's soul,

We'll link our wretched fortunes here together.

And if a king's example can inspire

The few yet faithful in my lost condition,

Cast fear behind, and daringly come on,

Determin'd still to conquer or to die. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A full Prospect of the field.

Enter LORD RIBEMONT.

Rib. Ill-fated Athens, thou hast breath'd thy last—

But wherefore call'd I thee ill-fated? since
Death but prevented thee the curse of seeing
Our arms dishonour'd, and our country lost.
Now, sacred soul of him who gave me life,
The purpose of thy visit is explain'd.

No private evil, not a fate like mine—

That were a trivial call for thee to earth:

It was to warn me of a heavier loss—

Our diadem and fame. Ah!—I'm alone

Amidst a field of foes. Let me collect

A decent vigour, like the hunted lion,

With an assault to dignify my fall,

And not shrink, tamely, to a vulgar fate.

Enter LORD AUDLEY.

Aud. For England?

Rib. France—By heav'n! the gallant Audley.

Now, fortune, I forgive thy partial dealing:

For, next to victory, my wish has been

To fall by so renown'd an arm as Audley's.

Aud. Brave Ribemont, I will return thy praise,

And own thee noblest of my country's foes.

Had we been natives of one happy land,

The gen'rous semblance of our souls had link'd us

In friendship's dearest bonds.

Rib. But here we stand,

Determin'd champions in opposing lists,

Each in his country's cause, the other's foe.

Come, for I long to try this season'd blade

Upon true metal. If I conquer thee,

I take no portion of the foul disgrace

Which heav'n this day has thrown upon our arms.

But should my fortune, (as perhaps it may,) [reach

Like my poor country's, bow the head to England,

Then, Audley, wilt thou add to thy renown,

By doing what thy king has only done—

Baffle the warrior he pronounc'd a brave one!

Now for determination.

Aud. Hold a moment:

Look on the field, brave Ribemont; behold

Thou hast no passage for escape left open!

Me shouldst thou vanquish, from the thousands
Captivity or death must be thy lot. [round thee,

Then make not havoc of great qualities,
Nor to thy kingdom lose, through desperation,
The bravest arm and noblest heart it boasts.
Give my fond wish the power but to protect thee:
Resign thy sword; I'll prove no conqueror,
But clasp thee with a warmth of gen'rous friendship.

Rib. Audley, I thank thee; but my hour is come.

You bid me look upon the field; look thou,

And see the glory of my country blasted!

To lose a day like this, and to survive it,

Would be a wretchedness I'll ne'er endure.

No; in a nation's fate be mine involv'd:

To fall with France is now the only means

To satisfy my soul, and save my fame.

Aud. Oh! yet—

Rib. I'm fix'd!

Aud. Why, then, for England this.

Rib. And this for France. (They fight.)

Aud. What! neither get the better?

'Tis a tough task. Again.

(They fight again.)

Rib. Why, valiant lord,

The balance still nods doubtful; as the pow'rs

Were undetermin'd which must yield the day.

Are our fates grown of such high consequence,

That heav'n should pause upon the great decision?

Let us no longer worry one another,

Where can the vulnerable spot be found?

Aud. Why there.

(They fight. Ribemont falls, and Audley is wounded.)

Rib. No, there.

Aud. We are companions still. [fast;

Rib. Inward I bleed: the streams of life run

And all that did invigorate deserts me.

Audley, the palm of victory is thine:

I yield, I die—but glory in my fall:

It is beneath the noblest English arm,

And that secures my fame: thy bosom now

May harbour him that is thy foe no more.

(Audley kneels, and takes him in his arms.)

Why, this is kind! thus lock'd in thy embrace,

To let a rival warrior breathe his last.

Report me truly as thy sword has found—

I know thou wilt—and, in the long hereafter,

If we can meet—I'll thank thee for't.—Farewell!

(Dies.)

Aud. Farewell, brave Ribemont; thou fearless soldier!

Peace to thy ashes, to thy soul reward,

And honour crown thy name! A foe could weep;

But pity would disgrace a death like thine.

(Trumpets.)

Enter PRINCE EDWARD, LORD CHANDOS, and Attendants.

P. Edw. (Turning back.) Give instant orders to recall our parties;

I will not hazard, by a rash pursuit,

So vast a victory! And let my standard

Be hoisted on the highest neighb'ring tree,

To guide our troops returning from the chase.

England, my Chandos, triumphs! For our arms

Have won the noblest field that e'er was fought!

Ah! Audley bleeding! then must conquest mourn,

And I lament, amidst my spoils and trophies,

The best of nobles, warriors, and of friends.

Aud. Faint with the loss of blood, I hope no more. [reach

P. Edw. Summon assistance; all that wealth can

To him who gives me but his life's assurance.

[Exit an Attendant.]

Advance that banner o'er us. Long, oh! long

May'st thou survive to wear this well-won honour.

(He knights and embraces Audley.)

My bravest knight, my most belov'd of men,

Lead him away; repose him in his tent.

Soon as the hurry of the field is o'er,

I'll come in person and attend his cure.

Aud. There lifeless lies the arm that gave the
A braver soldier never press'd the earth. [wound:
On his remains let due distinction wait,
To dignify the dust that once was noble.

[He is led off.]

P. Edw. The valiant Ribemont! Take hence his corpse,
And see that every solemn rite be paid:
With honours suited to his high renown,
Conduct the body to its peaceful grave.

[Ribemont is carried off.]

Chan. The field is thinn'd! And now, far off re-
The dying voice of tumult faintly sounds, [mov'd,
Like the hoarse thunder in a distant sky;
Or hollow roarings of subsiding waves,
After their conflict with a furious storm. [us,

P. Edw. An awful horror! The sad scene before
Pompous with desolation! as declines
The glow and ardour of our martial flame,
Softens the mind to mournful meditation.
How many souls have ta'en eternal flight,
Who, but this very morning, on the wing
Of expectation, look'd through years to come!
So have the bubbles of their hopes been broke;
So may it fare with us—And such is life!

[Enter LOUISA, and falls on her knees.]

Lou. Oh! mighty prince, whose matchless virtues charm

The many realms your victories have aw'd,
Lend your compassion, your protection lend,
To wretched, bleeding, dying penitence.

P. Edw. What wouldst thou say?

Lou. Unhappy Mariana,
At once the victim of distressful love,
And deep remorse for treachery—

P. Edw. Go on.

Lou. Frantic and weeping, ran o'er all the field,
Till chance directed her to Arnold's corpse,
That welt'ring lay in blood. She kiss'd it oft,
Bath'd it with tears, tore her dishevell'd locks,
Smote her poor bosom, sobb'd, and sadly groan'd,
Till snatching from his clay-cold hand his sword,
She plung'd it sudden in her side! sunk down,
And call'd on death to lock their last embrace;
I (but too late to save her) interpos'd,
And cry'd for help—alas! in vain. But now,
Pluck'd by some passing soldiers from the body,
They force her, raving and reluctant, hither.

P. Edw. Oh! Chandos, what a moving sight is here!

[Enter Soldiers, forcing in MARIANA, distracted and bleeding.]

Mar. Off, let me go! I will not be torn from him:
Relentless monsters! Let us mingle blood,
And die together. What do I behold!
Oh! hide me, friendly earth! for ever hide me
From that offended face. [Sinks down.]

P. Edw. Look up, fair mourner,
[Kneeling by her.]

And gather comfort from my friendly tears.

Mar. Comfort from thee? Thou injur'd godlike hero,

Load me with curses! Stab me with reproaches—
Thy sweetness cannot! but the hand of heav'n,
That strikes for injur'd virtue, heavy falls,
And crushes me beneath it.

P. Edw. Weep not thus. [this?

Mar. What art thou made of, heart, to bear all
That grov'ling in the dust—abandon'd—

P. Edw. Nay,
Do not be so wilful—And—

Mar. Indeed, great prince,
The dear, departed Arnold was ensnar'd,
Seduc'd, betray'd by me. But heav'n can witness,
My only motive was his preservation.
Danger, despair, provok'd the guilty deed,
Which horror, death, and infamy reward.
Forgive the breathless soldier that rever'd,
And servant that ador'd you, sir! On me

Heap all your indignation; scorn, detest,
Despise, and hate my memory for ever.

P. Edw. No; both have my compassion, my forgiveness. [sound!

Mar. Forgiveness, said you? Oh! celestial
Catch it, ye angels, hov'ring on the wing,
To waft me to the bar of heav'n's high justice!
Offended virtue pities and forgives!
Chant it aloud, and cheer with this foretaste
Of goodness infinite—my drooping—Oh!— [Dies.]

Chan. She's breathless!

P. Edw. Heav'n, I hope, will think their crime
Enough was punish'd by affliction here.
Lay them together.—Well, my Lord of Warwick—

[Enter EARL OF WARWICK.]

War. I've view'd the adverse camp, as you commanded;

Where all the wealth of France was sure collected,
To grace the ruin of that wretched people:

Each tent profuse! like those of Pompey's host,
When on Pharsalia's plain he fought great Cæsar,
And lost the world, his life, and Rome her freedom.

P. Edw. All-righteous heav'n! thy hand is here conspicuous:

Pride and presumption finish thus their shame. [Shout.]

Chan. 'Tis a train of pris'ners; bring hither.

[*Enter EARL OF SALISBURY, with Officers and Soldiers, conducting KING JOHN, the DUKE OF TOU-
RAIN, ARCHBISHOP OF SENS, and several French
Noblemen, prisoners.*]

P. Edw. Brave Salisbury, you're welcome to my
The field is ours! [arms.

Sal. And nobly was it fought! [ted
Behold, my noble prince, how well we have acquit-
The claims our adversaries made on us.

Your veteran swordsman, Sir John Pelham, sends
This royal trophy to adorn your triumph.

P. Edw. Most wise and valiant of all Christian kings,

Rever'd for virtues, and renown'd in arms!
That I behold you thus, dissolves my heart
With tender feeling; while I bend the knee
In humble praise of that good Providence,
Which gives so great a victory to England!
For you, great monarch! let your godlike soul
Strive with adversity, and still preserve,
As well you may, your royal mind unconquer'd.
Fortune is partial in her distributions:

Could merit always challenge its reward,
In other lights we might this hour have stood,
Perhaps the victor you, and I the captive:
But fear no wrong, the good should never fear it.
This land, from whence my ancestors have sprung,
By me shall not be injur'd: for yourself,
And this illustrious train of noble pris'ners,
My care shall be to treat you as I ought. [sin,

K. John. My gracious conqueror, and kindest cou-
This goodness more than victory renowns you!

That I'm unfortunate is no reproach,
I brav'd all dangers as became a king,
Till by my coward subjects left and lost. [riv'd,

P. Edw. Lead to my tent; when we are there ar-

Prepare a banquet with all princely pomp,
At which I'll wait, and serve my royal guests.

My noble lords, and brave companions all,
I leave your praise for the wide world to sound:
Nor can the voice of fame, however loud,
Out-speak the merit of your matchless deeds.

Oh! may Britannia's sons, through every age,
As they shall read of this so great achievement,
Feel the recorded victory inspire
An emulation of our martial fire,

When future wrongs their ardour shall excite,
And future princes lead them forth to fight;
Till, by repeated conquests, they obtain
A power to awe the earth, and rule the main;

Each tyrant fetter gloriously unbind,
And give their liberty to all mankind. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in Sir Simon Flourish's house.

Enter SIR SIMON FLOURISH and OLD TESTY.

Sir S. But, my good friend Testy, do lower the pitch of your voice a little; for to speak so very loud is really not well-bred.

Old T. I'll speak as loud as I like, and say what I like. D— your breeding! an ounce of honesty is worth an hundred weight of it.

Sir S. There now! ounce and hundred weight! Can't you contrive to think and talk a little like a man of fashion? When you quitted business, you should have disposed of your vulgarity with your stock in trade. Copy me. Do you find anything vulgar about me?

Old T. Psha! you and I lived too long together to think of cajoling each other: you are as vulgar as I am; I wish you were half as honest.

Sir S. My good friend, if we are not to attempt cajoling each other, the less you say about your honesty the better.

Old T. Why, what have you to say against my honesty?

Sir S. Nothing; I am too well bred: beside, I was your partner in trade for twenty-five years, I reaped half the profits of your ingenuity, and had you been honest, I might be poorer. But, my dear friend, let us settle our business a little quietly, if you will be so kind. Your son, you say, is come to town: good. You insist he may be introduced to our ward, Miss Hartley: he shall.

Old T. That's fair.

Sir S. I thought you'd say so; because 'tis very unfair to my own son, who, being absent from England, ought not to have a rival introduced to the lady I wish to be his wife. But remember, as she cannot marry without our joint consent, we must agree that which ever she prefers shall have our mutual approbation.

Old T. Why, yes.

Sir S. Ah! mine is the boy that will win her! Educated with every advantage; now receiving the last polish, the finishing stroke to his accomplishments, in a tour through Europe. Oh! he is a—

Old T. Yes, he is a pretty boy. That youth will put foreign ingenuity to the test. If they can send him away more dissipated than they find him, I will give them credit for one miracle.

Sir S. Leave your growling, good Mr. Bear, and look after your own unlicked cub. His country breeding will render him vastly pleasing to a young lady.

Old T. He is a model of perfection. Innocent himself, he will never suspect that evil exists; that may make him liable to imposition: but I have adopted a remedy in my choice of a profession for him.

Sir S. As how, pray?

Old T. To render him in some degree a match for the roguery of the world, I shall make him a lawyer.

Sir S. And I dare say his Yorkshire simplicity will qualify him admirably for the profession.

Old T. Well, Flourish, the only thing we were ever in one mind about was parting, and I conclude you have no objection to it now.

Sir S. None in the least.

Old T. I shall send my son; and mind, fair play's the word.

Sir S. Certainly. Let me see you out.

Old T. Oh! d— your civility! Stay where you are. [Exit.]

Sir S. Oh! you pretty behaved, accomplished creature! Is it not strange, that in so many years acquaintance the polish of my manners should not have induced him to rub off his vulgar rust?

Serv. Captain O'Neill, sir.

Sir S. Shew the Captain in. [Exit Serv.]

Enter CAPTAIN O'NEILL.

I rejoice to see you, Captain O'Neill. You are welcome to town.

Capt. Sir Simon Flourish, your most obedient. Permit me to inquire after her ladyship, and your lovely ward, Miss Hartley.

Sir S. Both in fine health and spirits; and they will very much regret not being at home to receive you.

Capt. Proud as I always am to pay them my profound respects, at this moment my business lies entirely with you, Sir Simon.

Sir S. Oh Lord! I hope he doesn't want to borrow money of me. (Aside.) Your commands, if you please, Captain.

Capt. An affair of honour compels me to be troublesome to you.

Sir S. An affair of honour compels him to be troublesome to me! Oh! that is worse than borrowing money. (Aside.)

Capt. My wounded reputation must be healed.

Sir S. Oh lord! Oh lord! How have I offended him? (Aside.)

Capt. Slander can only be washed out with blood.

Sir S. Oh! my precious blood! Oh dear, oh dear! I suppose I have said some ill-natured thing of him behind his back, for I am sure I never durst affront him to his face. (Aside.)

Capt. A little after your leaving Bath—

Sir S. A little after my leaving Bath! Oh! yes, some d—d good-natured friend blabbed when my back was turned. (Aside.) Why, really, Captain, I don't recollect what can have given you offence at Bath.

Capt. That I readily believe; for it would be hard to expect you to recollect what you never heard.

Sir S. Eh!

Capt. I say, Sir Simon, you cannot be expected to know the insult offered me by a man who did not arrive till you were gone.

Sir S. Oh! the man that insulted you did not arrive till I was gone? Lord! what a load is off my mind! (Aside.) And so, Captain, a villain had the audacity to insult you?

Capt. I was insulted, Sir Simon.

Sir S. You'll not let him live. You'll tear him to atoms; I know you will. Blood and thunder! if it were my case—

Capt. Be cool, Sir Simon; you are too desperate.

Sir S. I am; I know it is my fault; but—fire and fury!—Can I assist you in this business?

Capt. That is the very cause of my visit to you. Will you honour me so far as to deliver a bit of a message for me?

Sir S. What, carry a challenge for you?

Capt. Exactly.

Sir S. What, and be your second?

Capt. If I may take the liberty to ask such a favour?

Sir S. My dear Captain, give me your hand. I am the happiest man alive to serve a friend. I'll see you through this affair; I'll take care of you. Where am I to go? What am I to do first?

Capt. Why, first of all, there is a little preparatory business. Before I can receive satisfaction for the injury done me I must put it in the power of my adversary to give it me.

Sir S. As how, pray?

Capt. You must know, the young man is unluckily in prison for debt: and as he has friends who are able to release him, I thought it would be taking a liberty to rob them of a pleasure they have the best right to; but they scorn to be outdone in politeness, and I believe, would let him remain till doomsday, before they would dispute the point with me.

Sir S. And so, you mean to pay his debts on purpose to fight him?

Capt. I do, and I wish I had a better motive; for though injured honour demands atonement, I would rather do one little bit of a kindness than revenge a thousand injuries.

Sir S. Will it cost you much?

Capt. More than is quite convenient, and therefore, I must trespass on your goodness in a second instance.

Sir S. Eh! what, how?

Capt. I shall be under the necessity of troubling you for three hundred pounds.

Sir S. Lord! it is a vast deal of money: I think you had better not fight him till there is an act of insolvency. Or, couldn't you get a snug little room in the prison, and fight him at his own home? that would be more genteel and accommodating. No, no; plague take it! that won't do; for, if you kill him, they will keep us there. I should like to see you fight amazingly; but then, to pay three hundred pounds for it, it is very dear: I only paid a guinea to see Johnson and big Ben, and their way of fighting is quite as fashionable now-a-days.

Capt. Understand me, Sir Simon. I don't intend to be under an obligation to you or any man. I have brought my commission as security for the sum.

Sir S. Security! My dear friend, do you think I want security? That is like a trader: there is no security with people of fashion. Yet I may as well take it by way of memorandum. (Takes the commission.) Well, tell me who he is, and where he is to be found. I'll carry him the money and the challenge.

Capt. Oh! by no means. He must not know the money comes from me. He may feel it unpleasant to be under an obligation to a man he has wronged; and to know that I had injured his feelings, would not be the way to satisfy mine.

Sir S. You are a very strange man! There is the money, manage it your own way. (Gives him notes.)

Capt. I thank you; and as soon as he has got the miseries of a prison a little out of his mind, you shall wait on him.

Sir S. As soon as you please. The sooner the better.

Capt. You are too impetuous, you fiery little fellow! We must not be in a hurry, for misfortune is apt to lower a man's spirit, and I scorn to meet a foe in a state of degradation.

Sir S. Well, you must act as you choose, only fight soon, for I shall think of nothing else. I know I am a desperate dog. When I was at school, they used to call me the little game cock. You are to do as you like, but were it my own affair, I should stand close, muzzle to muzzle, toe to toe. D—! I'd fight him in a saw-pit. I wonder I have not fought yet. I never was even asked to be a second till now; but, I believe, I know pretty well from the newspapers what a second has to do. To load the pistols, measure the ground, take care they stand near enough, and let them fire as long as they like. I believe that is all. Oh! no; if the parties are wounded, he is to leave them on the ground, to the mercy of chance, and take care of himself.

Capt. I am not to dictate your conduct, Sir Simon; only it might be as well if every second would consider that his office is that of a friend to adjust an affair of honour, not of a sheriff to witness an execution. Good morning, Sir Simon. [Exit.]

Sir S. What a lucky dog I am! To be concerned in a duel was the only thing wanting to complete me as a man of fashion. I shall state the case next day in the newspapers, with my name at full length. Then a glorious confusion always takes place! People just remember the names, but forget whether they were principals or seconds. Oh! my character will be up: I shall be a man of fashion, indeed!

Enter LADY FLOURISH and MISS HARTLEY.

Lady F. My dear Sir Simon, how glad I am you're at home! If I am ever so little a while away from you, my darling, it appears a long, tedious age. How does my lovey do? Do look tender: 'tis so becoming to you; and beside, if you don't, you know you break my heart.

Sir S. Now really, Lady Flourish, you are too fond before company, indeed you are. 'Tis your only fault, my dear. But you ought to consider, that to be fond of a husband at all, is very unfashionable; and therefore, when a wife feels that amiable weakness, she ought never to expose it before people.

Lady F. But I can't help exposing it. Miss Hartley knows I have been talking of nothing else but my dearest the whole time I have been out: all the while I was buying my china, and my gold muslins, and my lace, I was longing to be at home with my darling.

Sir S. Lord! my dear, I wish you had indulged your longing, and then you wouldn't have laid out so much money. And how is my dear Miss Hartley? You don't seem in spirits.

Miss H. Indeed I am not; but the cause of my want of spirits must remain a secret to you. (Aside.) They, sir, who, like me, never knew misfortune, are apt to trifle with their felicity.

SONG.—MISS HARTLEY.

*The heart that has ne'er tasted sorrow,
E'en happiness often will cloy;
And we ever from misery borrow
Our knowledge of exquisite joy.*

*To those who all anguish would smother,
The best use of life is unknown;
To feel for the woes of another,
Or value the bliss that's their own.*

Sir S. Old Testy's stupid bumpkin of a son is to be introduced to you this morning: but there is no fear of his rivalling my boy Jack. How I long to see the rogue again! Where is he now, I wonder? May be, eating macaroni with the grand duke, or having the honour of kissing the toe of his holiness the pope. Oh! what high fellows my son is living with!

Lady F. Wherever he is, my dearest, he can meet nobody so fine a gentleman as his papa.

Sir S. Oh! you are too partial, Lady Flourish, a great deal; a great deal too partial. I have news for you: Captain O'Neill has been here.

Lady F. Captain O'Neill in town?

Sir S. I should like to tell them of his engaging me to be his second. (Aside.) You know the Captain is a man of great bravery, and knowing me to be of the same turn—um—um—we have had a good deal of conversation on the subject of duelling.

Lady F. I hope the Captain is not going to fight a duel? (Alarmed.)

Sir S. Oh dear! no.

Lady F. I am glad to hear you say so. I was quite agitated at the thought of any friend of your's being engaged in so horrid a business.

Sir S. I must not blab, I find. She'd lay an information, and destroy my renown. Were I a principal instead of a second, I should be vastly obliged to her. (Aside.) I wonder how many duels Jack has fought abroad—that is, fought, or been second in. 'Tis just the same thing. The credit is the same, and so is the danger, pretty nearly; for the principals are often so cursedly frightened that it is an even chance whether they hit their antagonist, or their own second.

Miss H. Though I abhor the practice, yet when men deem such trials necessary, I hope they conduct themselves with proper courage.

Sir S. That is mighty well of you. You don't know what it is to receive a man's fire, or you would not talk so lightly about it.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Young Mr. Testy. sir.

Sir S. Very well.

[Exit Serv.]

Lady F. Come, my dear, rest yourself a little before you encounter the fatigue of this bumpkin's conversation.

Sir S. Ay, do; I'll talk to him first.

[Exeunt Lady F. and Miss H.]

Enter YOUNG TESTY.

Well, Tom, I'm glad to see you: you are welcome to London. Oh! what a quiz it is! (Aside.)

Young T. Thank you, thank you, Sir Simon. Lord, Lord! why, you be quite another guise kind of a man than what you used to be. I remember, as thof it was but yesterday, when father and you used to weigh I and Jack Flourish in the great warehouse scales, and I always were heaviest.

Sir S. Yes, and you'll continue heaviest as long as you live. But, Tom, don't talk about weights and scales; 'tis so vulgar. D— trade, and all that belongs to it. I am a gentleman and a knight now.

Young T. Yes, Sir Simon, so they tell me; but for all that, don't d— trade; for I don't think as how you'd ha' been a gentleman and a knight, if the money you got by the warehouse had not given you a bit of a lift.

Sir S. Oh! the vulgar young dog! (Aside.)

Young T. Well, Sir Simon, father sent me a courting; and so, you see, I am come; so no more words, let's set about it.

Sir S. Oh! yes, with all my heart. I'll see if Miss Hartley is ready to receive you. What a young savage! I dare say they would buy him at Exeter 'Change. [Aside and exit.]

Young T. Well, faint heart never won fair lady. Dang it! I'll shew her a Yorkshire boy is not afraid of a pretty girl.

SONG.—YOUNG TESTY.

*I ne'er by a lass yet was scouted,
I know the right method to get her;
No cringing for me,
I'll soon let her see
That I'm bold, and she'll like me the better.*

*I'm a boy that's not easily flouted,
If she give herself airs, why, e'en let her;
When to kiss her I try,
"You're rude, sir," she'll cry,
"Why, I am, and you like me the better."*

*When she finds that I'm not to be routed,
And at morn, noon, and night I beset her,
She'll alter her tone,
And readily own,
Though I'm rude, that she likes me the better.*

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Room in Sir Simon Flourish's house.

Enter SIR SIMON FLOURISH and KITTY.

Sir S. And now give me a kiss, you little rogue you. (Kisses her.)

Kitty. Lard! Sir Simon, how can you be so rude!

Sir S. Now, Kitty, mind you say all the ill-natured things you can to your young mistress of this country blockhead. Always praise my son Jack to her, and he'll bring you over trinkets enough for you to set up a raffle-shop at Margate. Here the booby comes. Now you may go and fetch Miss Hartley.

Enter YOUNG TESTY.

There, Mr. Testy, good bye: I leave you to your love-making. What a lout it is!

[Aside to Kitty, and exit.]

Young T. So, this be young madam that father wants me to marry. Egad! she is a tight lass enow! (Aside.) Well, miss, and so father says as how he wishes I'd marry you; and so, d'ye see? if you've no mighty objection, we may even be axed in church together.

Kitty. What does the booby mean? Lord! he takes me for my mistress. Not such a booby as I thought him. (Aside.)

Young T. Why, you don't answer, miss. Speak out: don't be shame-faced. So, as I was saying, I have no disliking to you, nor liking for anybody else, and if you have no particular disliking to me more than to other people, I dare say we shall be as happy a couple as goes.

Kitty. Gemini! what a flutter I am in! If I can but make him believe I am my mistress, my fortune is made. I must try to behave like a lady; but if I am modest, like my mistress, I shall never pass upon him. No, no; I must be free and dashing, as fine ladies are in general. (Aside.) Why, young man, I have been considering what you have been saying; and, as I don't think you quite so great a brute as I expected you to be, I don't much care if I take you upon trial.

Young T. Take me upon trial! What, does she make a horse of me? But, dang it! free and easy! I like her the better. (Aside.) But mayhap, miss, if I am not so great a brute now, I may be a greater when I am married. Ah! what do you say to that, my tight filly?

Kitty. I'll do all I can to make you fashionable.

Young T. Thank you, thank you. I'll do as much for you. Dang it! I didn't think I should have been so much at home with a fine lady.

Kitty. What is your name, young man?

Young T. Tom Testy.

Kitty. Well, Tom—

Young T. Tom! How familiar and kind!

Kitty. I'll have you, Tom. 'Tis a bargain.

Young T. Is it? There's my hand, and my lips, too. How little we know in Yorkshire about London folk. They told me, your fine ladies were squeamish and shy, and all that nonsense.

Kitty. No, Tom. That is quite gone by in high life.

Young T. So much the better. Well, but miss, and when shall we be married? eh! Let it be soon.

Kitty. When you like; 'tis all one to me. Only, Tom, don't mention it, let us be snug. We'll steal a march; marry first, and tell the old ones after.

Young T. So we will: that will be good fun.

Kitty. Now mind, when you go home to your father, you don't tell him what we have settled.

Young T. No, not I; but I don't live at father's; I've got a place of my own, do as I like, live in the Temple. I am to be a counsellor, father says, and a plaguy good one I shall make; for it is all done by eating, and I have a fine appetite, if the London air don't spoil it. Lord! what a happy life we shall lead!

DUETT.—KITTY and YOUNG TESTY.

Kitty. When I'm married, I'll be gay,
Still flaunting as shall please me;
Careless what I do or say,
No power on earth shall tease me.
If you e'er, in jealous spite,
Should hint at horns ideal,
Then my way to set you right
Will be to make them real.

Young T. Husbands, now, for horns who care,
Must be less wise than nice, ma'am,
While, at market, horns will bear
So very high a price, ma'am:
And for lawyers, too, like me,
No trouble it at all is,
Since Horn-fair remov'd we see
To Westminster old hall is.

Both. Then since we agree so easy to be,
Let's marry as soon as we can;
For, not to demur, whate'er may occur,
Is, surely, the very best plan. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The King's Bench Prison.

Enter HARCOURT.

Har. Was ever man more miserably circumstanced? Bred up as heir to a splendid fortune, and all my hopes destroyed by the caprice of a splenetic old uncle. Shut up here, in the King's Bench, for debt; and, not only deprived of the happiness of beholding the woman I adore, but ashamed to acquaint her with the wretchedness of my situation.

AIR.—HARCOURT.

Once, all that could enchant the sight
Enraptur'd fancy drew,
And deck'd each prospect of delight
With tints of brightest hue.
In fairy loveliness array'd,
The beauteous objects shone,
While charm'd I gaz'd, Hope sweetly said,
"These prospects are thine own."

But fancy, now, from forms of joy,
Averts her sick'ning sight;
Her pencil horrors wild employ,
And scenes of blackest night;
The dismal pictures rise to view
Where direst ills combine,
Despair exclaims, "Bid Hope adieu,
These prospects now are thine."

Enter a Servant belonging to the Prison.

Serv. Mr. Flourish, sir has sent you the book of travels he borrow'd; and says he will call on you presently.

Har. That good-humoured, whimsical fellow, Flourish, is always welcome to me.

Serv. It is queer enough that his father, Sir Simon Flourish, should be hummed so as to think he is going the tour of Europe, when, all the while, he never got a step farther than St. George's Fields. [Exit.]

Young F. (Singing without.) "Over the hills," &c.
Har. Here he comes.

Enter YOUNG FLOURISH in a shabby light-coloured coat, with black breeches and boots.

Young F. Ah! my boy, Harcourt, how are you?
Har. Why, Jack, what makes you booted?

Young F. A man ought to be booted when he's on a journey. A'n't I going the tour of Europe?

Har. Oh! I beg your pardon; I had forgot: but you don't seem furnished with a very elegant riding dress; boots and black are not very correct—eh!

Young F. The customs of countries differ: but to tell you the truth, so much travelling has made vast havoc among my leather, and as for my black small-clothes, I wear them as mourning for the demise of my last coloured pair.

Har. But, my dear Jack, what can be the joke of your staying in this sad place?

Young F. All the joke was in getting here. Staying is not quite so comical.

Har. But, Jack, I must know what brought you here?

Young F. Poll.

Har. Poll! What Poll?

Young F. Not know Poll? Where the devil have you lived? Not know Poll? Why, Poll is the rage—in Hyde Park every morning—rides the best horse—drives the best curricule—gives the best dinners; d—e! the first dutchess in the land envies Poll.

Har. I beg Poll's pardon for not knowing her.

Young F. So you ought, for Poll's familiar and kind, she'd have no objection to knowing you. But the thing is, father said I should be a man of fashion, and so I am, a'n't I? D—e! you still look at my legs: well, black-legs don't make a bit less a man of fashion.

Har. Oh! by no means.

Young F. Well, but about Poll. As I was to be a man of fashion, who so proper to make me one as Poll? Poll has made and unmade half the fine men of the day. I kept Poll when I was at school; Poll stuck to me at college; and when father fixed I should travel, and see the world, who so fit to shew it me as Poll?

Har. Well, why didn't Poll shew it you?

Young F. She did, she shewed me here.

Har. But why not take her abroad with you?

Young F. She would not go. Poll said she would do anything but cross the water with me. And I could not find in my heart to go abroad without her. So I touched father's cash, and resolved to finish my education in my own country.

Har. Very patriotic, truly!

Young F. Well, father went to Bath—I staid in town—the money flew—Poll knew how to dash it. When all was gone, it was natural enough to come here, you know.

Har. But how were you able to leave Poll?

Young F. She did not trouble me to think about that: when the money was gone, Poll left me.

Har. So Poll would not follow your fortunes to the King's Bench? How unkind!

Young F. So I told her: "Ah! Poll!" said I, "'tis d—d ill-natured to leave me."

Har. And what did she say?

Young F. She only laughed, and said, she told me at first, she'd do anything but cross the water with me.

Har. You must throw yourself on your father's mercy at last, and the sooner you do it the better.

Enter Servant with a letter.

Young F. For me?

Serv. No, sir; for Mr. Harcourt.

Young F. Ah! nobody writes to me.

Har. (Reads.) "I am led to believe the enclosed notes will liberate you. They are sent for that purpose." Astonishing! No name! Does anybody wait?

Serv. No, sir.

[Exit.]

Har. This must be from my dear girl.

Young F. Ah! you are a happy fellow! Your dear girl writes to you. Though Poll would not cross the water, she might send me a letter now and then. It is d—d unkind. But no, no, poor girl, I shouldn't scold her for what she can't help; I ought to remember Poll can't write.

Har. This must be my Harriot's generosity. Charming girl! How could she discover my situation? But what will not love discover?

Young F. So, you're going to leave me. 'Tis devilish hard to be cut by everybody.

Har. Depend on it, my dear fellow, I will be with you soon.

Young F. Ah! do come and see me. Don't be like Poll, afraid of crossing the water.

Har. No, Jack, depend upon it. Adieu! Now to my charming girl. [Exit.]

Young F. Ah! your's is a charming girl, indeed, to send you money. If Poll had a million, I dare say she wouldn't think of sending me a shilling, and yet she used to say she loved me vastly.

SONG.—YOUNG FLOURISH.

When to my pretty Poll I went,
And I to travel sought her,
"Ah! stay at home, dear Jack," says she,
"I cannot cross the water."
What could I do? Away I flew,
A curricule I bought her;
Six smoking bays, all Hyde Park's gaze,
From Tattersall's I brought her.
"Dear Jack," says she, "how kind you be!
(She'd coax like Eve's own daughter,)
With you I will both live and die,
Do all but cross the water."
Then splashing, dashing through the town,
She drove, the stare of all;
The echo of her rattling wheels
Was, "There goes pretty Poll!"
Oh! pretty, pretty Poll!
From ev'ry tongue the echo rung
"See, there goes pretty Poll!"
What a lad then was I!
All to dress at me try,
And my praise to withhold none so currish,
With a girl so divine!
Such dinners! such wine!
What a d—d clever dog was Jack Flourish!
But an end to my cash,
And my fame goes to smash,
No friends my good qualities nourish;
For they, once so kind,
Now agree in one mind,
What a d—d stupid flat was Jack Flourish!
Thus cut by my friends, by bailiffs seiz'd,
And this vile limbo near,
Yet with one hope I still was pleas'd,
That Poll my cage would cheer.
To Poll I told where I must go,
And not to leave me sought her;
She, laughing, cried, "Dear Jack, you know
"I cannot cross the water." [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Garden belonging to Sir Simon Flourish's house.

MISS HARTLEY discovered.

Miss H. How distressing is my Harcourt's absence! and the mysterious concealment of his residence increases my anxiety. Can he think so meanly of me, as to suppose his loss of fortune will lessen my affection?

AIR.—MISS HARTLEY.

Not mine the narrow soul, assur'd,
In riches joy to find;
Not mine by title's glare allur'd,
To genuine merit blind.
In wealth and rank who seek for bliss,
Contempt or pity move,
They never choose so much amiss,
Whose hearts were form'd for love.

Enter HARCOURT.

Har. My life!

Miss H. Oh! Charles.

Har. My angel, what a tedious absence!

Miss H. If my Charles thought it so, why not sooner fly to his adoring Harriot?

Har. I followed you to Bath, but unluckily you had left it the day before I arrived; and what then happened I could not prevail on myself to disclose to you: I was resolved to bear my misfortunes alone; but your kindness has dispelled them, and now I fly with gratitude to thank my deliverer.

Miss H. Your deliverer!

Har. Yes, my Harriot; attempt not to conceal your generous conduct. But for you, a prison would have been my habitation for life.

Miss H. A prison, Charles! Has such been your distress, and yet conceal it from me?

Har. Can it be possible that I am not indebted to you for my deliverance?

Miss H. By concealing from me your situation, you prevented me from being your deliverer. Oh! Charles, that was a false pride, which avoided the assistance of her who loves you. True affection should seek occasions for receiving kindness, conscious it bestows most delight when it affords the power of obliging.

Har. Pardon me, Harriot. Poverty will be proud. But what am I to think? See here, my love, this cover enclosed notes sufficient to discharge my debts.

Miss H. Whoever has had the pleasure of releasing you claims my gratitude, yet excites my envy.

Har. Generous girl! To avoid suspicion, I had better leave you now, my Harriot.

DUETT.—HARCOURT and MISS HARTLEY.

Miss H. Ah! must you away while nature's so gay,
And all things to happiness move?

*Hark! the feather'd warbler's throat
Pours of joy the swelling note,
'Tis inspir'd by the spirit of love.*

Har. Ah! wert thou away, 'twould cease to be gay,
No longer to happiness move,
'Tis thou art the soul
Gives life to the whole,
And infuses the spirit of love.

Miss H. Hark! the tuneful current near Sweetly steals upon mine ear;
And its gentle murmurs prove
'Tis inspir'd by the spirit of love.

Har. Ah! dear girl, wert thou not here,
No more these sounds would sweet appear,
The murmur'ing stream would cease to prove
'Tis inspir'd by the spirit of love.

Both. Ah! dear youth, wert thou away,
Ah! dear girl, wert thou away,
No more would nature's face be gay;
No more each sound would sweetly prove
'Tis inspir'd by the spirit of love.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Sir Simon Flourish's house.

Enter LADY FLOURISH and KITTY.

Lady F. Kitty, did you see old Testy's Yorkshire prodigy when he was here?

Kitty. Yes, my lady.

Lady F. I conclude he is a shocking Saracen.

Kitty. Yes, my lady.

Lady F. I suppose Miss Hartley votes him a sad bore.

Kitty. Lard! your ladyship, I could not think of Miss Hartley being troubled with such a brute of a fellow; especially, my lady, as his honour, Sir Simon, designs miss for his own son; so, an't please you, my lady, I sent him away with a flea in his ear.

Enter CAPTAIN O'NEILL.

Lady F. Captain O'Neill, I am prodigiously happy to see you. Kitty, you need not wait.

[Exit Kitty.]

Capt. I protest and vow, that meeting your ladyship gives me the most superlative pleasure.

Lady F. Why, then, I protest and vow the pleasure is mutual.

Capt. Your ladyship does me a great deal of honour. I will beg of her ladyship to say a kind word for me to Miss Hartley, for I want very much to be thought well of by that lovely girl. (Aside.) I am glad to find your ladyship alone.

Lady F. Glad to find me alone, Captain?

Capt. Prodigiously so, my lady. I have a favour to beg of your ladyship.

Lady F. A favour of me! I hope, Captain, you are not going to ask anything improper.

Capt. I hope your ladyship will not think it so.

Lady F. Indeed but I shall, if I ought to think it so; for though you are a very pretty man, and very much of a gentleman, and dance delightfully, and have a profusion of elegant accomplishments, and—

Capt. Oh! madam, madam, you confuse me.

Lady F. Do I? Well, I protest, 'tis very becoming to you. Confusion seems quite natural to you; but I will have compassion on your modesty.

Capt. It is very generous in your ladyship to compassionate a national infirmity. Bashfulness and the brogue always go together. But let me intreat you to take an interest in my happiness.

Lady F. I take an interest in your happiness! You'll absolutely make me faint.

Capt. What should your ladyship faint about? Why, my lady, I but desire—

Lady F. Oh! you should conquer your desires!

Capt. But I only wish—

Lady F. Fie, fie! I must not gratify your wishes. Don't press me any further; for though I have a great deal of resolution, you have an infinity of insinuation.

Capt. I wish you would let me insinuate my meaning.

Lady F. Don't shock me. I know what you want to insinuate. Think what a dreadful thing it is to seduce the wife of your friend.

Capt. My lady—

Lady F. Oh! Captain O'Neill, how can you go to persuade me to be unfaithful to poor, dear, little Sir Simon?

Enter SIR SIMON FLOURISH.

Sir S. Can I believe my ears? Why, fire and fury! Captain O'Neill, how durst you think of such a thing?

Capt. Here's a blessed piece of a blunder!

Lady F. Sir Simon, I'm quite shocked at your intrusion. How can you be so ill-bred? I beg you'll not interfere with my concerns. I am myself the guardian of my honour, and will not brook so insolent a monitor. [Exit.]

Sir S. Oh! you violator of friendship! Oh! you seducer! Why, Tarquin was a Joseph to you.

Capt. Sir Simon, upon my honour, I meant not the least harm.

Sir S. Why, did I not hear her say you wanted her to be unfaithful to poor, dear, little Sir Simon.

Capt. Will you hear me, Sir Simon?

Sir S. No, you monster of iniquity! you wanted to separate a pair of fine turtle-doves. You deluder of innocence, you destroyer of the peace of families!

Capt. Very well, Sir Simon, I plainly see what you mean. You are too fond of fighting to listen to reason; and since nothing but spilling my innocent blood will appease you, I must submit. There, Sir Simon; (pulling out pistols) I little thought to cock either of these against you.

Sir S. Cock them against me!

Capt. Take your choice, sir.

Sir S. Take my choice! No, I sha'n't take my choice.

Capt. Oh! you may trust to them; they have done execution in their time. But may be, you don't think one a piece enough? Well, then, fetch a pair of your own; I'll measure out a few paces while you are gone.

Sir S. A few paces!

Capt. Oh! I beg your pardon; I had forgot: you like to fight muzzle to muzzle.

Sir S. Muzzle to muzzle! Oh Lord! Oh Lord!

Capt. Well, I must assent to your savage propensities. I must fight you how you like.

Sir S. But d—e if I'll fight at all!

Capt. Not fight me? Oh! the patience of St. Patrick could not brook such contemptuous treatment. You won't even fight me?

Sir S. I won't upon my soul.

Capt. You positively refuse to treat me like a gentleman? Oh! what extremities you drive me to! (Strikes Sir S. with his cane.) How can you distress me so?

Sir S. How the devil can you distress me so?

Capt. Not fight me? Oh! 'tis cruel treatment!

Sir S. It is, upon my soul.

Capt. Now will you fight me?

Sir S. You are taking the worst way in the world to persuade me.

Capt. I'll try it a little more, however.

Sir S. Hold, for mercy! I'll ask your pardon—anything. What will satisfy you?

Capt. Nothing that a poltroon can offer. I am sorry I have degraded myself by striking a coward.

Sir S. So am I—very.

Capt. Oh! you are a desperate dog! You would stand close, toe to toe, muzzle to muzzle. D—e! you'd fight in a saw-pit. Oh! you are a pretty fellow for a second!

Sir S. Very well for a second, but not quite so well for a principal. But, Captain, I hope you'll be kind enough not to mention this trifling affair; for 'tis a pity the reputation a man has been collecting his whole life, should be whisked away in a moment. What a vapour honour is, that it will fly away in the dusting a coat! Do be tender, Captain; pray, don't mention this.

Capt. In my opinion, you are too contemptible to be mentioned at all.

Sir S. Your opinion I shall always have the highest respect for.

Capt. Good b'ye, my little game cock! I shall remember you always stand muzzle to muzzle. Oh! you are a desperate dog, indeed! [Exit.]

Sir S. I have been very unlucky. I am afraid I have not acted quite like a man of fashion. In the first place, to interrupt a gentleman's making love to my wife, was not at all like a man of fashion; no, that was very low breeding, indeed. As to getting a beating, that will happen to men of fashion, now and then. But one part of my behaviour, I hope, sets all to rights—I behaved very ill, and I asked pardon. If that is not like a man of fashion, the devil's in it. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Inside of the King's Bench Prison, with a view of the high wall.

Enter YOUNG FLOURISH.

Young F. I have been puzzling over maps, these two hours, to find out where I have been, or rather, where I ought to have been; and 'tis a great deal more troublesome to travel in imagination than in reality: for I must keep my eyes open, while I am tracing my journey on paper; but if I had gone it in earnest, I might have slept comfortably from post to post, as most travellers do.

Enter HARCOURT and CAPTAIN O'NEILL.

Ah! Charles, my boy! coming to see me so soon is kind, indeed.

Har. And I have brought a friend to see you.

Capt. What a mighty queer world we live in! This is a gentleman I am proud to hear call me friend, and yet, half-an-hour ago, I was ready to cut his throat.

Young F. Cut your friend's throat?

Capt. Why, it happens every day, don't it? Your making a wonder of that proves you live out of the world.

Young F. By your account, to live out of the world seems the only chance one has to live at all.

Capt. You are pretty right there; for between those who, having too little courage, want to be thought to have enough, and those who have so much 'tis always boiling over, a quiet man's life is in a constant state of requisition.

Young F. But how came you two to quarrel?

Capt. The only way that two honest men can quarrel—by mistake. However, before we troubled our pistols to speak for us, we thought it no dishonour to speak a little for ourselves; by which means we found out that though we met to settle a dispute, devil a dispute we had to settle.

Young F. How was that?

Capt. Why, it appears that this same good-looking countenance of mine is unlucky enough to resemble the phiz of a gentleman blacklegs, who by a little trick or two in the way of his trade, disburthened our friend of his cash. He thought, when he met me in the rooms at Bath, (and the place, to be sure, was not much in my favour,) that he had nicked his man, and accosted me accordingly. We lost one another in the crowd, and he departed in his error. I learnt his name, and followed him to London; where, if I hadn't had wisdom enough to ask an explanation, I might have been sent out of the world for the misfortune of resembling a scoundrel.

Har. How much I must ever feel bound to you!

Capt. Ah! Harcourt, appearances are very deceitful, and he who forms his opinions from them will blunder on in the dark, let the sun shine ever so bright.

Young F. And that is blundering, indeed.

Har. Captain O'Neill, my friend, Jack Flourish, is a very whimsical fellow: if he had been out of limbo you would have seen him earlier; for I should have brought him for my second.

Young F. No, you would not: for to be second in a duel is, in my mind, an employment pretty nearly as honourable as to be Jack Ketch's deputy.

Capt. All the Flourishes are not of that opinion. I presume, you are no relation to that little game cock, Sir Simon?

Young F. My father a little game-cock?

Capt. Sir Simon your father! Why, Sir Simon's son is on his travels.

Young F. Yes, Sir Simon's son travels like a mill-horse, a great deal in a small space. But here he is; here's Jack Flourish; and if he had not had the wisdom to stay at home, he would have lost the good fortune of becoming acquainted with you. He is a fool who quits Old England, for d—e, if he'll find such fellows anywhere as he leaves behind him.

Capt. I should be jealous of your praise if Old England and Old Ireland were not exactly the same spot of ground. So you are, really and truly, the fine travelled young gentleman, Mr. Flourish? Oh! you are a hopeful boy! I assure you, your father believes you have been seen and admired in every court in Europe.

Young F. So I ought to have been seen and admired in every court in Europe, but I was unluckily introduced at the court of King's Bench, and am not likely to visit any other court in a hurry.

Har. You must contrive to be on terms with your father, to assist me in obtaining his sanction to my passion for his ward, Miss Hartley.

Capt. What! you have a passion for Miss Hartley? So have I too. That is unlucky.

Har. A passion for Miss Hartley?

Capt. Yes: but I am by no means sure she has a passion for me; so, if you can prove she has for you, there are two to one against me.

Young F. I'll lay the odds.

Capt. Is it so? Enough said, then. He that can't make sport, never let him spoil it. 'Tis true, I had a liking for the young lady, but the first principle of my liking was to make her happy; and as long as that is brought about, whether by you or me, is the same thing among friends. Ha, ha, ha! My young traveller, I can't help laughing to think that this very morning I was dusting the coat of a relation of your's.

Young F. That was very kind of you; and while your hand is in I'll thank you to dust mine, for I'm sure it wants it.

Capt. Farewell, my young traveller; every assistance I can give, you may depend on. Well, Charles, you are a lucky dog to get such a sweet girl as Miss Hartley. Oh! the dear creatures, how I love them!

SONG.—CAPTAIN O'NEIL.

*In the smiles of the fair
Is the best cure for care,
If ruffled our bosom, they charm it to ease;
Or with eye sweetly glancing,
Our hearts they set dancing,
They calm us and rouse us e'en just as they please.*

*The wise prop of a state,
Or the warrior so great,
Oft bows down to kiss beauty's rod on his knees;
'Tis the province of beauty
To teach men their duty,
For women can do with us just what they please.*

*E'en the miser quits gold,
Their bright charms to behold,
And gives them his soul, for he yields them his keys;
The dear rogues are so clever,
Oh! bless 'em for ever,
And may they rule over us just as they please. [Exit.]*

Har. Jack, I've been thinking how you are to get at liberty.

Young F. Have you? Well, how?

Har. Acquaint your father that you are returned from abroad, then get a rule for the day, and see him: his joy at the sight of you may soften his heart, and pave the way for your forgiveness.

Young F. Well said. I'll do it: I'll have a rule: I'll hire a horse, as we call it.

Har. Well, my boy, success attend you. All the assistance I can give you, depend on. Farewell, my young traveller! [Exit.]

Young F. D—e! 'tis a lucky thought. Ay, but they won't trust me out alone. I must take one of their watch-dogs along with me. How shall I manage that? I have it. Yonder goes little Dicky. That's lucky! He's the man for my purpose. I must go to Monmouth-street myself to brush up appearances, and so I'll take little Dicky with me, dress him smartly, and introduce him to my father as a foreign nobleman who came over with me.

Well said! Huzza! Dicky, Dicky! I am so happy that I shall see the outside of that d—d wall once more!

Enter DICKY.

Dicky. Do you want me, Master Flourish?

Young F. Dicky, my boy, you are a clever little fellow; you are the only man that can serve me.

Dicky. Vy, then, make it worth my while, and nobody readier.

Young F. I am going to have a rule: hire a horse, as we call it; and you shall get up behind. There is nobody else in your way fit for a gentleman's companion: you are the only genteel article.

Dicky. To be sure, they are d—d vulgar.

Young F. I am going to take you to my father's, and you must pass for a man of fashion.

Dicky. Well, my master, I'll try. I shall look it very well.

Young F. No, no: I must put you on a laced coat.

DUETT.—YOUNG FLOURISH and DICKY.

Young F. Dicky, I shall smartly dress you.

Dicky. Why, I'm smart enough, Lord bless you!

Young F. No, no.

Dicky. Why so?

What am I to pass for, pray?

Young F. For a man of rank, I say.

Dicky. Why, then, don't I hit it quite? Sure, I'm dress'd exactly right.

Young F. Why, really, Dicky, I must own
You're in the style of men of ton;
In side-boxes oft we view
Men of fashion dress'd like you.

Dicky. In side-boxes oft you see
Men of fashion dress'd like me.

Young F. Very true,
Just like you;
But that will not with daddy do.

Dicky. Why so?

Young F. You must know,
Dad's a bit of the old beau,
And thinks it most becoming when
Men of fashion dress like gentlemen.

Dicky. In side-boxes oft you see
Men of fashion dress'd like me.

Young F. Dad thinks it most becoming when Men of fashion dress like gentlemen.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Young Testy's Chambers in the Temple.

YOUNG TESTY and SNARE discovered.

Snare. And so you like London prodigiously?

Young T. Hugely! What did my quiz of a father mean by keeping me in the country so long? I ought to have been as wise as I am now five years ago.

Snare. To be sure; and your knowledge would not have surprized people either.

Young T. No, not at all. I am not half so knowing as I ought to be, for all I was bred in Yorkshire.

Snare. That was in your favour.

Young T. Oh! 'twas heaven's mercy I was pitched into a 'cutish country, or I should never have been able to shew my face here. Why, boys of sixteen here know a great deal more than I do.

Snare. Boys of sixteen! Men of sixteen, you mean. Sixteen! why, 'tis the prime of a man's life. Who are your greatest men on the turf? your men of sixteen. Who keep your dashing women in the greatest style? your men of sixteen.

Young T. So I thought. It came into my head that keeping your dashing women was a very young trick.

Snare. Everything is now in a state of forwardness unknown to our ancestors. London may be termed an immense hot-house, where everything is forced. You eat your fruit before it is in season. You run through your constitution before it is matured. You spend your estate before you are in possession, and get divorced from your wife before you ought to have married. 'Tis a lively system, is it not?

Young T. Ay, a short life and a merry one.

Snare. But you were out of luck last night.

Young T. Yes, a little; and when I had lost all my money, it was vastly friendly of you to lend me the two hundred pounds; but I lost them too.

Snare. It will happen so sometimes. A lad of spirit does not mind such trifles. I will thank you, though, to return me the money: for I am rather out of cash.

Young T. Eh!

Snare. I'll thank you for the two hundred pounds I lent you.

Young T. My dear friend, I could as soon give you a million. My father does not allowance me in such a grand style as that comes to. I must catch him in a devilish good humour, ay, and in a great many of them, before I get two hundred pounds of him.

Snare. 'Tis d—d shabby of you to borrow money you can't pay.

Young T. Is this your friendship? Why, did not you force it on me? Did not you tell me you only lived in obliging your friends?

Snare. You make a small mistake; I told you I only lived by obliging my friends. But as it is not convenient to you to pay the money, give me your note, and it will do just as well.

Young T. Ah! now you are my friend again. I thought you would not desert me so soon. You who so kindly took me by the hand, taught me to punt at faro, told me the nicks and crabs at hazard, and though you never play yourself, were so kind to introduce me to all your friends that do.

Snare. Here's a stamp; sign your name: I have filled it up. I thought you couldn't pay me directly.

Young T. What is this? (Reads.) "On demand, I promise to pay Nic. Snare, Esquire, four hundred pounds. Value received." Dang it, man, you lent me but two.

Snare. And do you think I'm to be paid nothing for my risk? Your father may disinherit you, and I may never get a doit. No, no; I shall never live by obliging my friends at that rate.

Young T. Oh! this is d—d scandalous! pay four hundred pounds for two, and not have the worth of a sixpence to shew for it! D— London! I wish I had staid in Yorkshire all the days of my life.

Snare. It is very ungrateful of you to put yourself in a passion with me, who have taught you so many pretty games.

Young T. Yes, and you want to teach me another pretty game: to shew me that one and one make four.

Old T. (Knocking without.) Tom, let me in.

Young T. Zounds! my father! I must open the door.

Snare. (Holding him.) No, you sha'n't till you have settled our business.

Old T. (Without.) Tom, I say, let me in.

Young T. Coming, sir.

Snare. If you don't sign, I'll tell him all your pranks.

Young T. (Signs.) There, and the devil do you good with it. D— gaming! d— swindling! and d— (Opens the door.)

Enter OLD TESTY.

How do you do, sir?

Old T. How do I do! You made great haste to ask me. Why, you have company. Is this the way you pass your mornings? You ought to be at study, sir.

Young T. This gentleman comes to assist me in my studies, sir.

Old T. Oh! that is very kind of him. Thank you, sir, for all you have taught my son.

Snare. Oh! sir, 'tis a pleasure to me.

Old S. Do you practise much at the bar, sir?

Snare. Not much now, sir. I have had in my time a pretty deal of Old Bailey practice.

Old T. And retired from it with your just deserts?

Snare. Not exactly, sir, or I must say I should have been in a more elevated situation. Men often retire from the bar with less than they merit.

Old T. More's the pity. Well, I will not intrude any longer, Tom. I called to give you money to pay for your furniture and your books: never be in debt longer than you can help. Always pay your way. There's a draft for four hundred pounds. And so, good morning, and thank you kindly for all you have done for my son. [Exit.]

Snare. A very good kind of an old gentleman that father of your's: mind what he says—"Never be in debt longer than you can help. Always pay your way." That four hundred pounds will just balance our little account.

Young T. Why, you a'n't such a rogue?

Snare. You had better be correct in your language, young gentleman, or you must satisfy my honour.

Young T. Oh! d— your honour! Did not you hear my father say, it was for my upholsterer and bookseller? They have been for their money already, and if I don't pay them, who knows but they will send me to gaol?

Snare. Oh! no. Tradesmen are used to go without their money; but gentlemen like me, must touch the ready, or your character is lost for ever. So at once pay me, or I'll expose you.

Young T. There—plague take you!—there is the money. And now if I don't marry directly, I may go hang myself; and of two evils—

Snare. Marry, by all means. Good b'ye, Tom. Remember, I live by obliging my friends. [Exit.]

Young T. The devil fly away with such friends! Oh! I'm in a pretty mess! If Miss Hartley hadn't taken such a fancy to me, what would have become of me! 'Tis heaven's mercy I was a likely lad! My beauty has saved my bacon. I'm in a fine way! I shall certainly be arrested; I can't save my liberty, that is certain. All I can do is to try to lose it my own way. Of the two, 'tis better to marry than go to gaol; but at whose suit I shall be obliged to surrender myself, my wife's, or my tradesmen's, depends entirely on whether the bailiff or the parson does his business quickest. [Exit.]

SCENE V.—Lady Flourish's Dressing-room; a sofa, and sash-window with curtains.

KITTY discovered.

Kitty. Well, thank my stars, I sha'n't long be obliged to do such menial business. Called here, and called there. No, no; I shall soon be young Mr. Testy's wife; and then Madam Testy will call her servants about her as haughtily as the first lady in the land.

AIR.—KITTY.

*What a hard lot is ours now, indeed and indeed,
'Tis a terrible life that we poor servants lead;
Up early and late,
To toil and to wait,*

To do as one's bid,
Yet sure to be chid,
Ill humours to bear,
And yet not to dare
Tho' with anger we burn,
To be spiteful and cross in return.

What a hard lot is ours, then, indeed and indeed!
'Tis a terrible life that we poor servants lead!

To be sure, when one happens a service to get in,
Where, to aid madam's frolics, her secrets we're let in,
Why, then, I must own, of our blabbing afraid,
The maid is the mistress, the mistress the maid.

They coax one so pretty!
'Tis "dear Mrs. Kitty!"
You're so kind and clever,
I'll love you for ever."

Our wages they double,
Yet give us no trouble;
And, while they're so civil,
We're as saucy and pert as the devil.

What a hard lot is theirs, then, indeed and indeed!
'Tis a terrible life our poor mistresses lead!

But the times are so alter'd, these places are rare
now,
For who knows their intrigues, there are few ladies
care now,

A faux-pas to conceal they will use little labour,
While each lady's in countenance kept by her neighbour.

Their spouses so kind, too,
Such foibles are blind to;
Nay, some will assume our vocation;
If a go-between's needed,
We're pass'd by unheeded,
The husband takes our occupation.

What a strange lot is theirs, then, indeed and indeed!
'Tis a whimsical life that some husbands lead!

Enter OLD TESTY.

Dear me! here comes my papa that is to be.

Old T. What, I have found somebody at last: I have been hunting from room to room, and the devil a soul could I see.

Kitty. Sir, my master and mistress are not at home.

Old T. Since I can't prove to the contrary, I incline to believe so.

Kitty. Pray, sir, let me shew you out. You have intruded yourself into my lady's dressing room.

Old T. Don't hurry me, you young baggage! and, pray, who are you, with that pretty face?

Kitty. Your daughter that is to be. (Aside.) I am Kitty, sir.

Old T. Kitty, you are a pretty girl. Give me a kiss, Kitty.

Kitty. Lard! sir, don't be rumbustical.

Old T. I say, Kitty—this is what I have wanted a long while. (Aside.) I say, Kitty, do you like your place? Should you have any objection to quit it, to live with a middle-aged gentleman as a kind of a housekeeper? eh!

Kitty. Lard! sir, I hope you have no design upon my honour.

Old T. No, not I; I dare say your honour has been long out of the way of anybody's design. But tell me, could you like such a plain-spoken, comely-looking, matter-of-fact man as myself? eh!

Kitty. This is lucky: I'll humour the old fellow, and when I marry his son, he'll not be angry with me, for fear of my exposing him. (Aside.)

Old T. Well, what do you say, my pretty?

Kitty. I don't know what to say, sir. If I could have it under your hand that you wouldn't forsake me—

Old T. Under my hand—hum! D— it! there is no making love now without signing and sealing.

A love-letter will be sent back unopened, unless 'tis on stamped paper; and Cupid himself would not be half so good a go-between as a common attorney.

AIR.—OLD TESTY.

Woman now, by grace and feature,
Sighs and vows, will not be caught,
If you'd have the pretty creature,
The pretty creature must be bought.

You may swear,
You may tear,
You may cry,
You may lie,
You may kneel,
You may feel

All the pangs that from love's raging fervours arise,
And proclaim her an angel dropp'd down from the skies.

No pity she shews

For your budget of woes;

She scoffs at your tears, and derides all your pain,
And e'en darling flatt'ry assails her in vain.

Who then finds the way

His addresses to pay,

In a style which this whimsical creature can fix?

He who drives to her door

In a chariot and four,

Or old Nick himself in a fine coach and six.

Well, what am I to give to you under my hand?

Kitty. Only your promise that you love me, and won't forsake me.

Old T. Come, there is no great harm in a promise without a penalty. (Aside. Takes out his pocket-book, and writes on a leaf.) There, there's my written promise, and now, my pretty dear— (Going to kiss her.)

Sir S. (Without.) Kitty! Is your lady come home, Kitty?

Kitty. Oh, dear me! here is Sir Simon. What shall I do? Coming, sir. I wouldn't have him see you and me alone together, for the world.

Old T. Nor I neither. The rascal would banter me to death.

Kitty. And I should lose my character. Oh! dear sir, hide yourself.

Old T. Where, where?

Kitty. Anywhere, sir.

Sir S. (Without.) Kitty!

Kitty. Coming, sir. There, under the sofa, sir.

Old T. Zounds! I shall be cramped to death.

Sir S. (Without.) Kitty, I say!

Kitty. Make haste, make haste.

Old T. Well, if I must, I must. (Gets under the sofa.) Send him away directly.

Kitty. Yes, sir, yes.

Enter SIR SIMON FLOURISH.

Sir S. Why, Kitty, what are you in such a bustle about? My lady is not at home, is she?

Kitty. No, sir, no.

Sir S. I'm glad of it. I came home on purpose to catch you alone, Kitty.

Old T. (From under the sofa.) Oh ho! you did, did you?

Sir S. You are the prettiest little rogue in the world, Kitty. You know how long I have been in love with you, Kitty; now, do have compassion on me.

Kitty. Pray, sir, be quiet, and don't take such liberties.

Sir S. Why, my dear, charming Kitty—

Lady F. (Without.) Pray, Captain O'Neill, do me the kindness to walk this way.

Kitty. My lady's voice!

Sir S. By all that's discordant! She must not see me here with you. I told her I should not be at home till night. She'll suspect something.

Kitty. Well she may, if she sees me in this rumpled condition. Oh dear! what shall I do? where shall I run?

Sir S. Here, here; come, quick.

Kitty. Oh dear! oh dear! (Both go behind the window-curtain.)

Enter LADY FLOURISH and CAPTAIN O'NEILL.

Lady F. This way, Captain O'Neill. Allow me to shew you into my little dressing-room.

Capt. Your ladyship does me great honour.

Lady F. Pray, sit down. I conducted you here, Captain O'Neill, that I might not be agitated again by Sir Simon's intrusion.

Sir S. Vastly well.

Capt. Madam, the reason of my now calling is—

Lady F. I know your reasons very well, you can't impose upon me, though you have on my husband.

Capt. My dear lady, I wish to be understood—

Lady F. I don't in the least doubt it: but gentlemen of your country, with the best intentions in the world, sometimes find it a very difficult matter. But I understand you perfectly; the passion you ventured to intimate this morning—

Capt. I have, now, my lady, entirely relinquished—

Lady F. What, you barbarous man, have you ensnared my susceptible heart, and do you now abandon your conquest?

Capt. I ensnare your susceptible heart!

Lady F. Yes, you inhuman creature! Oh, oh! (Crying.) 'Tis too much, too much to bear!

Sir S. (Rushing from behind the curtain.) 'Tis too much for me to bear. To hear one's wife make love to another man, is too much for anybody to bear.

Capt. Sir Simon!

Lady F. Sir Simon!

Sir S. Yes, the wronged Sir Simon. Is this the way you reward my faithful love, my fond attachment? (Lady F. sinks on the sofa, fainting.)

Capt. Get her a little water, Sir Simon: I'll give her some air. (Going towards the window.)

Sir S. Don't give her any air, she'll be better without it. (Captain O'Neill runs to open the window, throws aside the curtains, and discovers Kitty: she screams, which calls the attention of Lady F.)

Lady F. Very well, Sir Simon. This is your faithful love, your fond attachment!

Capt. Oh! the blessing of mutual affection! These are the fond turtle-doves! 'Faith! you are well paired.

Lady F. I shall never recover this terrible shock.

Capt. Now the impediment is removed, let me recommend a little ventilation to your ladyship. (Opens the window.) Pray, sit and enjoy it as comfortably as you can. (Runs to the sofa, and draws it back towards the window, by which Old Testy is discovered.) What have we got here? It looks like a great turtle, left on the shore by the retiring of the tide. Favour me with one of your fins. (Raising him up by the arm.)

Sir S. Mr. Testy, what the devil do you do here?

Lady F. Mr. Testy, what is your business in my dressing-room?

Old T. Your dressing-room is a place of wonderful business, indeed!

Capt. Pray, to which party do you belong?

Old T. Which party! You see I am out now; and what is not uncommon, I kept my place as long as I could.

Sir S. What do you mean by your outs and ins in my house? I have a great mind to make an example of you. To be found under the sofa in my wife's dressing-room! why, the bank of England could hardly pay the damages a liberal crim. con. jury would give me.

FINALE.

Sir S. I'll teach you to play the antic.

Old T. So you can for you know how.

Lady F. They will surely drive me frantic.

Kitty. I am innocent, I vow.

Capt. Oh! be quiet;
Make no riot.

Sir S. Make no riot! but I will.

Capt. You've forgot.

Sir S. No, I've not;
No, with you I'm very still.

Capt. Come, agree,
For I see
You had all the self-same plan,
All but the modest Irishman.

Sir S. For no good he came, 'tis certain.

Lady F. I know nothing why he came;

Old T. Why went you behind the curtain?

Lady F. Ah! Sir Simon, blush for shame!

Old T. Oh, the curtain!

Lady F. Pretty flirting;

Sir S. True, my tender, darling wife,
Constant dove!

Lady F. Faithful love!

Capt. Psha! leave off this foolish strife,
For you had all the self-same plan.

Sir S. But me and the modest Irishman.

Kitty. Ma'am, forgive me;

Lady F. That I'll never.

Kitty. Don't forget your freaks are known:

Lady F. Character you've lost for ever:

Kitty. Pray, my lady, where's your own?

Lady F. I don't heed it,
Servants need it,
Ladies do as well without.

Capt. Come, give o'er,
Talk no more,
Why keep up this foolish rout,
When you had all the self-same plan.

Lady F. } But me and the modest Irishman.
Kitty. }

All. Suspicious certainly appear,
But I'm in my conscience clear,
And therefore nothing have to fear;
For you had all the self-same plan,
But me and the modest Irishman.

'Tis quite shocking,
You're but mocking,
You to innocence pretend!
You're found out,
Past a doubt:
Cease your folly to defend;
For you had all the self-same plan,
But me and the modest Irishman.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

HARCOURT and MISS HARTLEY discovered.

DUETT.—HARCOURT and MISS HARTLEY.

Tell me, my love, wou'd'st thou forego
Transports, which only lovers know
To heal at once the poignant smart
That still must rack the anxious heart;

*Trembling, lest all its scheme of joy
Fortune for ever shou'd destroy.
Ah! no, the throbbings of delight,
Which in each pulse proclaim thy sight,
The bounding heart's tumultuous beat,
Swelling its kindred heart to meet,
Are joys for which all pain I'd prove,
And never, never cease to love.*

Miss H. Here comes Sir Simon. Heavens! how shall I account for your being here?

Har. Don't be alarmed, my love; I'll think of some excuse.

Enter SIR SIMON FLOURISH.

Sir S. Eh! who have we here? a young man tête-à-tête with my ward! Well done, it runs through the family; I'll be bound there is not an unpaired turtle in my whole establishment. This is a worse business than my wife's a great deal, for this young lady will wish to carry her fortune as well as her inclinations, out of my family. Now, though my wife may send her affections on a visit, I still keep at home all I married her for. Pray, Miss Hartley, have I the honour of knowing this gentleman?

Miss H. The gentleman, sir, has business with you. (Retires.)

Har. Sir, your son, who is my particular friend, both of the same college, has commissioned me to acquaint you of his safe arrival in England.

Sir S. My boy arrived! Huzza! sir, I shall be proud of your acquaintance. How soon may I expect to see my son?

Har. Very shortly, sir. I got the start of him, and hastened to make you happy with this intelligence.

Sir S. How far have you been travelling, sir?

Har. Just as far as your son, Sir Simon?

Sir S. Well, sir, and how do you like foreign parts?

Har. Ah! sir, I believe travellers, who have seen more of foreign countries than I have, will give the palm to old England.

AIR.—HARCOURT.

*Thy glory in war let those loudly proclaim,
Who mistake discord's blast for the trumpet of fame,
And give slaughter the meed of renown;
'Tis Britain, thy praise,
The sword ne'er to raise
In ravage and plunder's fell cause;
But to guard sacred honour's pure laws,
And the pride of the base to bring down.
Still o'er the fall'n foe
Let pity's tear flow,
Not sound forth the triumph of blood.
No, Britain, thou art great and good;
Let this thy glory be,
This let admiring nations see,
That with thee
Dwells sweet Humanity.*

Sir, I must now take my leave.

Sir S. Won't you stay till your friend arrives?

Har. Now, Sir Simon, I am particularly engaged; but I shall hope for the pleasure of being further known to you.

Sir S. You honour me very much, sir, and a thousand thanks for your kind visit. [Exit Harcourt.] My son returned, and so soon to see him! This atones for all my disasters. The sight of my accomplished boy will almost compensate for the loss of being second in a duel to an Irishman; will almost make me forget the hearty threshing he gave me, and my wife's making love to him. These are misfortunes, to be sure, but Jack is come home, and I will think no more of them. [Exit.]

Miss H. I will endeavour to repress every anxious thought, and dwell only on the prospect of future happiness.

AIR.—MISS HARTLEY.

*Come, smiling Hope, dispel each chilling fear.
And with thy glowing beams my bosom cheer;
On future blessings dart thy vivid ray,
Chasing the low'ring clouds of doubt away;
To bright perspective still direct my eye,
And cast in shade the brightest objects nigh. [Exit.]*

SCENE II.—A Street.

Enter BLUFF, the Bailiff, and Followers.

Bluff. Are you sure, Tom, you dogged the right man?

1st Fol. Quite sure, Master Bluff.

Bluff. And why didn't you take him?

1st Fol. Because he got into church before I could get at him.

Bluff. And so I am to be kept waiting here till he chooses to come out of church? Oh! here he comes.

Enter YOUNG TESTY and KITTY.

Young T. Well, the job is done; I'm a married man for the first time in my life. 'Tis devilish comical. I wonder how I shall like it. Mrs. Testy, how do you do, my dear?

Kitty. How do you do, Tom?

Young T. Tom! I don't know whether I like to be called Tom now. It don't shew respect enough from a wife to her husband.

Kitty. Respect from a wife to a husband! Oh! Tom, your country education! I see you will be very troublesome to me.

Young T. I don't know whether I shall be troublesome or no. Dang it, one can't begin too soon to shew one is determined to wear the breeches. (Aside.) Mrs. Testy, I desire you will consider what is due to a husband.

Kitty. And I desire, Mr. Testy, you will consider what is due to a wife.

Bluff. And I desire, Mr. Testy, you will consider what is due to a creditor. (Taps him on the shoulder.) I am sorry, good folks, to interrupt your nuptial harmony. Here's a little bit of a writ against you.

Young T. At whose suit?

Bluff. Your bookseller's.

1st Fol. And here's another.

Young T. At whose suit?

1st Fol. Your upholsterer's.

Kitty. Writs against my dearly beloved? How soon the comforts of matrimony begin!

Young T. Well, I don't mind; when I touch my wife's fortune I shall be at liberty directly.

Kitty. Your debts must be very small, if your wife's fortune will pay them. (Aside.)

Young T. Where must I go?

Bluff. That depends on how much of the ready you have got.

Young T. D—n it, they are all for the ready. I say, wife—my dear—

Kitty. What do you want? (Sulkily.)

Young T. Have you got any of the ready?

Kitty. No, not I.

Young T. Haven't you, indeed! Search.

Kitty. I have nothing but two pocket pieces and a silver bodkin.

Bluff. Come, come; poor as a rat, I see. You must go to prison directly; I have no room for such paupers as you, so come along.

Young T. My darling, and must I be torn from my loving wife? (Sobbing.)

Kitty. Oh, dear! Oh, dear! 'tis very distressing.

Young T. Bless my soul, who is that coming yonder? sure, 'tis Jack Flourish; it is—stand back a little.

Enter YOUNG FLOURISH and DICKY, both dressed in Monmouth-street finery.

Young F. Here I am once more at large in London streets. What a luxury it is again to be jostled about, and nearly run over by the coaches and carts. Lord, how happy I am to be out of that d—d cage, though only for a day. Dicky, you look vastly well.

Dicky. Yes, my master, good clothes become me.

Young F. As I was obliged to have a jailor to attend me, it is lucky, Dicky, I could get one so much of a gentleman.

Dicky. It would be d—d hard if I could not behave like a gemman, who have lived all my life in gemmen's company, in the King's Bench, and the Marshalsea, and the debtor's side of Newgate.

Young F. Yes, Dicky, 'tis certainly very genteel to be intimate in those places; but, you know, one should not brag of one's connexions, so mum's the word before my father; I must pass you off for a foreign Count; so mind your hits, Dicky.

Young T. Ecod! I'll speak to him. Don't let him see your face. Do you walk a little that way, (to Kitty.) for as I am going to ask a favour of him, it might not be so prudent to let him know I have married his mistress.

Kitty. Lord! you fool, many a gentleman would be much obliged to you for marrying his mistress. [Exit.]

Young T. I say, Jack—Jack Flourish.

Young F. Eh!

Young T. What, don't you know me? I know you, you see, for all your outlandish clothes.

Young F. What, Tom Testy?

Young T. Yes, I be Tom Testy.

Young F. I am devilish glad to see you.

Young T. Be you, indeed; that's right, 'Tis lucky to meet friends when one wants them, is it not? One should never be shy of a friend when he is in trouble, should one?

Young F. No, to be sure not. What the devil does he mean? (Aside.)

Young T. If I was to meet a friend with a bailiff at his elbow (Flourish turns and looks at Dicky.) I should be as glad to see him as if I met him walking with a nobleman.

Young F. Bailiff and nobleman! Yes, yes, he twigs me. He knows Dicky here in his real and masquerade character both. (Aside.)

Young T. I say, I should be as happy to shake hands with him at one time as another.

Young F. And so should I, upon my soul. (Shaking hands.) O d—n it, all's up; I am found out. (Aside.) I say, Tom, I see how the thing is. How the devil came you to know it?

Young T. Know it! dang it, I could not help knowing it; for before he said a word, he gave me such a cursed thump on the shoulder, as nobody would have ventured to have done that hadn't the law to back him.

Young F. Eh!—(Looking about and seeing Bluff.)

Bluff. Come, come, I an't to stay here a whole term arresting you. Will the gemman bail you or not?

Young T. Ay, Jack, will you bail me?

Young F. I bail! I bail you! Here's an affair! What, Tom, you arrested? Ha, ha! well said, young Rural.

Young T. Don't laugh, don't laugh, Jack. What will you do for me?

Young F. I can't bail you, I'm not a house-keeper. But where are you going?

Young T. (To Bluff.) Ay, where am I going?

Bluff. Straight to the King's Bench.

Young F. The King's Bench; that's unlucky, (aside) for then we shall know more of one another than I wish. I say, Tom, Newgate is a very pretty prison. You had better go to Newgate.

Young T. Newgate! Don't mention it.

Young F. Well, there is no persuading people to their good against their inclination. If you will go to the King's Bench, I will certainly come and see you there.

Young T. Will you be so kind?

Young F. I will, upon my soul.

Young T. It is vastly good-natured of you.

Young F. Not at all; it won't be putting me out of my way in the least.

Young T. It is your good-nature makes you say so. Good b'ye, Jack; we shall meet again soon, then.

Young F. Yes, Tom, much sooner than I wish (Aside.) Farewell.

Young T. Good b'ye, you'll not forget to come.

Young F. No, not I; but if I should, here is a gentleman will remind me.

[Exeunt Young F. and Dicky.]

Bluff. Take care of him. [To one of his Followers, who exits with Young T.] Now, how stand our other jobs?

QUARTETTO.—BLUFF and Followers.

*Jemmy Chimier, the rhymer, from his garret I haul'd,
By Sir Thunder O'Blunder I was cursedly maul'd;
For young Stakehall of Rakehall I was sent on the scout,*

So I sought him and caught him at Lady Plunder's rout,

Blessing on those gaming-houses!

Oh, the thought our spirits rouses,

They're the cause of our well-doing,

They draw in ten flats to ruin.

Charming Faro!

Game so rare O!

Fleece away, ye dames of style,

Fill your purses,

Laugh at curses,

Bailiffs bless you all the while.

1 Fol. I've a writ for Colonel Spendall,

2 Fol. I have one for Doctor Endall,

3 Fol. And I one for Simon Lendall.

All. Bravo! Nab 'em, have 'em tight,

Merry then we'll be at night;

These will yield a jovial quaff

To us officers o' th' staff. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Sir Simon Flourish's House.

Enter SIR SIMON FLOURISH and OLD TESTY.

Sir S. I am surprized you have the assurance to enter my doors again. Where the devil are you come to hide yourself now? There is no sofa here for you; but you may get up the chimney if you will.

Old T. Psha! I am come on business; you'll, may be, like worse your darling boy; your accomplished traveller is not far off.

Sir S. I know it.

Old T. You know it, do you? What, you know he is in the King's Bench?

Sir S. What do you say?

Old T. In Banco Regis.

Sir S. What the devil should he do in the King's Bench. He is just arrived from abroad, and I shall see him in a few minutes.

Old T. In a few minutes! So you may, but you must gallop to St. George's Fields, then. Ha, ha, ha! the all-accomplished youth that has been getting the finishing stroke to his fashionable education! Well, you have not been much out, it is the finishing stroke to many a fashionable education.

Sir S. What is come to the man! That d—d sofa you crept under has cramped your faculties as well as your limbs. Don't tease me with your nonsense.

Young F. (Without.) Par ici Monsieur le Comte.

Sir S. There, there, what dy'e say now? My son is in the King's Bench, is he?

Old T. Why here he is 'faith! and I've been told a d—d lie, then.

Enter YOUNG FLOURISH and DICKY.

Sir S. My dear, dear Jack, come to my arms.

Young F. Ah! mon Pere, comment vous portez vous? O mon Dieu! I had forgot; I must speak English now. How do you do, father?

Sir S. What, forgot your English, boy?

Young F. 'Tis so long since I have spoken it, that it is as awkward to me, as the acknowledgement of an old friend to a man who has got sudden promotion. Well, father, how do you do?

Sir S. Happy to see you, my boy.

Young F. Bien obligé—D—n it, there I go again.

Sir S. Never mind, Jack, it shews your breeding.

Young F. Ah! Testy! how are you, my old boy?

Old T. La, la! There's French for you, puppy.

Young F. As sulky as ever, eh! (Slapping him on the shoulder.) Why don't you travel and polish a bit, my old buck?

Old T. Polish a bit, my old buck! Don't be so d—d familiar, or I shall try whether my cane can't polish a bit, my young buck.

Young F. What a sour old Crab it is, father. Permettez moi à vous—(Stopping himself.)—Psha! that is, permit me to introduce to you my friend and companion, Count Tipstaffo Kingsbencheni.

Old T. Those d—d foreign names, I never could learn one of them.

Sir S. I am the Count's most obsequious humble servant.

Dicky. Vy, my master, for matter of that—

Young F. Silence, you dog, or you'll ruin me. The Count speaks little English. Hush!

Sir S. Well, my boy, tell me where you have been.

Young F. You'll know all in good time, father; to tell you, at once, where I have been, would surprise you too much.

Sir S. Really!

Young F. It would, upon my honour.

Sir S. What, then, you have been further than you expected to go?

Young F. Not further. I have been where I did not expect to go.

Sir S. Indeed!

Old T. Now the old doting fool will swallow all his lies for gospel.

Sir S. Well, Jack, come tell me all about it. I say, are the women very pretty abroad?

Young F. If I had not found them so pretty at home, I might have been able to tell you. (Aside.) The women, sir, are, to be sure, very handsome; but leaving England to seek beauty, is like going abroad to look for liberty. The prime commodities are in our own market.

Sir S. Well, Jack, in what court did you chiefly reside?

Young F. In what court? Why, where I chiefly resided was not exactly a court; but it belonged to one.

Sir S. And so, my son lived in a palace?

Young F. Yes, yes, a kind of a palace, large enough of all conscience; rooms rather shabby, though—not kept neat, and surrounded by a d—d high wall.

Sir S. Ay, for fear people should get in.

Young F. No, for fear people should get out.

Sir S. What, so afraid to part with you?

Young F. Oh! very much. Once I have the honour to get in, 'tis devilish hard to get out again.

Sir S. Now, in my mind, that is carrying civility too far.

Young F. But how is my mother-in-law, Lady Flourish, eh? Why, you look glum, father; has anything happened?

Sir S. Oh, nothing, but what is so common now-a-days, that 'tis quite a folly to think about it. But I am very rude to pay so little attention to your friend the Count. Sir, would you be pleased to take some refreshment?

Dicky. I thank your honour, nothing at all; I took a drap of gin as I came along.

Young F. Oh, curse you, you stupid dog.

Old T. A drap of gin!

Sir S. 'Tis a strange liqueur for a foreign nobleman. The Count speaks English pretty fluently, though rather queerly.

Young F. Yes, yes, he don't speak much; but the little he does, he speaks like a native.

Old T. Yes, like a native of Broad St. Giles's.

Young F. Don't let him hear you, he'll be offended, and he is a d—d fighting little fellow, when he is provoked.

Enter Servant, and gives a letter to Sir Simon.

Sir S. (Opens it.) It looks like a woman's hand. (Reads.) "This comes to desire you to tell Mr. Testy, that his son is in the King's Bench. This is from one who is much concerned in his welfare."

Why, Testy, you find there is a little bit of a mistake. 'Tis your son, not mine, that is in the King's Bench. Ha, ha, ha!

Old T. I don't know whether I am awake, or asleep, alive or dead.

Sir S. Ha, ha, ha! he would have it you were in the King's Bench.

Young F. (Confused, and endeavouring to overcome it by assumed gaiety.) I in the King's Bench! yes, I look vastly as if I had been in the King's Bench. Ha, ha, ha! (All laugh.)

Old T. It can't be; 'tis out of all human possibility.

Sir S. You may soon be convinced; you may see him in a few minutes; but you must gallop to St. George's Fields, then. Ha, ha, ha!

Old T. I'll go directly, and if I find him there, I'll disinherit him; and I'll adopt—d—e, I'll adopt one of the Catabaw Indians.

Sir S. We will go along with you.

Old T. Come, then, call a coach there; I'm mad, stark mad. [Exit.]

Sir S. Won't you go, Jack?

Young F. What, to the King's Bench? I wonder what kind of a place it can be. I have a great mind to go out of curiosity. What do you say, Count, will you go by way of a lounge? (Dicky going to speak, Young F. stops him.) You need not speak, the Count nods assent.

Sir S. Ay, it will be a new sight to the Count.

Young F. Not very. (Aside.) Come, Dicky, for go we must, you know.

Dicky. Ay, ay, returnable—nolens, volens.

Young F. Hush! yes, yes, the Count and I will go with you, and see this queer kind of a place. What do you stop for, father?

Sir S. To let the Count go first.

Young F. Ay, by all means; I beg the Count's pardon. [Exeunt ceremoniously.]

SCENE IV.—An Apartment in the King's Bench.

KITTY, YOUNG TESTY, and the Keeper, discovered.

Keeper. Though the prison is so full, you have got as good as a room to yourselves, for there is only one gentleman belongs to it.

Young T. One gentleman belongs to it.

Keeper. Yes. He is gone out on a day rule, but he must be home soon; he'll be pleasant company for you and the lady.

Young T. Yes, very; 'tis devilish pleasant to have a gentleman sleep in the room with one's wife.

Keeper. It may be a little awkward to the lady at first, but she'll soon come into it.

Old T. (Without.) Where is this ungracious villain?

Young T. Oh, lord! Oh, lord! here's my father. Hide yourself, hide yourself. (To Kitty, who conceals herself behind one of the beds.) Now I shall have it sweetly.

Enter OLD TESTY, SIR SIMON FLOURISH, and YOUNG FLOURISH.

Old T. Let me come to the rascal. Why, you graceless wretch, what have you to say for yourself?

Young T. Lord, father, you have come upon me in such a hurry, I have not settled what I have to say for myself.

Young F. They have lodged him in my room, by Jupiter. (Aside.)

Old T. You to turn out profligate and extravagant, when I took such care to the contrary! Didn't I breed you out of the way of all manner of harm?

Sir S. Yes, and therefore not knowing it, when he saw it, how was he able to avoid it?

Young T. Ay, how was I able to avoid it?

Old T. Till you came to London, did you know what it was to have more than sixpence in your pocket?

Sir S. Then how the devil did you expect him to know the value of guineas, when you trusted him with them?

Old T. Hold your tongue, will you?

Sir S. Didn't I always tell you how foolish you were to bring him up in that ridiculous way. I knew my plan was the best, was it not, my boy? (To Young F.)

Young F. Oh, certainly, father; no doubt about it.

Keeper. Oh, here's Master Flourish come home. Pray, Master Flourish—(Young F. makes signs to him to hold his tongue.)

Sir S. Master Flourish come home! Why, how the devil does he know you?

Young F. (Crossing over to the Keeper.) Ah! what, Bobby, is it you? Hold your tongue, you dog. (Aside.) Oh, I knew Bobby abroad. Bobby was head gaoler to the Emperor of Morocco. Ah! Bobby, how do you do, Bobby; how long have you been in England, Bobby?

Keeper. How long have I—

Young F. (Putting his hand to his mouth, and drawing him aside.) I want to talk with you, Bobby, about the Emperor's two daughters, Boblatilda and Gruntawiska. Come this way. Excuse me, (to Sir Simon) I have some secrets to talk to Bobby about. (They retire.)

Old T. Well, you rascal, what can you say for yourself, you stupid dolt?

Young T. Why, father, if I have been a stupid dolt one way, I have been pretty cunning another. I was cheated out of my money, to be sure, but I have cheated other people out of a wife.

Old T. A wife! What does the blockhead mean?

Young T. Not such a blockhead as you think. Suppose now, I should have married Miss Hartley, all out of my own head, without any of your help?

Old T. and Sir S. Married Miss Hartley!

Young T. Ay, married Miss Hartley; and suppose she should like me well enough to follow me to prison.

Enter MISS HARTLEY, HARCOURT, and CAPTAIN O'NEILL.

Old T. Prodigious!

Sir S. Nothing but my own eyes could have convinced me.

Old T. Come to my arms. All is forgiven. You are a clever boy. I did not think it had been in you. Eh! Simon, what do you think of my boy, now?

Sir S. I am petrified!

Old T. Huzza, huzza! Yorkshire for ever! Huzza!

Capt. I am glad to find you so merry; we heard you were come here, and thinking a friend of our's might be in a little hobble, we came to intercede.

Old T. There needs no intercession; 'tis all right, 'tis all as it should be, my dear girl. (To Miss Hartley.) We have heard of your marriage. Take him, take him, take your husband.

Miss H. Sir!

Old T. Nay, don't be shame-faced; it is all known, 'tis all forgiven.

Har. All known! all forgiven! Generous conduct! our mutual affection made us overlook every other consideration, and marriage has now ratified the union of our hearts.

Sir S. What is all this?

Old T. Why, Tom, what the devil, has your wife married another husband so soon?

Har. What do you mean?

Old T. Why, what the devil right have you to marry Tom's wife?

Young T. My wife! that is a good one. I believe they are all mad. I never saw that fine lady in my life.

Old T. You didn't? And all you have been telling me about your marriage is a d—d lie, then. Let me come at him. (They hold him.)

Young T. Will you be quiet, father, and hear a little reason? I tell you I married Miss Hartley, and you shall have her own word for it. Mrs. Testy! Mrs. Testy! (Kitty comes forward.) There, what do you say now? There's my wife!

Old T. The devil it is! (All laugh.)

Young T. Why, what the devil do you all laugh at?

Sir S. Only at a little error in your politics. My rural Machiavel, instead of the mistress, you have married the maid.

Young T. What!

Kitty. It is very true, husband.

Young T. The devil it is!

Old T. Well, Mr. Wiseacre, you have married all out of your own head, without my help, and now you may keep your precious bargain without my help. You may starve, you may rot in a prison, for you shall never have sixpence from me.

Kitty. Lord, sir, how can you be so unkind! You didn't look so cross at me the last time I saw you.

Old T. Eh! what?

Kitty. Don't you remember, how good-humoured you looked just before you got under the sofa.

Sir S. Oh! now the murder is out. I say, Testy, you had better give hush-money, for if we old fellows let the girls tell all they know about us, it may not be for our credit; besides, the world may be spiteful enough to say you are angry with your son, because you wanted to marry the girl yourself.

Kitty. I don't know, sir, as to marrying, but I have a little bit of paper here, which—

Old T. Hold your tongue, say no more. I believe you are quite good enough for the blockhead you have got, and so he may pack into Yorkshire again, and carry you with him as a sample of a London fine lady.

Sir S. But this gentleman's taking the liberty of marrying our ward without our consent is a thing which—

Capt. Oh! 'tis a very great insult; and a word in your ear, my little game-cock: If you mean to call him to account for it, I'll be your second.

Sir S. I don't want to have anything to do with seconds.

Capt. When I was going to fight him, you were to have been my second, and I only offer to return the obligation.

Sir S. What, is this the gentleman you redeemed out of prison, to have the pleasure of fighting?

Har. Is it to you, then, I owe my liberty? Generous man!

Capt. Oh, it was very generous, to be sure, to release you out of prison, that I might have the satisfaction of sending you out of the world. But Sir Simon, this gentleman, in fortune, is equal to the lady he has wedded.

Har. Captain O'Neill, I am not conscious of what you are asserting.

Capt. But I am, or I would not assert it. Understanding that your uncle had taken it into his head to be angry with you for nothing at all, I called on the old gentleman to talk with him a little about it. "If your nephew had been guilty of a dishonourable action," said I, "devil a word would O'Neill offer in his behalf; but as he has been a dupe to the villany of others, restore him to your favour, and launch him into the world again, with experience for his pilot." So the old gentleman shook hands with me, and swore he was ready to do the same with you as soon as you pleased.

Har. Thanks are too poor for such nobleness of soul!

Capt. Nobleness of soul! for walking a few steps out of my common road, for the pleasure of reconciling a discarded nephew to a rich old uncle. Oh, if people would but just lengthen their morning's walk to do a few good-natured actions, they can scarcely conceive what health and spirits such exercise would give them, and how much sweeter they would rest for it at night.

Young F. Harcourt, I give you joy.

Sir S. Give him joy! why, you part with your mistress very easily.

Young F. 'Tis the fashion, father.

Sir S. Well, I think we may all adjourn, we have staid in this dismal place long enough.

Young F. I have for one, I'm sure.

Sir S. Then let us be gone directly.

Young F. That is sooner said than done.

Enter DICKY.

Dicky. Master Flourish, here is the man from Monmouth-street. He knows you are come home, and he must, and will have his cloaths. He has got mine.

Sir S. Must have his cloaths! Knows you are come home! Why, that is the Count. I smell powder.

Capt. And that is a scent I know you're not fond of.

Sir S. Hush! Knows you are come home! What, this is your home, then?

Young F. Why, father, the—the—the—

Sir S. The—the—I thought there was something d—d odd about that Emperor of Morocco's gaoler, and I suppose you will tell me now, the Count is the Emperor himself.

Young F. Come, father, the truth must out: The two different systems of education have at last been completed in the same college; and though I don't think keeping terms here absolutely necessary for the finish of every young gentleman's education; yet, as a school of adversity, it has taught me this lesson:—Never, by folly and extravagance, to run the chance of returning, when once you do me the honour to take my name out of the books.

Capt. Come, you must forgive him. You know the brave are always compassionate.

Sir S. Very true; besides, it is useless to repine at what is past, especially as you acknowledge you have learned some good, which I am not quite sure you would have done by travelling; and if your friends here will be but indulgent, you may possess all the credit of going ABROAD with the advantage of having remained AT HOME.

FINALE.

Capt. Now put an end to silly strife,
Malice is but folly;
Let's wisely pass a merry life,
Waste no jot in care.

Sir S. Why that's well said, come let's away.
With heart's good-humour'd, faces gay,
And sing fal, lal, &c.

Har. Possessing all I prize on earth,
Farewell, melancholy,
Each hour will give new pleasure birth,
Blest with thee, my fair.

Miss H. Then tune to joy the dulcet note,
On harmony let pleasure float,
And sing fal, lal, &c.

Young T. To harmony I don't object,
While I've luck to meet it;
In home duetts I can't expect
Much of harmony.

Kitty. Come, let's be wise, and from this day,
With hearts good-humour'd, faces gay,
We'll sing fal, lal, &c.

Young F. Our mirth and joy may all partake,
Humbly I intreat it,
And let your cheering plaudits make
Our poet full of glee.

Old T. Then tune to joy the dulcet note,
On harmony let pleasure float,
And sing fal, lal, &c.

[Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A rocky Shore, with a view of the sea, at break of day.

Enter FITZ-ALLAN and RAYMOND, meeting.

Raym. Well met, Fitz-Allan; what's the time of day?

Fitz-A. Broad morning by the hour.

Raym. Sleeps the sun yet?

Or has the stormy south, that howls so loud,
Blown out his untrimm'd lamp, and left us here
To be witch-ridden by this hag of night,
Out of time's natural course?

Fitz-A. Methinks, the winds,
Which peal'd like thunder thro' Glendarlock's towers, [clouds,

Have lower'd their note a pitch; the flecker'd
Lifting their misty curtain in the east,
Unmask the weeping day.

Enter MONTGOMERI, hastily.

Mont. Oh! are you men?

Have you less mercy than the winds and waves,
That you stand here aloof?

Fitz-A. Why, what has chanc'd?

Mont. A noble vessel breaks upon the rocks,
That jut from old Dunnose's rugged base;
And, as the floating fragments drive ashore,
Our plund'ring islanders (convert their hearts,
Holy St. Michael!) dash the drowning wretches
From the poor wreck they cling to, and engulf them [me!

Quick in the boiling waves: by heav'n that made
I could forswear my nature, when I see
Man so degenerate!

Raym. Lo! we are ready:
Lead to the beach.

Mont. Alas! 'tis now too late:

I had not left it but that all was lost:
The element had mercy, man had none.

Two I have sav'd; the one a Carmelite,
Noble the other in his mien and habit;
I left them in the outskirts of the grove;
Let us go forth, my friends, and bring them in:
You to that quarter, I to this. Away. [Exeunt.

Enter LORD HILDEBRAND and SAINT VALORI.

Saint V. Bear up, Lord Hildebrand; there's hope in view.

Seest thou yon turrets, that o'er top the wood?
There we may shelter from the storm, and men
More merciless than rocks and winds, that wreck'd
Our strong-ribb'd galley in the foaming surge.

Lord H. I see the towers you point at, but I fear
My limbs will fail their burden ere we reach them.
Let me lie down beneath these oaks, and die.

Saint V. If thus you shake with the soul's ague, fear,

Back to the sea, and seek the death you fled from;
Make not a coward's grave on English ground;
Your life is stak'd, your gauntlet is exchang'd,
Each drop of blood about you is in pledge
To meet the champion of Saint Valori,
A lady's champion, in King Henry's lists:
There fight; or if you needs must die, die there;
Fall as a Norman knight should fall, in arms.

Lord H. Father, your words accord not with your weeds.

Saint V. Our ancestors were holy men, and they Ordain'd the combat, as the test of truth;
Let them who made the law defend the law,
Our part is to obey it. Hark! who comes?
The islanders will be upon us. Stand!

Re-enter FITZ-ALLAN and RAYMOND.

Fitz-A. What, ho! Montgomeri! the men are found.

Saint V. Inhuman Englishmen! Will you destroy
Your brethren? We are Normans.

Re-enter MONTGOMERI.

Mont. Ye are men,
Let that suffice; we are no savages.
Saint V. 'Tis the brave youth who sav'd us.
Mont. Heav'n hath sav'd you, [death:
To heav'n give thanks, oh! men redeem'd from
All else have perish'd. 'Tis a barbarous coast.
Saint V. How is your island nam'd?
Mont. The Isle of Wight. [fatal!
Saint V. Alas! that isle so fair should prove so
And you our benefactor, by what name
Shall we record you in our prayers?
Mont. I am call'd
Montgomery.
Saint V. 'Twill be our grateful office,
Generous Montgomery, to make suit to heaven
To bless, reward, and from distress like ours
Protect you ever.
Mont. Now declare thyself, [dumb,
And this thy mournful friend, whom grief makes Say who he is.
Lord H. A wretch without a name.
Saint V. A gentleman of Normandy he is,
One who has seen good days. 'Tis now no time
To tell you further: he has wounds about him,
And bruises dealt him on the craggy beach,
That cry for charity. Whose is that castle?
Mont. A lady's, whom we serve, of Norman birth. [Normans;
Saint V. Then lead us to her gates, for we are Poor, helpless men, fainting with want of food
And over-watching: tedious nights and days
We struggled with the storm: the greedy deep
Has swallow'd up our ship, our friends, our all,
And left us to your mercy. Sure, your lady,
Who owns so fair a mansion, owns withal
A heart to give us welcome. You are silent.
Fitz-A. To save you, and supply your pressing wants
With food and raiment, and what else you need,
We promise, nothing doubting: more than this
Stands not within our privilege: no stranger
Enters her castle.
Saint V. Wherefore this exclusion?
What can she fear from us?
Fitz-A. Ask not a reason;
We question not her orders, but obey them.
Saint V. Then lay us down before her castle-
gates,
And let us die: inhospitable gates!
Your roofs shall echo with our famish'd shrieks.
A Norman she! impossible: our wolves
Have hearts more pitiful.
Mont. Your saints in bliss,
Your calendar of martyrs does not own
A soul more pure, a virtue more sublime:
Her very name will strike defamers dumb.
Saint V. Speak it.
Mont. Saint Valori.
Saint V. Uphold me, heaven!
The ways of Providence are full of wonder,
And all its works are mercy. How now, sir!
Will you betray yourself? what shakes you thus?
Lord H. I sicken at the heart: let me go hence,
And make myself a grave.
Saint V. Be patient: stay!
And has your lady here consum'd her youth
In pensive solitude? Twenty long years,
And still a widow?
Mont. Still a mournful widow. [yet
Saint V. Has she such sorrows of her own, and
No heart to pity ours? It cannot be:
I'll not believe but she will take us in,
And comfort her poor countrymen.
Mont. Forbid it, heav'n,
That misery thus should plead, and no friend found
To speak in its behalf! I'll move her for you.
Saint V. The mother of our Lord reward you
'Twill be a Christian deed. [for it!

Fitz-A. Montgomery, turn:
Have you your senses? the attempt is madness.
Raym. Where is the man, native or foreigner,
(Inmates excepted,) ever pass'd her doors?
Who dares to ask it?
Mont. I; Montgomery.
Raym. So dare not I.
Fitz-A. Nor I: success attend you!
But share the attempt I dare not; so, farewell!
[Exit with Raymond.
Mont. Farewell to both! Strangers, be not dis-
may'd,
I'll soon return; the place will be your safeguard.
[Exit.
Saint V. Lord Hildebrand, stand not aghast:
you see
The youth is confident: look up and live!
Lord H. By my soul's penitence, I'd rather die
Unpitied, starv'd, and to her castle dogs
Bequeath my untomb'd carcass, than receive
Life from her hands; the widow of Saint Valori!
That brave, heroic champion of the cross,
Who, from the holy wars returning home,
Within the rugged Pyrenæan pass—
Saint V. No more of that: I have your full confession;
You slew Saint Valori, and now his widow
Provokes you by her champion to defend
The rights you seiz'd, the title you inherit,
And hold by bloody charter. What's your fear?
Saint Valori's dead; he cannot rise again,
And beard you in the lists.
Lord H. Oh! that he could;
So I were not a murderer.
Saint V. Grant you slew him, [wound
Twenty long years have staunch'd the bleeding
Of him you slew, and laid his angry ghost.
Have you not rear'd his stately tomb, endow'd
The abbey of Saint Valori, and purchas'd
Perpetual masses to reclaim his soul
From purgatory's bondage? Have you faith
In absolution's power, and do you doubt
If yet atonement's made?
Lord H. I do perceive
The hand of heav'n hangs o'er me and my house:
Why am I childless else? seven sons swept off
To their untimely graves; their wretched mother
By her own hand in raging frenzy died;
And last behold me here, forlorn, abandon'd,
At life's last hour, before her surly gate,
Deaf to my hungry cries: and shall we rank
Such judgments in the casual course of things?
To me 'tis palpable that heav'nly justice
Puts nature by, and to the swelling sum
Of my uncancell'd crimes adds all the lives
Of them who sunk this morning.
Saint V. What know'st thou,
Blind or obdurate man? Shall we despond,
On whom the light of this deliverance shines?
No, let us boldly follow: there's a voice
Augurs within me wondrous things, and new,
Now on the moment's point: for, of a certain,
I know this lady shall set wide her gates
To give us joyful welcome: sable weeds
Shall turn to bridal robes, and joy shall ring
Thro' all her festive mansion, where of late
Deep groans and doleful lamentations howl'd.
Therefore no more: from my prophetic lips
Receive heaven's mandate—and behold 'tis here!
Enter MONTGOMERI.
Mont. Health to your hopes, that were but now so sick!
Ye sons of sadness, cast off your despair;
Heav'n has vouchsaf'd deliverance, and sends
Its angel messenger in person to you.
Saint V. Then let me kneel, and hail the heav'nly vision! (Kneels.)
Enter MATILDA.
To Him, to Him alone, who, by the hand,

Leads his unseeing creatures thro' the vale
Of sorrow, to the day-spring of their hope,
Be praise and adoration! A poor monk, (Rising.)
Who has trod many a weary league, as far
As there was Christian ground to carry him,
Asks for himself, and for this mournful man,
Newly escap'd from shipwreck, food and rest,
Warmth, and the shelter of your peaceful roof.

Mat. Are ye of Normandy?

Saint V. We are of Normandy:

But were we not your countrymen, distress
Like ours would make us so. Two of your servants
Spoke harshly, and had thrust us from your gates,
But for this charitable youth.

Mat. Alas!

I am a helpless solitary woman,
A widow, who have lost—Oh, God! oh, God!
'Twill turn my brain to speak of what I've lost:
It is amongst the lightest of my griefs
That I have lost myself.

Saint V. Thyself?

Mat. My senses:

At best they are but half my own, sometimes
I am bereft of all. Therefore, I lead
On this lone coast a melancholy life,
And shut my gate, but not my charity,
Against the stranger.

Saint V. Oh! support me, heav'n!
'Tis she, 'tis she! that woe-tun'd voice is hers;
Those eyes, that cast their pale and waning fires
With such a melting languor thro' my soul,
Those eyes are her's and sorrow's. Heart, be still!
She speaks again. (Aside.)

Mat. You shall have food and clothing;
I'll bring you medicines for your bruised wounds.
What else you need, declare.

Saint V. If I speak now,
She cannot bear it, it will turn her brain. [men—
What shall I say? (Aside.)—We are your country-
Oh! my full heart! Oh! anguish to dissemble!

Mat. Nay, if you weep—

Saint V. Let us but touch your altar:
We are the sole sad relics of the wreck.
Let us but kneel and offer up one prayer
For our soul's peace, then turn us forth to die.

Mat. Mercy forbid it! Oh! approach and enter.
If you can weep, we will converse whole days,
And speak no other language; we will sit,
Like fountain statues, face to face oppos'd,
And each to other tell our griefs in tears,
Yet neither utter word. Pray you, pass on;
I had not been thus strict, but that I hear
Lord Hildebrand is on the seas: I hope
You are not of his friends.

Lord H. Death to my heart!

Oh! father Carmelite, I must have leave—

Saint V. On your salvation, peace!

Mat. What would he say? [away;

Saint V. His brain begins to turn: take him
I pray you, lead him hence.

[Montgomeri leads off Hildebrand.

Mat. Alas! I pity him.

Why dost thou stay behind? Whence that emotion?
What wouldst thou more?

Saint V. I would invoke a blessing,
But that each sainted spirit in the skies
Will be thy better advocate.

Mat. Remember,

When you converse with heav'n, there is a wretch
Who will be glad of any good man's prayers.
Farewell.

Saint V. Oh! tell me, have you, then, endur'd
Twenty long years of mournful widowhood?

Mat. They say 'tis twenty years ago he died:
I cannot speak of time; it may be so;
Yet I should think 'twas yesterday.

Saint V. I saw you—

Mat. You saw me! When?

Saint V. When you did wed your lord.

The paragon of all this world you was.
Grief has gone o'er you like a wintry cloud.
You've heard this voice before.

Mat. I think I have:

It gives a painful sense of former days:
I've heard such voices in my dreams; sometimes Convers'd with them all night; but then, they told
me

My senses wander'd. Pray you, do not harm me:
Leave me, good monk; indeed I know you not.

Saint V. I wore no monkish cowl in that gay hour
When you wore bridal white. On Pagan ground,
Beneath the banner of the Christian cross,
Faithful I fought; I was God's soldier, then,
Tho' now his peaceful servant.

Mat. You have fought
Under the Christian cross? You shake my brain.

Saint V. Peace to your thoughts! I will no farther move you:

Shall I not lead you hence?

Mat. Stand off; stand off!

The murderer of Saint Valori is abroad;
The bloody Hildebrand is on the seas.
Rise, rise, ye waves! blow from all points, ye winds,
And whelm th' accursed plank that wafts him over
In fathomless perdition! Let him sink,
He and his hateful crew! let none escape,
Not one; or if one, let him only breathe
To tell his tale, and die! Away, begone!
You've made me mad.

Saint V. I was Saint Valori's friend:
He never yet bled with the battle's wound,
But I shed drop for drop: when o'er the sands
Of sultry Palestine with panting heart
He march'd, my panting heart with his kept time,
And number'd throb for throb.

Mat. Where are my people?
What, ho! Montgomeri! Lead, lead me hence.

Re-enter MONTGOMERI, hastily, with GYFFORD.
Give me thine arm; support me. Oh! 'tis well.
To horse, to horse! I have a champion now,
Whose hand, heart, soul, are mine, and mine are his;
One who has valour to assert my cause,
And worth to wear the honours he defends.

Mont. What hast thou done, old man?

Gyf. Stay not to question;
Look to the lady: leave the monk with me.

Mat. Come, let us hence; I do not live without thee. [Exit with Mont.

Saint V. Amazement! Speak, what kindred, what affection,
What passion binds her to that youth? Resolve me,
Who and what is he?

Gyf. You are curious, father.
Who he may be I know not; what he was
I well remember.

Saint V. What was he?

Gyf. Her page;
A menial thing, no better than myself.

Saint V. Heavens! can it be? Will she so far descend

From her great name, to wanton with her page?
Saw you the look she gave him?

Gyf. I did see it. [them,

Saint V. It seem'd as tho' his eyes had magic in
That charm'd away her madness. Ha! you sigh:
What means that pensive movement of your head?
Answer.

Gyf. Good father, question me no more.
Fortune can level all things in this world,
Pull down the mighty and exalt the mean:
But you and I, methinks, have outliv'd wonders.
Now to the castle: shut both ears and eyes:
Hear without noting; see, but not observe. [Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in Matilda's castle.

Enter SAINT VALORI and GYFFORD.

Gyf. With awful wonder I survey and hear you,
Whilst thro' the veil of that disguiseful habit,

Thro' all the changes time and toil have wrought
In that once noble visage, I scarce trace
The lineaments of my most honour'd lord.

Saint V. Awake from this surprise, and hear me,
Gyfford.

I am no spectre, but thy living master :
Wounded and breathless, on the ground I lay
Welt'ring in blood : th' assassins fled and left me ;
There I had soon expir'd, but that a company
Of merchants, journeying from Venice, found me,
And charitably stanch'd my bleeding wounds.
To their own homes they bore me : heal'd, restor'd,
In a Venetian galley I embark'd,
And sail'd for Genoa ; but ere we reach'd
Our destin'd port, a Saracen assail'd
And master'd our weak crew. To tell the tale
Of my captivity, escape, return,
Would ask more leisure, and a mind at ease.

Gyf. But why does brave Saint Valori appear
A bearded Carmelite?

Saint V. This holy habit,
Thro' a long course of dangerous pilgrimage,
Has been my saving passport: thus attir'd,
I reach'd my native castle, found it lorded
By the usurper Hildebrand; with zeal
I burn'd to call my faithful people round me,
And throw off my disguise; this I had done,
But straight arriv'd a herald from King Henry
To warn him to the lists against the champion
Of my supposed widow: the pale coward
Shrunk, yet obey'd the summons. The thought struck me
To join his train, and in my sovereign's presence,
At the last trumpet's signal, to come forth
Before the king, the lords, and armed knights,
And strike confusion to the caitiff's soul.
The rest needs no relation.

Gyf. 'Tis resolv'd
To-morrow for Southampton we depart;
There Henry keeps his court.

Saint V. Why, then, to-morrow
Truth and the morning-sun shall rise together,
And this black night of doubt shall be dispell'd:
Till, then, lock fast my secret in thy heart,
And know me for none other than I seem.
Lo! where they come. Yet, yet I will be patient;
Time will bring all things forth. Gyfford, withdraw.

[Exeunt.]

Enter MATILDA and MONTGOMERI.

Mat. I think he said he was my husband's friend;
If so, I've been too harsh: reason forsook me,
For he did speak of things that rent my heart:
But let that pass. Dost thou observe, Montgomeri?

Mont. With fix'd attention and devoted heart
I hear, and note your pleasure.

Mat. I am calm,
Thou seest I am, and not about to speak,
As sometimes, when my thoughts obey no order:
Therefore, I pray thee mark: thou must have noted
With what a tenderness I've train'd thee up
From helpless infancy to blooming manhood:
Hast thou not noted this?

Mont. I were most vile
Did I forget it.

Mat. I am sure thou dost not;
For from the moment of thy birth till now
I've nurs'd thy opening virtues, mark'd their growth,
And gloried in the fruit of my adoption:
I've register'd each movement of thy soul,
And find it tun'd to honour's loftiest pitch,
To soft affection modell'd, and to love,
The harmony of nature: my best hopes
Are satisfied, and thou art all I pray'd for.

Mont. What thou hast made me, that I truly am,
And will be ever: hands, head, heart, are your's.

Mat. The day is coming on, the wish'd-for day
(After a night of twice ten tedious years)
At length is coming on: justice is granted:
I go to Henry's court; Lord Hildebrand

Is summon'd to the lists: and where's the man
To avenge the widow's cause?

Mont. Where is the man!
And can you want a champion? Have I liv'd
The creature of your care, the orphan child
Of your adopting charity, the thing
Your plastic bounty fashion'd from the dust
Of abject misery; and does my heart
Utter one drop of blood that is not your's?
One artery that does not beat for you?

Mat. Know, then, I have a champion, noble,
brave,

Heir of the great Saint Valori, my son. [liv'd,

Mont. What do I hear? thy son! Where has he
That I have never seen him? never known

There was a living hero of the name?
Oh! tell me where he is, that I may fly
To do him faithful service, on my knee
Brace on his glittering armour, bear his shield,
The glorious badge of his nobility,
And shout with triumph, when his conqu'ring sword
Cleaves the assassin's crest. Oh! send me hence,
To hail his victory, or share his fall.

Mat. Thou art my son.

Mont. Merciful God! thy son!

Mat. Thou art my son; for thee alone I've liv'd,
For thee I have surviv'd a murder'd husband;
For thee—but it would break thy filial heart
To hear what I have suffer'd; madness seiz'd me,
And many a time, (sweet Jesus intercede,
For I was not myself!) yes, many a time
In my soul's anguish, with my desperate hand
Rais'd for the stroke of death, a thought, a glance
Of thee, my child, has smote my shatter'd brain,
And stopp'd th' impending blow.

Mont. Oh! spare thyself,

Spare me the dread description.

Mat. Thou hast been
Thy mother's guardian angel: furious once,
In the mind's fever, to Glendarlock's roof
Madd'ning I rush'd; there, from the giddy edge
Of the projecting battlements, below,
Measuring the fearful leap, I cast my eye:
Thy cherub form arrested it; my child
Upon the pavement underneath my feet
Sported with infant playfulness; my blood
Drove back upon my heart; suspended, pois'd,
High hung in air, with outstretch'd arms I stood,
Pondering the dreadful deed; thy fate prevail'd,
Nature flew up, and push'd me from the brink:
I shrunk, recoil'd, and started into reason. [ror.

Mont. Oh! terrible to thought. Oh! pictur'd hor-
It pierces to my brain; there's madness in it.

Mat. Yes, sorrow had o'erturn'd thy mother's brain:

I have been mad, my son; and oftentimes
I find, alas! all is not yet compos'd,
Sound, and at peace: it takes a world of time
To heal the wounds of reason; even now,
When I would fain relate my life's sad story,
I cannot range my scatter'd thoughts in order
To tell it as I should. I pray thee, pardon me;
I'll do my best to recollect myself,
If thou'lt be patient.

Mont. Patient! Oh! thou sufferer!
Oh! thou maternal softness! hear thy son,
Thus kneeling, bathing with his tears thy feet,
Swear to cast off each fond, alluring thought,
The world, its honours, pleasures, and ambition;
Here in this solitude to live with thee,
To thee alone devoted.

Mat. No, my son:
Tho' in this solitude I have conceal'd thee,
Ev'n from thyself conceal'd thee, to evade
A fell usurper's search, and stemm'd the tide
Of nature, gushing to a mother's heart;
Still I have done it in the sacred hope
Of some auspicious hour, when I might shew thee
Bright as thy father's fame.

Mont. I own the cause,
And know how watchfully this hungry vulture
Has hover'd o'er thee on his felon wings.
Now I can solve this solitude around us,
Why thou hast built thine aerie in this crag,
And with a mother's care conceal'd thy young.

Mat. Another day, and then—meanwhile be secret;

Discovery now would but disturb the house
From its sobriety, and mar the time
Of awful preparation. Pass to-morrow!
(Oh! all ye saints and angels, make it happy!)
Then, if thou com'st a living conqueror home,
This roof, that still has echoed to my groans,
Shall ring with triumphs to Saint Valori's name:
But if—

Mont. Avert the sad, ill-omen'd word!
Thou shalt not name it: my great father's spirit
Swells in my bosom. When my falchion gleams,
When the red cross darts terror from my shield,
The coward's heart shall quail, and heaven's own
arm,

Ere mine can strike, shall lay the murderer low.

Mat. Thy father stirs within thee: hark! methinks

I hear the shrieks of his unburied ghost, [me!
Screaming for vengeance. Oh! support, defend
See where he gleams, he bursts upon my sight!
'Tis he, 'tis he! I clasp him to my heart;
My hero! my Saint Valori! my husband!

(Embraces him.)

Re-enter GYFFORD, unseen.

Gyf. Husband! oh, fatal word! undone for ever!

Mat. I will array thee in a sacred suit,
The very armour my Saint Valori wore,
When in the single combat he unhors'd
And slew the Lord Fitz-Osborn. On that helm
High-plum'd victory again shall stand,
And clap her wings exulting; from that shield
Vengeance with gorgon terrors shall look forth,
Awfully frowning. Ha! what man art thou?

(Discovering Gyfford.)

Gyfford, what wouldst thou? wherefore this intrusion?

Gyf. A noble messenger from Henry's court
Is landed on the isle.

Mat. From the king, say'st thou?

Gyf. A runner of his train, whose utmost speed
Scarce distanc'd him an hour, is now arriv'd,
And gives this warning.

Mat. Did you not inquire
His master's name and title?

Gyf. Lord De Courci.

Mat. A generous and right noble lord he is:
Our Normandy boasts not a worthier baron,
Nor one affianc'd to our house more kindly:
Prepare to give him welcome. Follow me.

[Exit with Montgomeri.]

Gyf. Yes, to destruction; for that way thou lead'st.

Husband! her husband! her Saint Valori!
It cannot be. Without the church's rite,
Wed him she could not; to conceal those rites,
And wed by stealth, is here impossible.
What must I think? That he is yet her husband
In meditation only, not in form.
Embracing, too! Oh! mortal stab to honour!
Oh! shame, shame, shame! that I should live to see it.

Enter SAINT VALORI, hastily.

Saint V. What hast thou seen? My mind is on the rack;

Thou'st been in conference with thy lady; speak!
If thou hast aught discover'd that affects
My honour, tell it.

Gyf. Hard task you enjoin;
Would rather I were in my grave, than living
To utter what I've seen.

Saint V. Nay, no evasion.

Gyf. For the world's worth I would not with my knowledge

Add or diminish of the truth one tittle. [truth

Saint V. Gyfford, as thou shalt render up the
To the great Judge of hearts, say what thou know'st
Of my unhappy wife; nor more nor less,
Give me the proof unvarnish'd.

Gyf. I surpris'd

Her and Montgomeri heart to heart embracing—

Saint V. Death! Heart to heart embracing!
Woman, woman! [lay;

Gyf. Fond and entranc'd within his arms she Then with uplifted, rapturous eyes exclaim'd,
"My hero! my saint Valori! my husband!"

Saint V. Husband! reflect. Art sure she call'd him husband?

Gyf. If there be faith in man, I've spoke the truth. [past:

Saint V. Why, then, the truth is out, and all is
I have no more to ask.

Gyf. Hear me with favour;
I'll not abuse the license of old age
And faithful service with too many words.

Saint V. What canst thou tell me? I have one within

That is my monitor: not unprepar'd
I meet this fatal stroke, nor with revilings
Or impious curses (be my witness, Gyfford!)
Do I profane heav'n's ear, tho' hard and painful
This bitter visitation of its wrath.

Gyf. Tho' to the sure conviction of my senses
I saw and heard what I have now reported,
Yet, circumstances weigh'd, I must believe
As yet, she is not wedded.

Saint V. Ha! not wedded?

Perish the man who dares to breathe a doubt
Of her unspotted chastity. Not wedded!
Yet heart to heart embracing! dreadful thought!
Death in his direst shape approach me rather Than that dishonest thought!

Gyf. Would I had died
Ere I had seen this day!

Saint V. Wretch that I am,
Why was I snatch'd from slaughter? why deliver'd
From barbarous infidels? why, when o'erwhelm'd
And sinking in th' oblivious deep, preserv'd,
Wash'd like a floating fragment to the shore,
Sav'd, nourish'd, ransom'd by the very hand
That cuts my heart asunder; set in view
Of all my soul held dear; and now, ev'n now,
As I reach forth my hand to seize the goal,
The resting-place and haven of my hope,
Dash'd in a moment back, and lost for ever?

Gyf. Such is the will of heaven! For me, thus old,

And blighted with misfortune, I've no strength,
No root to bear against this second storm;
There, where I fall, I'll make myself a grave.

Saint V. No more of this: you've heard my last complaint;

For I must soon put off these monkish weeds,
And what a consecrated knight should do,
Fitting the cross he wears, that must be done.
How stands your preparation for to-morrow?
Will she depart?

Gyf. I think she will; for now
The Lord De Courci, from King Henry sent,
Bears courtly salutation to your lady,
With formal summons to her challenger.

Saint V. If it be that De Courci who was once
My youth's companion, and my bosom friend,
A more accomplish'd knight ne'er carried arms:
His coming is most timely. Tell me, Gyfford,
Rememberest thou the armour which I wore
When in the lists I combatted Fitz-Osborn?
I gave it to my wife.

Gyf. I well remember.

Saint V. And hath she kept it, think'st thou?

Gyf. She hath kept it.

Saint V. 'Tis well; for that's the suit, the very
Which I must wear to-morrow. [suit,

Giff. Ah! my lord,
She hath bestow'd that armour on her champion;
And young Montgomeri, with to-morrow's dawn,
Starts, like another Phæton, array'd
In substituted splendour: on his arm
He bears the shield of great Saint Valori,
A golden branch of palm, with this device,
"Another, and the same!" 'Twill be a pageant
Glittering as vanity and love can make it. [take?

Saint V. Mournful as death. My armour will she
My shield, my banners, to array her champion?
Let them beware how they divide the spoil
Before the lion's kill'd. Oh! fall of virtue.
Oh! all ye matron powers of modesty;
How time's revolving wheel wears down the edge
Of sharp affliction! Widows' sable weeds
Soon turn to grey; drop a few tears upon them,
And dusky grey is blanch'd to bridal white;
Then comes the sun, shines thro' the drizzling show'r.
And the gay rainbow glows in all its colours. [Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Castle.

Enter LORD HILDEBRAND and SAINT VALORI.

Lord H. Ah! father Carmelite, where hast thou been?

Was it well done to leave thy wretched friend
To be devour'd by heart-consuming anguish?

Saint V. I left you to repose.

Lord H. I know it not:

Sleep is my horror; then the furies rise;
Then pale Saint Valori appears before me:
Trembling I wake, cold damps bedew my limbs,
And my couch floats with tears. Is this repose?

Saint V. No; yet it moves my wonder why your conscience,

Mute for so many years, should on the sudden
Break into voice, and cry so loud against you.
I found you lull'd in a luxurious calm,
Feasting upon the spoils of him you stabb'd;
Your castle flow'd with revelry and wine,
And you the loudest of the sons of riot:
Where was your conscience then?

Lord H. With you it came;
You are the father of my soul's repentance:
Your fascinating eye pervades my breast;
Conscious, abash'd, uncover'd to the heart,
I stand before you; to your ear confide
Things unreveal'd to man. Now, as I see you,
Tho' in religion's peaceful garment cloth'd,
Saint Valori, methinks, appears before me,
Dreadful in arms, and braves me to the lists.

Saint V. Take food and rest, recruit your body's
And you'll forget these fears. [strength,

Lord H. I'll die with famine
Before I'll eat the charitable bread
Of her I made a widow; and for sleep,
I tell thee once again, sleep is my horror.
Methought but now by shipwreck I was plung'd
Into the foaming ocean; on the shore
Your figure stood with beck'ning hand outstretch'd
To snatch me from the waves; cheer'd with the sight,

Thro' the white surf I struggled; with strong arm
You rais'd me from the gulf; joyful I ran
T' embrace my kind preserver, when at once
Off fell your habit, bright in arms you stood,
And with a voice of thunder cried aloud,
"Villain, avant! I am Saint Valori!"

Then push'd me from the cliff: down, down I fell,
Fathoms on fathoms deep, and sunk for ever.

Saint V. This was your dream.

Lord H. Now hear my waking terrors.
Rous'd by this dream I started; to the wall
Furious I rush'd, to dash my desperate brains:
Burst with the force, a secret door flew open,
Where full in view a lighted altar blaz'd
With holy tapers bright; around it hung

The funeral trophies of Saint Valori;
Red gleam'd the banner of the bloody cross,
And on a tablet underneath was written,
"Pray for the peace of his departed soul!"
Upon my knees I dropp'd, and would have pray'd,
When soon, behold, the lady widow enter'd,
Led by the generous youth who sav'd our lives:
I rose, made low obeisance, and retir'd.

Saint V. You left them there. Did all this pass in silence?

Lord H. All; not a word was spoken.

Saint V. Did you note
Her look, her action? How did she dismiss you?
Abruptly, eagerly?

Lord H. With matron grace,
Her hand thus gently waving, she dismiss'd me;
The other hand most lovingly was lock'd
In his on whom she lean'd.

Saint V. No more of this.

Hark! you are summon'd: rouse from this despair;
Shake off your lethargy. (Trumpets.)

Lord H. What trumpet's that?

Saint V. To you, or to your challenger, the last;
Death sounds the knell, and justice seals the doom.

Lord H. My soul sinks down abash'd: I cannot fight; [murder.

What would you more? I have confess'd the Saint V. You have confess'd you know not what:

retire!

Go to your chamber; I will quickly follow.

And bring you comfort. [Exeunt.

*Enter MATILDA and her Domestics, LORD DE
COURCI and his train.*

Mat. My noble lord, thrice welcome! you are come [sence

To glad the mourner's heart, and with your pre-
Make her poor cottage rich.

Lord De C. Most noble lady,
Henry of Normandy, the kingly heir
Of England's mighty conqueror, of his grace
And princely courtesy, by me his servant,
As a most loving father, kindly greets you;
Which salutation past, I am to move you
Upon the matter of your suit afresh,
Its weight and circumstance; how many years
It hath been let to sleep; what forfeiture
And high default you stand in, should it fail:
Conjuring you, as fits a Christian king,
By the lov'd memory of your honour'd lord
Who now hath tenanted the silent grave
These twenty years and more, not to proceed
In this high matter on surmise, or charge
Of doubtful circumstance; the crime alledg'd
Being so heinous, the appeal so bloody,
And he whom you attain so brave and noble.

Mat. I know, my lord, in property the law
Can plead prescription and the time's delay;
But justice, in an inquisition made for blood,
With retrospective eye thro' ages past,
Moves her own pace, nor hears the law's demur.
Why I have let this murder sleep thus long,
Necessity, and not my will, must answer.
The conqueror William, and his furious son,
With iron hand upheld th' oppressor's power,
And stopp'd their ears against the widow's cries.
In painful silence brooding o'er my grief,
On this lone rock, upon the ocean's brink,
Year after year I languish'd, in my dreams
Conversing oft with shadowy shapes and horrors,
That scar'd me into madness. Oh! my lord,
Bear with my weakness: pray, regard me not;
I have a remedy at hand—my tears. (Weeps.)

Lord De C. Sad relict of the bravest, best of men,
Tell not thy griefs to me, nor let my words
(Which by commission, not of choice, I speak)
Shake thy firm purpose; for on England's throne
No tyrant sits, deaf to the widow's cause,
But heav'n's vicegerent, merciful and just.
If steadfast thou art fix'd in thy appeal,

Stedfast in justice is thy sovereign, too.
Bring forth thy knight appellant, for the lists
Expect him, and may heav'n defend the right!

Mat. Thanks to thy royal sender! on my knee
I offer prayers to heaven for length of days,
And blessings shower'd on his anointed head.
Now, gallant lord, you shall behold my champion,
My shepherd boy, who, like the son of Jesse,
Unskill'd in arms, must combat this Philistine.
Montgomeri, come forth!

Enter MONTGOMERI.

Lord De C. Is this your knight? [strength]

Mat. This is my knight. I trust not in the
Of mortal man; heaven will uphold my cause,
And to a murderer's heart will guide the blow,
Tho' from an infant's hand.

Lord De C. Of what degree
Must I report him? In the royal lists,
Against so proud a name as Hildebrand,
The warlike forms of knighthood will demand
That noble shall to noble be oppos'd.

Mat. Not unprepar'd I shall attend the lists;
And, at my sovereign's feet, prefer the proofs
Which honour's forms demand.

Lord De C. You know the peril,
If you fall short.

Mat. I take it on my head.

Lord De C. Where have you serv'd? what battles have you seen?

Mont. Few and unfortunate have been the fields,
Where I have fought. I serv'd a sinking cause;
Robert of Normandy was my liege lord,
For I am Norman born.

Lord De C. Have you been train'd
In tournaments?

Mont. I never broke a lance,
Nor shall I, as I hope, but in his heart
Who stabb'd Saint Valori.

Lord De C. Noble lady,
I would impart something of nearest import
To your more private ear.

Mat. Let all withdraw: (They withdraw.)
Leave us. And now, my lord and honour'd guest,
Impart your noble thoughts; for sure I am
None others can be native of a soul,
Where courtesy and valour are enshrin'd,
As in a holy altar, under guard
Of consecrated keepers; therefore, speak.

Lord De C. Let infamy fix on me, when I wrong
A confidence so generous. Heav'n bestow'd
One friend, the pride and blessing of my life;
Heav'n, when you lost a husband, from me also Took that one friend away, and in his grave
Buried my heart beside him.

Mat. Yes, my lord,
We both have cause to mourn him: I remember
The day he parted for the holy wars,
His manly bosom struggling to repress
Its bursting passion, in those racking moments,
When stern religion rent him from my arms,
Then, even then, in his capacious soul
Friendship had part—you shar'd it with Matilda.
Need I proceed? Ah! no, for you was present,
You took him from me, on your neck he fell;
I parted, sunk, and never saw him more.

Lord De C. 'Twas in those parting moments he committed
A sacred charge, the very test of friendship,
Your soft, unshelter'd beauty, to my care.
I serv'd, consol'd you, lov'd you as a brother;
But soon Saint Valori call'd me from my charge,
For war and sickness had consum'd our host,
And Palestine was drench'd with Christian blood.
We fought, we conquer'd, and from Pagan hands
Rescued the captive cross: and now command
My zealous heart, you are its mistress still.

Mat. There needs not this, my lord; for I can read
Your zeal without a preface: freely then,
As a friend should, and plainly speak your thoughts.

Lord De C. When rumour of this combat reach'd
Without delay, I sent a trusty page, [my ears,
Offering myself as your devoted knight:
He brought for answer, that you had a champion;
You thank'd me for my offer; cold repulse
Temper'd in courteous phrase! still I submitted
In silence, as became me, to your pleasure,
Musing who this might be—

Mat. And now you find him
A stripling youth unknown, in arms a novice,
And you condemn my choice; these are your thoughts.

Lord De C. I do confess it. Oh! reflect in time;
Think not, because nature hath cast a form
In fair proportion, strung his youthful joints
With nerves that bear him bounding to the chace,
Or hurl the wrestler in the shouting ring,
That you have train'd a champion to encounter
A combatant so practis'd in the lists,
So valorous in fight as Hildebrand. [my lord,

Mat. What I have done, I've done. Your zeal,
May start new terrors for my hero's danger,
Shake me with new alarms, but change it cannot.

Lord De C. Turn not away, but still with patience hear me.

Think what you are, great in yourself, yet greater
As brave Saint Valori's widow: oh! preserve
That name untainted; hear what honour counsels;
Truth makes me bold, your danger is my warrant.

Mat. You was my husband's friend; I own your Lo! I am turn'd to hear. Proceed. [plea.

Lord De C. I was his friend,
I am your's also; and as such, I warn you
Against a deed so fatal, that the steel
Of Hildebrand gave not a stab more mortal
To life than this to fame.

Mat. My lord, my lord!
You rise too fast upon me, and advance
Too strongly on so weak a disputant,
So much to seek for reason as I am.

Lord De C. May I not then demand, what is this boy,
Whom you thus dignify? this page, this lacquey,
The very topmost pitch of whose promotion
Had been to touch the stirrup of Saint Valori?

Mat. What is he!—but you question me too harshly;

I'll answer to the King; but to a friend
Who treats me with suspicion, I am silent.
You bid me call to memory what I am:
I hope, when thus you school me, you yourself
In your own precepts need no monitor.
I think I am as humble as I should be Under such hard correction. I acknowledge
Two powerful duties: to my husband one,
The first and strongest; to yourself the next,
As my much-honour'd guest; but I oppose
The tyranny of friendship, which would stamp
Dishonour on the worthy, and forbid
My free affections to direct their choice
Where nature warrants, and my soul approves.

[Exit.

Lord De C. Why, then, there's no perfection in the sex,
Or I had found it here. Farewell to grief;
So much for tears! though twenty years they flow
They wear no channels in a widow's cheeks;
And still the ambush'd smile lurks underneath
The watry surface, ready to start up
At the next lover's summons; now to greet
A hero's passion, now to wed a page.

Enter SAINT VALORI.

Saint V. My Lord De Courci, doth your memory
To recollect a certain pledge of love, [serve
A jewel, which the lady of this house
Gave to her husband by your hands?

Lord De C. A bracelet;
She took it from her arm when they did part:
I well remember it.

Saint V. Was it like this?

Lord De C. The very same; I gave it to Saint Valori
When he embark'd for Palestine.

Saint V. You did:

I had it then; your memory is perfect. [of this?

Lord De C. You had it then! What must I think

Saint V. Can you this little token keep in mind,
And not remember him you gave it to?

Lord De C. Explain yourself; you speak in mysteries. [surprise

Saint V. Be temperate, then; let not your loud
Betray me to the house: I'm here unknown.

Lord De C. Impossible! though the dead rose
Yet this cannot be he. [again,

Saint V. My friend! my friend!

Come to my arms! let this embrace convince you.

Lord De C. Oh, earth and heaven! he lives.

Saint V. He lives, indeed,
To a new life of misery. Be still!

Forbear to question me: another time
Thou shalt hear all, but let this hour be sacred

To friendship's pressing call. My wife! my wife!

Lord De C. Oh! my prophetic fears.

Saint V. Unhappy woman!

For why should I accuse her? twenty years
A mournful widow, and at last to start

So wide from all propriety; and now,
After so brave a struggle, now to sink

Her honour, which still bore so proud a sail
Through the rough tide of time. Oh! bitter

Oh! aggravating shame! [thought!

Lord De C. Alas! my friend,

How shall I comfort you? I see you point
At young Montgomeri: in friendship's right

I ask'd her private ear, and boldly urg'd
The peril of her fame.

Saint V. And what reply? [I touch'd

Lord De C. Patient at first she heard; but when
The master-string, and set to view how base

The choice of such a minion, such a page,
Then—but 'twere painful to describe the scene,

Vain to conceal: she loves him to distraction.

Saint V. Can it be doubted? She has married

Lord De C. Indeed! [him.

Saint V. I have a trusty servant here,
Who saw her clasp him in her wanton arms,

Twine, like pale ivy round the polish'd bark
Of the smooth beech, whilst rapt'rous she exclaim'd,

"My hero! my Saint Valori! my husband!"—
Oh! she is lost, beyond redemption lost.

Lord De C. Who now shall dream of constancy in woman? [bat.

What's to be done? Your life dissolves the com-
Saint V. That shame I've sav'd her from: Lord

Is dying in this house. [Hildebrand
Lord De C. Lord Hildebrand!

How many strange events are here combin'd
Of sorrow and surprise; so thick they crowd,

So swift they change, I know not where to turn,
Nor what to counsel.

Saint V. What can counsel give?

Can words revoke, can wisdom reconcile,
Th' indissoluble web which fate has wove?

And shall I stay and harbour here with shame?
Walk, like a discontented moping ghost,

To haunt and hover round their nuptial bed,
When I can die, as I have liv'd, in arms?—

Off, holy counterfeit! begone, disguise!

Lord De C. Stop, I conjure you; rush not on despair. [so long

Saint V. Despair! And have I worn the cross
But as the mask and mockery of religion?

No, 'tis the armour of a Christian knight,
And with this gauntlet I defy despair.

Lord De C. Then by that sacred symbol, by our friendship

And faithful brotherhood in God's holy service,
I do beseech thee to persist in hope:

For whilst one circumstance of doubt remains,

One, though the slightest fragment is afloat,
That fond credulity e'er clung to, still,
Still will I keep some happy chance in view
To save thy lady's honour.

Saint V. Gallant friend,
Thy counsel shall prevail; I will persist;
And as misfortune is the world's best school
For true philosophy, I will extract
The cordial patience from the bitter root
Of this implanted pain. Come, brave De Courci!
Pleasure's gay scene, and hope's delusive dream,
Are vanish'd, lost; love's fairy palace sinks
In the false fleeting sand on which 'twas built;
Whilst thy immortal constancy alone
Stands in the waste, a solitary column,
To tell life's mournful traveller where once
Joy revell'd, and a stately fabric rose. [Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the castle.

Enter MATILDA and LORD HILDEBRAND.

Mat. Stop, stranger! wherefore have you left your chamber?

Will you go forth with all your wounds about you?
Return, nor rashly counteract our care,
That labours to preserve you.

Lord H. Shall I make
Your house a grave? The wounds you see are nothing, [ments;

Their pain may be assuag'd by drugs and oint-
Nature abounds in simples, that can heal
These tumours of the body.

Mat. If the cure
Be, as you say, so easy, why oppose it?

Is pain your choice, that you resist our medicines,
And thus expose your rankling wounds undress'd

To the raw, fest'ring air?

Lord H. Ah! generous lady,
'Tis but a superficial flattering art

To heal the skin, and make the surface whole,
When an unsearchable and mortal sting

Has pierc'd the nobler part.

Mat. That sting is grief:
You mourn a wife, perhaps, or some dear friend,

In your late shipwreck lost: if it be so,
I'll not arraign your sorrow; yet remember,

Though short of their allotted time they fell,
'Twas heav'n that struck them short, they were not murder'd,

As my Saint Valori, by vile treach'rous man.

Lord H. Oh, horror! horror!

Mat. Have I touch'd the cause?
Was there a friend? a wife?

Lord H. Nor wife, nor friend;
And yet—

Mat. What yet? Your heart perhaps was fix'd
Upon your freighted treasures, hoarded up

By carking care, and a long life of thrift;
Now, without interest or redemption, swallow'd

By the devouring bankrupt waves for ever:
What then? your cares have perish'd with your fortune. [wail

Lord H. The wreck of friends and fortune I be-
As things heav'n gives and takes away at pleasure;

Conditional enjoyments, transient loans,
Bliss that accumulates a debt of pain:

Swift their succession, sudden their reverse.
To-day the setting sun descends in tears,

To-morrow's dawn breaks forth, and all is joy:
But guilt involves me in perpetual night;

No morning star, no glimmering ray of hope;
Eternal tossings on a bed of thorns,

Conscience, that raven, knelling in my ear,
And vulture furies plucking at my heart!

Mat. Then I conjectur'd right, and 'tis remorse
Which tortures you; I read it in your eyes:

Did that descending virtue come on earth,
To set at large the captive or the free?

'Twas to redeem the captive: turn to him,
Turn then, and seek your saving hope, repentance;

Go to your Carmelite, confess to him,
Fly to your soul's physician for a cure;
Whether with soft emollients he assuage,
Or with corrosive penances consume
The cank'rous gangrene that now gnaws your heart.

Lord H. I have confess'd to him, he knows my guilt;

But what can he, alas! there lives but one
Under heav'n's canopy, who can absolve.
Hither th' immediate hand of heav'n has led me,
Hopeless of pardon, to expire before you,
And cast your husband's murderer at your feet.

Mat. Ah! scorpion! is it thou? I shake with horror.

Thee have I pitied? thee have I preserv'd?
Monster, avaunt! Go to the rocks for food,
Call to the winds for pity! lay thee down
Beneath some blighted yew, whose pois'nous leaf
Kills as it falls; there howl thyself to death!
Hangs the roof o'er us yet? I am astonish'd.
Art not asham'd, oh! earth, to bear him yet?
Oh! sea, to cast him up again? Begone!

Lord H. I do not wait for pardon, but for death;
Call to your servants; whelm me with their swords.
Heav'n throws me on your mercy; you receiv'd
And gave me shelter; hospitably tender'd
Food and restoring med'cines; I refus'd them:
My thirst is unallay'd, my wounds undress'd,
No particle of food has past my lips,
For I disdain a fraud upon your pity;
And, where I can't have pardon, scorn support.
The only mercy I implore is death.

Mat. Mercy! and dare thy tongue pronounce the name?

Mercy! thou man of blood, thou hast destroy'd it,
It came from heaven to save Saint Valori:
You saw the cherub messenger alight
From its descent; with outspread wings it sate,
Covering his breast; you drew your cursed steel,
And through the pleading angel pierc'd his heart.
Then, then the moon, by whose pale light you struck,

Turn'd fiery red, and from her angry orb
Darted contagious sickness on the earth;
The planets in their courses shriek'd for horror;
Heav'n dropt maternal tears. Oh! art thou come?

Enter MONTGOMERI.

Mont. Why dost thou tremble? Why this ghastly terror?

Mat. Save me, support me! In thy arms I fall:
I mov'd not till thou cam'st, lest I had sunk
Upon the floor, and catching at the hand
That stabb'd Saint Valori, his touch had kill'd me.

Mont. That stabb'd Saint Valori! Is this the wretch?

Is this Hildebrand before me? Draw, thou traitor!
Stand to defence, or die!

Lord H. Behold my heart!
Strike! I expect no mercy.

Mat. Stop thine hand:
Black though he be, as infamy can make him,
He is defenceless, wounded, and expiring.

Lord H. Wilt thou not add, repentant? I am vanquish'd,

Body and soul laid prostrate by despair.
I do confess my crime; what can I more?
Castle, demesne, and treasure, all the spoils
Of my accursed avarice, I resign:
Take my life too; dismiss me from a world
Where I have none to mourn me, no kind hand
To close my eyes; of children, wife, and friends,
(Save only this poor Carmelite) bereft;
Be merciful to him, he is not guilty.

If I dare ask a little earth to cover me
For Christian decency, I would—but that,
That were too much—my tears will sink a grave.

Mont. He's deeply penitent: you'll not refuse
What he petitions for: 'twere most unchristian
To let him die without the church's rites.

Mat. Forbear!

Mont. He's dying—see, he faints—he falls.

(Hildebrand sinks on the ground.)

'Twill give him comfort in the hour of death;
And that I'd give ev'n to a murderer.

Mat. You never knew your father, and in you
Pity is natural; in me 'tis treason
To breathe the air which his pollution taints;
A crime to look upon his eyes and live. [fall:

Mont. I feel, I feel your cause; there let him
Die where he lists, but give his corpse a grave.
And see, the Carmelite approaches.

Mat. Ha!

The Lord De Courci, too! Stand by the body;
And if the wretch has breath to speak again,
Call them to witness his confession. Mark!
In heav'n's own presence, mark this awful scene,
And write it on thy heart. Farewell! Be constant!
[Exit.

Enter SAINT VALORI and DE COURCI.

Mont. Noble De Courci, and thou, reverend father,

From whom the penitent in life's last hour
Draws holy comfort, look upon that wretch,
Visit his soul with peace at its departure,
And take confession from his dying lips.

Saint V. Withdraw, and stand apart then, out of hearing. [They withdraw.

Lord Hildebrand, if thou hast sense and motion,
Reach forth thine hand. So! If thou canst, look
I am the Carmelite. [up!

Lord H. Oh! save me, save me!
I am a sinful man.

Saint V. But not a murderer:
He who speaks to you is Saint Valori.

Lord H. God of my hope! is it some blessed
Or living man that speaks? [spirit,

Saint V. A living man,
Saint Valori himself; no spirit. Mark!
I grasp your hand in token of forgiveness:
Dost thou perceive it?

Lord H. At my heart I feel it.
Can you forgive me? May I die in peace?

Saint V. Lo! thus with friendly hand I close thine eyes:

Sleep, sleep! and be at rest from thy afflictions;
Would mine were laid beside thee in the grave!

Lord H. Oh! balmy comfort! oh! how sweet to die!

Farewell for ever: do not quit my hand;
Let it not go, till I am dead. Farewell! (Dies.)

Saint V. He's dead; his soul forsook him with that sigh.

Now, sirs, return—'tis past; I have beheld
Religion's triumph, a repentant death.

Re-enter DE COURCI and MONTGOMERI.

Call to your servants, and remove the body.

Mont. There is a charitable house hard by,
Where, on the ocean's edge, a few poor monks,
A slender brotherhood of Mercy dwell;
For human misery a small asylum;
There often from the foundering bark escap'd,
The houseless wretch finds shelter, and his wounds
With balsams by the fathers cull'd, are dress'd:
There we'll entomb the body.

Saint V. Be it so. [wreck:

Mont. You now alone survive the morning's
You by peculiar providence are sav'd
From a devoted vessel, which the sins
Of its dire owner sunk; still I must wonder
How God's own servant with a demon leagu'd,
And piety with murder could embark. [care

Saint V. You think he was a murderer; have a
How you incline too rashly to such tales.
Let not your vassals triumph and rejoice
Too much o'th' sudden; let your castle keep
Some remnant of its old propriety:
And you, the champion, hang not up your lance
In token of a bloodless victory,

But keep it sharpen'd for a fresh encounter ;
And stick your valour to the test, young knight,
Lest haply some new questioner should come,
And dash your feast with horror.

Mont. Reverend stranger,
It will become your order to desist [ing,
From threats, which cover some mysterious mean-
And speak without disguise. You boast yourself
Noble Saint Valori's friend, yet plead the cause
Of Hildebrand, defend him from the crime
Of murder, and with gloomy menace bid me
Expect some new appellant. Lo! I'm ready.

Saint V. Away, vain boy, away!

Mont. Vain let me be,
Not of myself, but of the cause I stand for :
The lady of Saint Valori accounts me
Worthy to be her champion, by that title
I do impeach the memory of Lord Hildebrand ;
And in the presence of this lord, whose person
Stands for the king, arraign him as a murderer :
If any love his memory so well
As to adopt his cause, let him stand forth,
I pledge myself to answer.

Saint V. Lord De Courci,
Shall I reveal myself? I'm strongly tempted?

[Aside.]
Lord De C. I do protest against it ; and conjure
Whilst he is thus in train, leave it to me [you,
To draw confession up.

Saint V. I am content.

Lord De C. Montgomeri, in virtue of my charge
I've noted your defiance : should there come
A knight of known degree to challenge it,
Say, by what stile and title wilt thou answer?

Mont. Ask that of her in whose defence I stand.

Lord De C. We know thee for her champion ;
but declare,
Hast thou no nearer name, no closer tie?

Saint V. Answer to that. 'Tis palpable, 'tis gross :
Your silence is confession.

Mont. Ah! good father,
Have you so us'd confession as an engine
To twist and torture silence to your purpose,
And stain the truth with colouring not its own?

Saint V. The man who flies to silence for evasion,
When plainly questioned, aims at a deception
Which candour's self will construe to condemn him.

Mont. Thyself a stranger, dark, inscrutable,
With Hildebrand associate, thou to question me!
First answer for thyself.

Saint V. For myself then—

Lord De C. Stop, re-collect your thoughts.

Saint V. Thanks, noble lord!
For myself, then, I own I am your debtor
For no less gift than life ; and though that life
Makes what you gave a gift of misery,
Yet is the gift uncancell'd.

Mont. Set it down
For nothing but the mutual debt of nature,
Common from man to man. To-morrow's sun,
With favouring winds to aid us, shall transport
This castle's noble mistress and myself
Across the streight that severs this fair isle
From its maternal shore ; there to renew
At Henry's feet, against this bloody man
Newly deceas'd, our criminal appeal,
Arraigning him for murder.

Saint V. Ha! beware!

Mont. Who shall oppose it?

Saint V. I ; this noble witness ;
Truth, and the living evidence of sight.

Mont. To you, my Lord De Courci, not to him,
Who is a son of peace, to you, a knight
Seal'd with the cross, and militant for truth,
Thus I appeal. What say you to our charge?

Lord De C. False, false ; I pledge my life upon the proof. [dare

Mont. Ha! by my father's soul, if thou shalt
To whisper that to-morrow—

Lord De C. If I dare
To whisper it! My herald shall proclaim it ;
I'll cry it in the lists. There is my gauntlet.
(Throws it down.)

Saint V. Hold! I forbid it.
(Takes up Lord De Courci's gauntlet.)

Brother of the cross,
Upon your knightly honour I conjure you,
Put up your gauntlet : I revoke the combat.
Hear me, young sir, you tread upon your grave ;
Fate waves the sword of vengeance o'er your head ;
I've pass'd it by, and paid you life for life.
Lo! I provoke you to a gentler combat ;
Behold my peaceful gauntlet! Take this jewel ;
(Gives the bracelet.)

And an hour hence, when I am on my way,
Shew it to her (what shall I call your lady?)
To her that own'd it once.

Mont. I will obey you.

What more have you in mind?

Saint V. Tell her the monk,
Through all his pilgrimage from Holy Land
Preserv'd it sacred ; journeying night and day,
By sea, by land, in shipwreck, in the waves,
Still guarded it with reverence more devout
Than holy relics of departed martyrs.
Now 'tis no longer worth : 'tis her's, 'tis your's,
'Tis the next favourite's prize, a transient bauble,
The fleeting emblem of a woman's love.

No more : farewell! Come, gallant lord, to horse.
[Exit with Lord De Courci.]

Mont. To horse! why so a warrior would have call'd ;

With such a step a warrior would have trod :
A monk!—Mysterious man! I'll not believe it.
This jewel may unfold the labyrinth—
What then? Shall I commit the clue
To sorrow's trembling hand, or firmly hold it
Till more shall be discover'd? Time direct me!

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Chapel with an altar decorated with the funeral trophies of Saint Valori. MATILDA is discovered kneeling at the altar. MONTGOMERI enters, and after a pause, speaks.

Mont. Still at the altar! Ever on her knees!
Nothing but peace! peace to her husband's soul!
Perpetual requiems. If, as we believe,
Th' uncircumscribed spirit of a man
Walks after death, till it can find a grave,
Or holy church, with soul-compelling hymns,
Shall chant it to repose, I am amaz'd
My father's ghost, whilst unappeas'd by prayer,
Ne'er took its shadowy journey to this spot.
Why, when De Courci and the monk outfac'd me,
Did he not then arise with all his wounds,
And scare them to confession? I am lost,
Bewilder'd, and perplex'd. But see! she moves.
(Matilda arises, and comes down from the altar.)

Mat. My son! my joy! my blessing!

Mont. Whence is this?

What sudden transformation? By my hopes,
There is a joyful emanation round thee,
That strikes a gleam of rapture to my heart.
What angel of good tidings hath been with thee?
Who hath exorcis'd thy despair, and breath'd
This beam of placid pleasure in thine eyes?

Mat. Thy father hath been with me.

Mont. Heav'n's! my father? [with him

Mat. I've seen him in my vision ; commun'd
Before the altar : soft his accents fell,
Like voices of departed friends heard in our dreams,
Or music in the air, when the night-spirits
Warble their magic minstrelsy.

Mont. Indeed!

Would I had seen him, too!

Mat. Would heav'n thou hadst.

Mont. What was his form?

Mat. Majestically sweet ;
He smil'd upon me ; straight through all my veins

Methought I felt a thrilling virtue run,
Healing, where'er it cours'd, both heart and brain.

Mont. Saw you no wounds about him?

Mat. None, no wounds;
Nor was he in his youth, or when he died,
But grey with years, and much transform'd by time:

At first I knew him not, and as he spoke,
So chang'd methought he was, with pain I trac'd
The faded record.

Mont. Spoke he of his murder?

Mat. Oh! not a word; but as it ne'er had been,
And he were living now, so look'd and spoke.

Mont. 'Tis strange—one question more. Say, did this form
Ne'er visit you before?

Mat. Never, till now.

Mont. Nor this, nor any other shape?

Mat. Oh! never, never.

Mont. Then, I own my confidence is shaken;
And fit it is no longer to conceal
What I have newly heard so boldly vouch'd,
That my faith reels.

Mat. Speak, I conjure thee, speak!

Mont. I came this instant from the Carmelite
And Lord De Courci: on the floor was stretch'd
The breathless corpse of Hildebrand; the monk
In his last moments had been private with him:
I urg'd the murder, to his own confession
Appealing in my accusation's proof;
When, strange to tell, his confessor the monk
Boldly denied that he had kill'd Saint Valori.
Rous'd at this daring insult, and indignant,
I turn'd upon De Courci, and demanded
If he would vouch the falsehood; he, more hot
And no less confident than t'other, hurl'd
Defiance in my teeth, and to the ground
Threw down his gauntlet, pledging to the truth
Of what the monk affirm'd.

Mat. I am amaz'd;
There is a trembling expectation in me,
That by some secret impulse draws me on
To the great revelation of my fate:
Therefore proceed!

Mont. Before I could reply,
The Carmelite had seiz'd De Courci's pledge,
And with a tone and gesture more befitting
A haughty warrior than a son of peace,
Sternly forbade the challenge to proceed:
Then with a mournful action turning tow'ards me,
And sighing, drew from forth his bosom this,
This pearly chain. (Produces the bracelet.)

Mat. Ah! Do my eyes betray me?
Help, help! uphold me, whilst I look upon it.
The same, the same! I gave it to my husband;
My last, fond, parting pledge: guide, guide my hands,
My trembling hands, to touch it. Sacred relic!
Enthusiastic as the pilgrim's kiss,
Thus to my lips I press thee. Hail, thrice hail!
To thee, oh! altar, with these banners deck'd,
Hallow'd with daily incense, and besieg'd
With never-ceasing requiems for his soul,
I dedicate this trophy of my love!
Lead me, my son!

Mont. Oh! dost thou love thy son?

Mat. Love thee! Oh! heaven!

(Falls on his neck, weeping.)

Mont. By that, then, I conjure thee
Come to thy couch. Now, as thy cheek turns pale,
Convulsion shakes thy lip, and the full stream
Bursts from thine eyes, return not to the altar:
Let me conduct thee forth.

Mat. Where, where's the monk?
Shall I not see him?

Mont. Yes, thou suffering saint!
Be patient for a while, and thou shalt see him.

Mat. Come, then, dispose of me as to thy love
And piety seems best: I will obey.

Let me have this; thou wilt not take this from me?
(Holding the bracelet.)

Mont. Not for the worth of all this world.

Mat. I thank thee. [Exeunt.

Enter SAINT VALORI, LORD DE COURCI, and GYFFORD.

Saint V. Suffer this last one weakness. Ha!
she's gone;

The chapel is deserted: I had hop'd
Once more to have look'd upon her ere we parted.

Lord De C. 'Tis better as it is.

Saint V. It may be so;

And yet 'twere stern philosophy, methinks,
That could refuse the sight one short indulgence,
Ere the heart breaks with sorrow.

Lord De C. I am pain'd
To see this tender sorrow swell so fast.

Saint V. Oh! call to mind how I have lov'd this woman!

Gyfford, thou know'st it; say, thou faithful servant,
What was my passion; how did absence feed it?
But how canst thou compute my sum of sorrows?
Years upon years have roll'd since thou wast with
me:

Time hath been wearied with my groans, my tears
Have damp'd his wings, till he scarce crept along;
The un pitying sun ne'er wink'd upon my toils;
All day I dragg'd my slavery's chain, all night
Howl'd to its clanking on my bed of straw;
And yet these pains were recreation now,
To those I feel, whilst I resign Matilda.

Gyf. Stay, then, my noble master, here abide,
And to this awful place convoke your lady.

Saint V. This awful place! she'll visit it no
more;

Or, if she does, 'twill be to strip these trappings;
These mockeries shall come down, they've had their day,

They've serv'd the uses of hypocrisy,
And festive garlands now shall fill their place
Around this nuptial altar.

Lord De C. No, my friend,
I am a witness to her unfeign'd sorrows;
And were I left to judge of them unbiass'd,
By what I saw besides, I should believe
She were the very mirror of her sex
For matchless constancy.

Saint V. You rend my heart. [wash'd

Gyf. Thrice on her knees this morning hath she
This altar's feet with tears, and with her pray'rs
Sent up a mingled cry of sighs and groans.

Saint V. Why, then, old man, didst thou distract my soul

With gossip tales to slander her fair fame,
And murder my repose? If thou art conscious
Of having wrong'd her, get thee hence, begone!
Fall at her feet for pardon, howl for pity,
And hide thyself where light may never find thee.

Gyf. With grief, but not with shame, I will retire
From thee and light. I have not wrong'd the truth.

Saint V. Stay, Gyfford, stay, thou loyal, good old man!

Pity thy master, and forgive my frenzy.
Lo! I am calm again: the pledge I've given
To young Montgomeri shall be the test.
Yes, with that chain I'll draw her to the proof;
Link'd and entwin'd about her heart I'll hold it,
And tent her nature to its inmost feelings.
See, the young favorite comes.

Enter MONTGOMERI.

Mont. Oh! timely found,
Well are you thus encounter'd, holy sir!
The lady of Saint Valori demands you;
And lo! where she advances.

Enter MATILDA.

Mat. Ha! 'tis well.
In presence of this altar we are met:
And may the sacred genius of the place
Prosper our interview.

Saint V. Amen! amen!

[the chapel

Mat. Good friends, withdraw! let none approach
Whilst we are private. Now, be firm, my heart.
(They go out—she pauses some time, and then addresses herself to Saint Valori.)

Father, I thank you! I've receiv'd your pledge,
The small, but prizeless relic you have brought me.
The bracelet, given by Lord De Courci's hands
In times long past (fie, fie upon these tears,
They will have way) to a departed friend.
Perhaps he priz'd this trifle—but, alas!
'Tis fated, like the arm from which 'twas taken,
Never to clasp him more.

Saint V. Alas! I fear it.

Mat. I hope De Courci gave it to my lord.

Saint V. He did; I saw him give it.

Mat. Ha! you saw him! [told you

Saint V. When he embark'd for Palestine; I've
We never march'd apart. I wore the cross
In those fame-seeking days.

Mat. I do remember.

And this poor favour, did my hero wear it?

Saint V. Devoutly, at his heart.

Mat. Then, then, indeed [come!

Thou hast bestow'd a treasure. Welcome, wel-
(As she is pressing it to her heart, Saint Valori observing her agitation, runs to her assistance.)

Saint V. He wore it like an amulet; with this Before his heart, first through the yawning breach
Thy sacred walls, Jerusalem, he storm'd;
Tore down the moony standard, where it hung
In impious triumph; thrice their Pagan swords
Shiver'd his mailed crest, as many times
That sacred amulet was dy'd in blood
Nearest his heart.

Mat. Stop there! I charge thee stop!
Tell me no more: oh! follow him no further,
For see, th' accursed Pyrenæans rise,
Streaming with blood; there hellish murder howls;
There madness rages, and with haggard eyes
Glares in the craggy pass. She'll spring upon me,
If I advance. Oh! shield me from the sight.

Saint V. Be calm, collect thyself: it was not there,

It was not there Saint Valori met his death.

'Twas not the sword of Hildebrand that slew him;
Though pierc'd with wounds, that ambush he sur-
viv'd. [altar:

Mat. What do I hear? Oh! look upon this
Think where you stand, and do not wrong the truth.

Saint V. He who is truth itself be witness for me!
Deep was the stroke that dire assassin gave,
Yet short of life it stopp'd; unhors'd and fall'n,
Welt'ring in blood, your wounded husband lay,
Till haply found by charitable strangers
Journeying to Venice, he was heal'd, restor'd;
And, thence embarking, by a barbarous rover
Was captur'd. Start not; but repress your terrors.

Mat. Admire not that I tremble; marvel rather
That I hear this and live. Saint Valori captur'd!
The bravest captain of the cross enslav'd
By barbarous Pagans!

Saint V. Tedious years he suffer'd
Of hard captivity—

Mat. Oh! where, ye heavens,
Where was your justice then? And died he there?

Saint V. 'Twas not his lot to find a distant grave.

Mat. Where, where? oh! speak; release me from Where did my hero fall? [the rack!

Saint V. Where did he fall!
Nor Pagan swords, nor slavery's galling chain,
Nor murderers' daggers, Afric's burning clime,
Toils, storms, nor shipwreck, kill'd him—here he fell!

Grief burst his heart—here in this spot he fell!

(He falls to the ground.)

Mat. Ah! horror, horror! Help, for mercy, help!

My son, my son! your father lies before you.

MONTGOMERI runs in, followed by LORD DE
COURCI and GYFFORD.

Mont. My father! heav'n and earth! Oh! save him; save him!

Where shall I turn? See, see! she faints, she falls! (Supports her in his arms.)

Lord De C. He is her son. Awake, look up, my friend!

Live, live! De Courci bids Saint Valori live.

Your rival is your son.

Saint V. (Raising himself on his knee, unsheaths his dagger.)

Off! give me way:

I'll kill him in her arms.

Lord De C. He is your son;

Hear me, thou frantic father! I, De Courci,

I speak to you. Would you destroy your son?

Saint V. Bind up his wounds. Oh! if I've slain
Perdition will not own me! [my son,

Mont. He revives.

Nature awakens reason. Hush! be still.

She stirs. Withhold him from her arms awhile;

Let all be silence, whilst disposing heaven,

That showers this joy, shall fit them to receive it.

Mat. How could you say my husband is alive?

Which of you keeps him from me? Oh! 'tis cruel!

Saint V. Uncase me of my weeds: tear of my cowl!

Now, she'll know me; now I am Saint Valori.

(Throws off his habit, and appears in armour.)

Mat. Stand off! Oh! blessed light of heaven, shine forth!

Visit my aching eyes, ye solar beams,

And let me see my hero! Ha! the cross—

He gleams—he glimmers;—like a mist he rises.

He lives! he lives! I clasp him in my arms.

My lost Saint Valori! my long-lost husband!

(Runs into his arms.)

Saint V. Oh! my heart's joy! do I again embrace thee?

Soul of all honour, constancy, and truth!

Mat. This transport is too quick, it melts my brain;

The sky runs round; the earth is all in motion;

Nay, now it whirls too fast.

Saint V. Ye saints in bliss!

Heroic matrons! ye angelic virtues,

Protect your fair resemblance! Ha! she weeps!

Kind tears, I thank you! Nature's soft relief,

Waters, that from the soul's full fount run o'er,

To joy or grief welcome alike ye flow,

Assist our patience, and assuage our pain.

Mat. Alas! alas! that I should know thee not.

What ravages have time and sorrow made

In heav'n's most perfect work, the fairest temple

Nature e'er rear'd in majesty and grace!

Saint V. What dire calamity have we escap'd!

Now 'tis dispers'd, the mists of doubt are fled,

Truth, like the sun, breaks forth, and all is joy.

My son, my son! oh! throw my arms about him,

And let me cling for ever to his neck.

Mont. Oh! sympathetic energy of nature.

This morn a nameless orphan, now the son

Of living parents: he for virtue fam'd,

For dignity of soul, and matchless courage;

She for affection, constancy renown'd,

Inspir'd with truth, with every grace adorn'd,

A woman's fondness and an angel's faith.

Mat. Heaven bear my praises! echo them, oh!
earth:

Cherubs, that come with healing on your wings,

Waft my thanksgiving back! Bright beam of mercy,

Visit the inmost chambers of my heart;

And where grief rear'd a husband's monument

Fix now his living image: there, as time

Shook not the faithful witness from my soul,

When grief assail'd it, so in joy support me,

And guard my constancy in both extremes.

[Exeunt.]

ACT. I.

SCENE I.—A Chocolate-house.

MIRABLE and FAINALL, rising from cards; BETTY waiting.

Mir. You are a fortunate man, Mr. Fainall.

Fain. Have we done? [you.]

Mir. What you please. I'll play on to entertain

Fain. No, I'll give you your revenge another time, when you are not so indifferent; you are thinking of something else now, and play too negligently; the coldness of a losing gamester lessens the pleasure of the winner. I'd no more play with a man that slighted his ill fortune, than I'd make love to a woman who undervalued the loss of her reputation.

Mir. You have a taste extremely delicate, and are for refining on your pleasures.

Fain. Pr'ythee, why so reserved? Something has put thee out of humour.

Mir. Not at all: I happen to be grave to-day; and you are gay: that's all.

Fain. Confess, Millamant and you quarrelled last night, after I left you: my fair cousin has some humours that would tempt the patience of a stoic. What, some coxcomb came in, and was well received by her, while you were by?

Mir. Witwould and Petulant! and what was worse, her aunt, your wife's mother, my evil genius; or to sum up all in her own name, my old Lady Wishfort came in.

Fain. Oh! there it is, then. She has a lasting passion for you, and with reason. What, then my wife was there?

Mir. Yes, and Mrs. Marwood, and three or four more, whom I never saw before: Seeing me, they all put on their grave faces, whispered one another, then complained aloud of the vapours, and after fell into a profound silence.

Fain. They had a mind to be rid of you.

Mir. For which reason I resolved not to stir. At last the good old lady broke through her painful taciturnity, with an invective against long visits. I would not have understood her, but Millamant joining in the argument, I rose, and with a constrained smile told her, I thought nothing was so easy as to know when a visit began to be troublesome; she reddened, and I withdrew, without expecting her reply.

Fain. You were to blame to resent what she spoke only in compliance with her aunt.

Mir. She is more mistress of herself than to be under the necessity of such resignation.

Fain. What! though half her fortune depends upon her marrying with my lady's approbation?

Mir. I was then in such a humour, that I should have been better pleased if she'd been less discreet.

Fain. Now I remember, I wonder not they were weary of you; last night was one of their cabal nights; they have 'em three times a week, and meet by turns at one another's apartments; where they come together like the coroner's inquest, to sit upon the murdered reputations of the week. You and I are excluded; and it was once proposed that all the male sex should be excepted, but somebody moved, that, to avoid scandal, there might be one man of the community; upon which motion Witwould and Petulant were enrolled members.

Mir. And who may have been the foundress of this sect? My Lady Wishfort, I warrant, who publishes her detestation of mankind; and, full of the vigour of fifty-five, declares for a friend and ratafia.

Fain. The discovery of your sham addresses to her, to conceal your love to her niece, has provoked this separation: had you dissembled better, things might have continued in the state of nature.

Mir. I did as much as man could, with any reasonable conscience; I proceeded to the very last act of flattery with her, and was guilty of a song in her commendation. But for the discovery of this amour, I am indebted to your friend, or your wife's friend, Mrs. Marwood.

Fain. What should provoke her to be your enemy, unless she has made you advances which you have slighted? Women do not easily forgive omissions of that nature.

Mir. She was always civil to me, till of late; I confess I am not one of those coxcombs who are apt to interpret a woman's good manners to her prejudice; and think that she who does not refuse 'em every thing, can refuse 'em nothing.

Fain. You are a gallant man, Mirabell; and though you may have cruelty enough not to answer a lady's advances, you have too much generosity not to be tender of her honour. Yet you speak with an indifference which seems to be affected, and confesses you are conscious of a negligence.

Mir. You pursue the argument with a distrust that seems to be unaffected, and confesses you are conscious of a concern for which the lady is more indebted to you, than is your wife.

Fain. Fie, fie! friend, if you grow censorious, I must leave you. I'll look upon the gamesters in

Mir. Who are they? [the next room.]

Fain. Petulant and Witwould. Bring me some chocolate. [Exit.]

Mir. Betty, what says your clock?

Betty. Turned of the last canonical hour, sir.

Mir. How pertinently the jade answers me! (Aside.) Ha! almost one o'clock! (Looking on his watch.) Oh! y'are come.—[Enter a Footman.]—Well; is the grand affair over? You have been something tedious.

Foot. Sir, there's such coupling at Pancras, that they stand behind one another, as 'twere in a country dance. Our's was the last couple to lead up; and no hopes appearing of despatch, besides, the parson growing hoarse, we were afraid his lungs would have failed before it came to our turn; so we drove round to Duke's-place; and there they were rivetted in a trice.

Mir. So, so; you are sure they are married?

Foot. Incontestibly, sir: I am witness.

Mir. Have you the certificate?

Foot. Here it is, sir.

Mir. Has the tailor brought Waitwell's clothes home, and the new liveries?

Foot. Yes, sir.

Mir. That's well. Do you go home again, d'ye hear? bid Waitwell shake his ears, and dame Partlet rustle up her feathers, and meet me at one o'clock by Rosamond's-pond, that I may see her before she returns to her lady; and as you tender your ears, be secret. [Exit Footman.]

Enter FAINALL.

Fain. Joy of your success, Mirabell; you look pleased.

Mir. Ay; I have been engaged in a matter of some sort of mirth, which is not yet ripe for discovery. I am glad this is not a cabal-night. I wonder, Fainall, that you, who are married, and of consequence should be discreet, will suffer your wife to be of such a party.

Fain. Faith, I am not jealous. Besides, most who are engaged, are women and relations; and for the men, they are of a kind too contemptible to give scandal.

Mir. I am of another opinion. The greater the coxcomb, always the more the scandal: for a woman who is not a fool, can have but one reason for associating with a man that is one.

Fain. Are you jealous as often as you see Witwould entertained by Millamant? [person.]

Mir. Of her understanding I am, if not of her

Fain. You do her wrong; for, to give her her due, she has wit.

Mir. She has beauty enough to make any man think so; and complaisance enough not to contradict him who shall tell her so.

Fain. For a passionate lover, methinks you are a man somewhat too discerning in the failings of your mistress.

Mir. And for a discerning man, somewhat too passionate a lover; for I like her with all her faults; nay, like her for her faults. Her follies are so natural, or so artful, that they become her; and those affectations, which in another woman would be odious, serve but to make her more agreeable. I'll tell thee, Fainall, she once used me with that insolence, that in revenge I took her to pieces; sifted her, and separated her failings; I studied 'em and got 'em by rote. The catalogue was so large, that I was not without hopes, one day or other, to hate her heartily: to which end I so used myself to think of 'em, that at length, contrary to my design and expectation, they gave me every hour less disturbance; till in a few days, it became habitual to me, to remember them without being displeased. They are now grown as familiar to me as my own frailties; and in all probability, in a little time longer, I shall like 'em as well.

Fain. Marry her, marry her; be half as well acquainted with her charms, as you are with her defects, and my life on't, you are your own man again.

Mir. Say you so?

Fain. I, I, I have experience. I have a wife, and so forth. Enter Messenger.

Mess. Is one 'squire Witwould here?

Betty. Yes; what's your business?

Mess. I have a letter for him, from his brother, Sir Wilful, which I am charged to deliver into his own hands.

Betty. He's in the next room, friend. That way. [Exit Messenger.]

Mir. What, is the chief of that noble family in town, Sir Wilful Witwould?

Fain. He is expected to day. Do you know him?

Mir. I have seen him. He promises to be an extraordinary person. I think you have the honour to be related to him.

Fain. Yes; he is half-brother to this Witwould by a former wife, who was sister to my Lady Wishfort, my wife's mother. If you marry Millamant, you must call cousins too. [quaintance.]

Mir. I would rather be his relation than his acquaintance.

Fain. He comes to town in order to equip himself for travel. [above forty.]

Mir. For travel! Why, the man that I mean is Fain. No matter for that; 'tis for the honour of England, that all Europe should know we have blockheads of all ages.

Mir. I wonder there is not an act of parliament to save the credit of the nation, and prohibit the exportation of fools.

Fain. By no means, 'tis better as 'tis; 'tis better to trade with a little loss, than to be quite eaten up with being overstocked.

Mir. Pray are the follies of this knight-errant and those of the 'squire, his brother, anything related?

Fain. Not at all; Witwould grows by the knight like a medlar grafted on a crab. One will melt in your mouth, and t'other set your teeth on edge; one is all pulp, and the other all core.

Mir. So, one will be rotten before he be ripe, and the other will be rotten without being ripe at all.

Fain. Sir Wilful is an odd mixture of bashfulness and obstinacy. But when he's drunk, he's as loving as the monster in the Tempest; and much after the same manner. To give t'other his due, he has something of good nature, and does not always want wit.

Mir. Not always; but as often as his memory fails him, and his common-place comparisons. He is a fool with a good memory, and some few scraps of other folks' wit. He is one whose conversation can never be approved, yet it is now and then to be endured. He has indeed one good quality; he is not exceptious; for he so passionately affects the reputation of understanding raillery, that he will construe an affront into a jest; and call downright rudeness and ill language, satire and fire.

Fain. If you have a mind to finish his picture, you have an opportunity to do it at full length. Behold the original.—[Enter WITWOULD.]

Wit. Afford me your compassion, my dears; pity me, Fainall; Mirabell, pity me.

Mir. I do, from my soul.

Fain. Why, what's the matter?

Wit. No letters for me, Betty?

Betty. Did not a messenger bring you one but

Wit. Ay, but no other? [now sir?

Betty. No, sir,

Wit. That's hard, that's very hard! a messenger, a mule, a beast of burden; he has brought me a letter from the fool my brother, as heavy as a panegyric in a funeral sermon, or a copy of commendatory verses from one poet to another. And what's worse, 'tis as sure a forerunner of the author, as an epistle dedicatory.

Mir. A fool, and your brother, Witwould!

Wit. Ay, ay, my half-brother, My half-brother he is, no nearer upon honour.

Mir. Then 'tis possible he may be but half a fool.

Wit. Good, good, Mirabell le drole! Good, good; hang him, don't let's talk of him. Fainall, how does your lady? 'Gad I say anything in the world to get this fellow out of my head. I beg pardon that I should ask a man of pleasure, and the town, a question at once so foreign and domestic. But I talk like an old maid at a marriage; I don't know what I say: but she's the best woman in the world.

Fain. 'Tis well you don't know what you say, or else your commendation would go near to make me either vain or jealous.

Wit. No man in town lives well with a wife but Fainall. Your judgment, Mirabell?

Mir. You had better step and ask his wife, if you would be credibly informed.

Wit. Mirabell.

Mir. Ay.

Wit. My dear, I ask ten thousand pardons. 'Gad! I have forgotton what I was going to say to

Mir. I thank you heartily, heartily. [you.

Wit. No, but pr'ythee, excuse me, my memory is such a memory.

Mir. Have a care of such apologies, Witwould; for I never knew a fool but he affected to complain, either of the spleen or his memory.

Fain. What have you done with Petulant?

Wit. He's reckoning his money; my money it was. I have had no luck to-day.

Fain. You may allow him to win of you at play; for you are sure to be too hard for him at repartee. Since you monopolize the wit that is between you, the fortune must be his of course.

Mir. I don't find that Petulant confesses the superiority of wit to be your talent, Witwould.

Wit. Come, come, you are malicious now, and would breed debates. Petulant's my friend, and a very pretty fellow, and a very honest fellow, and has a smattering—'faith and troth! a pretty deal of an odd sort of a small wit; nay, I do him justice, I'm his friend, I won't wrong him. And if he had any judgment in the world, he would not be altogether contemptible. Come, come, don't detract from the merits of my friend. [bred.

Fain. You don't take your friend to be over-nicely

Wit. No, no, hang him, the rogue has no manners at all, that I must own; no more breeding than a humbailly, that I grant you: 'tis pity; the fellow has fire and life.

Mir. What, courage?

Wit. Hum! 'faith! I don't know as to that; I can't say as to that. Yes, 'faith! in controversy, he'll contradict anybody.

Mir. Though 'twere a man who he feared, or a woman who he loved.

Wit. Well, well, he does not always think before he speaks; we have all our failings; you are too hard upon him, you are, 'faith! Let me excuse him; I can defend most of his faults, except one or two; one he has, that's the truth on't; if he were my brother, I could not acquit him; that indeed I could wish were otherwise.

Mir. Ay, marry, what's that, Witwould?

Wit. Oh, pardon me; expose the infirmities of my friend! no, my dear, excuse me there.

Fain. What, I warrant he's insincere, or 'tis some such trifle.

Wit. No, no; what if he be? 'tis no matter for that, his wit will excuse that; a wit should no more be sincere, than a woman constant; one argues a decay of parts, as t'other of beauty.

Mir. May be you think him too positive?

Wit. No, no, his being positive is an incentive to argument, and keeps up conversation.

Fain. Too illiterate?

Wit. That! that's his happiness, his want of learning gives him the more opportunity to shew

Mir. He wants words? [his natural parts.

Wit. Ay, but I like him for that now; for his want of words gives me the pleasure very often to Fain. He's impudent? [explain his meaning.

Wit. No, that's not it.

Mir. What, he speaks unseasonable truths sometimes, because he has not wit enough to invent an evasion?

Wit. Truth! ha, ha, ha! No, no; since you will have it, I mean, he never speaks truth at all, that's all. He will lie like a chambermaid, or a woman of quality's porter. Now that is a fault.

Enter Coachman.

Coach. Is master Petulant here, mistress?

Betty. Yes. [speak with him.

Coach. Three gentlewoman in a coach would Fain. Oh, brave Petulant! three!

Betty. I'll tell him.

Coach. You must bring two dishes of chocolate, and a glass of cinnamon-water. [Exit with Betty.

Wit. That should be for two fasting bona robas and a procuress troubled with wind. Now you may know what the three are. [quaintance.

Mir. You are very free with your friend's ac-

Wit. Ay, ay, friendship without freedom is as dull as love without enjoyment, or wine without toasting; but, to tell you a secret, these are trulls whom he allows coach-hire, and something more, by the week, to call on him once a day at public

Mir. How! [places.

Wit. You shall see he won't go to 'em, because there's no more company here to take notice of him. Why, this is nothing to what he used to do; before he found out this way, I have known him call for himself.

Fain. Call for himself! What dost thou mean?

Wit. Mean, why he would slip you out of this chocolate-house, just when you had been talking to him—as soon as your back was turned, whip he was gone; then trip to his lodging, clap on a hood and scarf, and a mask, slap into a hackney-coach, and drive hither to the door again in a trice; where he would send in for himself, that is, I mean, call for himself, wait for himself, nay, and what's more, not finding himself, sometimes leave a letter for himself.

Mir. I confess this is something extraordinary; I believe he waits for himself now, he is so long a coming. Oh! I ask his pardon.

Enter PETULANT and BETTY.

Betty. Sir, the coach stays.

Pet. Well, well; I come. 'Sbud! a man had as good be a professed midwife, as a professed gallant, at this rate; to be knocked up, and raised at all hours, and in all places. Deuce on 'em, I won't come. D'ye hear? tell 'em I won't come. Let 'em snivel and cry their hearts out. [Exit Betty.

Fain. You are very cruel, Petulant.

Pet. All's one, let it pass; I have a humour to be cruel. [you use at this rate.

Mir. I hope they are not persons of condition that

Pet. Condition! condition's a dried fig, if I am not in humour. By this hand, if they were your—a—a—your what-d'ye-call-'ems themselves, they must wait or rub off, if I am not in the vein.

Mir. What-d'ye-call-'ems! what are they, Witwould?

Wit. Empresses, my dear. By your what-d'ye-call-'ems he means sultanaqueens.

Pet. Ay, Roxalanas.

Mir. Cry your mercy.

Fain. Witwould says they are—

Pet. What does he say th'are?

Wit. I? fine ladies, I say.

Pet. Pass on, Witwould. Harkye, by this light, his relations; two co-heiresses, his cousins, and an old aunt, who loves intriguing better than a conventicle.

Wit. Ha, ha, ha! I had a mind to see how the rogue would come off, ha, ha, ha! 'Gad! I can't be angry with him, if he had said they were my

Mir. No! [mother and my sisters.

Wit. No; the rogue's wit and readiness of invention charm me, dear Petulant.—[Enter BETTY.]

Betty. They are gone, sir, in great anger.

Pet. Enough, let 'em trundle. Anger helps complexions, saves paint.

Fain. This continence is all dissembled; this is in order to have something to brag of the next time he makes court to Millamant, and swear he has abandoned the whole sex for her sake.

Mir. Have you not left off your impudent pretensions there yet? I shall cut your throat, some time or other, Petulant, about that business.

Pet. Ay, ay, let that pass; there are other

Mir. Meaning mine, sir? [throats to be cut.

Pet. Not I, I mean nobody; I know nothing; but there are uncles and nephews in the world, and they may be rivals. What then? all's one for that.

Mir. Now, harkye, Petulant, come hither; explain, or I shall call your interpreter.

Pet. Explain! I know nothing. Why, you have an uncle, have you not, lately come to town, and lodges by my Lady Wishfort's.

Mir. True.

Pet. Why, that's enough; you and he are not friends: and if he should marry and have a child, you may be disinherited, eh! [truth?

Mir. Where hast thou stumbled upon all this

Pet. All's one for that; why, then, say I know something.

Mir. Come, thou art an honest fellow, Petulant, and shalt make love to my mistress, thou shalt, 'faith! What hast thou heard of my uncle?

Pet. I! nothing; I! If throats are to be cut, let swords clash; snug's the word, I shrug and am silent.

Mir. Oh! raillery, raillery. Come, I know thou art in the women's secrets; what, you're a cabalist; I know you staid at Millamant's last night, after I went. Was there any mention made of my uncle or me? tell me. If thou hadst but good-nature equal to thy wit, Petulant, Tony Witwould, who is now thy competitor in fame, would shew as dim by thee as a dead whiting's eye by a pearl of orient; he would no more be seen by thee, than Mercury is by the sun. Come, I'm sure thou wo't tell me.

Pet. If I do, will you grant me common sense, then, for the future?

Mir. 'Faith! I'll do what I can for thee, and I'll pray that it may be granted thee in the meantime.

Pet. Well, harkye! (They talk apart.)

Fain. Petulant, and you both, will find Mirabell as warm a rival as a lover.

Wit. Psha, psha! that she laughs at Petulant is plain. And for my part, but that it is almost a fashion to admire her, I should—harkye! to tell you a secret, but let it go no farther—between friends, I shall never break my heart for her.

Fain. How!

[certain woman.

Wit. She's handsome; but she's a sort of an un-

Fain. I thought you had died for her.

Wit. Humph! no.

Fain. She has wit.

Wit. 'Tis what she will hardly allow anybody else. Now, I should hate that, if she were as handsome as Cleopatra. Mirabell is not so sure of her

Fain. Why do you think so? [as he thinks.

Wit. We staid pretty late there last night, and heard something of an uncle to Mirabell, who is lately come to town, and is between him and the best part of his estate. Whether he has seen Mrs. Millamant or not, I can't say; but there were items of such a treaty being in embryo; and if it should come to life, poor Mirabell would be in some sort unfortunately fobbed, i'faith!

Fain. 'Tis impossible Millamant should hearken

Wit. 'Faith! my dear, I can't tell; she's a woman, and a kind of a humorist. [lect last night?

Mir. And this is the sum of what you could col-

Pet. The quintessence. Maybe Witwould knows more, he staid longer; besides, they never mind him; they say anything before him.

Mir. I thought you had been the greatest favourite.

Pet. Ay, tête-à-tête; but not in public, because I

Mir. You do? [make remarks.

Pet. Ay, ay; I'm malicious, man. Now he's soft, you know; they are not in awe of him: the fellow's well-bred; he's what you call a—what-d'ye-call-em? a fine gentleman: but he's silly withal.

Mir. I thank you, I know as much as my curiosity requires. Fainall, are you for the Mall?

Fain. Ay, I'll take a turn before dinner.

Wit. Ay, we'll all walk in the park; the ladies talk of being there.

Mir. I thought you were obliged to watch for your brother, Sir Wilful's arrival.

Wit. No, no; he comes to his aunt's, my Lady Wishfort; plague on him! I shall be troubled with him, too; what shall I do with the fool?

Pet. Beg him for his estate, that I may beg you afterwards; and so have but one trouble.

Wit. Oh! rare Petulant; thou art as quick as fire in a frosty morning; thou shalt to the Mall with us, and we'll be very severe.

Pet. Enough; I'm in a humour to be severe.

Mir. Are you? Pray, then, walk by yourselves. Let not us be accessory to your putting the ladies out of countenance with your senseless ribaldry, which you roar aloud as often as they pass by you; and when you have made a handsome woman blush, then you think you have been severe.

Pet. What, what? then let 'em either shew their innocence by not understanding what they hear, or else shew their discretion by not hearing what they would not be thought to understand.

Mir. But hast not thou, then, sense enough to know that thou oughtst to be most ashamed thyself, when thou hast put another out of countenance?

Pet. Not I, by this hand; I always take blushing either for a sign of guilt or ill-breeding.

Mir. I confess you ought to think so. You are in the right, that you may plead the error of your judgment in defence of your practice.

Where modesty's ill-manners, 'tis but fit

That impudence and malice pass for wit. [Exeunt.

ACT II.—SCENE I.—St. James's Park.

Enter MRS. FAINALL and MRS. MARWOOD.

Mrs. F. Ay, ay, dear Marwood, if we will be happy, we must find the means in ourselves, and among ourselves. Men are ever in extremes; either doating or averse. While they are lovers, if they have fire and sense, their jealousies are insupportable: and when they cease to love, (we ought to think, at least,) they loathe: they look upon us with horror and distate; they meet us like the ghosts of what we were, and as from such, fly from us.

Mrs. Mar. True, 'tis an unhappy circumstance of life, that love should ever die before us; and that the man so often should outlive the lover. But say what you will, 'tis better to be left than never to have been loved. To pass our youth in dull indifference, to refuse the sweets of life because they once must leave us, is as preposterous as to wish to have been born old, because we one day must be old. For my part, my youth may wear and waste, but it shall never rust in my possession.

Mrs. F. Then it seems you dissemble an aversion to mankind, only in compliance to my mother's humour.

Mrs. Mar. Certainly. To be free; I have no taste of those insipid, dry discourses, with which our sex of force must entertain themselves apart from men. We may affect endearments to each other, profess eternal friendships, and seem to dote like lovers; but 'tis not in our natures long to persevere. Love will resume his empire in our breasts, and every heart, or soon or late, receive and readmit him as its lawful tyrant.

Mrs. F. Bless me, how have I been deceived! Why, you're a professed libertine.

Mrs. Mar. You see my friendship by my freedom. Come, be as sincere, acknowledge that your

Mrs. F. Never. [sentiments agree with mine.

Mrs. Mar. You hate mankind?

Mrs. F. Heartily, inveterately.

Mrs. Mar. Your husband? [meritoriously.

Mrs. F. Most transcendently; ay, though I say it,

Mrs. Mar. Give me your hand upon it.

Mrs. F. There. [been to try you.

Mrs. Mar. I join with you; what I have said has

Mrs. F. Is it possible? dost thou hate those vipers, men?

Mrs. Mar. I have done hating 'em, and am now come to despise 'em; the next thing I have to do, is eternally to forget 'em. [Penthesilea.

Mrs. F. There spoke the spirit of an Amazon, a

Mrs. Mar. And yet, I am thinking sometimes to

Mrs. F. How? [carry my aversion farther.

Mrs. Mar. By marrying; if I could but find one that loved me very well, and would be thoroughly sensible of ill usage, I think I should do myself the violence of undergoing the ceremony.

Mrs. F. You would not dishonour him?

Mrs. Mar. No: but I'd make him believe I did, and that's as bad.

Mrs. F. Why had you not as good do it?

Mrs. Mar. Oh! if he should ever discover it, he would then know the worst, and be out of his pain; but I would have him ever to continue upon the rack of fear and jealousy. [ried to Mirabell!

Mrs. F. Ingenious mischief! would thou wert mar-

Mrs. Mar. Would I were!

Mrs. F. You change colour.

Mrs. Mar. Because I hate him.

Mrs. F. So do I; but I can hear him named. But what reason have you to hate him in particular?

Mrs. Mar. I never loved him; he is, and always was, insufferably proud.

Mrs. F. By the reason you give for your aversion, one would think it dissembled; for you have laid a fault to his charge, of which his enemies must acquit him.

Mrs. Mar. Oh! then it seems you are one of his favourable enemies. Methinks you look a little pale, and now you flush again. [sudden.

Mrs. F. Do I? I think I am a little sick o' the

Mrs. Mar. What ails you?

Mrs. F. My husband. Don't you see him? He turned short upon me unawares, and has almost overcome me.

Enter FAINALL and MIRABELL.

Mrs. Mar. Ha, ha, ha! He comes opportunely for you. [with him.

Mrs. F. For you, for he has brought Mirabell

Fain. My dear.

Mrs. F. My soul.

Fain. You don't look well to-day, child.

Mrs. F. D'ye think so?

Mir. He's the only man that does, madam.

Mrs. F. The only man that would tell me so, at least; and the only man from whom I could bear it without mortification.

Fain. Oh! my dear, I am satisfied of your tenderness; I know you cannot resent anything from me; especially what is an effect of my concern.

Mrs. F. Mr. Mirabell, my mother interrupted you in a pleasant relation last night; I could fain hear it out.

Mir. The persons concerned in that affair have yet a tolerable reputation. I am afraid Mr. Fainall will be censorious.

Mrs. F. He has a humour more prevailing than his curiosity, and will willingly dispense with the hearing of one scandalous story, to avoid giving an occasion to make another, by being seen to walk with his wife. This way, Mr. Mirabell, and I dare promise you will oblige us both. [Exit with Mir.

Fain. Excellent creature! well, sure, if I should live to be rid of my wife, I should be a miserable

Mrs. Mar. Ay? [man.

Fain. For having only that one hope, the accomplishment of it, of consequence, must put an end to all my hopes; and what a wretch is he who must survive his hopes! nothing remains, when that day comes, but to sit down and weep like Alexander, when he wanted other worlds to conquer.

Mrs. Mar. Will you not follow them?

Fain. No; I think not.

Mrs. Mar. Pray, let us; I have a reason.

Fain. You are not jealous?

Mrs. Mar. Of whom?

Fain. Of Mirabell.

Mrs. Mar. If I am, is it inconsistent with my love to you, that I am tender of your honour?

Fain. You would intimate, then, as if there were a particular understanding between my wife and him.

Mrs. Mar. I think she does not hate him to that degree she would be thought.

Fain. But he, I fear, is too insensible.

Mrs. Mar. It may be you are deceived. [hend it.

Fain. It may be so. I do not now begin to appre-

Mrs. Mar. What? [you are false.

Fain. That I have been deceived, madam, and

Mrs. Mar. That I am false! What mean you?

Fain. To let you know I see through all your little arts. Come, you both love him, and both have equally dissembled your aversion. Your mutual jealousies of one another have made you clash till you have both struck fire. I have seen the warm confession, reddening on your cheeks, and sparkling from your eyes,

Mrs. Mar. You do me wrong.

Fain. I do not. 'Twas for my ease to oversee and wilfully neglect the gross advances made him by my wife; that, by permitting her to be engaged, I might continue unsuspected in my pleasures, and take you oftener to my arms in full security. But could you think, because the nodding husband would not wake, that e'er the watchful lover slept?

Mrs. Mar. And wherewithal can you reproach me? [love of Mirabell.

Fain. With infidelity, with loving another, with Mrs. Mar. 'Tis false. I challenge you to shew an instance that can confirm your groundless accusation. I hate him.

Fain. And wherefore do you hate him? He is insensible, and your resentment follows his neglect. An instance! The injuries you have done him are a proof: your interposing in his love. What cause had you to make discoveries of his pretended passion? to undeceive the credulous aunt, and be the officious obstacle of his match with Millamant?

Mrs. Mar. My obligations to my lady urged me: I had professed a friendship to her; and could not see her easy nature so abused by that dissembler.

Fain. What, was it conscience, then? Professed a friendship! Oh! the pious friendships of the female sex!

Mrs. Mar. More tender, more sincere, and more enduring, than all the vain and empty vows of men, whether professing love to us, or mutual faith to one another.

Fain. Ha, ha, ha! you are my wife's friend, too.

Mrs. Mar. Shame and ingratitude! Do you reproach me? You, you upbraid me! Have I been false to her through strict fidelity to you, and sacrificed my friendship to keep my love inviolate? and have you the baseness to charge me with the guilt, unmindful of the merit? To you it should be meritorious, that I have been vicious; and do you reflect that guilt upon me, which should lie buried in your own bosom?

Fain. You misinterpret my reproof. I meant but to remind you of the slight account you once could make of strictest ties, when set in competition with your love to me.

Mrs. Mar. 'Tis false; you urged it with deliberate malice; 'twas spoken in scorn, and I never will forgive it.

Fain. Your guilt, not your resentment, begets your rage. If yet you loved, you could forgive a jealousy: but you are stung to find you are discovered.

Mrs. Mar. It shall be all discovered. You, too, shall be discovered; be sure you shall. I can but be exposed; if I do it myself, I shall prevent your Fain. Why, what will you do? [baseness.

Mrs. Mar. Disclose it to your wife; own what

Fain. Frenzy! [has passed between us.

Mrs. Mar. By all my wrongs I'll do't. I'll publish to the world the injuries you have done me, both in my fame and fortune: with both I trusted you, you bankrupt in honour, as indigent of wealth.

Fain. Your fame I have preserved. Your fortune has been bestowed as the prodigality of your love would have it, in pleasures which we both have shared. Yet, had not you been false, I had ere this repaid it. 'Tis true, had you permitted Mirabell with Millamant to have stolen their marriage, my lady had been incensed beyond all means of reconciliation: Millamant had forfeited the moiety of her fortune, which then would have descended to my wife. And wherefore did I marry, but to make lawful prize of a rich widow's wealth, and squander it on love and you.

Mrs. Mar. Deceit and frivolous pretence.

Fain. Death! am I not married? what's pretence? Am I not imprisoned, fettered? have I not a wife? nay, a wife that was a widow, a young widow, a handsome widow; and would be again a widow, but that I have a heart of proof, and something of a constitution to bustle through the ways of wedlock and this world. Will you be reconciled to truth and me?

Mrs. Mar. Impossible. Truth and you are inconsistent. I hate you, and shall for ever.

Fain. You know I love you. [is not yet—

Mrs. Mar. Poor dissembling! Oh! that—Well, it

Fain. What? what is not yet? what is not yet? is it not yet too late? [comfort.

Mrs. Mar. No, it is not yet too late; I have that Fain. It is, to love another.

Mrs. Mar. But not to loathe, detest, abhor mankind, myself, and the whole treacherous world.

Fain. Nay, this is extravagance. Come, I ask your pardon. No tears: I was to blame—I could not love you and be easy in my doubts. Pray, forbear: I believe you; I'm convinced I've done you wrong; and any way, every way, will make amends; I'll hate my wife yet more; d— her! I'll part with her, rob her of all she's worth, and we'll retire somewhere, anywhere, to another world. I'll marry thee: be pacified—'Sdeath! they come; hide your face, your tears—You have a mask, wear it a moment. This way, this way; be persuaded. [Exeunt.

Enter MIRABELL and MRS. FAINALL.

Mrs. F. They are here yet.

Mir. They are turning into the other walk.

Mrs. F. While I only hated my husband, I could bear to see him; but since I have despised him, he's too offensive.

Mir. Oh! you should hate with prudence.

Mrs. F. Yes, for I have loved with indiscretion.

Mir. You should have just so much disgust for your husband, as may be sufficient to make you relish your lover.

Mrs. F. You have been the cause that I have loved without bounds; and would you set limits to that aversion, of which you have been the occasion? Why did you make me marry this man?

Mir. Why do we daily commit disagreeable and dangerous actions? To save that idol reputation. If the familiarities of our loves had produced that consequence, of which you were apprehensive, where could you have fixed a father's name with credit, but on a husband? I knew Fainall to be a man lavish of his morals, an interested and professing friend, a false and a designing lover; yet one whose wit and outward fair behaviour have gained a reputation with the town, enough to make that woman stand excused who has suffered herself to be won by his addresses. A better man ought not to have been sacrificed to the occasion; a worse had not answered to the purpose. When you are weary of him, you know your remedy. [with you, Mirabell.

Mrs. F. I ought to stand in some degree of credit

Mir. In justice to you, I have made you privy to my whole design, and put it in your power to ruin or advance my fortune. [your pretended uncle?

Mrs. F. Who have you instructed to represent

Mir. Waitwell, my servant.

Mrs. F. He is an humble servant to Foible, my mother's woman, and may win her to your interest.

Mir. Care is taken for that: she is won and worn by this time. They were married this morning.

Mrs. F. Who?

Mir. Waitwell and Foible. I would not tempt my servant to betray me by trusting him too far. If your mother, in hopes to ruin me, should consent to marry my pretended uncle, he might, like Mosca in the Fox, stand upon terms; so I made him sure before-hand.

Mrs. F. So, if my poor mother be caught in a contract, you will discover the imposture betimes; and release her, by producing a certificate of her gallant's former marriage.

Mir. Yes, upon condition that she consent to my marriage with her niece, and surrender the moiety of her fortune in her possession.

Mrs. F. She talked last night of endeavouring at a match between Millamant and your uncle.

Mir. That was by Foible's direction, and my instruction, that she might seem to carry it more privately.

Mrs. F. Well, I have an opinion of your success; for I believe my lady will do anything to get a husband; and when she has this which you have provided for her, I suppose she will submit to anything to get rid of him.

Mir. Yes, I think the good lady would marry anything that resembled a man, though 'twere no more than what a butler could pinch out of a napkin.

Mrs. F. Female frailty! we must all come to it, if we live to be old, and feel the craving of a false appetite when the true is decayed.

Mir. An old woman's appetite is depraved like that of a girl—'tis the green sickness of a second childhood; and like the faint offer of a latter spring, serves but to usher in the fall, and withers in an

Mrs. F. Here's your mistress. [affected bloom.
Enter MRS. MILLAMANT, WITWOULD, and MINCING.

Mir. Here she comes, i'faith! full sail, with her fan spread and streamers out, and a shoal of fools for tenders—eh! no; I cry her mercy.

Mrs. F. I see but one poor empty sculler; and he tows her woman after him.

Mir. You seem to be unattended, madam. You used to have the beau monde throng after you, and a flock of gay, fine perukes hovering round you.

Wit. Like moths about a candle. I had like to have lost my comparison for want of breath.

Mrs. Mill. Oh! I have denied myself airs to-day. I have walked as fast through the crowd—

Wit. As a favourite just disgraced; and with as few followers.

Mrs. Mill. Dear Mr. Witwould, truce with your similitudes; for I am as sick of 'em—

Wit. As a physician of a good air. I cannot help it, madam, though 'tis against myself.

Mrs. Mill. Yet again! Mincing, stand between me and his wit.

Wit. Do, Mrs. Mincing, like a screen before a great fire. I confess, I do blaze to-day, I am too bright.

Mrs. F. But, Millamant, why were you so long?

Mrs. M. Long! Lud! have I not made violent haste? I have asked every living thing I met for you; I have inquired after you, as after a new fashion.

Wit. Madam, truce with your similitudes: no, you met her husband, and did not ask him for her.

Mir. By your leave, Witwould, that were like inquiring after an old fashion, to ask a husband for his wife. [it.

Wit. Hum! a hit, a hit, a palpable hit, I confess

Mir. You were dressed before I came abroad.

Mrs. Mill. Ay, that's true. Oh! but then I had—Mincing, what had I? why was I so long?

Min. Oh! mem, your la'ship staid to peruse a packet of letters.

Mrs. Mill. Oh! ay, letters: I had letters; I am persecuted with letters; I hate letters; nobody knows how to write letters; and yet one has 'em, one does not know why—they serve one to pin up one's hair.

Wit. Is that the way? Pray, madam, do you pin up your hair with all your letters? I find I must keep copies.

Mrs. Mill. Only with those in verse, Mr. Witwould. I never pin up my hair with prose. I think I tried once, Mincing.

Min. Oh! mem, I shall never forget it.

Mrs. Mill. Ay, poor Mincing tiffed and tiffed all the morning.

Min. Till I had the cramp in my fingers, I'll vow, mem, and all to no purpose. But when your la'ship pins it up with poetry, it sits so pleasant the next day as anything, and is so pure and so crips!

Wit. Indeed, so crips?

Min. You're such a critic, Mr. Witwould.

Mrs. Mill. Mirabell, did you take exceptions last night?—Oh! ay, and went away. Now I think on't I'm angry—No, now I think on't, I'm pleased; for I believe I gave you some pain.

Mir. Does that please you?

Mrs. Mill. Infinitely; I love to give pain.

Mir. You would affect a cruelty which is not in your nature; your true vanity is in the power of pleasing.

Mrs. Mill. Oh! I ask your pardon for that. One's cruelty is one's power, and when one parts with one's cruelty, one parts with one's power; and when one has parted with that, I fancy one's old and ugly.

Mir. Ay, ay, suffer your cruelty to ruin the object of your power, to destroy your lover; and then how vain, how lost a thing you'll be! The ugly and old, whom the looking-glass mortifies, yet after commendation, can be flattered by it, and discover beauties in it; for that reflects our praises, rather than your face.

Mrs. Mill. Oh! the vanity of these men! Fainall, d'ye hear him? If they did not commend us, we were not handsome! Now, you must know they could not commend one, if one was not handsome. Beauty the lover's gift! Dear me, what is a lover, that it can give? Why, one makes lovers as fast as one pleases, and they live as long as one pleases, and they die as soon as one pleases; and then, if one pleases, one makes more.

Wit. Very pretty. Why, you make no more of making of lovers, madam, than of making so many card-matches.

Mrs. Mill. One no more owes one's beauty to a lover, than one's wit to an echo: they can but reflect what we look and say; vain, empty things, if we are silent or unseen, and want a being.

Mir. Yet, to those two vain, empty things, you owe two of the greatest pleasures of your life.

Mrs. Mill. How so?

Mir. To your lover you owe the pleasure of hearing yourselves praised; and to an echo the pleasure of hearing yourselves talk.

Wit. But I know a lady that loves talking so incessantly, she won't give an echo fair play; she has that everlasting rotation of tongue, that an echo must wait till she dies, before it can catch her last words.

Mrs. Mill. Oh! fiction. Fainall, let us leave these

Mir. Draw off Witwould. (To Mrs. F.) [men.

Mrs. F. Immediately. I have a word or two for Mr. Witwould. [Exit with Witwould.

Mir. I would beg a little private audience, too. You had the tyranny to deny me last night; though you knew I came to impart a secret to you that concerned my love.

Mrs. Mill. You saw I was engaged.

Mir. Unkind. You had the leisure to entertain a herd of fools; things who visit you from their excessive idleness; bestowing on your easiness that time, which is the incumbrance of their lives. How can you find delight in such society? It is impossible they should admire you, they are not capable; or if they were, it should be to you a mortification; for, sure, to please a fool is some degree of folly.

Mrs. Mill. I please myself: besides, sometimes to converse with fools is for my health.

Mir. Your health! Is there a worse disease than the conversation of fools? [it, next to asafetida.

Mrs. Mill. Yes, the vapours; fools are physic for

Mir. You are not in a course of fools?

Mrs. Mill. Mirabell, if you persist in this offensive freedom, you'll displease me. I think I must resolve, after all, not to have you. We sha'n't agree.

Mir. Not in our physic, it may be.

Mrs. Mill. And yet, our distemper, in all likelihood, will be the same; for we shall be sick of one another. I sha'n't endure to be reprimanded, nor instructed; 'tis so dull to act always by advice, and so tedious to be told of one's faults, I can't bear it. Well, I won't have you, Mirabell—I'm resolved—I think—You may go. Ha, ha, ha! What would you give that you could help loving me?

Mir. I would give something that you did not know I could not help it. [what do you say to me?

Mrs. Mill. Come, don't look grave, then. Well,

Mir. I say that a man may as soon make a friend by his wit, or a fortune by his honesty, as win a woman with plain-dealing and sincerity.

Mrs. Mill. Sententious Mirabell! Pr'ythee, don't look with that violent and inflexible wise face, like Solomon at the dividing of the child, in an old tapestry hanging.

Mir. You are merry, madam; but I would persuade you for a moment to be serious.

Mrs. Mill. What, with that face? No, if you keep your countenance 'tis impossible I should hold mine. Well, after all, there is something very moving in a love-sick face. Ha, ha, ha! Well, I won't laugh; don't be peevish. Heigho! Now I'll be melancholy; as melancholy as a watch-light. Well, Mirabell, if ever you will win me, woo me now. Nay, if you are so tedious, fare you well: I see they are walking away.

Mir. Can you not find, in the variety of your disposition, one moment—

Mrs. Mill. To hear you tell me Foible's married, and your plot likely to speed? No.

Mir. But how came you to know it?

Mrs. Mill. Without the help of conjuration, you can't imagine; unless she should tell me herself. Which of the two it may have been, I will leave you to consider; and when you have done thinking of that, think of me. [Exit with Mincing.

Mir. I have something more—Gone! Think of you! to think of a whirlwind, though 'twere in a whirlwind, were a case of more steady contemplation; a very tranquillity of mind and mansion. A fellow that lives in a windmill, has not a more whimsical dwelling than the heart of a man that is lodged in a woman. There is no point of the compass to which they cannot turn, and by which they are not turned; and by one as well as another; for motion, not method, is their occupation. To know this, and yet continue to be in love, is to be made wise from the dictates of reason, and yet persevere to play the fool by the force of instinct. Oh! here comes my pair of turtles. What, billing so sweetly! is not Valentine's day over with you yet?—[Enter WAITWELL and FOIBLE.]—Sirrah, Waitwell, why, sure, you think you were married for your own recreation, and not for my convenience.

Wait. Your pardon, sir. With submission, we have, indeed, been billing; but still with an eye to business, sir. I have instructed her as well as I could. If she can take your directions as readily as my instructions, sir, your affairs are in a prosperous way.

Mir. Give you joy, Mrs. Foible.

Foi. Oh la! sir, I'm so ashamed. I'm afraid my lady has been in a thousand inquietudes for me. But I protest, sir, I made as much haste as I could.

Wait. That she did, indeed, sir.

Foi. I told my lady, as you instructed me, sir, that I had a prospect of seeing Sir Rowland, your uncle; and that I would put her ladyship's picture in my pocket to shew him; which, I'll be sure to say, has made him so enamoured of her beauty, that he burns with impatience to lie at her ladyship's feet, and worship the original. [eloquent in love.]

Mir. Excellent Foible! Matrimony has made you

Wait. I think she has profited, sir; I think so.

Foi. You have seen Madam Millamant, sir?

Mir. Yes.

Foi. I told her, sir, because I did not know that you might find an opportunity; she had so much company last night. [time—(Gives money.)]

Mir. Your diligence will merit more; in the mean-

Foi. Oh! dear sir, your humble servant.

Wait. Spouse—

Mir. Stand off, sir; not a penny. Go on and prosper, Foible. The lease shall be made good, and the farm stocked, if we succeed.

Foi. I don't question your generosity, sir; and you need not doubt of success. If you have no more commands, sir, I'll be gone; I'm sure my lady is at her toilet, and can't dress till I come. Oh dear! I'm sure that (looking out) was Mrs. Marwood that went by in a mask; if she has seen me with you I'm sure she'll tell my lady. I'll make haste home and prevent her. Your servant, sir. B'ye, Waitwell. [Exit.]

Wait. Sir Rowland, if you please. The jade's so pert upon her preferment, she forgets herself.

Mir. Come, sir, will you endeavour to forget yourself, and transform into Sir Rowland?

Wait. Why, sir, it will be impossible I should remember myself. [Exit Mir.] Married, knighted, and attended, all in one day! 'tis enough to make any man forget himself. The difficulty will be how to recover my acquaintance and familiarity with my former self; and fall from my transformation to a reformation into Waitwell. Nay, I sha'n't be quite the same Waitwell neither; for now I remember, I'm married, and can't be my own again.

Ay, there's my grief; that's the sad change of life,
To lose my title, and yet keep my wife. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in Lady Wishfort's house.

LADY WISHFORT at her toilet, PEG waiting.

Lady W. Merciful! no news of Foible yet?

Peg. No, madam.

Lady W. I have no more patience—If I have not fretted myself till I am pale again, there's no veracity in me. Fetch me the red—the red, do you hear? An arrant ash colour, as I'm a person. Look you how this wench stirs! why dost thou not fetch me a little red? didst thou not hear me, mopus?

Peg. The red ratafia, does your ladyship mean, or the cherry brandy?

Lady W. Ratafia, fool! no, fool, not the ratafia, fool! Grant me patience! I mean the Spanish paper, idiot; complexion. Darling paint, paint, paint; dost thou understand that, changeling, dangling thy hands like bobbins before thee? why dost thou not stir, puppet? thou wooden thing upon wires.

Peg. Lord, madam, your ladyship is so impatient! I cannot come at the paint, madam; Mrs. Foible has locked it up, and carried the key with her.

Lady W. Plague take you both! Fetch me the cherry-brandy, then. [Exit Peg.] I'm as pale and as faint, I look like Mrs. Qualmsick, the curate's wife, that's always breeding. Wench, come, come, wench; what art thou doing, sipping? tasting? save thee, dost thou not know the bottle?

Enter PEG, with a bottle and china cup.

Peg. Madam, I was looking for a cup.

Lady W. A cup! save thee; and what a cup hast thou brought! dost thou take me for a fairy, to drink out of an acorn? why didst thou not bring thy thimble? hast thou ne'er a brass thimble clinking in thy pocket with a bit of nutmeg? I warrant thee. Come, fill, fill. So, again. (Knocking heard.) See who that is. Set down the bottle first. Here, here, under the table. What, wouldst thou go with the bottle in thy hand, like a tapster? [Exit Peg.] As I'm a person, this wench has lived in an inn upon the road before she came to me.—[Re-enter PEG.]—No Foible yet?

Peg. No, madam; Mrs. Marwood.

Lady W. Oh! Marwood! let her come in. Come in, good Marwood.—[Enter MRS. MARWOOD.]

Mrs. Mar. I'm surprised to find your ladyship in dishabille at this time of day.

Lady W. Foible's a lost thing; has been abroad since morning, and never heard of since.

Mrs. Mar. I saw her but now, as I came masked through the park, in conference with Mirabell.

Lady W. With Mirabell! you call my blood into my face with mentioning that traitor. She durst not have the confidence. I sent her to negotiate an affair, in which, if I'm detected, I'm undone. If that wheedling villain has wrought upon Foible to detect me, I'm ruined. Oh! my dear friend, I'm a wretch of wretches if I'm detected. [Foible's integrity.]

Mrs. Mar. Oh! madam, you cannot suspect Mrs.

Lady W. Oh! he carries poison in his tongue that would corrupt integrity itself. If she has given him an opportunity, she has as good as put her integrity into his hands. Ah! dear Marwood, what's integrity to an opportunity? Hark! I hear her. Dear friend, retire into my closet, that I may examine her with more freedom. You'll pardon me, dear friend, I can make bold with you. There are books over the chimney: Quarles and Prynne, and the Short View of the Stage, with Bunyan's works, to entertain you. [Exit Mrs. Mar.] Go, you thing, and send her in.—[Exit Peg. Enter FOIBLE.]—Oh! Foible, where hast thou been? what hast thou been doing?

Foi. Madam, I have seen the party.

Lady W. But what hast thou done?

Foi. Nay, 'tis your ladyship has done, and are to do; I have only promised. But a man so enamoured—so transported! well, if worshipping of pictures be a sin—poor Sir Rowland, I say.

Lady W. The miniature has been counted like—But hast thou not betrayed me, Foible? Hast thou not detected me to that faithless Mirabell? What hadst thou to do with him in the park? answer me, has he got nothing out of thee?

Foi. So mischief has been before-hand with me; what shall I say? (Aside.) Alas! madam, could I help it, if I met that confident thing? was I in fault? If you had heard how he used me, and all upon your ladyship's account, I'm sure you would not suspect my fidelity. Nay, if that had been the worst, I could have borne: but he had a fling at your ladyship, too; and then I could not hold: but, i'faith! I gave him his own.

Lady W. Me! what did the filthy fellow say?

Foi. Oh! madam, 'tis a shame to say what he said: with his taunts and fleers, tossing up his nose. "Humph!" says he, "what, you are hatching some plot," says he, "you are so early abroad; or catering," says he, "ferretting for some disbanded officer, I warrant. Half-pay is but thin subsistence," says he. "Well, what pension does your lady propose? Let me see," says he, "what, she must come down pretty deep now she's superannuated," says he; and—

Lady W. Odds my life! I'll have him murdered. I'll have him poisoned. Where does he eat? I'll marry a drawer, to have him poisoned in his wine.

Foi. Poison him! poisoning's too good for him. Starve him, madam, starve him; marry Sir Rowland, and get him disinherited. Oh! you would bless yourself to hear what he said.

Lady W. A villain! superannuated!

Foi. "Humph!" says he, "I hear you are laying designs against me, too," says he, "and Mrs. Milamant is to marry my uncle;" he does not suspect a word of your ladyship; "but," says he, "I'll fit you for that, I warrant you," says he; "I'll hamper you for that," says he, "you and your old frippery, too," says he; "I'll handle you"—

Lady W. Audacious villain! handle me! would he durst! Frippery! old frippery! Was there ever such a foul-mouthed fellow! I'll be married to-morrow, I'll be contracted to-night.

Foi. The sooner the better, madam.

Lady W. Will Sir Rowland be here, say'st thou? when, Foible?

Foi. Incontinently, madam. No new sheriff's wife expects the return of her husband after knight-hood, with that impatience in which Sir Rowland burns for the dear honour of kissing your ladyship's hand after dinner.

Lady W. Frippery! superannuated frippery! I'll frippery the villain; I'll reduce him to frippery and rags; a tatterdemallion. I hope to see him hung with fatters, like a Long-lane pent-house, or a gibbet thief. A slander-mouthed railer: I warrant the spendthrift prodigal is in debt as much as the million lottery, or the whole court upon a birthday. I'll spoil his credit with his tailor. Yes, he shall have my niece with her fortune, he shall.

Foi. He! I hope to see him lodge in Ludgate first, and angle into Blackfriars for brass farthings, with an old mitten.

Lady W. Ay, dear Foible; thank thee for that, dear Foible. He has put me out of all patience. I shall never recompose my features, to receive Sir Rowland with any economy of face. The wretch has fretted me, that I am absolutely decayed. Look Foible.

Foi. Your ladyship has frowned a little too rashly, indeed, madam. There are some cracks discernable in the white varnish.

Lady W. Let me see the glass. Cracks, say'st thou? why, I am arrantly flayed: I look like an old peeled wall. Thou must repair me, Foible, before Sir Rowland comes; or I shall never keep up to my picture.

Foi. I warrant you, madam; a little art once made your picture like you; and now a little of the same art must make you like your picture. Your picture must sit for you, madam.

Lady W. But art thou sure Sir Rowland will not fail to come? or will he not fail when he does come? will he be importunate, Foible, and push? for if he should not be importunate—I shall never break decorums—I shall die with confusion, if I am forced to advance. Oh! no, I can never advance: I shall swoon if he should expect advances. No, I hope Sir Rowland is better bred than to put a lady to the necessity of breaking her forms. I won't be too coy, neither. I won't give him despair. But a little disdain is not amiss: a little scorn is alluring.

Foi. A little scorn becomes your ladyship.

Lady W. Yes, but tenderness becomes me best. You see that picture has a sort of a—eh! Foible?—a swimmingness in the eyes. Yes, I'll look so. My niece affects it; but she wants features. Is Sir Rowland handsome? Let my toilet be removed; I'll dress above. I'll receive Sir Rowland here. Is he handsome? Don't answer me. I won't know; I'll be surprised; I'll be taken by surprise. [man.]

Foi. By storm, madam; Sir Rowland's a brisk

Lady W. Is he? Oh! then he'll importune, if he's a brisk man. I have a mortal terror at the apprehension. Let my things be removed, good Foible. [Exit.]

Enter MRS. FAINALL.

Mrs. F. Oh! Foible, I have been in a fright, lest I should come too late. That devil, Marwood, saw you in the park with Mirabell, and I'm afraid will discover it to my lady.

Foi. Discover what, madam?

Mrs. F. Nay, nay, put not on that strange face. I am privy to the whole design, and know that Waitwell, to whom thou wert this morning married, is to personate Mirabell's uncle, and as such, winning my lady, to involve her in those difficulties from which Mirabell only must release her, by his making his conditions to have my cousin and her fortune left to her own disposal.

Foi. Oh! dear madam, I beg your pardon. It was not my confidence in your ladyship that was deficient; but I thought the former good correspondence between your ladyship and Mr. Mirabell might have hindered his communicating this secret.

Mrs. F. Dear Foible, forget that.

Foi. Oh! dear madam, Mr. Mirabell is such a sweet winning gentleman—But your ladyship is the pattern of generosity. Sweet lady, to be so good! Mr. Mirabell cannot choose but be grateful. I find your ladyship has his heart still. Now, madam, I can safely tell your ladyship our success. Mrs. Marwood has told my lady; but I warrant I managed myself. I turned it all for the better. I told my lady that Mr. Mirabell railed at her. I laid horrid things to his charge, I'll vow; and my lady is so incensed, that she'll be contracted to Sir Rowland to-night, she says.

Mrs. F. Oh rare Foible!

Foi. Madam, I beg your ladyship to acquaint Mr. Mirabell of his success. I would be seen as little as possible to speak to him; besides, I believe Madam Marwood watches me; she has a penchant; but I know Mr. Mirabell can't abide her. John, remove my lady's toilet. Madam, your servant. My lady is so impatient, I fear she'll come for me if I stay.

Mrs. F. I'll go with you up the back stairs, lest I should meet her. [Exeunt.]

Enter MRS. MARWOOD.

Mrs. Mar. Indeed, Mrs. Engine, is it thus with you? Are you become a go-between of this importance? Yes, I shall watch you. Why, this wench is the pass-partout, a very master-key to every body's strong box. My friend Fainall, have you carried it so swimmingly? I thought there was something in it; but it seems 'tis over with you. Your loathing is not from a want of appetite, then, but from a surfeit: else you could never be so cool to fall from a principal to be an assistant; to procure for him! a pattern of generosity, that I confess. Oh! man, man! Woman, woman! The devil's an ass: if I were a painter, I would draw him like an idiot, a driveller, with a bib and bells. Man should have his head and horns, and woman the rest of him. Poor simple fiend! Madam Marwood has a penchant, but he can't abide her. Here comes the good lady, panting ripe; with a heart full of hope, and a head full of care, like any chemist upon the day of projection.

Enter LADY WISHFORT.

Lady W. Oh! dear Marwood, what shall I say for this rude forgetfulness? But my dear friend is all goodness. [very well entertained.]

Mrs. Mar. No apologies, dear madam. I have been

Lady W. As I'm a person, I am in a very chaos to think I should so forget myself; but I have such an olio of affairs, really I know not what to do. (Calls.) Foible! I expect my nephew, Sir Wilful, every moment, too.—Why, Foible!—He means to travel for improvement.

Mrs. Mar. Methinks Sir Wilful should rather think of marrying than travelling at his years. I hear he is turned of forty.

Lady W. Oh! he's in less danger of being spoiled by his travels. I am against my nephew's marrying too young. It will be time enough when he comes back, and has acquired discretion to choose for himself.

Mrs. Mar. Methinks, Mrs. Millamant and he would make a very fit match. He may travel afterwards. 'Tis a thing very usual with young gentlemen.

Lady W. I promise you I have thought on't; and since 'tis your judgment, I'll think on't again. I assure you I will; I value your judgment extremely. On my word, I'll propose it.—[Enter FOIBLE.]—Come, come, Foible. I had forgot my nephew will be here before dinner. I must make haste.

Foi. Mr. Witwould and Mr. Petulant are come to dine with your ladyship.

Lady W. Oh dear! I can't appear till I'm dressed. Dear Marwood, shall I be free with you again, and beg you to entertain 'em? I'll make all imaginable haste. Dear friend, excuse me. [Exit with Foible.]

Enter MRS. MILLAMANT and MINCING.

Mrs. Mill. Sure, never anything was so unbred as that odious man. Marwood, your servant.

Mrs. Mar. You have a colour: what's the matter?

Mrs. Mill. That horrid fellow, Petulant, has provoked me into a flame. I have broken my fan. Mincing, lend me your's. Is not all the powder out of my

Mrs. Mar. No. What has he done? [hair?]

Mrs. Mill. Nay, he has done nothing; he has only talked; nay, he has said nothing neither; but he has contradicted everything that has been said. For my part, I thought Witwould and he would have quarrelled. [have fit.]

Min. I vow, mem, I thought once they would

Mrs. Mill. Well, 'tis a lamentable thing, I swear, that one has not the liberty of choosing one's acquaintance as one does one's clothes.

Mrs. Mar. If we had that liberty, we should be as weary of one set of acquaintance, though never so good, as we are of one suit, though never so fine. A fool and a doily stuff would now and then find days of grace, and be worn for variety.

Mrs. Mill. I could consent to wear 'em, if they would wear alike; but fools never wear out. They are such drap-de-berry things! without one could give 'em to one's chambermaid after a day or two.

Mrs. Mar. 'Twere better so, indeed. Or what think you of the play-house? A fine, gay, glossy fool should be given there, like a new masking-habit after the masquerade is over, and we have done with the disguise. For a fool's visit is always a disguise; and never admitted by a woman of wit, but to blind her affair with a lover of sense. If you would but appear barefaced now, and own Mirabell, you might as easily put off Petulant and Witwould as your hood and scarf. And, indeed, 'tis time, for the town has found it; the secret is grown too big for the pretence: indeed, Millamant, you can no more conceal it than my Lady Strammel can her face, that goodly face, which, in defiance of her Rhenish-wine tea, will not be comprehended in a mask.

Mrs. Mill. I'll take my death, Marwood, you are more censorious than a decayed beauty, or a discarded toast. Mincing, tell the men they may come up. My aunt is not dressing here; their folly is less provoking than your malice. [Exit Mincing.] The town has found it! what has it found? That Mirabell loves me is no more a secret, than it is a secret that you discovered it to my aunt, or than the reason why you discovered it is a secret.

Mrs. Mar. You are nettled.

Mrs. Mill. You're mistaken. Ridiculous!

Mrs. Mar. Indeed, my dear, you'll tear another fan if you don't mitigate those violent airs.

Mrs. Mill. Oh, silly! Ha, ha, ha! I could laugh immoderately. Poor Mirabell! His constancy to me has quite destroyed his complaisance for all the world beside. I swear I never enjoined it him, to be so coy: if I had the vanity to think he would obey me, I would command him to shew more gallantry. 'Tis hardly well-bred to be so particular on one hand, and so insensible on the other. But I despair to prevail, and so let him follow his own way. Ha, ha, ha! Pardon me, dear creature, I must laugh—ha, ha, ha!—though I grant you 'tis a little barbarous. Ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. Mar. What pity 'tis so much fine raillery, and delivered with so significant gesture, should be so unhappily directed to miscarry!

Mrs. Mill. Dear creature, I ask your pardon. I swear I did not mind you.

Mrs. Mar. Mr. Mirabell and you both may think a thing impossible, when I shall tell him by telling you—

Mrs. Mill. Oh dear! what? for, 'tis the same thing, if I hear it. Ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. Mar. That I detest him, hate him, madam.

Mrs. Mill. Oh! madam, why, so do I. And yet the creature loves me. Ha, ha, ha! How can one forbear laughing to think of it? I am a sybil if I am not amazed to think what he can see in me. I'll take my death, I think you are handsomer, and within a year or two as young. If you could but stay for me, I should overtake you. But that cannot be. Well, that thought makes me melancholic. Now I'll be sad. [sooner than you think.]

Mrs. Mar. Your merry note may be changed

Mrs. Mill. D'ye say so? Then I'm resolved I'll have a song to keep up my spirits.

Enter MINCING.

Min. The gentlemen stay but to comb, madam; and will wait on you.

Enter PETULANT and WITWOULD.

Mrs. Mill. Is your animosity composed, gentlemen?

Wit. Raillery, raillery, madam; we have no animosity; we hit off a little wit now and then, but no animosity. The falling out of wits, is like the falling out of lovers. We agree in the main, like treble and bass. Eh! Petulant? [to contradict—]

Pet. Ay, in the main. But when I have a humour

Wit. Ay, when he has a humour to contradict, then I contradict, too. What! I know my cue. Then we contradict one another like two battledores; for contradictions beget one another like Jews.

Pet. If he says black's black—if I have a humour to say 'tis blue—Let that pass; all's one for that. If I have a humour to prove it, it must be granted.

Wit. Not positively must; but it may, it may.

Pet. Yes, it positively must, upon proof positive.

Wit. Ay, upon proof positive it must; but upon proof presumptive it only may. That's a logical distinction now, madam.

Mrs. Mar. I perceive your debates are of importance, and very learnedly handled.

Pet. Importance is one thing, and learning's another; but a debate's a debate, that I assert.

Wit. Petulant's an enemy to learning; he relies altogether on his parts. [me.]

Pet. No, I'm no enemy to learning; it hurts not

Mrs. Mar. That's a sign, indeed, 'tis no enemy to you. [that have it.]

Pet. No, no; 'tis no enemy to anybody but those

Mrs. Mill. Well, an illiterate man's my aversion. I wonder at the impudence of an illiterate man, to offer to make love.

Wit. That, I confess, I wonder at, too.

Mrs. Mill. Ah! to marry an ignorant! that can hardly read or write.

Pet. Why should a man be any further from being married though he can't read, than he is from being hanged? The ordinary's paid for setting the psalm, and the parish priest for reading the ceremony. And for the rest which is to follow, in both cases, a man may do it without book; so all's one for that.

Mrs. Mill. D'ye hear the creature? Lord! here's company! I'll be gone. [Exit with Mincing.]

Enter SIR WILFUL WITWOULD in a riding-dress, and Footman.

Wit. In the name of Bartholomew and his fair, what have we here? [know him?]

Mrs. Mar. 'Tis your brother, I fancy. Don't you

Wit. Not I. Yes, I think it is he. I've almost forgot him; I have not seen him since the revolution.

Foot. Sir, my lady's dressing. Here's company; if you please to walk in, in the meantime.

Sir W. Dressing! What, 'tis but morning here I warrant with you in London; we should count it towards afternoon in our parts, down in Shropshire. Why, then, belike my aunt ha'n't dined yet;

Foot. Your aunt, sir? [eh! friend?]

Sir W. My aunt, sir? yes, my aunt, sir, and your lady, sir; your lady is my aunt, sir. Why, what, dost thou not know me, friend? Why, then, send somebody hither that does. How long hast thou lived with thy lady, fellow, eh?

Foot. A week, sir; longer than any in the house, except my lady's woman.

Sir W. Why, then, belike thou dost not know thy lady, if thou seest her; eh, friend?

Foot. Why, truly, sir, I cannot safely swear to her face in a morning, before she is dressed. 'Tis like I may give a shrewd guess at her by this time.

Sir W. Well, pr'ythee, try what thou canst do; if thou canst not guess, inquire her out; dost hear, fellow? and tell her, her nephew, Sir Wilful Wit-

Foot. I shall, sir. [would, is in the house.]

Sir W. Hold ye, hear me, friend; a word with you in your ear: pr'ythee, who are these gallants?

Foot. Really, sir, I can't tell; here come so many here, 'tis hard to know 'em all. [Exit.]

Sir W. Oons! this fellow knows less than a starling; I don't think a' knows his own name.

Mrs. Mar. Mr. Witwould, your brother is not behind-hand in forgetfulness. I fancy he has forgot you, too. [bers first, I say.]

Wit. I hope so. The deuce take him that remem-

Sir W. Save you, gentlemen and lady.

Mrs. Mar. For shame, Mr. Witwould; why won't you speak to him? And you, sir.

Wit. Petulant, speak.

Pet. It seems as if you had come a journey, sir; hem, hem! (Surveying him round.)

Sir W. Very likely, sir, that it may seem so.

Pet. No offence, I hope, sir. [sir.]

Sir W. May be not, sir; thereafter as 'tis meant,

Wit. Smoke the boots, the boots; Petulant, the boots. Ha, ha, ha! [boots.]

Pet. Sir, I presume upon the information of your

Sir W. Why, 'tis like you may, sir: if you are not satisfied with the information of my boots, sir, if you will step to the stable, you may inquire further of my horse, sir.

Pet. Your horse, sir! your horse is an ass, sir.

Sir W. Do you speak by way of offence, sir?

Mrs. Mar. The gentleman's merry, that's all, sir. 'Slife! we shall have a quarrel betwixt a horse and an ass, before they find one another out. You must not take anything amiss from your friends, sir. You are among your friends here, though it may be you don't know it. If I am not mistaken, you are Sir Wilful Witwould.

Sir W. Right, lady; I am Sir Wilful Witwould, so I write myself; no offence to anybody, I hope; and nephew to the Lady Wishfort of this mansion.

Mrs. Mar. Don't you know this gentleman, sir?

Sir W. Hum! What, sure, 'tis not—yea, by'r lady, but 'tis. 'Sheart! I know not whether 'tis or no. Yea, but 'tis, by the wrekin. Brother Anthony! what, Tony, i'faith! what, dost thou not know me? By'r lady, nor I thee, thou art so belaced, and so beperiwigged. 'Sheart! why dost not speak? art thou overjoyed? [brother.]

Wit. Odso! brother, is it you? your servant,

Sir W. Your servant! why, your's, sir.

Wit. No offence, I hope, brother.

Sir W. 'Sheart! sir, but there is, and much offence. A plague! is this your inns-o'-court breeding, not to know your friends and your relations, your elders, and your betters?

Wit. Why, brother Wilful of Salop, you may be as short as a Shrewsbury cake, if you please. But I tell you, 'tis not modish to know relations in town. 'Tis not the fashion here; 'tis not, indeed, dear brother.

Sir W. The fashion's a fool; and you're a fop, dear brother. 'Sheart! I suspected this; by'r lady, I conjectured you were a fop, since you began to change the style of your letters, and write on a scrap of paper, gilt round the edges, no bigger than a subpoena. I might expect this when you left off "honoured brother," and "hoping you are in good health," and so forth, to begin with a "Rat me, knight, I'm sick of a last night's debauch." You could write news before you were out of your time, when you lived with honest Pimplenose, the attorney of Furnival's-inn, you could entreat to be remembered then to your friends round the Wrekin.

Pet. 'Slife! Witwould, were you ever an attorney's clerk, of the family of the Furnivals? Ha, ha!

Wit. Ay, ay, but that was but for awhile. Not long, not long. Psha! I was not in my own power then. An orphan, and this fellow was my guardian; ay, ay, I was glad to consent to that, man, to come to London. He had the disposal of me then. If I had not agreed to that, I might have been bound 'prentice to a felt-maker in Shrewsbury; this fellow would have bound me to a maker of felts.

Sir W. 'Sheart! and better than be bound to a maker of fops; where, I suppose, you have served your time; and now may set up for yourself.

Mrs. Mar. You intend to travel, sir.

Sir W. Belike I may, madam. I may chance to sail upon the salt seas, if my mind hold.

Pet. And the wind serve.

Sir W. Serve or not serve, I sha'n't ask licence of you, sir; nor of the weathercock your companion. I direct my discourse to the lady, sir. 'Tis like my aunt may have told you, madam; yes, I have settled my concerns, I may say now, and am minded to see foreign parts. [at all adventures.]

Mrs. Mar. I thought you had designed for France

Sir W. I can't tell that; 'tis like I may, and 'tis like I may not. I am somewhat dainty in making a resolution, because when I make it, I keep it. I don't stand shill I, shall I, then; if I say't, I'll do't: but I have thoughts to tarry a small matter in town, to learn somewhat of your lingo first, before I cross the seas. I'd gladly have a spice of your French, whereby to hold discourse in foreign countries.

Mrs. Mar. Here's an academy in town for that, and dancing, and curious accomplishments, calculated purely for the use of grown gentlemen.

Sir W. Is there? 'tis like there may.

Mrs. Mar. No doubt you will return very much improved. [whale-fishing.]

Wit. Yes, refined like a Dutch skipper from a

Enter LADY WISHFORT and FAINALL.

Lady W. Nephew, you are welcome.

Sir W. Aunt, your servant.

Fain. Sir Wilful, your most faithful servant.

Sir W. Cousin Fainall, give me your hand.

Lady W. Cousin Witwould, your servant; Mr. Petulant, your servant. Nephew, you are welcome again. Will you drink anything after your journey, nephew, before you eat? dinner's almost ready.

Sir W. I'm very well, I thank you, aunt; however, I thank you for your courteous offer. 'Sheart! I was afraid you would have been in the fashion, too, and have remembered to have forgot your relations. Here's your cousin Tony; belike I mayn't call him brother, for fear of offence.

Lady W. Oh! he's a railer, nephew; my cousin's a wit: and your great wits always rally their best friends to choose. When you have been abroad, nephew, you'll understand raillery better. (Fainall and Mrs. Marwood talk apart.)

Sir W. Why, then, let him hold his tongue in the meantime, and rail when that day comes.

Enter MINCING.

Min. Mem, I am come to acquaint your la'ship that dinner is impatient.

Sir W. Impatient! why, then, belike it won't stay till I pull off my boots. Sweetheart, can you help me to a pair of slippers? My man's with his horses I warrant.

Lady W. Fie, fie! nephew, you would not pull off your boots here; go down into the hall; dinner shall stay for you. [Exeunt Mincing and Sir W.] My nephew's a little unbred; you'll pardon him, madam. Gentlemen, will you walk? Marwood?

Mrs. Mar. I'll follow you, madam, before Sir Wilful is ready. [Exeunt Lady W., Pet., and Wit.]

Fain. Why, then, Foible's a procuress; an errant, rank, match-making procuress. And I, it seems, am a husband, a rank husband; and my wife a very errant, rank wife, all in the way of the world. 'Sdeath! to be out-witted, out-jilted, out-matrimonied, and be outstripped by my wife; 'tis scurvy wedlock.

Mrs. Mar. Then shake it off: you have often wished for an opportunity to part; and now you have it. But first prevent their plot; the half of Millamant's fortune is too considerable to be parted with, to a foe, to Mirabell.

Fain. Ay, that had been mine, had you not made that fond discovery; that had been forfeited, had they been married. My wife had added lustre to my dishonour by that increase of fortune. I could have worn 'em tipped with gold.

Mrs. Mar. They may prove a cap of maintenance to you still, if you can away with your wife. You married her to keep you; and if you can contrive to have her keep you better than you expected, why should you not keep her longer than you intended?

Fain. The means, the means.

Mrs. Mar. Discover to my lady your wife's conduct; threaten to part with her. My lady loves her, and will come to any composition to save her reputation. Take the opportunity of breaking it just upon the discovery of this imposture. My lady will be enraged beyond bounds, and sacrifice niece and fortune, and all, at that conjuncture. And let me alone to keep her warm; if she should flag in her part, I will not fail to prompt her.

Fain. This has an appearance.

Mrs. Mar. I'm sorry I hinted to my lady to endeavour a match between Millamant and Sir Wilful; that may be an obstacle.

Fain. Oh! for that matter, leave me to manage him; I'll disable him for that; he will drink like a Dane: after dinner, I'll set his hand in.

Mrs. Mar. Well, how do you stand affected towards your lady?

Fain. Why, 'faith! I'm thinking of it. Let me see: I am married already; so that's over: my wife has played the jade with me; well, that's over, too: I never loved her, or if I had, why, that would have been over, too, by this time: jealous of her I cannot be, for I am certain; so there's an end of jealousy. Weary of her, I am and shall be—no, there's no end of that; no, no, that were too much to hope. Thus far concerning my repose. Now for my reputation: as to my own, I married not for it; so that's out of the question. [nourable.]

Mrs. Mar. Besides, you forget, marriage is ho-

Fain. Hum! 'faith! and that's well thought on. Marriage is honourable, as you say.—So, so! well, how do we proceed?

Mrs. Mar. I will contrive a letter which shall be delivered to my lady at the time when that rascal who is to act Sir Rowland is with her. It shall come as from an unknown hand; for the less I appear to know of the truth, the better I can play the incendiary. Besides, I would not have Foible provoked if I could help it, because, you know, she knows some passages—nay, I expect all will come out; but let the mine be sprung first, and then I care not if I be discovered.

Fain. If the worst come to the worst, I'll turn my wife to grass: I have already a deed of settlement of the best part of her estate, which I wheedled out of her; and that you shall partake at least.

Mrs. Mar. I hope you are convinced that I hate Mirabell now; you'll be no more jealous.

Fain. Jealous! no, by this kiss. Let husbands be jealous; but let the lover still believe: or, if he doubt, let it be only to endear his pleasure, and prepare the joy that follows, when he proves his mistress true. But let husbands' doubts convert to endless jealousy; or if they have belief, let it corrupt to superstition, and blind credulity. I am single, and will herd no more with 'em. True, I wear the badge, but I'll disown the order. And since I take my leave of 'em, I care not if I leave 'em a common motto to their common crest.

All husbands must or pain or shame endure;

The wise too jealous are, fools too secure. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.—SCENE I.—The same.

Enter LADY WISHFORT and FOIBLE.

Lady W. Is Sir Rowland coming, say'st thou, Foible? and are things in order?

Foi. Yes, madam. I have put wax-lights in the sconces, and placed the footmen in a row in the hall, in their best liveries, with the coachman and postillion to fill up the equipage.

Lady W. Have you pulvilled the coachman and postillion, that they may not stink of the stable, when

Foi. Yes, madam. [Sir Rowland comes by?]

Lady W. And are the dancers and the music ready, that he may be entertained in all points with correspondence to his passion?

Foi. All is ready, madam.

Lady W. And—well, and how do I look, Foible?

Foi. Most killing well, madam.

Lady W. Well, and how shall I receive him? in what figure shall I give his heart the first impression? There is a great deal in the first impression. Shall I sit?—No, I won't sit—I'll walk—ay, I'll walk from the door upon his entrance; and then turn full upon him—no, that will be too sudden. I'll lie—ay, I'll lie down—I'll receive him in my little dressing-room. There's a couch—yes, yes, I'll give the first impression on a couch—I won't lie neither, but loll and lean upon one elbow, with one foot a little dangling off, jogging in a thoughtful way; yes, and then as soon as he appears, start, ay, start and be surprised, and rise to meet him in a pretty disorder—yes—oh! nothing is more alluring than a levee from a couch in some confusion: it shews the foot to advantage, and furnishes with blushes, and re-composing airs beyond comparison. Hark!

Foi. 'Tis he, madam. [there's a coach.]

Lady W. Oh dear! has my nephew made his addresses to Millamant? [the parlour.]

Foi. Sir Wilful is set in to drinking, madam, in Lady W. Ods my life! I'll send him to her. Call her down, Foible; bring her hither. I'll send him as I go; when they are together, then come to me, Foible, that I may not be too long alone with Sir Rowland. [Exit.]

Enter MRS. MILLAMANT and MRS. FAINALL.

Foi. Madam, I staid here to tell your ladyship that Mr. Mirabell has waited this half-hour for an opportunity to talk with you. Though my lady's orders were to leave you and Sir Wilful together. Shall I tell Mr. Mirabell that you are at leisure?

Mrs. Mill. No. What would the dear man have?

I am thoughtful, and would amuse myself. Bid him come another time. (Repeating.)

There never yet was woman made,
Nor shall, but to be curs'd.

Mrs. F. You are very fond of Sir John Suckling to-day, Millamant, and the poets.

Mrs. Mill. He? ay, and filthy verses, so I am.

Foi. Sir Wilful is coming, madam. Shall I send Mr. Mirabell away?

Mrs. Mill. Ay, if you please, Foible, send him away, or send him hither, just as you will, dear Foible. I think I'll see him: shall I? ay, let the wretch come. (Repeating.)

Thyrsis a youth of the inspired train,---

Dear Fainall, entertain Sir Wilful; thou hast philosophy to undergo a fool; thou art married, and hast patience; I would confer with my own thoughts.

Mrs. F. I am obliged to you, that you would make me your proxy in this affair; but I have business of my own.—[Enter SIR WILFUL WITWOULD.]
Oh! Sir Wilful, you are come at the critical instant. There's your mistress, up to the ears in love and contemplation; pursue your point, now or never.

Sir W. Yes, my aunt will have it so: I would gladly have been encouraged with a bottle or two, because I'm somewhat wary at first, before I am acquainted; but I hope, after a time, I shall break my mind—that is, upon further acquaintance. (Millamant walks about repeating to herself.) So, for the present, cousin, I'll take my leave. If so be you'll be so kind to make my excuse, I'll return to my company. [be daunted.]

Mrs. F. Oh fie! Sir Wilful, what, you must not

Sir W. Daunted! no, that's not it, it is not so much for that; for if so be that I set on't, I'll do't. But only for the present, 'tis sufficient till further acquaintance, that's all: your servant.

Mrs. F. Nay, I'll swear you shall never lose so favourable an opportunity, if I can help it. I'll leave you together, and lock the door. [Exit with Foible.]

Sir W. Nay, nay, cousin, I have forgot my gloves. What d'ye do? 'Sheart! a'has locked the door, indeed, I think; nay, cousin Fainall, open the door; psha! what a vixen trick is this! Nay, now a'has seen me, too. Cousin, I made bold to pass through as it were—I think this door's enchanted.

Mrs. Mill. (Repeating.)

I pr'ythee spare me, gentle boy,
Press me no more for that slight toy.

Sir W. Anan? cousin, your servant.

Mrs. Mill. (Repeating.)

That foolish trifle of a heart—

Sir Wilful! [cousin?]

Sir W. Yes; your servant. No offence, I hope,

Mrs. Mill. (Repeating.)

I swear it will not do its part,
Though thou dost thine, employ'st thy power and art.

Natural, easy Suckling!

Sir W. Anan? Suckling! No such suckling neither, cousin, nor stripling: I thank heaven, I'm no minor.

Mrs. Mill. Ah! rustic, ruder than Gothio.

Sir W. Well, well, I shall understand your lingo one of these days, cousin; in the meanwhile, I must answer in plain English. [Wilful?]

Mrs. Mill. Have you any business with me, Sir

Sir W. Not at present, cousin. Yes, I made bold to see, to come and know if that how you were disposed to fetch a walk this evening; if so be that I might not be troublesome, I would have sought a

Mrs. Mill. A walk? what then? [walk with you.]

Sir W. Nay, nothing; only for the walk's sake, that's all.

Mrs. Mill. I nauseate walking; 'tis a country diversion; I loathe the country, and everything that relates to it.

Sir W. Indeed! ha! lookye, lookye, you do? nay, 'tis like you may: here are choice of pastimes here in town, as plays and the like, that must be confessed, indeed.

Mrs. Mill. Ah, l'étourdie! I hate the town, too.

Sir W. Dear heart! that's much—ha! that you should hate 'em both! ha! 'tis like you may; there are some can't relish the town, and others can't away with the country, 'tis like you may be one of those, cousin.

Mrs. Mill. Ha, ha, ha! Yes, 'tis like I may. You have nothing further to say to me?

Sir W. Not at present, cousin. 'Tis like, when I have an opportunity to be more private I may break my mind in some measure. I conjecture you partly guess; however, that's as time shall try: but, "spare to speak and spare to speed," as they say.

Mrs. Mill. If it be of no great importance, Sir Wilful, you will oblige me by leaving me. I have just now a little business.

Sir W. Enough, enough, cousin: yes, yes, all a case; when you're disposed. Now's as well as another time; and another time as well as now. All's one for that. Yes, yes, if your concerns call you, there's no haste; it will keep cold, as they say. Cousin, your servant. I think this door's locked.

Mrs. Mill. You may go this way, sir.

Sir W. Your servant: then, with your leave, I'll return to my company. [Exit.]

Mrs. Mill. Ay, ay! Ha, ha, ha! (Repeating.)

Like Phœbus sung the no less am'rous boy.

Enter MIRABELL.

Mir. (Repeating.)

Like Daphne she, as lovely and as coy.

Do you lock yourself up from me to make my search more curious? Or is this pretty artifice contrived to signify that here the chase must end, and my pursuit be crowned, for you can fly no further?

Mrs. Mill. Vanity! No, I'll fly and be followed to the last moment; though I am upon the very verge of matrimony, I expect you should solicit me as much as if I were wavering at the grate of a monastery, with one foot over the threshold. I'll be solicited to the very last, nay, and afterwards.

Mir. What, after the last?

Mrs. Mill. Oh! I should think I were poor, and had nothing to bestow, if I were reduced to inglorious ease; and freed from the agreeable fatigues of solicitation.

Mir. But do not you know, that when favours are conferred upon instant and tedious solicitation, that they diminish in their value, and that both the giver loses the grace, and the receiver lessens his pleasure?

Mrs. Mill. It may be in things of common application; but never sure in love. Oh! I hate a lover, that can dare to think he draws a moment's air, independent on the bounty of his mistress. There is not so impudent a thing in nature, as the saucy look of an assured man, confident of success. The pedantic arrogance of a very husband has not so pragmatical an air. Ah! I'll never marry, unless I am first made sure of my will and pleasure.

Mir. Would you have 'em both before marriage? or will you be contented with only the first now, and stay for the other till after grace?

Mrs. Mill. Ah! don't be impertinent. My dear liberty, shall I leave thee? My faithful solitude, my darling contemplation, must I bid you, then, adieu? Ay, adieu, my morning thoughts, agreeable wakings, indolent slumbers, ye douceurs, ye sommeils du matin, adieu! I can't do't; 'tis more than impossible: positively, Mirabell, I'll lie a-bed in a morning as long as I please. [I please.]

Mir. Then I'll get up in a morning as early as

Mrs. Mill. Ah! idle creature, get up when you will; and, d'ye hear? I won't be called names after I'm married: positively, I won't be called names.

Mir. Names!

Mrs. Mill. Ay, as wife, spouse, my dear, joy, jewel, love, sweetheart, and the rest of that nauseous cant, in which men and their wives are so fulsomely familiar; I shall never bear that. Good Mirabell, don't let us be familiar or fond, nor kiss before folks, like my Lady Fadler and Sir Francis; nor go in public together the first Sunday in a new chariot, to provoke eyes and whispers; and then never be seen there together again; as if we were proud of one another the first week, and ashamed of one another ever after. Let us never visit together, nor go to a play together, but let us be very strange and well bred; let us be as strange as if we had been married a great while; and as well bred as if we were not married at all.

Mir. Have you any more conditions to offer? hitherto, your demands are pretty reasonable.

Mrs. Mill. Trifles, as liberty to pay and receive visits to and from whom I please; to write and receive letters, without interrogatories or wry faces on your part; to wear what I please; and choose conversation with regard only to my own taste; to have no obligation upon me to converse with wits that I don't like, because they are your acquaintance; or to be intimate with fools, because they may be your relations. Come to dinner when I please, dine in my dressing-room when I'm out of humour, without giving a reason. To have my closet inviolate; to be sole empress of my tea-table, which you must never presume to approach without first asking leave. And lastly, wherever I am, you shall always knock at the door before you come in. These articles subscribed, if I continue to endure you a little longer, I may by degrees dwindle into a wife.

Mir. Your bill of fare is something advanced in this latter account. Well, have I liberty to offer conditions, that when you are dwindled into a wife, I may not be beyond measure enlarged into a husband?

Mill. You have free leave; propose your utmost; speak, and spare not.

Mir. I thank you. Imprimis then, I covenant that your acquaintance be general; that you admit no sworn confidant or intimate of your own sex; no she friend to screen her affairs under your countenance, and tempt you to make trial of a mutual secrecy. No decoy-duck to wheedle you a fop-scrambling to the play in a mask; then bring you home in a pretended fright, when you think you shall be found out; and rail at me for missing the play, and disappointing the frolic which you had to pick me up and prove my constancy.

Mrs. Mill. Detestable imprimis! I go to the play in a mask!

Mir. Item, I article that you continue to like your own face, as long as I shall: and while it passes current with me, that you endeavour not to new coin it. To which end, together with all vizards for the day, I prohibit all masks for the night made of oil'd skins, and I know not what—hog's-bones, hare's-gall, pig-water, and the marrow of a roasted cat. In short, I forbid all commerce with the gentlewoman in What-d'ye-call-it court. Item, I shut my doors against all procuresses with baskets, and pennyworths of muslin, China, fans, &c. Item, when you shall be breeding—

Mrs. Mill. Ah! name it not.

Mir. I denounce against all straight lacing, squeezing for a shape, till you mould my boy's head like a sugar-loaf, and instead of a man-child, make me father to a crooked-billet. Lastly, to the dominion of the tea-table I submit; but with proviso, that you exceed not in your province; but restrain yourself to native and simple tea-table drinks, as tea, chocolate, and coffee. As likewise to genuine and authorized tea-table talk, such as mending of fashions, spoiling reputations, railing at absent friends, and so forth; but that on no account you encroach upon the men's prerogative, and presume to drink healths, or toast fellows; for prevention of which I banish all foreign forces, all auxiliaries to the tea-table, as orange-brandy, all anniseed, cinnamon, citron, and Barbadoes-waters, together with ratafia, and the most noble spirit of clary. But for cowslip-wine, poppy-water, and all dormitives, those I allow. These provisos admitted, in other things I may prove a tractable and complying husband.

Mrs. Mill. Oh! horrid provisos; filthy strong waters. I toast fellows, odious men! I hate your odious provisos.

Mir. Then we're agreed. Shall I kiss your hand upon the contract? And here comes one to be a witness to the sealing of the deed.

Enter MRS. FAINALL.

Mrs. Mill. Fainall, what shall I do? shall I have him? I think I must have him. [you do?

Mrs. F. Ay, ay, take him, take him; what should

Mrs. M. Well then—I'll take my death I'm in a horrid fright—Fainall, I shall never say it—well—I think—I'll endure you.

Mrs. F. Fie, fie! have him, have him, and tell him so in plain terms; for I am sure you have a mind to him.

Mrs. Mill. Are you? I think I have, and the horrid man looks as if he thought so too—well, you ridiculous thing you, I'll have you—I won't be kiss'd, nor I won't be thank'd—here, kiss my hand though—so hold your tongue now, don't say a word.

Mrs. F. Mirabell, there's a necessity for your obedience; you have neither time to talk nor stay. My mother is coming; and, in my conscience, if she should see you, would fall into fits, and may be not recover time enough to return to Sir Rowland, who, as Foible tells me, is in a fair way to succeed. Therefore spare your ecstasies for another occasion, and slip down the back-stairs, where Foible waits to consult you.

Mrs. Mill. Ay, go, go. In the meantime, I'll suppose you have said something to please me.

Mir. I am all obedience. [Exit.

Mrs. F. Yonder's Sir Wilful, drunk; and so noisy, that my mother has been forced to leave Sir Rowland to appease him, but he answers her only with singing and drinking; what they may have done by this time I know not, but Petulant and he were upon quarrelling as I came by.

Mrs. Mill. Well, if Mirabell should not make a good husband, I am a lost thing; for I find I love him violently.

Mrs. F. So it seems; for you mind not what's said to you. If you doubt him, you had better take up with Sir Wilful.

Mrs. Mill. How can you name that superannuated lubber? foh!

Enter WITWOULD.

Mrs. F. So, is the fray made up, that you have left 'em?

Wit. Left 'em? I could stay no longer; I have laugh'd like ten christenings—I am tipsy with laughing—yes, yes, the fray is composed; my lady came in and stopt the proceedings.

Mrs. Mill. What was the dispute?

Wit. That's the jest; there was no dispute. They could neither of 'em speak for rage; and so fell a sputtering at one another, like two roasting apples.—[Enter PETULANT, drunk.]—Now, Petulant, all's over, all's well; 'gad! my head begins to whim it about; why dost thou not speak? Thou art both as drunk and as mute as a fish.

Pet. Look you, Mrs. Millamant, if you can love me, dear nymph—say it—and that's the conclusion—pass on, or pass off, that's all.

Wit. Thou hast uttered volumes, folios, in less than decimo sexto, my dear Lacedemonian. Sirrah, Petulant, thou art an epitomizer of words.

Pet. Witwould, you are an annihilator of sense.

Wit. Thou art a retailer of phrases; and dost deal in remnants of remnants, like a maker of pin-cushions; thou art in truth (metaphorically speaking) a speaker of short-hand.

Pet. Thou art (without a figure) just one half of an ass, and Baldwin yonder, thy half-brother, is the rest; a gemini of asses split, would make just four of you.

Mrs. Mill. What was the quarrel?

Pet. There was no quarrel; there might have been a quarrel.

Wit. If there had been words enow between 'em to have expressed provocation, they had gone together by the ears like a pair of castanets.

Pet. You were the quarrel.

Mrs. Mill. Me!

Pet. If I have the humour to quarrel, I can make less matters conclude premises; if you are not handsome, what then, if I have humour to prove it? If I shall have my reward, say so; if not, fight for your face the next time yourself. I'll go sleep.

Wit. Do, wrap thyself up like a wood-louse, and dream revenge; and hear me, if thou canst learn to write by to-morrow morning, pen me a challenge; I'll carry it for thee.

Pet. Carry your mistress's monkey a spider; go slay dogs, and read romances: I'll go to bed to my maid. [Exit.

Mrs. F. He's horridly drunk. How came you all in this pickle?

Wit. A plot, a plot, to get rid of the knight. Your husband's advice; but he sneaked off.

Enter SIR WILFUL WITWOULD, drunk, and LADY WISHFORT.

Lady W. Out upon't, out upon't! At years of discretion, and comport yourself at this rantipole rate!

Sir W. No offence, aunt.

Lady W. Offence! as I'm a person, I'm ashamed of you—fogh! how you stink of wine! D'ye think my niece will ever endure such a Borachio? you're an absolute Borachio.

Sir W. Borachio!

Lady W. At a time when you should commence an amour, and put your best foot foremost—

Sir W. 'Sheart! an you grutch me your liquor, make a bill; give me more drink, and take my purse. (Sings.)

Pr'ythee, fill me the glass
Till it laugh in my face,
With ale that is potent and mellow;
He that whines for a lass
Is an ignorant ass,
For a bumper has not its fellow.

But if you would have me marry my cousin, say the word, and I'll do't. Wilful will do't, that's the word; Wilful will do't, that's my crest; my motto I have forgotten.

Lady W. My nephew's a little overtaken, cousin; but 'tis with drinking your health. O my word, you are obliged to him—

Sir W. In vino veritas, aunt. If I drunk your health to-day, cousin, I am a Borachio. But if you have a mind to be married, say the word, and send for the piper: Wilful will do't. If not, dust it away, and let's have t'other round.—Tony, ods-heart! where's Tony? Tony's an honest fellow; but he spits after a bumper, and that's a fault. (Sings.)

We'll drink, and we'll never ha' done, boys.
Put the glass, then, around with the sun, boys.
Let Apollo's example invite us;
For he's drunk every night,
And that makes him so bright,
That he's able next morning to light us.

The sun's a good pimple, an honest soaker; he has a cellar at your Antipodes. If I travel, aunt, I touch at your Antipodes. Your Antipodes are a good, rascally sort of topsy-turvy fellows: if I had a bumper, I'd stand upon my head, and drink a health to 'em. A match or no match, cousin with the hard name? Aunt, Wilful will do't.

Mrs. Mill. Your pardon, madam; I can stay no longer: Sir Wilful grows very powerful. I shall be overcome, if I stay. Come, cousin.

[Exit Mrs. Mill. and Mrs. F.]

Lady W. He would poison a tallow-chandler and his family. Beastly creature! I know not what to do with him. Travel, quotha! ay, travel, travel! get thee gone, get thee gone! get thee but far enough—to the Saracens, or the Tartars, or the Turks; for thou art not fit to live in a Christian commonwealth, thou beastly pagan!

Sir W. Turks! no; no Turks, aunt: your Turks are infidels, and believe not in the grape. Your Mahometan, your Mussulman is a dry stinkard. No offence, aunt. My map says that your Turk is not so honest a man as your Christian. I cannot find by the map that your Mufti is orthodox; whereby it is a plain case, that orthodox is a hard word, aunt, and (hiccup) Greek for claret. (Sings.)

To drink is a Christian diversion,
Unknown to the Turk or the Persian;
Let Mahometan fools
Live by heathenish rules,
And be damn'd over tea-cups and coffee;
But let British lads sing,
Crown a health to the king,
And a fig for your sultan and Sophi.

Enter FOIBLE, and whispers LADY WISHFORT.
Eh, Tony!

Lady W. Sir Rowland impatient? Good lack! what shall I do with this beastly tumbrel? Go, lie down, and sleep, you sot; or, as I'm a person, I'll have you bastinadoed with broomsticks. Call up the wenches with broomsticks.

Sir W. Ahey! wenches, where are the wenches?

Lady W. Dear cousin Witwould get him away, and you will bind me to you inviolably. I have an affair of moment that invades me with some precipitation: you will oblige me to all futurity.

Wit. Come, knight—plague on him, I don't know what to say to him—Will you go to a cock-match?

Sir W. With a wench, Tony?

Wit. Horrible! he has a breath like a bagpipe.—Ay, ay; come, will you march, my Salopian?

Sir W. Lead on, little Tony; I'll follow thee, my Anthony, my Tanthony. Sirrah, thou shalt be my Tanthony, and I'll be thy pig—"And a fig for your sultan and Sophi." [Exit with Wit. and Foi.

Lady W. This will never do. It will never make a match; at least, before he has been abroad.

Enter WAITWELL, disguised as Sir Rowland.

Dear Sir Rowland, I am confounded with confusion at the retrospection of my own rudeness. I have more pardons to ask than the pope distributes in the year of jubilee: but I hope where there is likely to be so near an alliance, we may unbend the severity of decorum, and dispense with a little ceremony.

Wait. My impatience, madam, is the effect of my transport; and till I have the possession of your adorable person, I am tantalized on the rack, and do but hang, madam, on the tenter of expectation.

Lady W. You have excess of gallantry, Sir Rowland; and press things to a conclusion, with a most prevailing vehemence—But a day or two, for decency of marriage.

Wait. For decency of funeral, madam. The delay will break my heart; or, if that should fail, I shall be poison'd. My nephew will get an inkling of my designs, and poison me; and I would willingly starve him before I die: I would gladly go out of the world with that satisfaction. That would be some comfort to me, if I could but live so long as to be revenged on that unnatural viper.

Lady W. Is he so unnatural, say you? Truly I would contribute much both to the saving of your life, and the accomplishment of your revenge. Not that I respect myself, though he has been a perfidious wretch to me.

Wait. Perfidious to you!

Lady W. Oh! Sir Rowland, the hours that he has died away at my feet; the tears that he has felt; the trances and tremblings; the ardours and the ecstasies; the kneelings and the risings; the heart-heavings and the hand-gripings; the pangs and the pathetic regards of his protesting eyes; oh! no memory can register. [He dies!

Wait. What, my rival! Is the rebel my rival?

Lady W. No, don't kill him at once, Sir Rowland; starve him gradually, inch by inch.

Wait. I'll do't. In three weeks he shall be bare-foot; in a month, out at knees with begging an alms. He shall starve upward and upward, till he has nothing living but his head, and then go out like a candle's end upon a saveall.

Lady W. Well, Sir Rowland, you have the way; you are no novice in the labyrinth of love; you have the clue. But as I'm a person, Sir Rowland, you must not attribute my yielding to any sinister appetite, or indigestion of widowhood; nor impute my complacency to any lethargy of continence. I hope you do not think me prone to any iteration of Wait. Far be it from me. [nuptials.]

Lady W. If you do, I protest I must recede, or think that I have made a prostitution of decorums; but in the vehemence of compassion, and to save the life of a person of so much importance—

Wait. I esteem it so.

Lady W. Or else you wrong my condescension.

Wait. I do not, I do not.

Lady W. Indeed you do.

Wait. I do not, fair shrine of virtue!

Lady W. If you think the least scruple of carnality was an ingredient—

Wait. Dear madam, no. You are all camphire and frankincense; all chastity and odour.

Lady W. Or that—[Enter FOIBLE.]

Foi. Madam, the dancers are ready; and there's one with a letter, who must deliver it into your own hands.

Lady W. Sir Rowland, will you give me leave? Think favourably, judge candidly, and conclude you have found a person who would suffer racks in honour's cause, dear Sir Rowland, and will wait on you incessantly. [Exit.]

Wait. Fie, fie! What a slavery have I undergone! Spouse, hast thou any cordial? I want spirits.

Foi. What a washy rogue art thou, to pant thus for a quarter of an hour's lying and swearing to a lady!

Wait. Oh! she is the antidote to desire. By this hand, I'd rather be a chairman in the dog-days, than act Sir Rowland till this time to-morrow.

Enter LADY WISHFORT, with a letter.

Lady W. Call in the dancers. Sir Rowland, we'll sit, if you please, and see the entertainment. (A dance.) Now, with your permission, Sir Rowland, I will peruse my letter: I would open it in your presence, because I would not make you uneasy. If it should make you uneasy, I would burn it. Speak if it does—but you may see, the superscription is like a woman's hand.

Foi. By heaven! Mrs. Marwood's. I know it. My heart aches—Get it from her. (To Wait.)

Wait. A woman's hand? No, madam; that's no woman's hand, I see that already. That's somebody whose throat must be cut.

Lady W. Nay, Sir Rowland, since you give me a proof of your passion by your jealousy, I promise you I'll make a return, by a frank communication. You shall see it; we'll open it together. Look you here. (Reads.)—"Madam, though unknown to you—(Look you there, 'tis from nobody that I know)—I have that honour for your character, that I think myself obliged to let you know that you are abused. He who pretends to be Sir Rowland, is a cheat and a rascal"—Oh, heavens! what's this?

Foi. Unfortunate, all's ruined!

Wait. How, how! let me see, let me see!—(Reads.)—"A rascal and disguised, and suborned for that imposture."—Oh, villany! oh, villany!—"By the contrivance of"—

Lady W. I shall faint, I shall die—oh!

Foi. Say 'tis your nephew's hand. Quickly, his plot—swear it, swear it! (Apart.)

Wait. Here's a villain, madam! Don't you perceive it, don't you see it? [much.]

Lady W. Too well, too well! I have seen too

Wait. I told you at first I knew the hand. A woman's hand! The rascal writes a sort of a large hand; a Roman hand. I saw there was a throat to be cut presently. If he were my son, as he is my nephew, I'd pistol him.

Foi. Oh, treachery!—But are you sure, Sir Rowland, it is his writing?

Wait. Sure! Am I here? Do I live? Do I love this pearl of India? I have twenty letters in my pocket from him, in the same character.

Lady W. How!

Foi. Oh! what luck it is, Sir Rowland, that you were present at this juncture! this was the business that brought Mr. Mirabell disguised to Madam Milamant this afternoon. I thought something was contriving, when he stole by me and would have hidden his face.

Lady W. How, how! I heard the villain was in the house, indeed; and now I remember, my niece went away abruptly, when Sir Wilful was to have made his addresses.

Foi. Then, then, madam, Mr. Mirabell waited for her in her chamber; but I would not tell your ladyship, to discompose you when you were to receive Sir Rowland.

Wait. Enough; his date is short.

Foi. No, good Sir Rowland, don't incur the law.

Wait. Law! I care not for law. I can but die, and 'tis in a good cause. My lady shall be satisfied of my truth and innocence, though it cost me my life.

Lady W. No, dear Sir Rowland, don't fight. If you should be killed I must never shew my face; or hanged—Oh! consider my reputation, Sir Rowland—No, you sha'n't fight. I'll go in and examine my niece; I'll make her confess. I conjure you, Sir Rowland, by all your love, not to fight.

Wait. I am charmed, madam; I obey. But some proof you must let me give you; I'll go for a black box, which contains the writings of my whole estate, and deliver that into your hands.

Lady W. Ay, dear Sir Rowland, that will be some comfort—Bring the black box.

Wait. And may I presume to bring a contract to be signed this night? May I hope so far?

Lady W. Bring what you will; but come alive, pray come alive. Oh! this is a happy discovery.

Wait. Dead or alive I'll come; and married we will be in spite of treachery. Come, my buxom widow:

Ere long, you shall substantial proof receive
That I'm an arrant knight.

Foi. Or arrant knave.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.—SCENE I.—The same.

LADY WISHFORT and FOIBLE.

Lady W. Out of my house, out of my house, thou viper, thou serpent, that I have fostered! thou bosom traitress, that I raised from nothing! Begone, begone, begone, go, go! That I took from washing of old gauze and weaving of dead hair, with a bleak blue nose, over a chaffing-dish of starved embers, and dining behind a traverse-rag, in a shop no bigger than a bird-cage—go, go, starve again, do, do!

Foi. Dear madam, I'll beg pardon on my knees.

Lady W. Away, out, out! go set up for yourself again! do, drive a trade, do, with your three-pennyworth of small ware, flaunting upon a pack-thread, under a brandy-seller's bulk, or against a dead wall by a ballad-monger. Go, hang out an old frisoner-gorget, with a yard of yellow colberteen, do; an old gnawed mask, two rows of pins, and a child's fiddle; a glass necklace, with the beads broken, and a quilted night-cap with one ear. Go, go, drive a trade. These were your commodities, you treacherous trull! this was the merchandize you dealt in, when I took you into my house, placed you next myself, and made you governante of my whole family. You have forgotten this, have you, now you have feathered your nest?

Foi. No, no, dear madam. Do but hear me; have but a moment's patience, I'll confess all. Mr. Mirabell seduced me; I am not the first that he has wheedled with his dissembling tongue: your ladyship's own wisdom has been deluded by him, then how should I, a poor ignorant, defend myself? Oh! madam, if you knew but what he promised me, and how he assured me your ladyship should come to no damage; or else the wealth of the Indies should not have bribed me to conspire against so good, so sweet, so kind a lady as you have been to me.

Lady W. No damage! What, to betray me, and marry me to a cast-serving man? No damage! Oh! thou frontless impudence!

Foi. Pray, do but hear me, madam! He could not marry your ladyship, madam; no, indeed, his marriage was to have been void in law; for he was married to me first, to secure your ladyship. Yes, indeed, I inquired of the law in that case before I would meddle or make.

Lady W. What then, I have been your property, have I? I have been convenient to you, it seems, while you were catering for Mirabell, I have been broker for you? This exceeds all precedent; I am brought to fine uses, to become a botcher of second-hand marriages between Abigails and Andrews! I'll couple you. Yes, I'll baste you together, you and your Philander. I'll Duke's-place you, as I'm a person. Your turtle is in custody already: you shall coo in the same cage, if there be a constable or warrant in the parish. [Exit.]

Foi. Oh! that ever I was born! Oh! that I was ever married! A bride, ay, I shall be a Bridewell bride, oh!

Enter MRS. FAINALL.

Mrs. F. Poor Foible, what's the matter?

Foi. Oh! madam, my lady's gone for a constable; I shall be had to a justice, and put to Bridewell to beat hemp. Poor Waitwell's gone to prison already.

Mrs. F. Have a good heart, Foible; Mirabell's gone to give security for him. This is all Marwood's and my husband's doing.

Foi. Yes, yes, I know it, madam; she was in my lady's closet, and overheard all that you said to me before dinner. She sent the letter to my lady; and that missing effect, Mr. Fainall laid this plot to arrest Waitwell, when he pretended to go for the papers; and, in the meantime, Mrs. Marwood declared all to my lady.

Mrs. T. Was there no mention made of me in the letter? My mother does not suspect my being in the confederacy; I fancy Marwood has not told her, though she has told my husband.

Foi. Yes, madam; but my lady did not see that part: we stifled the letter before she read so far. Has that mischievous devil told Mr. Fainall of your ladyship, then?

Mrs. F. Ay, all's out; my affair with Mirabell, everything discovered. This is the last day of our living together, that's my comfort.

Foi. Indeed, madam, and so 'tis a comfort if you knew all: he has been even with your ladyship; which I could have told you long enough since; but I love to keep peace and quietness by my good will: I had rather bring friends together, than set them at a distance. But Mrs. Marwood and he are nearer related than ever their parents thought for.

Mrs. F. Say'st thou so, Foible? Canst thou prove this?

Foi. I can take my oath of it, madam; so can Mrs. Mincing. We have had many a fair word from Madam Marwood, to conceal something that passed in our chamber one evening when we were at Hyde-park; and we were thought to have gone a walking: but we went up unawares—though we were sworn to secrecy, too; Madam Marwood took a book, and swore us both upon it; but it was but a book of poems. So long as it was not a Bible oath, we may break it with a safe conscience.

Mrs. F. This discovery is the most opportune thing I could wish.—Now, Mincing.

Enter MINCING.

Min. My lady would speak with Mrs. Foible, mem. Mr. Mirabell is with her; he has set your spouse at liberty, Mrs. Foible, and would have you hide yourself in my lady's closet, till my old lady's anger is abated. Oh! my old lady is in a perilous passion at something Mr. Fainall has said; he swears, and my old lady cries. There's a fearful hurricane, I vow. He says, mem, now that he'll have my lady's fortune made over to him, or he'll be divorced.

Mrs. F. Does your lady or Mirabell know that?

Min. Yes, mem, they have sent me to see if Sir Wilful be sober, and to bring him to them. My lady is resolved to have him, I think, rather than lose such a vast sum as six thousand pounds. Oh! come, Mrs. Foible, I hear my old lady.

Mrs. F. Foible, you must tell Mincing, that she must prepare to vouch when I call her.

Foi. Yes, yes, madam.

Min. Oh! yes, mem, I'll vouch anything for your ladyship's service, be what it will. [Exit with Foi.]

Enter LADY WISHFORT and MRS. MARWOOD.

Lady W. Oh! my dear friend, how can I enumerate the benefits that I have received from your goodness? To you I owe the timely discovery of the false vows of Mirabell; to you I owe the detection of the impostor Sir Rowland; and now you are become an intercessor with my son-in-law, to save the honour of my house, and compound for the frailties of my daughter. Well, friend, you are enough to reconcile me to the bad world, or else I would retire to deserts and solitudes, and feed harmless sheep by groves and purling streams. Dear Marwood, let us leave the world, and retire by ourselves, and be shepherdesses.

Mrs. Mar. Let us first despatch the affair in hand, madam; we shall have leisure to think of retirement afterwards. Here is one who is concerned in the treaty.

Lady W. Oh! daughter, daughter, is it possible thou shouldst be my child, bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh? and, as I may say, another me, and yet transgress the minute particle of severe virtue? Is it possible you should lean aside to iniquity, who have been cast in the direct mould of virtue?

Mrs. F. I don't understand your ladyship.

Lady W. Not understand! Why, have you not been naught? have you not been sophisticated? Not understand? here I am ruined to compound for your caprices; I must part with my plate and my jewels, and ruin my niece, and all little enough—

Mrs. F. I am wronged and abused, and so are you. 'Tis a false accusation; as false as your friend there; ay, or your friend's friend, my false husband.

Mrs. Mar. My friend, Mrs. Fainall? your husband my friend! What do you mean?

Mrs. F. I know what I mean, madam, and so do you; and so shall the world, at a time convenient.

Mrs. Mar. I am sorry to see you so passionate, madam. More temper would look more like innocence—But I have done. I am sorry my zeal to serve your ladyship and family should admit of misconstruction, or make me liable to affronts. You will pardon me, madam, if I meddle no more with an affair, in which I am not personally concerned.

Lady W. Oh! dear friend, I am so ashamed that you should meet with such returns; you ought to ask pardon on your knees, ungrateful creature! she deserves more from you, than all your life can accomplish. Oh! don't leave me destitute in this perplexity; no, stick to me, my good genius.

Mrs. F. I tell you, madam, you're abused.—Stick to you! ay, like a leach, to suck your best blood: she'll drop off, when she's full. Madam, you sha'n't pawn a bodkin, nor part with a brass counter, in composition for me. Let 'em prove their aspersions; I know my own innocence, and dare stand a trial. [Exit.]

Lady W. Why, if she should be innocent; if she should be wronged after all, eh? I don't know what to think; and I promise you, her education has been very unexceptionable; I may say it; for I chiefly made it my own care to initiate her very infancy in the rudiments of virtue, and to impress upon her tender years a young odium and aversion to the very sight of men; ay, friend, she would ha' shrieked if she had but seen a man, till she was in her teens. As I'm a person, 'tis true. She was never suffered to play with a male child, though but in coats; nay, her very babies were of the feminine gender. Oh! she never looked a man in the face, but her own father, or the chaplain; and him we made a shift to put upon her for a woman, by the help of his long garments and his sleek face, till she was going in her fifteen.

Mrs. Mar. 'Twas much she should be deceived so long.

Lady W. I warrant you, or she would never have borne to be catechized by him, and have heard his long lectures against singing and dancing, and such debaucheries, and going to filthy plays, and profane music-meetings. Oh! she would have swooned at the sight or name of an obscene play-book: and can I think, after all this, that my daughter can be naught? and thought it excommunication to set her foot within the door of a playhouse. Oh! dear friend, I can't believe it. No, no; as she says, let him prove it, let him prove it!

Mrs. Mar. Prove it, madam! what, and have your name prostituted in a public court; yours and your daughter's reputation worried at the bar by a pack of bawling lawyers! to be ushered in with an O-yes of scandal; and have your case opened by an old fumbler, in a coif like a man-midwife, to bring your daughter's infamy to light; to be a theme for legal punsters and quibblers by the statute; and become a jest, against a rule of court, where there is no precedent for a jest in any record; not even in Domesday-book; to discompose the gravity of the bench, and provoke naughty interrogatories in more naughty law Latin.

Lady W. Oh! 'tis very hard!

Mrs. Mar. And, then, to have my young revelers of the Temple take notes, like 'prentices at a conventicle; and after talk it over again in commons, or before drawers in an eating-house.

Lady W. Worse and worse!

Mrs. Mar. Nay, this is nothing; if it would end here, 'twere well. But it must after this be consigned by the short-hand writers to the public press, and from thence be transferred to the hands, nay, into the throats and lungs of hawkers, with voices more licentious than the loud flounder-man's; and this you must hear till you are stunned; nay, you must hear nothing else for some days.

Lady W. Oh! 'tis insupportable. No, no, dear friend; make it up, make it up! ay, ay, I'll compound. I'll give up all, myself and my all, my niece and her all; anything, everything, for composition.

Mrs. Mar. Nay, madam, I advise nothing; I only lay before you, as a friend, the inconveniences which perhaps you have overseen. Here comes Mr. Fainall; if he will be satisfied to huddle up all in silence, I shall be glad. You must think I would rather congratulate than condole with you.

Enter FAINALL.

Lady W. Ay, ay, I do not doubt it, dear Marwood: no, no, I do not doubt it.

Fain. Well, madam, I have suffered myself to be overcome by the importunity of this lady, your friend; and am content you shall enjoy your own proper estate during life, on condition you oblige yourself never to marry, under such penalty as I think convenient.

Lady W. Never to marry!

Fain. No more Sir Rowlands; the next imposture may not be so timely detected.

Mrs. Mar. That condition, I dare answer, my lady will consent to without difficulty; she has already but too much experienced the perfidiousness of men. Besides, madam, when we retire to our pastoral solitude, we shall bid adieu to all other thoughts.

Lady W. Ay, that's true.

Fain. Next, my wife shall settle on me the remainder of her fortune, not made over already; and for her maintenance depend entirely on my discretion.

Lady W. This is most inhumanly savage; exceeding the barbarity of a Muscovite husband.

Fain. I learned it from his czarish majesty's retinue, in a winter evening's conference over brandy and pepper, amongst other secrets of matrimony and policy, as they are at present practised in the northern hemisphere. But this must be agreed unto, and that positively. Lastly, I will be endowed, in right of my wife, with that six thousand pounds, which is the moiety of Mrs. Millamant's fortune in your possession, and which she has forfeited (as will appear by the last will and testament of your deceased husband, Sir Jonathan Wishfort) by her disobedience in contracting herself against your consent or knowledge; and by refusing the offered match with Sir Wilful Witwould, which you, like a careful aunt, had provided for her.

Lady W. My nephew was non compos, and could not make his addresses.

Fain. I come to make demands; I'll hear no objections.

Lady W. You will grant me time to consider?

Fain. Yes, while the instrument is drawing, to which you must set your hand till more sufficient deeds can be perfected, which I will take care shall be done with all possible speed; in the meanwhile, I will go for the said instrument, and, till my return, you may balance this matter in your own discretion. [Exit.]

Lady W. This insolence is beyond all precedent, all parallel. Must I be subject to this merciless villain?

Mrs. Mar. 'Tis severe, indeed, madam, that you should smart for your daughter's failings.

Lady W. 'Twas against my consent that she married this barbarian; but she would have him, though her year was not out. Ah! her first husband, my son Languish, would not have carried it thus. Well, that was my choice, this is hers; she is matched now with a witness: I shall be mad, dear friend. Is there no comfort for me? Must I live to be confiscated at this rebel-rate? Here come two more of my Egyptian plagues, too.

Enter MRS. MILLAMANT and SIR WILFUL.

Sir W. Aunt, your servant.

Lady W. Out, caterpillar! call not me aunt; I know thee not.

Sir W. I confess I have been a little in disguise, as they say—'Sheart! and I'm sorry for't. What would you have? I hope I committed no offence, aunt; and if I did, I am willing to make satisfaction; and what can a man say fairer? If I have broken anything, I'll pay for't, an it cost a pound; and so let that content for what's past, and make no more words. For what's to come, to pleasure you, I'm willing to marry my cousin: so, pray, let's all be friends; she and I are agreed upon the matter before a witness.

Lady W. How's this, dear niece? Have I any comfort? Can this be true?

Mrs. Mill. I am content to be a sacrifice to your repose, madam; and to convince you that I had no hand in the plot, as you were misinformed, I have laid my commands on Mirabell to come in person, and be a witness that I give my hand to this flower of knighthood; and for the contract that passed between Mirabell and me, I have obliged him to make a resignation of it in your ladyship's presence: he is without, and waits your leave for admittance.

Lady W. Well, I'll swear I am something revived at this testimony of your obedience; but I cannot admit that traitor: I fear I cannot fortify myself to support his appearance. He is as terrible to me as a Gorgon; if I see him, I fear I shall turn to stone, and petrify incessantly.

Mrs. Mill. If you disoblige him, he may resent your refusal, and insist upon the contract still. Then 'tis the last time he will be offensive to you.

Lady W. Are you sure it will be the last time? If I were sure of that—Shall I never see him again?

Mrs. Mill. Sir Wilful, you and he are to travel together, are you not?

Sir W. 'Sheart! the gentleman's a civil gentleman, aunt; let him come in: why we are sworn brothers, and fellow-travellers. We are to be Py-lades and Orestes, he and I; he is to be my interpreter in foreign parts. He has been over seas once already; and with proviso that I marry my cousin, will cross 'em once again, only to bear me company. 'Sheart! I'll call him in; an I set on't once, he shall come in, and see who'll hinder him. (Goes to the door, and hems.)

Mrs. Mar. This is precious fooling, if it would pass; but I'll know the bottom of it.

Lady W. Oh! dear Marwood, you are not going?

Mrs. Mar. Not far, madam; I'll return immediately. [Exit.]

Enter MIRABELL.

Sir W. Look up, man, I'll stand by you. 'Sbud! an she do frown, she can't kill you; besides, hark-ye! she dare not frown desperately, because her face is none of her own: 'sheart! and she should, her forehead would wrinkle like the coat of a cream-cheese; but mum for that, fellow-traveller.

Mir. If a deep sense of the many injuries I have offered to so good a lady, with a sincere remorse, and a hearty contrition, can but obtain the least glance of compassion, I am too happy. Ah! madam, there was a time, but let it be forgotten; I confess I have deservedly forfeited the high place I once held, of sighing at your feet! nay, kill me not, by turning from me in disdain, I come not to plead for favour; nay, not for pardon; I am a suppliant only for pity; I am going where I never shall behold you more. [yourself, then.]

Sir W. How, fellow-traveller! you shall go by

Mir. Let me be pitied first, and afterwards forgotten: I ask no more.

Sir W. By'r lady, a very reasonable request, and will cost you nothing, aunt. Come, come, forgive and forget, aunt; why you must, an you are a Christian.

Mir. Consider, madam, in reality, you could not receive much prejudice; it was an innocent device, though I confess it had a face of guiltiness; it was at most, an artifice which love contrived; and errors which love produces, have ever been accounted venial. At least, think it is punishment enough, that I have lost what in my heart I hold most dear; that to your cruel indignation I have offered up this beauty, and with her, my peace and quiet; nay, all my hopes of future comfort.

Sir W. An he does not move me, would I may never be o'the quorum. An it were not as good a deed as to drink, to give her to him again, I would I might never take shipping. Aunt, if you don't forgive quickly, I shall melt, I can tell you that. My contract went no further than a little mouth-glue, and that's hardly dry; one doleful sigh more from my fellow-traveller, and 'tis dissolved.

Lady W. Well, nephew, upon your account—Ah! he has a false, insinuating tongue. Well, sir, I will stifle my just resentment, at my nephew's request; I will endeavour what I can to forget, but on proviso that you resign the contract with my niece immediately.

Mir. It is in writing, and with papers of concern; but I have sent my servant for it, and will deliver it to you with all acknowledgments for your transcendent goodness.

Lady W. Oh! he has witchcraft in his eyes and tongue. When I did not see him, I could have bribed a villain to his assassination; but his appearance rakes the embers which have so long lain smothered in my breast. (Aside.)

Enter FAINALL and MRS. MARWOOD.

Fain. Your debate of deliberation, madam, is expired. Here is the instrument, are you prepared to sign?

Lady W. If I were prepared, I am not empowered. My niece exerts a lawful claim, having matched herself, by my direction, to Sir Wilful.

Fain. That sham is too gross to pass on me; though 'tis imposed on you, madam.

Mrs. Mill. Sir, I have given my consent.

Mir. And, sir, I have resigned my pretensions.

Sir W. And, sir, I assert my right; and will maintain it in defiance of you, sir, and of your instrument. 'Sheart! an you talk of an instrument, sir, I have an old fox by my thigh shall hack your instrument of ram vellum to shreds, sir: it shall not be sufficient for a mittimus, or a tailor's measure; therefore, withdraw your instrument, or by'r lady, I shall draw mine.

Lady W. Hold, nephew, hold!

Mrs. Mill. Good Sir Wilful, respite your valour.

Fain. Indeed! Are you provided of your guard, with your single beef-eater there? But I am prepared for you; and insist upon my first proposal. You shall submit your own estate to my management, and absolutely make over my wife's to my sole use, as pursuant to the purport and tenor of this other covenant. I suppose, madam, your consent is not requisite in this case; nor, Mr. Mirabell, your resignation; nor, Sir Wilful, your right. You may draw your fox, if you please, sir, and make a bear-garden flourish somewhere else; for here it will not avail. This, my Lady Wishfort, must be subscribed, or your darling daughter's turned adrift, to sink or swim, as she and the current of this lewd town can agree.

Lady W. Is there no means, no remedy, to stop my ruin? Ungrateful wretch! dost thou not owe thy being, thy subsistence to my daughter's fortune?

Fain. I'll answer you when I have the rest of it in my possession.

Mir. But that you would not accept of a remedy from my hands—I own I have not deserved you should owe any obligation to me; or else, perhaps, I could advise.

Lady W. Oh! what, what? to save me and my child from ruin, from want, I'll forgive all that's past; nay, I'll consent to anything to come, to be delivered from this tyranny.

Mir. Ay, madam; but that is too late; my reward is intercepted. You have disposed of her, who only could have made me a compensation for all my services? but be it as it may, I am resolved I'll serve you; you shall not be wronged in this savage manner.

Lady W. How, dear Mr. Mirabell, can you be so generous at last! But it is not possible. Hark-ye! I'll break my nephew's match; you shall have my niece yet, and all her fortune, if you can but save me from this imminent danger.

Mir. Will you? I take you at your word. I ask no more. I must have leave for two criminals to appear.

Lady W. Ay, ay; anybody, anybody!

Mir. Foible is one, and a penitent.

Enter MRS. FAINALL, FOIBLE, and MINCING.

Mrs. Mar. Oh! my shame! (Mirabell and Lady W. go to Mrs. F. and Foible.) these corrupt things are brought hither to expose me. (To Fainall.)

Fain. If it must all come out, why let 'em know it; 'tis but the way of the world: that shall not urge me to relinquish one tittle of my terms; no, I will insist the more. [of it.]

Foi. Yes, indeed, madam, I'll take my Bible oath

Min. And so will I, mem.

Lady W. Oh! Marwood, Marwood, art thou false? My friend deceive me! Hast thou been a wicked accomplice with that profligate man?

Mrs. Mar. Have you so much ingratitude and injustice to give credit against your friend, to the aspersions of two such mercenary trulls?

Min. Mercenary, mem! I scorn your words. 'Tis true we found you and Mr. Fainall in the blue garret; by the same token, you swore us to secrecy upon Messalina's poems. Mercenary! no, if we would have been mercenary, we should have held our tongues; you would have bribed us sufficiently.

Fain. Go, you are an insignificant thing. Well, what are you the better for this? Is this Mr. Mirabell's expedient? I'll be put off no longer; you, thing, that was a wife, shall smart for this.

Mrs. F. I despise you, and defy your malice; you have aspersed me wrongfully. I have proved your falsehood: go, you and your treacherous—I will not blame it, but starve together; perish.

Fain. Not while you are worth a groat, indeed, my dear; madam, I'll be fooled no longer.

Lady W. Ah! Mr. Mirabell, this is small comfort, the detection of this affair.

Mir. Oh! in good time. Your leave for the other offender and penitent to appear, madam.

Enter WAITWELL, with a box of writings.

Lady W. Oh! Sir Rowland—Well, rascal.

Wait. What your ladyship pleases. I have brought the black box at last, madam. [promise.]

Mir. Give it me, madam; you remember your Lady W. Ay, dear sir.

Mir. Where are the gentlemen?

Wait. At hand, sir, rubbing their eyes; just risen from sleep.

Fain. 'Sdeath! what's this to me? I'll not wait your private concerns.

Enter PETULANT and WITWOULD.

Pet. How now, what's the matter? whose hand's out?

Wit. Heyday! what, are you all together, like players at the end of the last act?

Mir. You may remember, gentlemen, I once requested your hands as witnesses to a certain parchment. [set his mark.]

Wit. Ay, I do, my hand I remember; Petulant

Mir. You wrong him, his name is fairly written, as shall appear. You do not remember, gentlemen, anything of what that parchment contained. (Undoing the box.)

Wit. No.

Pet. Not I. I writ, I read nothing. [promise.]

Mir. Very well, now you shall know. Madam, your Lady W. Ay, ay, sir, upon my honour.

Mir. Mr. Fainall, it is now time that you should know, that your lady, while she was at her own disposal, and before you had, by your insinuations, wheedled her out of a pretended settlement of the greatest part of her fortune—

Fain. Sir, pretended!

Mir. Yes, sir; I say, that this lady, while a widow, having it seems received some cautions respecting your inconstancy and tyranny of temper, which, from her own partial opinion and fondness of you, she could never have suspected; she did, I say, by the wholesome advice of friends, and of sages learned in the laws of this land, deliver this same as her act and deed to me in trust, and to the uses within mentioned. You may read if you please, (holding out the parchment) though, perhaps, what is written on the back may serve your occasions.

Fain. Very likely, sir. What's here? D—n! (Reads.) "A deed of conveyance of the whole estate real of Arabella Languish, widow, in trust to Edward Mirabell." Confusion!

Mir. Even so, sir; 'tis the way of the world, sir; of the widows of the world. I suppose this deed may bear an elder date than what you have obtained from your lady.

Fain. Perfidious fiend! then thus I'll be revenged. (Offers to run at Mrs. Fainall.)

Sir W. Hold, sir; now you may make your bear-garden flourish somewhere else, sir.

Fain. Mirabell, you shall hear of this, sir; be sure you shall. Let me pass, oaf! [Exit.]

Mrs. F. Madam, you seem to stifle your resentment: you had better give it vent.

Mrs. Mar. Yes, it shall have vent, and to your confusion, or I'll perish in the attempt. [Exit.]

Lady W. Oh! daughter, daughter; 'tis plain thou hast inherited thy mother's prudence.

Mrs. F. Thank Mr. Mirabell, a cautious friend, to whose advice all is owing.

Lady W. Well, Mr. Mirabell, you have kept your promise, and I must perform mine. First, I pardon, for your sake, Sir Rowland there and Foible; the next thing is to break the matter to my nephew, and how to do that—

Mir. For that, madam, give yourself no trouble. Let me have your consent; Sir Wilful is my friend; he has had compassion upon lovers, and generously engaged a volunteer in this action for our service, and now designs to prosecute his travels.

Sir W. 'Sheart, aunt, I have no mind to marry. My cousin's a fine lady, and the gentleman loves her, and she loves him, and they deserve one another. My resolution is to see foreign parts; I have set on't; and when I'm set on't, I must do't. And if these two gentlemen would travel, too, I think they may be spared.

Pet. For my part, I say little; I think things are best, off or on.

Wait. Egad! I understand nothing of the matter; I'm in a maze yet, like a dog in a dancing-school.

Lady W. Well, sir, take her, and with her all the joy I can give you.

Mrs. Mill. Why does not that man take me? Would you have me give myself to you over again?

Mir. Ay, and over and over again. (Kisses her hand.) I would have you as often as I possibly can. Well, heaven grant I love you not too well, that's all my fear.

Sir W. 'Sheart! you'll have time enough to toy after you're married; or if you will toy now, let us have a dance in the meantime; that we who are not lovers may have some other employment, besides looking on.

Mir. With all my heart, dear Sir Wilful. What shall we do for music?

Foi. Oh! sir, some that were provided for Sir Rowland's entertainment are within call. (A dance.)

Lady W. As I'm a person, I can hold out no longer; I have wasted my spirits so to-day already, that I am ready to sink under the fatigue; and I cannot but have some fears upon me yet, that my son Fainall will pursue some desperate course.

Mir. Madam, disquiet not yourself on that account; to my knowledge, his circumstances are such, he must of force comply. For my part, I will contribute all that in me lies to a re-union; in the meantime, madam, (to Mrs. Fainall) let me before these witnesses, restore to you this deed of trust; it may be a means, well managed, to make you live easily together.

From hence, let those be warn'd, who mean to wed,
Lest mutual falsehood stain the bridal-bed:

For each deceiver to his cost may find,
That marriage frauds too oft are paid in kind.

[Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in Aurora's house.

Enter AURORA, followed by LEONARDA.

Aur. Undone, ruined and undone, past redemption!

Leon. Well, madam, I can't help applauding my own sagacity, for I always thought your writing to Don Carlos would come to no good.

Aur. And why did you not say so, pray? I'm sure it was chiefly by your advice I did it.

Leon. Do you think, ma'am, Don Carlos will be here to-night?

Aur. I expected him last night, you know, and shall expect every moment till I hear farther from him.

Leon. And, bless us all, what do you intend to do?

Aur. Softly, here is my brother.

Enter DON PEDRO PACHECO, who throws himself into a chair.

Leon. (Apart to Aurora.) Mercy on us, how cross he looks!

Don P. Leonarda, leave the room.

Leon. (Aside.) With all my heart; I am very glad to be out of the way. [Exit.]

Don P. You know, sister, when our father died, a very considerable succession devolved to me: however, being then with my regiment at Naples, I did not come to take possession, but left everything to your care and management.

Aur. I hope, sir, you have had no reason to repent—

Don P. Pray, hear me out. A particular friend writ me word, that in the month of April last, you left your lodgings, with Don Alonzo de Ribbera; and that while you were walking together on the Prado, another cavalier came up, charged him sword in hand, and killed him on the spot. In a word, it is this intelligence that has brought me here to Madrid.

Enter LEONARDA.

Leon. Don Ferdinand, sir, the nephew of Don Guzman, is below, and desires to be admitted to you.

Don P. Don Ferdinand! Shew him up.

Leon. (Calling at the door.) Shew the gentleman up, Lopez.

Don P. Sister, retire into the next room for a few minutes; and I desire that what has just now passed between us, may go no farther to any one.

Leon. (Apart to Aurora.) Well, ma'am, what was it he had to tell you?

Aur. (Apart to Leon.) Oh! Leonarda, he knows all.

Leon. (Apart.) What, ma'am, does he know the history of the wainscot?

Aur. (Apart.) Hush! not that, thank heaven; but everything else. [Exit with Leon.]

Enter DON FERDINAND.

Don F. Don Pedro, I rejoice to find you.

Don P. Your air speaks a mind in agitation; what's the matter?

Don F. Don Carlos is at this moment in Madrid.

Don P. You are positive you saw Don Carlos?

Don F. I am as positive it was him as that I this moment see you. Now, as I am shortly to be married to my cousin, it is highly incumbent upon me to render myself acceptable to my uncle; and, I am certain I can do nothing more likely to please him, than taking vengeance on the man who killed his son. I, therefore, expect that you will lend me your assistance upon so interesting an occasion, and accompany me to the place where the servant is ready to lead us.

Don P. I will most willingly do what you desire. Lopez, my sword; tell my sister, I shall be in again presently. [Exeunt.]

Enter AURORA and LEONARDA.

Aur. Oh! too sure, too sure he is come; and they are gone to destroy him.

Leon. (A bell rings.) Hist, ma'am, hist!

Aur. What ails you?

Leon. Hark!

Aur. How now!

Leon. (Bell rings again.) As I hope to be saved, I heard the little bell ring below; he's come here, and is now at the garden-door.

Enter DON CARLOS DE PIMENTEL and MUSKATO.

Don C. Beautiful Aurora!

Aur. You cannot think how rejoiced I am to see you at this moment: yet, I fear, the asylum I have to offer you will not prove so much to our wishes as my letters to Portugal made you hope; for my brother arrived here from Italy, yesterday.

Don C. Your brother!

Aur. I had no notice of his coming; otherwise, you may be sure, I should have apprized you, that you might have deferred your journey, at least, for some time.

Don C. It will be impossible for me to stay in your house, then.

Aur. Why so? I have prepared a retreat for you, where his utmost cunning will never be able to find you.

Musk. Ay, ma'am, but the constables—

Leon. Nor they, neither; hear my lady out.

Aur. This house consists, like many others in Madrid, but of two stories: the upper, I occupy myself; the lower, which, on my father's death, I found I had no occasion for, I let to one Octavio, a wine-merchant; on this division of the building, a back staircase, which made the communication between the two stories, with a small closet adjoining, became useless; and, by mutual consent, was stopped up, by a partition on the side of the apartment below, as well as on this. When I had thoughts of bringing you back to Madrid, it occurred to me that the partition on my side might again be secretly opened, and prepared in such a manner as would effectually screen you from any search, should it ever be suspected that you were in the house: accordingly, the thing is done; (going to the back-scene, she pushes back a panel, which discovers the head of a staircase) and this moveable panel will, when you please, admit you into a place of security; and, when fastened on the inside—

Don C. Excuse me, ma'am, I have too grateful a sense of your kindness, to avail myself of a retreat which must expose you. In this emergency, the most simple way is to return to the place from whence I came.

Musk. That's my advice, sir; let us go to the inn directly, take our mules, o'God's name, and set off. Ladies, my master and I have the honour of wishing you all health and happiness.

Aur. You have, by some accident or other, been seen since you came to Madrid by young Ferdinand, the nephew of Don Guzman de Ribbera. His servant dogged you to your inn; and he and my brother are just gone in search of you.

Don C. Don't be alarmed; we have arms to defend ourselves.

Musk. (Getting behind his master.) No, no, ladies, don't be alarmed.

Aur. Talk not of defence, I beseech you; but, in pity to me, and out of regard to yourself, go into the place I have shewn you for this night: my brother will certainly go out early in the morning; and we will then consult together for your better and safer accommodation.

Musk. What the lady says, sir, is just and reasonable: I have considered the matter; and if you don't do it, I'll give myself up to justice immediately, and try to be admitted king's evidence.

Don C. I'll do anything for your safety.

Aur. For my safety be it, then.

Leon. Here, here, get you in. The closet's on the left hand, where you'll find a bed and a pallet; we'll be sure to come to you early in the morning; and, in the meantime, for your lives, don't come out upon any account whatsoever.

Aur. No, upon no account. Come, let us go into the next room.

Musk. Hip! Signora Leonarda, won't you leave us a bottle and a crust?

Leon. Feel in the closet. [Exeunt.]

Enter DON PEDRO PACHECO, sheathing his sword, followed by DON FERDINAND.

Don P. So, at length we are got into, at least, a temporary shelter. Who is the person we have wounded?

Don F. I think some one said, the secretary of the Duke of Medina.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, Signor Octavio, the wine-merchant below, desires to speak to you.

Enter OCTAVIO.

Oct. I understand, Don Pedro, you have had a scuffle in the street; you are known; and the person you have wounded is the Duke of Medina himself.

Don P. Fatal accident! the Duke himself!

Don F. Why do you stand like one confounded? Do you not hear what Signor Octavio says? You and your family must be gone from hence; I will stay behind and see your goods removed with all possible diligence.

Oct. What is most valuable may be put into my warehouse in half-an-hour; and if Don Pedro will commit the key of his apartments to my charge, I will do my utmost to quash whatever inquiries may be made after him.

Don P. Get a coach to the door, and call hither my sister and her maid; I must dispose of them in safety, the first thing I do.

[Exeunt Don Ferdinand and Octavio.]

Enter AURORA and LEONARDA.

Aur. What are your commands, sir?

Don P. Don Ferdinand came hither just now, to desire I would accompany him on an affair of honour; but we have missed the person we went in search of, and, by mistake, assaulted another, who proves to be the Duke of Medina.

Aur. Well, sir, and what—

Don P. I must withdraw immediately to a place of safety; and, before we part, I will see you and your maid lodged in a nunnery.

Leon. I am sure I'll not go into a nunnery.

Don P. Then I'm sure you shall go into the street. Come, give me both your hands: (seizing a hand of each) nay, no struggling. [Exeunt.]

Enter OCTAVIO and several Officers.

Oct. Come in, gentlemen; come in, and welcome; but why force the door? I had the key in my possession, and would have willingly opened it for you.

1 Offi. I want a gentleman called Don Pedro; my people understand these are his lodgings.

Oct. Don Pedro?

1 Offi. Ay, ay; you know him well enough.

Oct. I knew a sister of his who had these lodgings; but, as you may see, she has been gone from them some time.

1 Offi. (To his people.) Well, have you found any one?

Oct. That Don Pedro you look for is not here, I assure you, gentlemen; you may credit what I say. (Gives money.)

1 Offi. To be sure, Don Guzman, since you say the gentleman is not here, we'll take your word. Come along, comrades. [Exeunt Officers.]

Enter DON GUZMAN DE RIBBERA.

Don G. My nephew has told me all, and I suppose you would give this tenement a bargain to any one that would take it off your hands?

Oct. To be sure, sir, on an occasion like this—

Don G. You would be glad to take anything you could get; isn't that what you were going to say? so, if twenty dollars a month will be sufficient, I'll e'en hire the premises for my own use, and take possession directly.

Oct. Surely, sir, twenty dollars are too little.

Don G. Well, but consider, it's doing the young man a favour; and, belike, seeing my family in the house would satisfy the police, and prevent further inquiries.

Oct. I really think, sir, that as your chief motive for taking the apartment is to serve Don Pedro, the sooner you and your family come into it the better.

Don G. I am of that opinion too; and as, very luckily, my time is just up where I now lodge, and I want some larger rooms, in consequence of my daughter's marriage, which I shall shortly celebrate, I shall send to you for the key within this half hour.

Oct. You will oblige me, Don Guzman, by charging yourself with the key now; for having a small vineyard near town, I have shut up my place below, and sent all my servants, men and women, to work there.

Don G. And you want to go yourself, is it not so?

Oct. I thought of setting off before this, and staying for the remainder of the week, had not Don Pedro's affairs detained me.

Don G. Well, well, go your ways, and mind your business; I'll take the key from you. [Exeunt.]

Enter DON CARLOS DE PIMENTEL and MUSKATO.

Musk. They are gone out again, and have locked the door upon us.

Don C. Did you hear all that has passed, Muskato?

Musk. Yes, sir, every word of it; but don't grow desperate upon that account, things are not so bad as we expected; this is a respite, at least, if not a reprieve.

Don C. A respite! Has not Don Guzman taken this house over my head, and am I not by that means in the hands of my most cruel and avowed enemy?

Musk. Yes, sir, but he does not know you are in his hands; and by some fortunate means or other, you may, perhaps, contrive to slip through his fingers.

Don C. To complete my misfortune, too, the merchant below is gone out with his family, and has shut up his doors; so that my retreat is stopped that way. By forcing the lock of the door, we may get out before our enemy returns; I know the danger of shewing myself at this hour in the streets, but—

Musk. Oh! sir, nothing is so dangerous as staying here, if we can get out; so, pray, let us force the door; I have broken a lock before now upon a less justifiable occasion; and, if you'll lend me your assistance, I'll do my endeavour to master this. (Goes to the door, and returns in a fright.) Quick, sir, quick; get back to the staircase.

Don C. What's the matter?

Musk. Don Guzman's people are in the house; come here, and hide yourself, and ask no questions. [Exeunt behind the panel.]

Enter BEATRICE and LAZARILLO.

Beat. And so, these are the lodgings we are in such a hurry to leave our old ones for?

Laz. Ay; how do you like them?

Beat. Like them, not at all; I never saw such a battered barrack in my days. Who could build the dog-hole? In the first place, that door has not common sense in it; then the stairs are the wrong way; and the windows, mercy on us! what pigeon-holes! and a mile and a half from the ground.

Laz. Ay, there's the fault; you want to be gaping and staring into the street.

Beat. Lazarillo, run to the old gentleman, and tell him if he has not already signed the agreement, he must by no means take this house. I hear a coach; sure, it is not my lady already?

Laz. But it is though; you had better tell her you don't like the house.

Beat. So I shall, I promise you.

Enter MARCELLA.

La! ma'am, you are in great haste; I did not expect to see you these three hours.

Mar. I set out to oblige my father; nothing would satisfy him but I must come directly to see the apartments, and dispose of the furniture according to my own fancy.

Beat. Furniture, ma'am! I'm sure it's a pity to put any into them; if the kennel were mine I should think of nothing but pulling it down, and selling the rubbish to the best bidder.

Laz. Mrs. Beatrice is difficult to please, ma'am.

Mar. My father tells me, Lazarillo, that it is to please your master he takes these lodgings; and I suppose it is by his desire that we come to them so suddenly. Do you know the reason of Don Ferdinand's extraordinary attachment?

Laz. Why, ma'am, I am generally pretty well acquainted with my master's secrets.

Mar. I beg your pardon; I did not know it was any secret, or I should not have asked.

Laz. Oh! ma'am, there's no secret; that is to say, no absolute secret; but as far as this here, ma'am, the air and situation, I believe—

Beat. In short, ma'am, Signor Lazarillo is a person who seldom chooses to seem ignorant of anything. Did your master ever tell you why he liked these lodgings?

Laz. I can't say he ever did.

Beat. Then you can give my lady no satisfaction as to her question.

Laz. Well, Mrs. Beatrice, I did not speak to you.

Mar. Never mind her, Lazarillo, but go and take care of those things I brought in the coach. [Exit Lazarillo.] Ah, Beatrice!

Beat. Ay, ma'am, here I am.

Mar. I feel myself very unhappy.

Beat. Oh, fie! ma'am, to tell me so, on the eve of your marriage, as it were.

Mar. 'Tis the thought of that makes me melancholy.

Beat. Is it, indeed? I'm sure, then, ma'am, you and I are of very different dispositions. I wish I were going to be married; the deuce a thing should I think of but what would make me very glad.

Mar. How, Beatrice! suppose you were going to set out upon a journey, which presented you with the most beautiful prospect; but on the first advances you made, you found yourself on the brink of a precipice, what would you do?

Beat. A very great precipice, do you mean; or only a little sort of a declivity?

Mar. Psha! I'm not in a jesting humour.

Beat. Well, but, ma'am, let me understand you. You ask me, if I were going to set out on a journey which presented me with the most beautiful prospect, and on the first advances I made I found myself on the brink of a precipice, what I would do?

Mar. Ay.

Beat. Why, then, ma'am, I'll tell you: in case it was not a very ugly precipice indeed, I would muster up all my strength, shut my eyes, so, and give a great jump.

Mar. In short, Beatrice, my cousin, Don Ferdinand—

Beat. (Stopping her mistress.) He's here, ma'am.

Enter DON FERDINAND.

Don F. How happy am I to arrive at a moment when you pronounce my name!

Mar. I had just begun to talk to Beatrice, when your coming into the room interrupted me. I will take up the discourse again, if you please; and finish what I was going to say to her.

Don F. I am content.

Beat. Stand there, then, sir; and we'll proceed in our discourse as if you were fifty miles off. Come, ma'am, begin.

Mar. I say, then, Beatrice, my cousin, Don Ferdinand, no doubt, imagines that marriage is a dispensation from the subaltern duties exacted by complaisance, since he already begins to fail in those marks of tenderness and regard I expected to find from him: he forgets that love is nourished by attention; and that the slightest negligence kills it.

Don F. Ah! dear Marcella, did you know how uneasy you make me by this kind of discourse.

Mar. And why uneasy? what I spoke was said to Beatrice; and you need take no notice of it, as you need not be supposed to overhear.

Beat. That's right, ma'am; and to let you know another thing, sir, you are not to take the words out of my mouth; my lady spoke to me, and it's my part to answer; and here's the way I do it:—I suppose, ma'am, Don Ferdinand is like the rest of his sex; who, for the most part, follow women as they hunt hares and foxes; when the animal's caught, the sport is over. I once had a sweetheart myself, ma'am, that used to call me his queen, and his goddess; and made verses, and repeated such moving lines as these to me:

*"When first I attempted your pity to move,
You seem'd deaf to my sighs and my prayers;
Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love,
But why did you kick me down stairs?"*

Come, ma'am, give him your hand to kiss, and tell him you are friends with him. Look you there, sir, I knew it. There's nothing does with us like a little coaxing.

Don F. (Kissing Marcella's hand.) Your father, my dear, is determined to have our wedding a public one; and Saturday next, he assures me, shall be the happy day. Just as I left home, a good many of your things were brought, which I have ordered to be sent here, with some boxes of rich wine and foreign sweetmeats, for the ball I intend to give a select number of our friends, to-morrow night. In the meantime, I'll step back to the old lodgings to see things properly taken care of. Lazarillo, bring up those parcels. And you, Mrs. Beatrice, will not find yourself forgotten. [Exit.]

Beat. Oh! then, there's something for me. I suppose it's the new gown he promised to give me; and that your mantua-maker took measure of me for. I long to see it. Lazarillo, I say, will you be all day?

Laz. (Without.) Coming, Mrs. Beatrice, coming.

Beat. Why don't you make haste, then?

Laz. (Without.) It's impossible to make haste enough for impatient people.

Enter LAZARILLO, followed by other Servants, laden with boxes, cases of wine, &c.

Beat. Have not you something that your master gave you for me, pray?

Laz. I have something for everybody, but that's your bundle, I believe. (Gives her a parcel, which she immediately opens.) Here, comrades, bring in the table, and set it yonder, that I may put these things upon it; quick, quick.

Beat. (Having displayed her gown on a chair.) Dear madam, look here; upon my life, it's very pretty. I have a good mind to try it on now. (Going to unpin herself.) Do you think it will become me, ma'am?

Mar. Your head runs upon nothing but your dress. Follow me, to see the condition of the other rooms.

Laz. We are going back for more things, Mrs. Beatrice; you'll please to take care of what we leave behind.

Beat. Oh! stay, then, till I shut the doors. (Shuts the opposite door; returning, she stops a mo- ment to admire the gown.) Well, I swear and vow, it's one of the genteel things I ever saw in my life. I wish, however, there had been a little more puffing upon the sleeves. [Exeunt.

Enter DON CARLOS DE PIMENTEL and MUSKATO.

Musk. (Speaking as he pushes back the panel.) I will go out.

Don C. Muskato—

Musk. Zounds! sir, don't tell me; as good be hanged as famished. (Perceiving the table that has been put against the panel, which prevents his coming forward.) Heyday! what have we here? They have raised a buttress against our wooden wall. (Puts his hands among the things on the table, and throws some of them down.)

Don C. What are you doing?

Musk. Making a noise. How shall I remove these impediments? (Attempting to push the table from him, he overturns it.) Oh Lord! oh Lord!

Don C. Death and hell! are you bent on our ruin?

Musk. For heaven's sake, sir, don't swear. D—n the table! I did but just touch it. However, nobody has heard. (Taking up and opening a box.) What have we here? Sweetmeats! (Eating a piece.) Excellent, i'faith! and here are cakes. (Opening one of the cases.) Wine, wine, wine! (Falling upon his knees, and looking back on his master.) Sir, my service to you. (Drinks.) Will you pledge me?

Don C. They'll certainly come upon us.

Musk. (Speaking with his mouth full.) Lord! what an admirable blessing did Nature bestow upon man, when she gave him a good stomach! If your friends and family could be apprized of your situation and design—but as the matter stands, sir, I don't think we shall be able to make our escape by violence.

Don C. We can't pick our way through the walls, then?

Musk. No, sir; I wish we could; but I'll tell you, sir, I think one of us might get out unnoticed, by means of a disguise: now suppose I take upon me this disguise, make my escape, inform your friends where you are, and have 'em ready—

Don C. But how?

Musk. You see that gown there, and the veil and things along with it; I'll carry it into your repository, dress myself a-la-demoiselle, watch my opportunity when it is dark, and, I warrant, get clear without any suspicion.

Don C. 'Sdeath! here is somebody coming.

Musk. Is there? (Gathering the clothes under his arm.) Let me lay hold of that bottle, then.

Enter BEATRICE.

Beat. (Singing.) Fal, lal, lal, lal, lal. (Seeing the condition the room is in, she turns her song, by degrees, into a scream.) Oh, oh! ma'am, ma'am, come here and see what has happened!

Enter MARCELLA.

Mar. What's the matter?

Beat. The devil's the matter.

Mar. Who has been in the room?

Beat. I don't know, ma'am.

Mar. This seems to have been done on purpose.

Beat. (Looking about, screams.) Ah!

Mar. How now!

Beat. My new gown, ma'am, where's my new gown? Lazarillo! Lopez! Sancho!

Mar. This is very odd.

Beat. Lazarillo! I will have my gown.

Enter DON GUZMAN DE RIBBERA and LAZARILLO.

Don G. There's always a rout, and a racket, wherever this girl is. What are you after now, Mrs. Fidget?

Beat. Lazarillo, did not you give me my things in this room, and did you not see me leave them here when you went out again?

Laz. Ay; well, what then, suppose I did?

Beat. Well, and you must answer for them.

Don G. And who is to answer for all this pretty work, I would be glad to know? Why, you silly baggage you, did you think your frippery was stuffed into the boxes and wine-cases, that you have broken them to pieces?

Beat. It was not I.

Don G. Who then?

Beat. Old Nick, I believe.

Don G. 'Gad! I have a good mind to lay my my cane across your shoulders.

Beat. Speak to him, ma'am, will you?

Mar. Upon my word, sir, it is something very extraordinary; we left the things here in good order, a little while ago, and this moment that we came into the room again, we found them in the condition you see.

Laz. Some dog got in I suppose, sir.

Beat. Ay, some dog upon two legs. Dogs in Spain don't drink wine and eat sweetmeats, nor steal gowns; indeed, sir, you ought to pay me for my things.

Don G. I pay for them, hussy! do you think I stole your dab of a gown?

Beat. Some of your servants did.

Laz. Do you suspect me, Mrs. Beatrice?

Don G. Heyday! do you know where you are?

Beat. I will have my gown.

Don G. Come, child, you shall go with me to the other lodgings, where we will dine, and after dinner return hither, by which time most of the furniture will be moved; and, do you hear? let those things be taken away, and this room set to rights immediately; and if you find this slattern's trumpery in any hole or corner, lay them by for her.

Beat. Lazarillo, you certainly stole my things.

Laz. I stole your things! d—e, if you say so again—

Beat. Take that, you impudent jackanapes. (Gives him a box on the ear.)

Don G. Ay, ay, before my face, and behind my back, too; no respect to me on either side.

[Beating them out before him with his cane.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same.

LAZARILLO and BEATRICE discovered.

Laz. Pray, Mrs. Beatrice, how soon is my master and your lady to be married?

Beat. (Viewing herself in the glass.) If you want to know, it's a question you ought to ask them.

Laz. I must, i'faith! for it will be necessary for me to get my things and look a little about me.

Beat. What! and so you don't intend to stay with Don Ferdinand?

Laz. Oh! d—n it, no; it would not do for me at all. Service with a single gentleman, well and good; but married families are hell and the devil.

Beat. Do you intend to list for a soldier, then; or turn barber; or what? 'Tis dangerous being out of place; I have known several of your fraternity come to an untimely end by it.

Laz. To tell you the truth, I am afraid to stay with Don Ferdinand, lest, as valets are apt to ape their masters, I should be tempted to imitate him; and, as he has married your mistress, the devil might put it into my head to marry you.

Beat. (Turning round, and surveying him with an air of contempt.) What is the matter with this glass? it always makes me look browner than any other in the house. (Wiping it with her handkerchief, and going from it in a minuet step.) We shall have a ball here to-morrow evening; I suppose the company will desire to see me dance an alle-mande, or a fandango, or something.

Laz. Come, you have enjoyed it long enough; now let me look at myself a little.

Beat. Lazarillo, give me the glass.

Laz. (Viewing himself.) D—e, if I don't think people look very well in it.

Beat. Give me the glass, I say.

Laz. Come and kiss me for it.

Beat. I'll see you hanged first.

Laz. Then you sha'n't have it. Tol de rol, lol lol.

Beat. Come, let us dance then. Lord! here's Don Guzman and your master! [Runs out.]

Laz. The devil!

Enter DON GUZMAN DE RIBBERA and DON FERDINAND.

Don F. I have been at the Duke of Medina's; and I find his wounds are not so bad as I at first apprehended. The report, however, of Don Pedro being the person who assaulted him, rather gains ground.

Don G. Like enough.

Don F. Some officers have, as I understand, been, within these two hours, walking backwards and forwards before this house, and looking at it very inquisitively.

Don G. Then, belike, they still suspect that Don Pedro is in it.

Don F. So it would seem.

Don G. And we may have a visit from them in the night, perhaps, when we least desire their company. I'll strive to prevent them. Come hither, you sir. Go to the Conde de Lemos, governor of Madrid; his palace is hard by; give my respects, and tell his excellency, I shall be much obliged to him, if he will order me, directly, a couple of sentinels to stand at my door. Tell him I shall want them for two or three days, till I have married my daughter. [Exit Lazarillo.]

Don F. I have not seen Don Pedro since yesterday, sir; and, as he has given me an intimation where he is concealed, I will now, with your permission, step to him for a few minutes.

Don G. Well, well, go then; you'll be back to supper? [Exit Don F.] And now that we have got pretty well over the hurry of moving, let me see what I have to do to-morrow. In the first place, early in the morning, to go my lawyers, to desire them to be here precisely at eleven o'clock, to settle the business of my daughter's marriage. Secondly, to go to Father Bartolin, our parish priest.

Enter BEATRICE and LAZARILLO, on opposite sides.

Beat. (Calls loudly.) Lazarillo!

Laz. (Answering loudly.) Here!

Don G. (Clapping his fingers to his ears.) How now! What the plague's the matter with you both, have you a mind to break the drums of my ears?

Laz. What do you scream so for, Beatrice?

Don G. Scream! One and the other of you have screamed me almost deaf. What do you want, turbulence?

Beat. Lord, sir, I'm surprised at you. How can you have the idea of making the best room in your house a bed-chamber.

Don G. Because I like it.

Beat. Why, sir, it will be shocking.

Don G. What's that to you?

Beat. Besides, I suppose Don Ferdinand will remove to my lady's chamber in a night or two.

Don G. Ha! now you have got that in your head; and who bid you suppose about it?

Beat. Nay, sir, it's no business of mine, to be sure, if you have a mind to turn the house upside down, only I love to set people right, and see things done properly.

Don G. Well, but my nephew chose that room particularly.

Laz. Why, so I told Mrs. Beatrice, sir. I said my master had made particular choice of that room.

Beat. Very well then, let his bed be put in it; but remember, sir, it's done by no order of mine.

Don G. I believe there never was your fellow for impertinence, since the world begun. But why should I be surprised at this, when I am told, you give out all over the neighbourhood, that I am going to marry you?

Laz. Ha, ha, ha!

Don G. Ay, you may well laugh.

Beat. I never gave out any such thing.

Don G. Don't lie, for I can prove it upon you.

Beat. I say then, sir, I never did; for the thing was first mentioned to me; and isn't it common enough, when a genteel likely girl lives in the house with a gentleman, for people to talk?

Don G. Well, I sha'n't dispute the matter with you now. Go, take the coach, and fetch your young lady home: she's at her aunt's. Why don't you go where I bid you?

Beat. I'm settling myself, sir.

Laz. (Going out.) Ha, ha, ha! marry!

Beat. What's the matter with you? I promise you I don't know whether I would take the old fellow, if he would have me; so he need not make himself uneasy. [Exeunt Laz. and Beat.]

Enter AURORA, veiled.

Don G. A paltry, dirty baggage! to give out that I was going to marry her; there never was such a thought entered into my head. (Seeing Aurora.) Who is it that comes into the house this way without knocking? Is there nobody in the way to shew people?

Aur. Don't be offended, Signor, at the liberty an unfortunate woman has taken, upon seeing your door open; I implore a moment's refuge.

Don G. Explain yourself.

Aur. I have the misfortune to be the wife of the most jealous and suspicious of mankind, who is, at the same time, the most cruel. Upon a person's looking after me in the street, just now, he took something into his head, drew his poniard, and was going to strike me.

Don G. Oh! for shame.

Aur. I got from him, and made my escape in hither; but he is lurking about, and I am afraid, when I go out again—

Don G. What can I do for you?

Aur. I entreat you to go down into the street, and speak to him not to misuse me; you will easily know him, he is in a red cloak, and wears a gold laced hat, with a black feather.

Don G. I'll go down, madam.

Aur. In the meantime, sir, permit me to remain here; and, as I am a person of some distinction in the world, I beg you will not suffer your people to come about me, till your humanity has rescued me from the danger—

Don G. Step into that chamber, madam, where you will find a light, and nobody shall molest you. I warrant I'll give a good account of your jealous pate, and if words won't do, rougher means shall. (Don Guzman leads Aurora to the door, and then taking up the candle, goes out on the opposite side, which leaves the stage dark. Don Carlos immediately pushes back the moveable panel, and comes out with Muskato, who is disguised in woman's clothes.)

Don C. It is now quite dark; and you may, if ever, escape without being seen; as for myself, I'll wait with patience, determined to brave everything till your return.

Musk. I don't know what's the matter with me, sir, I am d—y frightened.

Don C. As soon as you have brought my friends together in the street, the signal is to be a pistol; which, when I hear discharged, I will instantly rush out, and force my passage to you.

Musk. Ay, sir; but the grand matter is my getting out.

Don C. Farewell; at any rate don't let your apprehensions confound you. [Exit.]

AURORA appears at the door of the room into which she had been conducted by Don Guzman.

Aur. Don Guzman's gone; and all is dark; this is the moment to find Don Carlos. Assist me, love; and, if he be yet here—

Musk. Eh, eh, eh! (Coughing.)

Aur. Ha! what figure's that!

Musk. This is a cursed scheme of mine; I wish I had never thought of it; it will bring me to the gallows, I'm sure; then they'll hang me in woman's clothes. (Aside.)

Aur. It moves this way; was ever anything so unlucky! I must retire a while. [Exit.]

Musk. Come, courage; it is but making the effort; if I can but get down stairs, I am safe enough; (going towards the door, sees Don Guzman) then there's an end of me; tried, condemned, and executed. The old man!

Re-enter DON GUZMAN DE RIBBERA, with the candle; and, seeing Muskato veiled, and in woman's clothes, takes him for Aurora, whom he had left.

Don G. Come, madam, you may take your way, without the least apprehension; I have looked all about the door, and no such person you describe was to be found.

Aur. (Aside.) What is he talking of?

Don G. Give me your hand, ma'am, I am going abroad myself, and will lead you to whatever place of safety you think proper.

Musk. What's all this?

Don G. Poor soul, how she trembles; fear nothing, ma'am; in committing yourself to my charge, you are perfectly secure.

Musk. (Curtsying, and in a squeaking voice.) I am much obliged to you, sir.

Don G. Her tears almost choak her voice. (Aside.)—Will you have any cordial to refresh you?

Musk. No, I thank you, sir.

Don G. Come along, don't be frightened, madam.

Musk. Sure, if ever there was an angel with a beard, this is he. (Aside.) [Exeunt.]

Enter AURORA and DON CARLOS DE PIMENTEL.

Aur. Now is my time. Good heaven! how I tremble. I am almost afraid to approach the place. (Knocking at the panel, Don Carlos pushes it back.) Sir, Don Carlos, sir. Merciful heaven! he's here still.

Don C. Donna Aurora!

Aur. I was obliged to leave you here last night.

Don C. Obligated to leave me!

Aur. It is too long a story to tell you now. I have escaped from a convent, where my brother placed me, resolved to make my way to you through all impediments; there is the key, let yourself out in the dead of night. Farewell.

Don C. Stay, madam.

Aur. Oh! unfortunate, here comes Marcella, the daughter of Don Guzman; I would not for the world be known by her. Get in, get in, there's another woman with her. What shall I do? Anything's better than meeting them. (She retires, and Don Carlos goes behind the panel.)

Enter MARCELLA and BEATRICE, with lights.

Mar. What was it you asked Lazarillo, Beatrice?

Beat. Why, ma'am, whether his master was at home.

Mar. And what did he say?

Beat. What you heard, ma'am, that he was not.

Mar. That he had been gone about half an hour; was it not?

Beat. Yes, ma'am.

Mar. Well, take my fan, and my veil, and see that my things are got ready in the dressing-room. (Beatrice goes out with the things.) A strange unseasonable hour for Don Ferdinand to leave the house, methinks; and just at a time when he knew I was coming home too.

Re-enter BEATRICE.

Beat. (In agitation.) Ma'am, ma'am!

Mar. Well, what now?

Beat. Don't make a noise. I have seen such a thing in Don Ferdinand's chamber; and, I believe, I have found out the thief, too, for I dare swear she stole my gown.

Mar. She! what she?

Beat. A woman, ma'am.

Mar. In Don Ferdinand's chamber?

Beat. Yes; as I was going along the passage, I observed the door pushed to; so I popped my head in; and there I saw a woman in a veil. I did not say a word, but came back directly.

Mar. We'll see who she is; take the candles.

Beat. Yes, ma'am; she can't escape us.

[They go out.]

Mar. (Behind.) We will know who you are.

Aur. That's as I please.

Mar. What brings you here?

Aur. I came here to a gentleman.

Beat. Pull off her veil, ma'am.

Aur. Nay, then—

Beat. Stop there, a thief!

DON CARLOS DE PIMENTEL pushes back the panel, comes out, and afterwards AURORA runs in.

Don C. What noise was that! Sure it was Aurora's voice; somebody molests her.

Aur. (Running in.) Save me, Carlos; they pursue me; I shall be discovered, and undone.

Enter DON FERDINAND. Don Carlos and Aurora retire behind the panel.

Don F. (Stamping.) Lights! here, lights! Lights, I say.

Enter BEATRICE, LAZARILLO, and other Servants.

Where is this assassin, this housebreaker?

Mar. Where is this shame to her sex?

Laz. Sir, madam, what's the matter?

Don F. There has been a man here, masked; search about.

Laz. Where shall we search, sir?

Don F. Call to the sentinels to let nobody out of the house; he can't have made his escape.

Beat. Oh! ma'am, you have let the woman go.

Mar. I let her go!

Beat. Yes, ma'am, it was certainly she that was here this morning. How did she get away?

Mar. Don Ferdinand let her pass; but how did she get in here, Beatrice?

Enter DON GUZMAN DE RIBBERA, with a Lawyer and a Notary.

Don G. Come, gentlemen, give me leave to bring you into this chamber; I have ordered things to be got ready for our business—Daughter, good morning to you. Heyday! What's the matter, child? Come, let us take our places. You, gentlemen, at that table, with your parchments; and you, children, seat yourselves here on each side.

Don F. (Sits.) Ugh!

Don G. So, so! what ails you? Have you got the melancholics? Caught the dumps of your cousin?

Don F. Dumps, sir? I don't know what you mean; I never was merrier in my life.

Don G. Come, gentlemen, have you got everything ready?

Laz. Yes, Don Guzman, everything is ready?

Don G. Daughter, why don't you sit down here when I desire it?

Mar. Sir, I choose—

Beat. Dear ma'am, pray sit down.

Mar. Why, it will be the same thing.

Notary. These you say, Don Guzman, are the parties?

Don G. Ay; you'll take notice, I give ten thousand pistoles to my daughters, for the present, and the rest of my fortune at my death.

Notary. Ten thousand pistoles; the residue of your fortune at your death; 'tis so set down, Don Guzman.

Don G. Let me see—

Don F. Shall we suffer them to go on with this farce, ma'am?

Mar. Don't talk to me, sir; I desire to have no manner of conversation with you.

Don F. Oh! very well, ma'am; I am as willing to avoid anything of that kind as you can be.

Don G. What, what, what are you saying to one another?

Don F. I was not speaking at all, sir.

Don G. Were you not speaking neither?

Mar. No, sir, I did not say a word.

Don G. I'm sure you did though.

Beat. (Behind Marcella's chair.) No, sir, my lady did not speak, indeed.

Don G. I'm not speaking to you, take notice.

Laz. (Behind Don Ferdinand's chair.) Put in your word again.

Don G. Well, before we go any further, let us fix the day for the marriage; I have thought of Saturday; however, please yourselves; what say you, nephew?

Don F. Why, sir, if I must give my opinion, I think we had better defer it a little.

Don G. Defer it! How long?

Don F. For ever, sir.

Mar. And that's my opinion, too, sir.

Don G. Is it so, indeed. And why is it your opinion, pray?

Mar. Don Ferdinand will tell you, sir. [Exit.

Don G. Come back, child. Marcella! (Turning to Don Ferdinand.) Don Ferdinand!

Don F. Inquire of your daughter, sir, she can best inform you. [Exeunt all but Don G. and Beat.

Don G. Gone! she one way, and he the other, and I am left in the clouds. Pray, ma'am, can you solve this riddle? What has happened between your mistress and her cousin to occasion this sudden—I know not what to call it; Satan has possessed them both, I believe.

Beat. Don't ask me anything about it, sir.

Don G. Not ask you?

Beat. No, sir, I had rather you would not.

Don G. What are you whimpering for?

Beat. I don't know, sir, I can't help it.

Don G. I desire you will tell me whatever has come to your knowledge.

Beat. Well, sir, all I know about it, is this: Don Ferdinand brought a creature into the house here—

Don G. A creature! When?

Beat. Just now, sir.

Don G. Well, don't cry. And what creature was it?

Beat. Sir, I'm ashamed to tell you what it was.

Don G. Ashamed!

Beat. Besides, I don't know how you name them.

Don G. No! It must be some strange monster, sure, or you are grown devilish mealy-mouthed of a sudden; was it a lion, a tiger, a bear, a rhinoceros, a crocodile, or a porcupine?

Beat. No, sir, it was not a porcupine, but it was a concubine; one of your creatures that run after the men.

Don G. Oh, ho! In short, Don Ferdinand brought a strumpet into my house last night?

Beat. Yes, sir, I believe that's one of the names gentlemen give them.

Don G. And how do you know he did this?

Beat. Because I saw her, sir.

Don G. Very well, that's all I want with you.

Beat. Sir, your humble servant. [Exit.

Don G. Gentlemen, you see there is something wrong in my family; I really don't know what it is at present; but as it must be settled before we conclude matters, I will endeavour to get at the bottom of it, and let you know this evening, when we will trouble you again. [Exeunt.

DON CARLOS DE PIMENTEL opens the panel, and enters with AURORA leaning on his arm.

Aur. Only get me a little into the air, and I shall be well again presently.

Don C. How do you find yourself?

Aur. Better already.

Don C. (Drawing her a chair.) Sit down here a little.

Aur. Heigho!

Don C. Aurora! she faints again; the heat of that place has overcome her so that I shall never be able to fetch her to herself.

Aur. 'Tis nothing but the sudden effects of the air. I assure you I am greatly recovered, and shall be able to go in again immediately.

Don C. If I can see Beatrice, I think I may venture to tell her my story, and commit Aurora to her care; 'tis the only thing I have for it, and the worst come to the worst, my mask and my sword shall defend me from everybody else. [Exit.

Aur. What woman can say she will make but one false step? Alas! we tread upon ice, and in making one, through want of caution, we make a thousand.

Mar. (Within.) Beatrice!

Aur. Heaven and earth! what do I hear? Is not that Marcella's voice? Should she find me in this place, should she know where I have been, what would she think of me! I am entangled so on every side, that it is impossible for me to extricate myself. Must then the retreat I contrived for another, be my own destruction. [Exit.

Enter MARCELLA and BEATRICE.

Mar. Where's my father?

Beat. I don't know, ma'am; but I've told him all.

Mar. Told him! What have you told him?

Beat. Why, about the woman, ma'am.

Mar. I'm sorry for it.

Beat. Are you? I'm sorry, too, then. But you would not have had me told him a lie, and he asked me.

Mar. In short, Beatrice, Don Ferdinand's behaviour betrays no marks of guilt; and, after all, if we should be mistaken—

Beat. Nay, ma'am, if there be any mistake, you led me into it, I'm sure; for I said at first, the woman was only a thief.

Mar. Go, and desire my father to come to me here.

Beat. Yes, ma'am; but, pray, now take care what you say to him, and don't let him lay all the blame upon me. [Exit.]

MARCELLA sits down in the chair which AURORA had just left. DON CARLOS DE PIMENTEL enters behind.

Don C. I have ventured as far as my apprehensions would give me leave, but without being able to meet Beatrice; however, it is so far well, that I have met nobody else. Perhaps her weakness may now have left her. (Approaching Marcella.) Dearest creature, how is it with you?

Mar. (Starting up with a scream.) Ah!

Don C. Confusion, what's this?

Mar. Who are you—Help!

Don C. My head turns round—I shall drop.

Mar. Don Carlos.

Don C. That wretch.

Mar. Whence come you, sir? How got you here?

Don C. Hold, ma'am! my life is not worth preserving—But where is the lady I left here just now?

Mar. The lady, sir, just now! Lord, what lady, and what are you talking of? I saw no lady.

Don C. (Aside.) Aurora, then, has recovered, and gone back to our retreat: Marcella has not seen her, so I had better say nothing.

Mar. On reflection, I find myself in the most critical situation: my honour is at stake as well as your life.

Enter BEATRICE.

Beat. Your father and Don Ferdinand are both gone.—(Seeing Don Carlos.) Ah! madam, here is a man, then, after all; and you would not venture to trust me.

Mar. The man is Don Carlos—

Beat. We shall every one be hanged.

Mar. How he got in, or his reason for coming, I cannot prevail on him to discover.

Beat. How long has he been here, ma'am?

Mar. I never saw him till this moment, that he surprised me.

Beat. Upon your word?

Mar. For my part, I believe he is mad; for he talks in the strangest, wild, incoherent manner.

Beat. His eyes look very ugly, I assure you. Stand further from him, ma'am. (Keeping at a distance, with her mistress by the arm.) What do you want here, sir? and which of our people let you in?

Don C. None of your people let me in.

Beat. I suppose, then, you were the man Don Ferdinand saw last night?

Don C. I was.

Beat. We must get him out, ma'am, while your father and Don Ferdinand are abroad; it will be better than calling the servants to take him, for reasons—

Mar. But how shall we get him out? He is subject to be seen by all the servants in the house, every one of whom know him; and, at last, perhaps, he may be stopped by the sentinels at the door.

Beat. The sentinels! I never thought of them. Lord, lord! how shall we contrive! One can't think of hanging the wretch. Stay, there's a thought come into my head. There is in my room, a military hat and cloak of your late brother's; let him put them on; the sentinels will take him for an officer—

Mar. At any rate, Beatrice, carry him up into your chamber for the present.

Beat. I will, ma'am. Come, sir. There is something that puzzles me in this business, notwithstanding; for, I can hardly believe the man would come into this house, merely for the sake of being hanged, let my lady say what she pleases. (Aside.) [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Street, with a view of Don Guzman's house.

Enter DON FERDINAND with DON PEDRO PACHECO.

Don F. The Duke of Medina, then, is entirely out of danger?

Don P. His physicians pronounced him so this morning. His grace took the blame of the whole affair upon himself; and assured me, upon his honour, he would not suffer me in any way to be troubled or molested about it.

Don F. It speaks the generosity which ought always to distinguish the nobleman. You may believe, being, in a great measure, the instrument of your misfortune, I more than participated in the uneasiness it gave you: Hold! Don Pedro, stand back a little: do you see the fellow that creeps yonder under the wall, looking behind him every moment?

Don P. Ay, what of him?

Don F. He comes this way. I have my reasons for it: let us stand a little under that piazza, and observe him. [Exeunt.]

Enter MUSKATO.

Musk. What a thing is a life of apprehension! I wish I may never stir if my fear has not almost melted me into a jelly. (Clapping his hands behind him, between his waistcoat and coat.) Well, I am out of the house, that's one comfort; and, in some measure, the way is paved for my master; for I have been among his friends, and six of them, brave, sturdy, young fellows, armed with swords and pistols, will be ready to favour his escape, when our Dons are taking their digestive naps after dinner. I only wait their arrival, to give Don Carlos the signal from this little popper; (shews a pistol) but I must first take a view of the house, in order to determine on which side I had best stand, when I give the alarm, that it may be sure to come to my master's ears. (Going off, he suddenly starts back, and turns.) Who do you want? It is not I! Lord have mercy upon me! I thought some one had touched my shoulder. I'll shoot the first man who assaults me. [Exit.]

Enter DON FERDINAND and DON PEDRO PACHECO.

Don F. 'Tis he, I'm positive.

Don P. I think so, too.

Don F. Hold a little. (Ringing at Don Guzman's door.)

Enter LAZARILLO.

Come this way, you sir! Do you see the man that goes along yonder, with his hat flapped over his face? Pass by him, and try if you know who he is.—[Exit Lazarillo.]—The fellow's not at home, who I sent to dog Don Carlos, or he could tell directly whether this is the same person that was with him.

Don P. Your man has taken a thorough survey of his whole person.

Re-enter LAZARILLO.

Don F. (To Laz.) Well, sir, do you know him?

Laz. Why, sir, I think I have seen his face before.

Don F. Is he the servant of Don Carlos?

Laz. The very man.

Don F. Then let us go and seize him directly.

Don P. Hold! Don Ferdinand, you and your servant will be sufficient to deal with him; and it is absolutely necessary for me to pay the compliment of calling at the Duke of Medina's immediately; however, I'll be with you, at your house, in less than half-an-hour.

Don F. Lazarillo, follow me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Don Guzman's House.

Enter BEATRICE.

Beat. (Looking about.) Come, ma'am, he may venture.

Mar. (Within.) Is the coast quite clear, Beatrice?

Beat. Yes, ma'am; but let him make haste.

Mar. (Within.) I'll fetch him.

Beat. The dickens take him! he has put me in such a tremble, as I have not been in this twelve-month: and frights ruin one's complexion, too: I dare swear, I shall look pale for a week.

Enter MARCELLA and DON CARLOS DE PIMENTEL.

Don C. I beg your pardon. Will you permit me to say a few words to Mrs. Beatrice in private?

Beat. In private to me! Mercy on us! What?

Don C. Don't be alarmed; it's only a little commission I have to charge you with. (Taking her aside.) In the first place, my dear girl, there is my purse, and ten thousand thanks for the kind interest you have taken in my misfortunes.

Beat. I am always ready and willing to assist any one in distress; and I wish you may get safe out of Madrid, with all my heart.

Don C. Well, but this is not all I have to say to you.

Beat. No, sir?

Don C. No. There is another person still in this house; for whom I must entreat your good offices; and should there be occasion and opportunity, I beg you will convey that person out unseen by your mistress.

Beat. Well, but I don't understand you; explain this matter to me a little more.

Don C. I can't explain it farther, at present.

Beat. Another person still in the house, that I must endeavour to get out unknown to my lady! Who is it?

Don C. What signifies: you'll see.

Beat. Well, but you've set me quite on the fidgets.

Mar. Upon my word, Beatrice, we shall delay so long—

Beat. We are ready, ma'am. Come, sir, you must be cautious not to shew any confusion. Come along the hall with a strut; and, in passing by, look impudent; more impudent still; you'll not look half impudent enough.

Don C. Never fear me.

Beat. I wish you would tell me what you meant, by the thing you said to me just now.

Don C. Once more, ma'am; and, for the last time, I take my leave of you.

Beat. Pray, sir, is the person a man or a woman?

Don C. Beatrice, farewell.

Mar. Have a moment's patience. I am a little uneasy: I think I see a crowd of people coming towards our door; and, if I be not mistaken, Don Ferdinand is among them.

Beat. I don't know. Don Ferdinand, and Lazarillo, and two or three more, have laid hold of a man, and are dragging him along; and I wish I may die, Don Carlos, if the person they have got, is not very like your servant Muskato.

Don C. Then the work of my destruction is complete.

Beat. They are bringing him into the house.—

Quick, quick, let us get back to my chamber, as fast as we can. [Exeunt.]

Enter DON FERDINAND, attended by LAZARILLO and other Servants, with MUSKATO, who they have got by the collar.

Don F. Pull the rascal in here; pull him in! and if he attempt to struggle, knock him down.

Musk. Well, but gentlemen, good, dear gentlemen, as you are men of honour, and catholic Christians, don't do me any hurt. I am a poor, miserable young fellow, but just turned of four and twenty, that have an old mother and two lame sisters—

Don F. Are you not a villain, sirrah?

Musk. You are pleased to say so, sir; and I sha'n't be so unmannerly as to contradict any gentleman, with a sword at my throat.

Don F. Are you not the servant of that assassin, Don Carlos?

Musk. Upon my word, sir, I can't say; perhaps I may, and perhaps I mayn't. You have frightened everything quite out of my head.

Laz. He is his servant, sir.

Musk. Well, sir—yes, I am his servant, if that will content you.

Don F. Where's your master?

Musk. (Laughing.) Ha, ha, ha!

Don F. Do you make a jest of us?

Musk. No, sir, no; but I am ticklish, and your man has got his fingers in my collar: bid him take them away, and I'll speak.

Don F. Let him go. Well, now, sir, where is Don Carlos?

Musk. He's in a place—(Looking towards the panel.)

Don F. In a place! what place? Answer my question directly, or torture shall make you.

Musk. Propose it again, good sir.

Don F. Where is Don Carlos?

Musk. Not a great way off.

Don F. So we suppose, by your being here.

Musk. He is, at present, I believe—Pray, sir, will you do me the favour to tell me what o'clock it is?

Don F. What a clock?

Musk. Yes, sir; because I would be as precise as possible in answering your question: and, if it be now about half-an-hour after one, (as I partly conjecture,) Don Carlos is, at this moment, picking his teeth, after dinner, in the city of Lisbon.

Don F. 'Tis false, sirrah! I know he is, at this moment hid somewhere in Madrid. Lay hold of him again.

Enter MARCELLA and BEATRICE.

Mar. What is the matter here?

Musk. Only some men, madam, that have got a poor criminal in their clutches, and are going to play the devil with him.

Don F. This is the servant of Don Carlos; I caught him just now in the street, measuring the outside of our house, with his eyes, from top to bottom. I know his master is at present in Madrid; and I suspect this emissary of his was not lurking about this neighbourhood for any good purpose: rather, perhaps, in meditation of some farther destruction of our family; for, searching his pockets, we found a pistol.

Musk. You found a pistol! Do you say you found a pistol in my pocket?

Laz. There it is.

Musk. Oh! do you call that a pistol?

Laz. Ay, what do you call it?

Musk. I keep it to light my pipe.

Beat. Well, but, sir, let me look at this person; because I was very well acquainted with Don Carlos, and his servant, too, if this be the same he had before he left Madrid.

Musk. Do look at me, ma'am; did you ever see my face before?

Beat. Never, upon my honour.

Musk. See there, gentlemen.

Laz. Why you yourself said but now, that you belonged to Don Carlos.

Musk. Did I?

Don F. Yes, this moment.

Musk. I don't think I said any such thing; and I am almost sure I did not.

Beat. Indeed, sir, you are mistaken here: he that lived with Don Carlos, used to make love to me; a good, genteel, personable fellow; whereas, this is one of the worst-looking, ugly hounds I ever saw in my life.

Laz. Sir, believe what I say to you: this is the servant that lived with Don Carlos, when he was last in Madrid; and he was always just as ugly as he is now. I even recollect his name; it begins with juss, or fuss, or—

Musk. There is neither juss nor fuss in my name; so you may give me my liberty.

Mar. Indeed, sir, I think you had better turn him about his business.

Don F. I think the contrary. Pray, ma'am, you and your maid return to your chamber. Lazarillo, lock that door, and give me the key. (To Muskato, who endeavours to steal away.)—'Tis in vain to strive to escape, sir; I shall leave you locked up here, till I come back with proper officers.

Musk. (Pulling Lazarillo by the sleeve.) Young man, I find myself a little indisposed; if you have any such thing as a drop of spirits in the house, I would be obliged to you for—

Laz. Oh! you'll be in greater want of spirits presently; you had better keep them for a more pressing occasion. [Exeunt all but Muskato.]

Musk. (Knocking at the wainscot.) Open! 'tis I.

Aur. (Coming out, veiled.) Well!

Musk. Heyday! have you got into petticoats, too? 'Gad! I don't know but you are much in the right of it; for there is an old gentleman hereabouts, who conducts ladies out of his house with an admirable politeness. But, joking apart, I suppose you have heard what has happened.

Aur. I endeavoured to listen; but the noise was so great, I could hear nothing distinctly.

Musk. You could hear nothing distinctly?—(Squeaking to mimic her.)—What the devil! have you put your voice into petticoats, too? I left you a double bass; and, I find you a treble.

Aur. (Shewing her face.) Come, a truce with these impertinences.

Musk. Donna Aurora! For heaven's sake, young gentlewoman, how came you here?

Aur. 'Tis a long story to tell: however, make yourself easy, your master has escaped. He came here just now, and offered to stay with me, or make me the companion of his escape: the former, you may be sure, I would not hear of; and, in the latter case, I thought I should only be an impediment to him.

Beat. (Through the key-hole.) Muskato!

Musk. Who's there?

Beat. 'Tis I, Beatrice. Have they locked you up?

Musk. Ay, double-locked me up; I am locked up on both sides.

Beat. I wish I could let you out.

Musk. I wish you could. How did you get out my master?

Beat. We have him here within; and he says he won't go without you.

Musk. I am very much obliged to him. But what good will that do me? However, at any rate, I should be glad to take my leave of him, before we part. I wish you would strive to put back the lock of the door.

Beat. It's impossible; but comfort yourself; my lady and I have been both crying for you; and, I dare swear, we shall cry a great deal more.

Musk. You think we shall suffer, then.

Beat. Take care of yourself; Don Ferdinand is coming up the other way with the alguazils.

Musk. (Running to the panel.) Is he! by gad, then I will take all the care I can.

Aur. Stay, Muskato—(Her foot slips as she is going to follow him.) Oh, gracious heaven! I have hurt myself, and they are opening the door.

Musk. (Shutting the panel.) Nay, if you won't come—charity begins at home.

Aur. (On the outside.) Muskato!

Enter DON FERDINAND, LAZARILLO, and Alguazils.

Don F. (Without.) Yes, yes; Lazarillo and I seized him; and we have him here under lock and key. Here, gentlemen, is the corigidor's warrant, and there's your prisoner Lazarillo.

Laz. Sir!

Don F. Where's the servant of Don Carlos?

Laz. Is not he there, sir?

Don F. And what woman's this? By heavens, I left him locked up here, and have had the key in my pocket ever since.

Don P. See who the woman is?

Laz. (Approaching Aurora.) I'll see that.

Don F. (Aurora making a motion with her hand.) Stand off!

Laz. She beckons to speak with you.

Don F. I desire, gentlemen, you won't leave the house yet.—[Exeunt Lazarillo and Alguazils.]—Well, now, ma'am, who and what are you?

Aur. Answer these questions yourself, sir; (lifting up her veil;) for the rest, my sex and my misfortunes give me claim to your protection.

Don F. Aurora, the sister of Don Pedro!—Where is the man I left here; and by what unaccountable accident—

Aur. A time will come for satisfying you in everything. Consider, at present, but the peril of my situation; my brother is here, I am a woman, and you are a gentleman.

Don G. (Behind.) Alguazils in my house again! this is really monstrous! How came the sentinels to let these people up?

Don F. Was ever man so embarrassed as I am! Here's my uncle now: if he find a woman with me, and I refuse to give an account how she came, he will believe the story Marcella told him concerning last night; if I discover her, I shall involve myself in a quarrel with her brother, besides breaking my word given to her.

Enter DON PEDRO PACHECO.

My dear Don Pedro, don't be surprised at what I am going to say to you: it stands me upon to keep this lady from my uncle's sight; I beg, therefore, you will not mention anything about her; and pray, ma'am, do you step into this cabinet. [Exit Aurora.]

Don P. Shall I shut myself up with her?

Don F. No; stay where you are.

Enter DON GUZMAN DE RIBBERA, speaking to LAZARILLO; afterwards, enter MARCELLA and BEATRICE.

Don G. Go you, sir, and desire my daughter to come to me immediately. Nephew, I am very angry with you.

Don F. I am sorry for that, sir.

Don G. A fig for your sorrow.

Don P. Don Guzman, I kiss your hand.

Don G. I am glad to see you out of your trouble.

Mar. Here I am, sir: what's your pleasure?

Don G. What, you won't let me enjoy ease and quietness?—(To Don Ferd.) They tell me, nephew, you have seized the servant of Don Carlos de Pimentel.

Don F. Yes, sir; but he has escaped.

Don G. How has he escaped?

Don F. That's more than I am able to say. I left him locked up here; and, when I came back again, I could not find him.

Don G. Oh! very well; I warrant you I'll find him. I hear tales of a very ugly nature from one side and the other, of men and women being concealed in the house.

Don F. 'Tis most certain, sir, that I met a strange man in the house last night; but I don't pretend to determine how he got in.

Don G. My daughter says there was a strange woman; and, for anything that appears to the contrary, both the lurking toads may be in the house still; and, if somebody does not ferret them out, we may have our throats cut one of these nights, when we are asleep in our beds, and dreaming of no such matter; and, therefore, I am determined to hunt every hole and corner: and first, I'll begin to examine this. (Going towards the closet where Aurora is.)—Perhaps they may have hidden themselves—

Don F. (Placing himself before the closet.) Hold, sir! you must not go in here.

Don G. No! And why not, pray?

Mar. Do go in, sir.

Don G. Nephew, I will go into that place.

Don F. Pardon me, sir, I have the greatest respect for you; but here my honour is engaged, and, by heaven! I will defend this door with my life.

Don G. This is very pretty behaviour, I protest; however, sir, since you are so violent, I will not contend with you at present: I'll take this room in my way back. And will you, Don Pedro, be so obliging as to accompany me, while I search the rest of the apartments.

Mar. Hold! pray, sir, stay a moment.

Don G. What mischief's in the wind now?

Mar. You must not go this way, sir.

Don G. Must not! By my faith, but I will, though.

Don F. I say, sir, do go in.

Mar. Pray, sir, don't think of it.

Don G. Then I'll go in there.

Don F. No, sir; that must not be.

Don G. Why now, did ever any one see the like of this? I say, nephew—daughter—

AURORA throwing open the doors of the cabinet, comes out, and discovers herself.

Aur. Ruin I see must overtake me; therefore, I'll meet it.

Don P. Fury and death, my sister! Villain, draw your sword.

Don G. Nay, now, Don Pedro, you're out of your wits.

Don F. Hear me, will you?

Don P. I'll hear nothing.

Mar. Nor I.

Don G. I'll leave it to all the world, now, if ever there was a poor old fellow so hampered and plagued, by a set of young rascals and hus-sies, as I am.

Enter LAZARILLO.

Laz. Where's Don Guzman—where's my master? Oh! gentlemen, gentlemen!

Don G. (Stopping them.) Pray, hold a little—What ails this fellow?

Beat. Lazarillo, have you seen a ghost?

Laz. You have hit it; the house is haunted.

Don G. Yes, with a pack of mad people.

Laz. Spirits, sir, spirits! As I am a living man, your son, Don Alonzo, appeared to me this instant. His face was as long as my arm, and as pale as a piece of chalk; his eyes glared like two coals of fire, and he had a flambeau in his hand.

Don G. I won't believe a word of this; it's all a monstrous lie: a ghost and a piece of chalk, and a flambeau and stuff. Draw all your swords, and follow me.

Mar. (Sinks into Ferdinand's arms.) Oh!

Don G. Here! you, man, ghost, devil, or whatever you are, make your appearance: I protest before heaven, I'll do you no harm, but let you go quietly about your business.

Enter DON CARLOS DE PIMENTEL, with his mask on, and his sword drawn; after advancing some paces, he discovers himself.

Don C. Don Guzman, I take you at your word.

All. Don Carlos!

Don F. Call in the alguazils.

Don G. No, come back. How have you the audaciousness, Don Carlos, to appear in this place? And what do you think must be the consequence of my seeing you?

Don C. I have delivered myself into your hands, Don Guzman, on the faith of your promise, that the memory of all past acts should be cancelled between us; but conscious of my innocence, I disdain to owe my safety to an undesigned clemency; recall what you have said, I release you from your word, if you can have more pleasure in satisfying an unjust revenge than in sacrificing it to a point of honour.

Don G. Go away, and never let me see you more.

Don P. This may do for you, Don Guzman, but I am to be answered in another manner. The death of a son may be forgiven, but not the ruin of a sister.

Don C. Don Pedro, I never wronged you. I honour, I esteem, I admire your sister; but not out of fear of your anger, but in regard to her virtue; and as a debt due to her reputation, brought into danger by her attention to me, I am willing to make her my wife.

Aur. (Going apart with Don P.) Brother—

Don F. There is one circumstance in this dark affair which surprises me more than anything else. Where is your servant, Don Carlos, whom I seized just now in the street? I left him locked up here, and in less than a quarter of an hour—

Musk. (Within.) Heigho!

Don G. Who have we bricked up in the wall, yonder?

Enter MUSKATO from behind the panel.

Musk. Are we all friends? is it peace and good fellowship without respect of persons?

Don G. Sirrah, I desire to know—

Musk. I am included in the treaty, sir.

Beat. This brings things into my head. Hark you! rogue's face, was it not you that stole my new gown?

Musk. Yes, ma'am.

Beat. Well, and where is it?

Musk. Why, you must know, I put it on.

Beat. Put on my gown!

Musk. Oh, Lord! yes; I make one of the gentlest ladies you ever laid your eyes on; ask Don Guzman else. Being somewhat more corpulent than you, indeed, your gown has suffered a little in the seams; but don't make yourself uneasy; to recompense the damage, I'll throw myself and fortune at your feet. (Falling on his knees.)

Don P. What you tell me is very odd; however, that is not a sufficient reason for my doubting the truth of it. Don Carlos, we have no leisure now to enter into discussions and explanations; your family and fortune are unexceptionable; you say you are willing to marry my sister; take her, and may you be happy together.

Musk. My dear master, I wish you joy from the bottom of my heart, of being released from all your troubles, by the generosity of this good old gentleman: his behaviour has been that of a noble Spaniard; and I hope our friends will testify their satisfaction, by joining to applaud it.

[Exeunt.]

THOMAS AND SALLY;

OR, THE SAILOR'S RETURN:

A MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENT, IN TWO ACTS.

Act I.—Scene 1.

CHARACTERS.

THE 'SQUIRE
THOMAS

SALLY DORCAS

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Village at the foot of a hill, with a cottage more advanced than the rest, on one side.

SALLY discovered spinning at the door.

AIR.—SALLY.

*My time how happy once, and gay!
Oh! blithe I was as blithe could be:
But now I'm sad, ah, well-a-day!
For my true love is gone to sea.*

*The lads pursue, I strive to shun,
Though all their arts are lost on me;
For I can never love but one,
And he, alas! is gone to sea.*

*They bid me to the wake, the fair,
To dances on the neighb'ring lea;
But how can I in pleasure share,
While my true love is out at sea?*

*The flowers droop till light's return,
The pigeon mourns its absent she;
So will I droop, so will I mourn,
Till my true love comes back from sea.*

Enter DORCAS.

Dorcas. What, will you never quit this idle trade?
Still, still in tears? Ah! you're a foolish maid!

In time, have prudence, your own int'rest see;
Youth lasts not always; be advis'd by me.

AIR.—DORCAS.

*That May-day of life is for pleasure,
For singing, for dancing, and shew;
Then why will you waste such a treasure
In sighing, and crying heigho?
Let's copy the bird in the meadows,
By her's tune your pipe when 'tis low;
Fly round, and coquet it as she does,
And never sit crying heigho!*

*Though when in the arms of a lover,
It sometimes may happen, I know,
That, e'er all our toying is over,
We cannot help crying heigho!
In age ev'ry one a new part takes,
I find, to my sorrow, 'tis so;
When old, you may cry till your heart aches,
But no one will mind you—heigho!*

Sally. Leave me.

Dorcas. Go to. I come to make you glad,
Odzooks! what's here? this folly sets me mad.
You're grieving, and for whom? 'tis pretty sport!
For one that gets a wife at ev'ry port.

Sally. Dorcas, for shame! how can you be so base?
Or after this, look Thomas in the face?
His ship's expected—

Dorcas. Tell not me. The 'Squire—
As Tom is your's, you are his heart's desire.
Then why so peevish, and so froward still?
He'll make your fortune; let him have his will.

AIR.—SALLY.

*Were I as poor as wretch can be,
As great as any monarch he,
Ere on such terms I'd mount his throne,
I'd work my fingers to the bone.*

*Grant me, ye Pow'rs, (I ask not wealth,)
Grant me but innocence and health.
Ah! what is grandeur link'd to vice?
'Tis only virtue gives it price.*

[Exit.

Dorcas. Well, go your ways. I cannot choose but smile:

Would I were young again! alas, the while!
But what are wishes? wishes will not do:
One cannot eat one's cake and have it too.

AIR.—DORCAS.

*When I was a young one, what girl was like me?
So wanton, so airy, and brisk as a bee:
I tattled, I rambled, I laugh'd, and where'er
A fiddle was heard, to be sure I was there.
To all that came near I had something to say;
'Twas this, sir, and that, sir, but scarce ever nay;
And Sundays, dress'd out in my silks and my lace,
I warrant I stood by the best in the place.*

*At twenty, I got me a husband—poor man!
Well, rest him, we all are as good as we can;
Yet he was so peevish, he'd quarrel for straws;
And jealous—though, truly, I gave him some cause.
He snubb'd me and huff'd me; but let me alone,
Egad! I've a tongue and I paid him his own.
Ye wives, take the hint, and when spouse is untow'rd,
Stand firm to our charter, and have the last word.*

*But now I'm quite alter'd, the more to my woe;
I'm not what I was forty summers ago;
This time's a sore foe, there's no shunning his dart;
However, I keep up a pretty good heart.
Grown old, yet I hate to be sitting mumchance;
I still love a tune, though unable to dance;
And books of devotion laid by on my shelf,
I teach that to others I once did myself.*

[Exit.

The 'Squire appears, descending the hill, with Huntsmen.

AIR.—The 'Squire.

*Hark, hark! the shrill horn calls the sportsmen abroad;
To horse, my brave boys, and away;
The morning is up, and the cry of the hounds
Upbraids our too tedious delay.
What pleasure we feel in pursuing the fox!
O'er hill and o'er valley he flies;
Then follow, we'll soon overtake him—Huzza!
The traitor is seiz'd on, and dies.*

*Triumphant returning at night with the spoil,
Like Bacchanals, shouting and gay;
How sweet with a bottle and lass to refresh,
And lose the fatigues of the day!
With sport, love, and wine, fickle fortune defy;
Dull wisdom all happiness sours:
Since life is no more than a passage at best,
Let's strew the way over with flow'rs.*

[Exeunt Huntsmen. The 'Squire knocks at the door of the cottage.

Enter SALLY.

Sally. Ah! whither have my heedless steps be tray'd?

'Squire. Where would you fly? of who are you afraid?

Here's neither spectre, ghost, nor goblin nigh;
Nor any one but Cupid, you, and I.

Sally. Unlucky! (Aside.)

'Squire. 'Sdeath! she sets me all on fire.
Bewitching girl! I languish with desire.
But wherefore do you shrink, and trembling stand,
So coy, so silly?

Sally. Pray, sir, loose my hand.

AIR.—The 'Squire.

*When late I wander'd o'er the plain,
From nymph to nymph I strove in vain
My wild desires to rally;
But now they're of themselves come home,
And, strange, no longer seek to roam:
They centre all in Sally.*

*Yet she, unkind one, damps my joy;
And cries I court but to destroy:
Can love with ruin tally?
By those dear lips, those eyes, I swear,
I would all deaths, all torments bear,
Rather than injure Sally.*

*Come, then, oh! come, thou sweeter far
Than jessamine and roses are,
Or lilies of the valley;
Oh! follow love, and quit your fear,
He'll guide you to these arms, my dear,
And make me bless'd in Sally.*

Sally. Sir, you bemean yourself; and, to be free,

Some lady you should choose of fit degree:
I am too low, too vulgar—

'Squire. Rather say,
There's some more favour'd rival in the way:
Some happy sweetheart in your thoughts takes place;

For him you keep your favours; that's the case.

Sally. Well, if it be, 'tis neither shame nor sin;

An honest lad he is, of honest kin:
No higher than my equal I pretend:
You have your answer, sir, and there's an end.

DUETT.—The 'Squire and SALLY.

'Squire. Come, come, my dear girl, I must not be deny'd;

Fine clothes you shall flash in, and rant it away.

*I'll give you this purse, too; and, hark you!
beside,*

We'll kiss and we'll toy all the long summer's day.

Sally. Of kissing and toying you soon would be tir'd,

Oh! should hapless Sally consent to be naught.

*Besides, sir, believe me, I scorn to be hir'd;
The heart's not worth gaining which is to be bought.*

'Squire. Perhaps you're afraid of the world's busy tongue;

But know, above scandal you then shall be put;

And laugh, as you roll in your chariot along,

At draggled-tail chastity walking a-foot.

Sally. If only thro' fear of the world I were shy,
My coyness and modesty were but ill
shewn;

*Its pardon 'twere easy with money to buy;
But how, tell me how, I should purchase
my own?*

'Squire. *Leave morals to grey-beards, those lips were design'd
For better employment—*

Sally. I will not endure—

'Squire. Oh fie! child, love bids you be rich, and be kind—

Sally. But virtue commands me be honest and poor. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Sea-side.

Enter THOMAS, with Sailors in a boat, from which they land.

Thomas. Avast! my boys, avast! all hands ashore.

Messmates, what cheer? Old England, eh! once
more.

I'm thinking how the wenches will rejoice;
Out with your presents, boys, and take your choice.

I've an old sweetheart—but look, there's the town;
Weigh anchor, tack about, and let's bear down.

AIR and CHORUS.—THOMAS and Sailors.

*How happy is the sailor's life,
From coast to coast to roam;
In every port he finds a wife,
In every land a home.*

*He loves to range,
He's no where strange;
He ne'er will turn his back,
To friend or foe;
No, masters, no;
My life for honest Jack.*

Cho. He loves to range, &c.

*If saucy foes dare make a noise,
And to the sword appeal;
We out, and quickly larn 'em, boys,
With whom they have to deal.*

*We know no craft,
But 'fore and aft'
Lay on our strokes amain;
Then, if they're stout,
For t'other bout,
We drub 'em o'er again.*

Cho. We know no craft, &c.

*Or fair or foul, let Fortune blow,
Our hearts are never dull;
The pocket that to-day ebbs low,
To-morrow shall be full;*

*For if so be,
We want, d'ye see?
A pluck of this here stuff;
In Indi—a,
And Americ—a,
We're sure to find enough.*

Cho. For if so be, &c.

*Then bless the king, and bless the state,
And bless our captains all;
And ne'er may chance unfortunate,
The British fleet befall.*

*But prosp'rous gales,
Where'er she sails,
And ever may she ride,
Of sea and shore,
Till time's no more,
The terror and the pride.*

Cho. But prosp'rous gales, &c. [Exeunt.]

Enter the 'Squire and DORCAS.

'Squire. In vain I've ev'ry wily art assay'd,
Nor promises can tempt, nor vows persuade;
No prospect of success is left me now:
How shall I gain her?

Dorcas. Why, I'll tell you how.
This way she comes; the wench is full of pride,
Lay oaths, and vows, and promises aside:
Often, when regular approaches fail,
Besiegers storm a place, and so prevail.

AIR.—DORCAS.

*All you would wish to succeed with a lass,
Learn how the affair's to be done;
For if you stand fooling, and shy, like an ass,
You'll lose her as sure as a gun.*

*With whining, and sighing, and vows, and all that,
As far as you please you may run;
She'll hear you, and jeer you, and give you a pat,
But jilt you, as sure as a gun.*

*To worship, and call her bright goddess, is fine;
But mark you the consequence, mun;
The baggage will think herself really divine,
And scorn you as sure as a gun.*

*Then be with a maiden, bold, frolic, and stout,
And no opportunity shun;
She'll tell you she hates you, and swear she'll cry out,
But mum—she's as sure as a gun.* [Exeunt.]

Enter SALLY, with a milking-pail.

Sally. How cruel those who, with ungen'rous aim,
Strive to seduce, and bring poor maids to shame!
That brutish 'squire! but wherefore should I fear?
I ne'er can turn false-hearted to my dear.
No, when he came his last farewell to take,
He bid me wear this token for his sake;
He shall not prove me fickle and unkind;
Or say, that—out of sight was out of mind.

AIR.—SALLY.

*Auspicious spirits guard my love,
In time of danger near him bide;
With out-spread wings around him move,
And turn each random ball aside.
And you his foes, though hearts of steel,
Oh! may you then with me accord;
A sympathetic passion feel,
Behold his face, and drop the sword.*

*Ye winds, your blust'ring fury leave;
Like airs that o'er the garden sweep;
Breathe soft in sighs, and gently heave
The calm, smooth bosom of the deep.
Till halcyon peace return'd, once more,
From blasts secure, and hostile harms,
My sailor views his native shore,
And harbours safe in these fond arms.*

Enter the 'Squire.

DUETT.—The 'Squire and SALLY.

'Squire. *Well met, pretty maid;
Nay, don't be afraid;
I mean you no mischief, I vow;
Psha! what is't you ail?
Come, give me your pail,
And I'll carry it up to your cow.*

Sally. *Pray let it alone,
I've hands of my own,
Nor need your's to help me—forbear!*

*How can you persist?
I won't, sir, be kiss'd,
Nor teas'd thus—go trifle elsewhere.*

'Squire. *In yon lonely grove,
I saw an alcove,
All round the sweet violet springs;
And there was a thrush,
Hard by in a bush,
'Twould charm you to hear how he sings.*

Sally. *But hark! pr'ythee, hark!
Look, yonder's a lark,
It warbles and pleases me so;
To hear the soft tale,
O' th' sweet nightingale,
I would not be tempted to go.*

'Squire. *Then here we'll sit down;
Come, come, never frown,
No longer my bliss I'll retard;
Kind Venus shall spread,
Her veil over head,
And the little rogue, Cupid, keep guard.*

Enter THOMAS.

Thomas. What's this I see? May I believe my eyes?

A pirate just about to board my prize!

'Tis well I this way chanc'd my course to steer—
Sal, what's the matter?

Sally. Thomas!

'Squire. 'Sdeath! who's here?
Fellow, begone, or—

Thomas. Larn your phrase to mend:
Do you sheer off, or else I'll make you, friend.
Let go the wench, I claim her for my share,
And now lay hands upon her—if you dare.

TRIO.—The 'Squire, THOMAS, and SALLY.

'Squire. *Saucy rascal, this intrusion
You shall answer to your cost:
Bully'd!—scandaliz'd!—confusion!
All my schemes and wishes cross'd.*

Thomas. *Hark you, master, keep your distance;
'Sblood! take notice what I say:
There's the channel, no resistance,
Tack about, and bear away.*

Sally. *Would you wrest our freedom from us?
Now my heart has lost its fear:
Oh! my best, my dearest Thomas,
Sure some angel brought you here.*

'Squire. *Since her paltry inclination,
Stoops to such a thing as you;
Thus I make a recantation,
Wretched, foolish girl, adieu! [Exit,*

Sally. Oh! welcome, welcome! How shall I impart

The joy this happy meeting gives my heart?
Now, Tom, in safety stay at home with me,
And never trust again that treach'rous sea.

Thomas. Excuse me, Sal, while mighty George has foes,
On land and main, their malice I'll oppose.
But hang this talking, my desires are keen;
You see yon steeple, and know what I mean.

DUETT.—THOMAS and SALLY.

Thomas. *Let fops pretend in flames to melt,
And talk of pangs they never felt;
I speak without disguise or art,
And with my hand bestow my heart.*

Sally. *Let ladies prudishly deny,
Look cold, and give their thoughts the lie;
I own the passion in my breast,
And long to make my lover blest.*

Thomas. *For this the sailor on the mast,
Endures the cold and cutting blast;
All dripping wet, wears out the night,
And braves the fury of the fight.*

Sally. *For this the virgin pines and sighs,
With throbbing heart, and streaming eyes;
Till sweet reverse of joy she proves,
And clasps the faithful lad she loves.*

Both. *Ye British youths, be brave, you'll find,
The British virgins will be kind:
Protect their beauty from alarms,
And they'll repay you with its charms.*
[Exeunt.]

SIR HORNET ARMSTRONG
SIR HARRY PORTLAND
'SQUIRE TURNBULL

CLARA

MISS TURNBULL
MRS. TRIP

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Sir Harry Portland's House.

CLARA and MELISSA discovered.

Clara. Well, my dear Melissa, you will be a happy woman.

Mel. I have no doubt of it. The attention which Mr. Osborne has shewn me, was not that of a man eager to gain the affection of his mistress by humouring her caprices, praising her beauty, and flattering her follies. He is obliging and well-bred, but sincere; yet his disapprobation is delivered with a delicacy that makes it more agreeable than some people's compliments.

Clara. If time, instead of mellowing the strokes, should wear away this smooth varnish, and discover a harsh outline, should you not be offended at the severity of his manner, think you?

Mel. Believe me, dear Clara, there is no danger; for if there be one man on earth more capable of making a woman happy than another, it is Mr. Osborne.

Clara. It would be heresy in you, my dear, to hold any other opinion; and I have no doubt but you will continue orthodox after marriage.

Mel. Yes; I shall certainly die in that faith.

Clara. Your brother, Sir Harry, I believe, is of your religion, too.

Mel. Entirely. The friendship of Mr. Osborne and my brother is as sincere as the commencement of it was remarkable. Have you ever heard their story?

Clara. Never. You know my acquaintance with your family is but just begun; but I hope you will not think them words of course when I assure you that, short as it is, I feel myself interested in its happiness.

Mel. Oh! I am sure you are sincere; I know it by sympathy. Well, then, I'll tell you: Harry and Osborne happened to be both abroad at the same time. As my brother was going to Italy, and passing through the mountainous part of Savoy, he came to a hollow way, among the rocks, surrounded by trees and caverns; all on a sudden, at a turning in the road, he beheld Osborne and his servants, attacked by six banditti, and ready to sink under their wounds.

Clara. Was Sir Harry alone? (Alarmed.)

Mel. He had his governor, two servants, and the postillion. My brother instantly leaped from his carriage, snatched up his sword and pistols, and flew to the place of action.

Clara. I declare you terrify me.

Mel. He was not seen by the combatants, and took care to advance so near before he fired, that he could not fail to do execution. He laid two of the banditti dead; and their companions, who had discharged their fire-arms, and beheld Sir Harry's people running to the attack, and levelling their pieces, fled.

Clara. Thank you for that, my dear; you have given me breath.

Mel. The intrepidity with which Sir Harry saw Osborne defend himself, and the fortitude he discovered when he was informed, as it was at first believed, that his wounds were mortal, attached my brother so powerfully to him, that he resolved not to leave him in the hands of strangers, but anxiously waited while he was under cure.

Clara. This was a noble generosity.

Mel. It was; and Osborne was so sensible of it, that, though he was going the other way, he would return with Sir Harry into Italy; and their friendship has continued ever since.

Clara. But is it not strange, my dear, that he cannot detach his friend from the gaming-table?

Mel. My brother is infatuated. It is his greatest, almost his only weakness.

Clara. But the report is, that Mr. Osborne takes advantage of this weakness; and, in fact, has half ruined Sir Harry himself.

Mel. The report of malice, my dear.

Enter SIR HARRY PORTLAND and MR. OSBORNE.

Sir Harry. Ladies, your obedient. Pray, when did you arrive in town, madam? (To Clara.)

Clara. Yesterday. But how came you to quit Bath so suddenly, gentlemen?

Sir Harry. Mr. Osborne, madam, was horriblement ennuyé; dull as an alderman at church, or a fat lap-dog after dinner; thinking on marriage, Melissa, and other important matters; and so—

Osborne. Come, come, Sir Harry, this is mighty ingenious; but you were, at least, as willing to be gone as myself. The truth, madam, is, my modest friend here heard you were to set off in a day or two; and from that moment, was continually giving hints, and asking me how I, as a lover, could exist so long without a sight of my mistress; and, in short, began, all at once, to talk so sympathetically about absence and ages, that I, who had made the excursion purely to oblige him, was, I acknowledge, exceedingly happy to find I could oblige him by returning.

Clara. What say you to this, Sir Harry? But, I know your politeness: you will confess it all to be true, and begin to say civil things upon the subject, that will only put me to the trouble of blushing and curtsying; so we'll suppose them all, if you please. But come, tell me: what's the news of the day?

Mel. News! Oh! that's true. Look here, my dear. I thought I had something to tell you. (Reads a paragraph in a newspaper.) "We hear, from very good authority, that an hymeneal treaty is concluded between a certain beautiful ward, not a mile from St. James's-square, and her old guardian; and that the lady is expected in town from Bath, every hour, to sign and seal."

Sir Harry. What say you to this, madam?

Clara. Say! I protest I don't know what to say; except that these newsmakers are a very pleasant, ingenious kind of people.

Mel. But aren't you angry?

Clara. Angry! no, indeed. I am sure I am very much obliged to them for thinking of me: I shall be so stared at! I'll go into public continually, and my guardian shall go with me. [my dear?]

Mel. But is there any foundation for this report,

Clara. Nay, I am sure I can't tell. I have suspected the matter a great while, by my guardian's simpering and squeezing my hand so often. He read, the other day, in the Annual Register, of a man, at Inverness, who lived to the age of one hundred and seventeen; and he has been talking ever since of purchasing a country-seat in the Highlands.

Sir Harry. That would be pleasant.

Clara. Very. Then we should have a flock of goats, I suppose.

Sir Harry. Dorastus and Faunia. [way.]

Clara. Oh! yes; quite in the Damon and Philida

Osborne. You are very happy in a lover, madam.

Clara. Oh! quite proud of my conquest. There is no such great miracle in bringing a young fellow, whose passions are all afloat, to die at one's feet. The thing's so natural that one does it every day. But to thaw the icy blood of a grave old gentleman; to see him simper, sigh, dance minuets, and look ridiculous for one—Oh! there is, positively, no flattery equal to it.

Sir Harry. He will make your winter evenings in the Highlands quite entertaining, with relating the wild pranks he committed, and the deeds of prowess he was guilty of in his youth; then you will be so delighted with listening to his raptures, and tasting his panado, and—

Clara. Oh! yes; yes, yes—Ha, ha!—I—I think

I see him now, with his venerable bald head, his shrivelled face, and his little pug nose, that looks as red and as bright as the best Dutch sealing-wax, rising from his chair, by the help of his crutch-headed stick, to breathe forth vows of love and everlasting fidelity. Ha, ha, ha!

Mel. It's whimsical enough.

Clara. Yes. Oh! now you talk of whimsicality, I was accosted by an old gentleman the night before I left Bath, in the rooms, who was the drollest being I ever met with. I thought he would have made love to me; swore I was an angel, and said a thousand civil things.

Osborne. Oh! madam, the old men are the only polite men of this age.

Clara. Upon my word, I begin to think so.

Osborne. The young ones, taught in the modern school, hold a rude familiarity to be the first principle of good breeding.

Clara. Manners, like point ruffles, are now most fashionable when they are soiled.

Sir Harry. No, no; they only hang the easier for being deprived of starch. But who was this old gentleman, pray, madam?

Clara. A relation of your's, sir.

Sir Harry. Of mine, madam?

Clara. I should suppose so, for he mentioned his nephew, Sir Harry Portland.

Mel. Our uncle, Sir Hornet Armstrong.

Sir Harry. It is. I found a letter from him when I came to town, in which he informed me he should arrive in Bath the very day we left it.—[Enter a Servant with a letter.]—Who brought this?

Servant. It came by the post, sir. [Exit.]

Clara. I die to be better acquainted with him. I must have him in my train of sighing swains.

Osborne. You seem astonished, Sir Harry.

Clara. Some unkind billet from his mistress, I suppose.

Sir Harry. No, indeed; it is the most unaccountable epistle I ever received, and from my unaccountable uncle, too. There, read, read. (To Osborne.)

Osborne. (Reads.) "Dear Harry,—You know, you dog, how your old uncle loves you. You will say so when you are thoroughly acquainted with the occasion of this. In brief, I met with a young lady at Bath, the most extraordinary, take her altogether, I ever beheld. She is a nonpareil, a phoenix! But you will judge for yourself: she is coming up to town with her brother; who, by-the-by, is a country booby—but that's no matter. I saw her only once, and that was in the rooms; but once is sufficient. They intend coming up to London, by way of seeing the town, for they are country people, I find; though the sister has more accomplishments, ease, and good-breeding, than I ever yet saw in the drawing-room. I proposed a match to the brother, and he seemed happy at the offer. They will arrive nearly as soon as this, for they set out before it; and I shall follow, maugre the gout, as fast as I can.—HORNET ARMSTRONG. P.S. I forgot to mention their name is Turnbull." Turnbull! why, what, in the devil's name, is Sir Hornet mad?

Sir Harry. In one of his right ancient whims, I suppose. Sir Hornet has had many such in his time.

Mel. But pray, who is this miraculous lady, Mr. Osborne? for you seem to know something of her.

Osborne. Do you remember, Sir Harry, a gawky girl, that stalked round the rooms, and stared prodigiously? she that was stuck to the side of a bob-wigged country'squire?

Clara. Oh! what, the—the girl with her arms dangling, her chin projecting, and her mouth open, that looked as if she were afraid of being lost.

Sir Harry. Yes; or as if she dared not trust herself alone, out of her own parish, lest somebody should catch her, put her in a sack, and send her for a present to the king of the cannibals.

Osborne. The same; that is the accomplished Miss Turnbull.

Sir Harry. How!

[lady.

Osborne. That is the easy, well-bred, drawing-room

Sir Harry. Is it possible?

Clara. Ha, ha, ha! Well, (with affected gravity) and I don't doubt but she would make a sort of a—a—a very good wife. Understands the art of brewing, baking, pickling of pork, curing of hung beef, darning of stockings, and other branches of housewifery, in perfection. Believes in ghosts, and has got the Wandering Prince of Troy, the Babes in the Wood, and the entertaining dialogue of Death and the Lady, by heart.

Osborne. Such, and so numerous, are the wife-like properties of Miss Barbara Turnbull.

Clara. Turnbull, too! Well, that is such a delightful name for a country lady; so pastoral!

Osborne. The father was one of the greatest graziers in the west of England; and was so intent on getting money, that he bred his children in the most stupid ignorance. He is lately dead, and the son has commenced gentleman and 'squire, by virtue of the father's industry, and a pack of fox-hounds; and though he has scarcely knowledge enough of articulate sounds to hold a dialogue with his own geese, yet does he esteem himself a devilish shrewd fellow, and a wit. His conversation is vociferous, and patched up of proverbs, and out-of-the-way sayings, which he strings together without order or connection; and utters, upon all occasions, and in all companies, without respect to time, place, or person.

Clara. Well, well, Sir Harry, I shall have to wish you joy soon, I suppose: but I must begone; fifty visits to make this morning—time flies—but agreeable company, and all that, you know—Oh! Sir Harry, you mean to attend the spring meetings this year, at Newmarket? I am told you understand the turf; I think of sending a venture of five hundred by somebody. But I shall see you often enough before then. Adieu. [Exit with Melissa.]

Sir Harry. Well, what do you think of this lady, Osborne?

Osborne. I think her a very amiable, accomplished lady; and one that, under an assumed levity, observes and understands everything about her.

Sir Harry. I am entirely of your opinion. If I may judge from an acquaintance of such short date, she is the first woman in the world.

Osborne. Except one, Sir Harry.

Sir Harry. You, Osborne, may make exceptions, if you please; I am not so captious. She has beauty without vanity, virtue without prudence, fashion without affectation, wit without malice, gaiety without coquetry, humour—

Osborne. Hold, hold! stop to breathe. How was it? Vinegar without acid, fire without heat, light without shade, motion without matter, and a likeness without a feature.

Sir Harry. "Spice, by the gods! proud spite and burning envy!"

Osborne. But did you observe her Newmarket hint, Sir Harry; and the concealed significance with which it was delivered?

Sir Harry. I did.

Osborne. Which being faithfully done into English, bears this interpretation: "I, Clara Forrester, a beautiful, elegant, sensible girl, with a fine fortune, should like to take you, Harry Portland, with youth, spirit, and certain et ceteras, but"—

Sir Harry. "But that I am afraid of indulging a partiality for any man who is so intolerably addicted to gaming." Is not that the conclusion of your speech?

Osborne. Oh, fie! No, no: gaming! That man has a body without a soul, that never felt an inclination to gaming.

Sir Harry. Perhaps so; but that man has the greatest soul who can best resist that inclination.

Osborne. Psha! Gaming is the essence of fashion, and one of your strongest recommendations. Clara is a girl of spirit, and what girl that comes under that description, would ever place her affections on a sneaking, sober, prudent fellow? a mechanical scoundrel, that knows the day of the month, sips tea, keeps a pew in the parish church, writes memorandums, and goes to bed at eleven o'clock. Pho! absurd!

Sir Harry. Curse me, Osborne, if I know what to make of you. You are a riddle that I cannot expound. You have such an awkward way of praising gaming, that it always has the appearance of satire.

Osborne. Satire! How so? Do you think I'd satirize myself? Who sports more freely than I do?

Sir Harry. Why, there's the mystery. You are as eager, to the full, as I am. If I set a hundred on a back hand, you offer a thousand; nay, had I the fortune of a nabob, and were to stake it all, you would be the first man to cry "covered!" and be d—d mad if any one wanted to go a guinea: not because you have not generosity, but in the true and inveterate spirit of gaming.

Osborne. Certainly. Gaming! why, gaming is the best sal volatile for the spleen: it rouses the spirits, agitates the blood, quickens the pulse, and puts the whole nervous system in a continual vibration. No man ever yet died of an apoplexy, that loved a box and dice.

Sir Harry. But they have died as suddenly.

Osborne. Oh! ay, ay; but that's a fashionable disease, an influenza; that's to make your exit with éclat; that's to go out of the world with a good report.

Sir Harry. True, true; and, indeed, as to a few years, more or less, that is, in reality, a mighty insignificant circumstance.

Osborne. A bagatelle! Let us live while we do live, and die when we can't live any longer.

Sir Harry. That's my comfort, that's my comfort. Yes, yes; a pistol—a pistol is a very certain remedy for the cholic. Nobody but a pitiful scoundrel would go sighing, and whining, and teasing other people with his griefs and complaints. When a man is weary, what should he do but go to sleep?

Osborne. To be sure. Life itself is but a dream. 'Tis only sleeping a little sounder.

Sir Harry. What! live to be pitied! Ha, ha! A decayed gentleman! No, no, no. A withered branch; a firelock without a flint. And yet—heigho! this Clara—d—n it, it's provoking. Youth, beauty, affability—she's a bewitching girl!

Osborne. She is, indeed.

Sir Harry. A lovely girl!

Osborne. Ay, enough so to make any man, that might hope to be in her favour, in love with life.

Sir Harry. Any man, any man but me—no, no—Undone, undone, undone!

Osborne. Well, but, seriously, since you have such bad success, why don't you renounce play?

Sir Harry. 'Tis too late. I have sunk eighty thousand; my resources almost all exhausted, my estates all mortgaged to Jews and scoundrels.

Osborne. All?

Sir Harry. All; except the estate in Kent.

Osborne. Well, then, if you cannot content yourself with your present loss, your best way will be to make another vigorous push.

Sir Harry. That's exactly what I am determined to do; and, unless the devil possesses the dice, I think I may expect, without a miracle, that fortune should change hands.

Osborne. One would think so, indeed. Will you dine, then, at my house? There will be the Chevalier, the Baron, and the usual set. They have engaged to dine with me. They are spirited fellows, and will play for any sum.

Sir Harry. I don't know. Suspicion is a cursed meanness; and yet, I cannot help having my doubts of some among that company. Nay, had you not so often assured me you were perfectly acquainted with them all—

Osborne. Why, I tell you again and again, so I am. I will be answerable for their conduct, and that's more than I would say for any other set of gamblers upon earth.

Sir Harry. Well, well; I'll meet you there.

Osborne. We dine early; at five.

Sir Harry. Agreed.

Osborne. And then, hey for a light heart and a heavy purse. [Exit.]

Sir Harry. No, no; no light heart for me: I am sunk, degraded in my own opinion. Gaming alters our very nature. Osborne used to hate it; he was then an open-hearted, generous fellow; he now appears to have contracted an insatiable love for money, and a violent desire to win, he cares not of whom, of me as soon as another. Were I in his situation, and he in mine, I think I should find an aversion to increase his distress; he knows mine, yet has no such aversion. Perhaps he thinks my ruin certain, and that he may as well profit by it as another. I know him to have the most refined and strictest sense of honour: I have lost most of my money to him, and in his company, and, therefore, have not been duped out of it. That is some comfort, however. [Exit.]

SCENE II.

Enter MR. OSBORNE and TIMID.

Osborne. Well, Mr. Timid, has Sir Harry sent to you for a further supply?

Timid. Lackaday! sir, yes; and a very large supply, too. He wants five thousand pounds immediately. Lackaday! I asked him how he thought it possible for me to raise such sums as he called upon me for every day; reminded him what a bad way his affairs were in, and what an usurious rate I was obliged to borrow all his money at.

Osborne. What said he?

Timid. Lackaday! not much: seemed chagrined; said it must have an end, one way or another, soon; and demanded whether I could or could not raise the money. Lackaday! I told him I was no longer master of ways and means; and he said then he must positively employ another prime minister, for supplies he must have.

Osborne. Why did you tell him that? Go to him, inform him you have met with a tender-hearted Jew, who knows nothing of the situation of his affairs, that will lend him ten thousand pounds directly, if he want it.

Timid. Ten thousand! on what terms?

Osborne. Oh! the mortgage of the Kentish estate.

Timid. The Kentish estate! Lackaday! but suppose he should go to gaming, and lose it to somebody else instead of you.

Osborne. Oh! I'll take care of that.

Timid. Lackaday! It must not be Benjamin Solomons who lends this?

Osborne. True; no—humph! Isaac Levi, agent to a private company at Amsterdam.

Timid. (Writes in a pocket-book.) "Isaac Levi, agent to a private company at Amsterdam." Lackaday!

Osborne. Well, go you to him, and inform him that the money shall be ready in about half-an-hour.

Timid. Lackaday! good young gentleman! Heaven pardon me, I had like to have said d—the dice! You'll be a true friend?

Osborne. Be under no apprehensions. This old fool is become suspicious, I must be sudden. (Aside.)

Timid. Had not we better inform him of all, before he goes any further?

Osborne. By no means; leave that to me.

Timid. Lackaday! Well, the remembrance of a good deed is grateful on a death-bed.

Osborne. Do you be expeditious; I'll instruct the Jew, and he shall meet you here. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.—SCENE I.—The same.

SIR HARRY PORTLAND and MELISSA discovered.

Sir Harry. Heavens! what romance! I can scarcely believe my eyes. Did you ever hear of so strange an affair?

Melissa. Strange! it's miraculous. Quixotism! And our good uncle is the prince of madmen.

Sir Harry. To send a foolish, illiterate, country dowdy, and her blockhead brother, a visiting on such an errand! What can I say to them? I declare I don't know how to behave: never was so embarrassed in my life. Where are they?

Melissa. He has made an acquaintance with the groom, and is gone to the mews, which seems to be his proper element, to examine the horses; and I left her with my woman, staring, like a Dutch doll, at everything she fixed her eyes on. Here she comes.

Enter MISS TURNBULL.

Miss T. My gracious! Here be a power of voine—(staring about)—I wonder if that be he that be to be my husband. (Aside.)

Sir Harry. I hope, madam, the fatigue of your journey has not injured your health.

Miss T. Zir? [journey.]

Sir Harry. I hope you are pretty well after your

Miss T. Pretty well, thank you, zir. I'veck! he's a handsome man. (Aside.)

Melissa. This is the oddest affair.

Sir Harry. (Aside.) I don't know what to say to her. I am afraid, Miss Turnbull, you won't find the town so agreeable as the Elysian fields of Somersetshire.

Miss T. Lysian fields! There be no zuch yields in our parts. There be only corn yields and hay yields.

Melissa. My brother, madam, means to say, you are not so well pleased with the town as with the country, perhaps.

Miss T. Oh! yes, but I be though, and ten times better. (They stand silent for some time.) Pray, miss, when did you zee Zekel Turnbull, my uncle?

Melissa. I have not the honour to know him.

Miss T. My gracious! What, don't you know

Melissa. No, indeed. [Zekel?]

Miss T. Why, he do come to London zity your times every year.

Sir Harry. Is he in parliament?

Miss T. Parliament!

Sir Harry. Yes.

Miss T. What, a parliament-man?

Sir Harry. Yes.

Miss T. No; he be a grazier. (Silent again.) Pray, miss, have you been to zee the lions and the Melissa. To-day? [wax-work to-day.]

Miss T. Ees.

Melissa. I never saw them in my life.

Miss T. My gracious! What, never zaw the kings, and the queens, and the tomb-stones?

Melissa. No. [zee 'em now, then.]

Miss T. Merciful vather! Well, let's go and Melissa. People of fashion never go to those kind of Miss T. Never! [places.]

Melissa. Never.

Miss T. My gracious! But I am zure I will go every day, while I be in London zity, if I can vind the way. Pray, be this vair-time here? Where be all those volk gwain, and where do they all come fro'?

Turn. (Without.) Barbara, Barbara! Where beest, Barbara?

Miss T. I be here.

Enter 'SQUIRE TURNBULL.

Turn. Well, Zir Harry, here we be. Madam, your zervant. I zupped wi' Zir Hornet three nights ago, an' a zaid you be a vine lass: what, though I had never zeen you, but I gave you, miss, in a bumper; an' Zir Hornet swore that, except Barbara, a didn't knaw one to match you.

Melissa. He did me great honour.

Turn. Why, to be zure a did. What, though a was wrong—I zee a was wrong; Barbara is well enough; but vor all the length of her spurs, she won't do, pitted against this vine ginger pullet.

Mel. Your compliments quite overpower me, sir.

Turn. Compliments! No, no. What, though vather be dead, an' I ha' three thousand a year, and the best pack of vox dogs in Zomerzethshire, I ha' no need make compliments; I would as zoon override the hounds, or vell oak zaplings vor vire-wood. Barbara, mayhap, understands zic things, her reads kademy o' compliments; vor my part, I ha' no time vor zic trash—

Miss T. I'm zure it be a very pretty book.

Turn. Hold thy tongue, Barbara, an' then nobody will know thee beest a vool. Lookye me, miss: I do want a wife, and I should like hugely vor you an' I to zet our horses together, as the zaying is.

Mel. Sir, I don't understand—

Turn. Vor my part, I am none o' your half-bred ones. What, though shilly-shally and no thank you are always hungry—a lame tongue gets nothing, and the last wooer wins the maid—a bad hound may start a hare, but a good one will catch her.

Sir Harry. I believe, sir, you never saw my sister before.

Turn. Why, no, to be zure. What though, love and a red nose can't be hid—If you cut up the goose, I'll eat it—The hare starts when the hound least expects it.

Sir Harry. Very true, sir; but here is a disagreeable misunderstanding—

Turn. Why, to be zure, I do know it. We misunderstand the thing parfitly well: it be very disagreeable, an' I be glad of it. I ha' brought Barbara to London to zee the lions, buy ribands, an' be married. But, what though, liking's liking, an' love's love; myzelf bevore my zister. If the mountain won't go to the man, the man mun go to the mountain—an' vaint heart never won vair lady.

Sir Harry. Don't you think, sir, that were my sister's affections totally disengaged, this abruptness were very unlikely to gain them? Is it not too violent, think you, for female delicacy?

Turn. Why, to be zure—female delicacy! I hate it; and as vor your abruptness, why, gi' me the man that speaks bolt outright; I am vor none o' your abruptness. What though, he must ha' leave to speak that can't hold his tongue.

Mel. Your proverb is quite apropos, sir.

Turn. Why, to be sure; dogs bark as they are bred.

Sir Harry and Mel. Ha, ha, ha!

Turn. I am a staunch hound, miss, and seldom at vault; an' zo, wi' your leave, I'll—(Offers to kiss Melissa.)

Mel. I beg, sir—

Turn. Nay, don't be bashful; I like fruit too well to play long at bob-cherry—a's a vool, indeed, that can't carve a plum-pudding. (Offers to kiss again, and is prevented by Sir Harry.)

Sir Harry. I am sorry to be obliged to inform you, that you are entirely mistaken, both with respect to the affections of my sister and myself. As a friend of my uncle's, sir, I shall be happy to shew you every respect, but nothing farther can possibly take place between the families.—[Enter a Servant, and delivers a card to Melissa. Exit Melissa.]

Serv. Mr. Timid desired me to tell you, sir, that Mr. Levi is quite tired of waiting; and says, if you can't come now, he will call again to-morrow.

Sir Harry. Oh! tell him he must not go; I beg Mr. Levi's pardon, I'll be with him in a minute. [Exit Serv.] Sir Hornet has been exceedingly precipitate in this business, sir: he is coming to town, and must apologize for his error. As to my sister, I have no doubt but she has every respect for your merits they deserve; but her affections are pre-engaged, the nuptials fixed, and are soon to be celebrated. While you remain in town, however, I beg you will command my house and services. [Exit.]

Turn. Well, Barbara, what dost think on un?

Miss T. Why, a be well enough; but I daunt rightly know what a means.

Turn. What a means! thee beest a vool; thee dost na' know the London tongue, thee means: a zaid, in a kind o' round-about way, that it's all right.

Miss T. Did a?

Turn. Did a! why, to be zure a did; didst na' zee how zivil a were, an' what a low bow a made? But thee has no contagion in thee; thee will never learn what's what.

Miss T. Why, where be I to learn zic things? I ha' never been no where.

Turn. Never been no where! Well, what o' that? Where have I been? I ha' never been no where. What though, I do know how to ztir my broth without scalding my vinger—I can zee an owl in an oven as zoon as another.

Miss T. But when be us to go and zee the zights?

Turn. Oh! we'll go all together on the wedding-day.

Miss T. My gracious! I wish it were here.

Turn. Ay, ay; I daunt doubt thee: women, pigs, and poultry, be never zatisfied.

Miss T. An' be you to be married as well?

Turn. Be I to be married as well! Why, to be zure I be. Isn't vather dead? an' ha' not I three thousand a-year, an' the best pack o' vox dogs in Zomerzethshire? An' didst na' hear me tell miss 'at I would marry her? What though, I do know how to catch two pigeons wi' one pea; shew-a dog a bone, and he'll wag his tail; he that is born a beauty is half-married, an' like will to like.

Miss T. Well, then, take me to parliament-house, an' shew me the king, an' the queen, and the lord mayor, an' th' elephant, an' the rest o' th' royal vamily.

Turn. I tell thee, thee sha'n't.

Miss T. My gracious! What zignification's my coming to London zity, an' I must be moped up a this'n? I will go, zo I will.

Turn. I tell thee, thee sha'n't.

Miss T. Why, then, an' I munnot zee the king, I'll go into next room and zee his picter, that I will. [Exit.]

Turn. Ahoic! Barbara, Barbara! The helve after the hatchet—He that holds a woman, mun ha' a long rope an' a strong arm—Women an' mules will go their own road in zpote of riders or ztinging-nettles. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The House of Mr. Vandervelt.

Enter VANDERVELT.

Vand. Clara is very beautiful, but mankind is very censorious. They will tell me that sixty-seven is too late in life to undertake the begetting, bringing up, and providing for a family. What of that? Must I go out of the world as I came into it, nobody to remember me? Must the name of Vandervelt be forgotten? Must I leave no pretty picture of myself? Sixty-seven is but sixty-seven. Have not we a thousand examples of longevity upon record? And, then, as to cuckolds, I cannot be persuaded that they are as common now as they were when I was a youngster. Times, men, and manners alter. Children are born wittier, and the world gets more sedate: I myself am a living proof of it: I never go to bagnios now; I never break lamps, beat watchmen, and kick constables now. I have no such wicked inclinations.

Enter CLARA.

Clara. Ah! mon cher papa! What, ruminating?

Vand. Ah! turtle. But why do you always call me papa? you know I don't like that word, turtle.

Clara. And why, papa, do you always call me turtle? Have not I told you, fifty times, it puts me in mind of calipash, and aldermen, and other ugly animals.

Vand. Calipash! Thou art sweeter, more tender, delicate, delightful, and delicious, than all the calipash and calipee in the universe. A gem, a jewel, that all the sultans, grand signiors, and great moguls of the whole earth have not riches enough to purchase.

Clara. You are so gallant! You do say the most obliging things.

Vand. Say the most obliging things! Ay, and will—no matter—Deeds, title-deeds, rent-rolls, India bonds—Well, death and the day of judgment will make strange discoveries.

Clara. Oh! yes: I know you wise men often meditate on these serious subjects.

Vand. Ay, life is treacherous ground; one foot firm, and the next in a pit.

Clara. But why so melancholy, papa?

Vand. I have no friends; that is, no relations, no children; have made a great fortune by care, and labour, and anxiety, and debarring myself the pleasures and comforts of life in my youth; and why should not I sit down and enjoy it?

Clara. Very true; and why don't you?

Vand. Because men are fools, and laugh they don't know why. I hate ridicule; nobody loves to be thought ridiculous. The world has got false notions: a man of fifty is called old, and must not be in love, for fear of being pointed at; whereas, some men are older at thirty, than others at threescore.

Clara. Certainly.

Vand. What is threescore?

Clara. A handful of minutes,—

Vand. That vanish like a summer shower,—

Clara. Melt like a lump of sugar in a dish of tea—

Vand. That come you don't know how,—

Clara. And go you don't know where.

Vand. Surely, a man of sixty may walk through a church-yard without fear of tumbling into a grave?

Clara. If he can jump over it.

Vand. True: and I was once an excellent jumper. Sixty! why, Henry Jenkins, the Yorkshire fisherman, lived to a hundred and sixty-nine. So that a man of sixty, even in these degenerate days, has a chance to live at least a hundred years.

Clara. Well, I declare, papa, you are quite a blooming youth; forty years younger, in my opinion, than you were a quarter of an hour ago.

Vand. Forty?

Clara. At least.

Vand. Why, then, by dad, as thou sayest, I am a blooming youth. Ah! turtle, I could tell you something that would surprise you; I could tell you—Think what I could tell you. (Sings.) "If 'tis joy to wound a lover"—hem!—"how much more to give him ease."

Clara. (Sings.) "When his passion we discover"—

Vand. "Oh! how pleasing 'tis to please!" Oh! I could tell—but no, no; you are sniggering, laughing in your sleeve: ay, ay, I perceive it; you're a wit, and I am an old fool: sneering, ridiculing me; I hate wit and ridicule.

Clara. Me a wit! Lord! papa, I would not be such an animal for the world. A wit! Why, a wit is a kind of urchin, that every man will set his dog at, but won't touch himself, for fear of pricking his fingers. A wit is a monster with a hideous long tongue and no brains; a dealer in paradoxes; one that is blind through a profusion of light; walks upon metaphor, is always seen in a simile, vanishes if you come too near him, and is only to be laid by a cudgel.

Vand. Frightful, indeed! Thank heaven, nobody can say I am a wit.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Mr. Codicil, the attorney, desires to speak with you, sir.

Vand. Very well; I am coming.

Serv. Mrs. Trip, madam, is in the housekeeper's room, and says she hopes your ladyship is well.

Clara. Desire her to walk up. [Exit Serv.]

Vand. Who is Mrs. Trip, turtle?

Clara. A person that lived several years in our family. She is, at present, lady's-maid to Melissa, Sir Harry Portland's sister. She will divert me with her fine language; besides that, I wish to ask her how she likes Sir Harry's family.

Vand. I know Sir Harry's uncle, Sir Hornet Armstrong, very well; an old friend.

Clara. Indeed! I never saw him here.

Vand. Why, no, I don't know how it has happened, but I have not seen him above twice these two years myself; he's an odd mortal; a whimsical old gentleman. Well, b'ye, b'ye!

Clara. Adieu!

Vand. B'ye, b'ye!

[Exit.]

Clara. This Sir Harry runs continually in my head; ay, and I am afraid has found a place in my heart: yes, yes; there's no denying that: but that friend, that Mr. Osborne—If I have any penetration, that man wears a most suspicious, hypocritical face.—[Enter MRS. TRIP.—] So, Mrs. Trip, how have you done this long time?

Mrs. T. Pretty well, thank you, madam, except that I am subject to the historicals, and troubled with the vapours; being, as I am, of a dilikut nervous system, whereof I am so giddy, that my poor head is sometimes quite in a whirlpool; and if I did not bathe with my lady, the doctor tells me I should decline into a liturgy, and so fall down and die, perhaps, in a fit of apostacy.

Clara. And how long have you lived in Sir Harry's family, Mrs. Trip?

Mrs. T. I came soon after my poor dear lady, your mamma, died, and was interrogated; whereof I was at her funeral. My lady is a very good lady; that is, I mean, ma'am, my future lady that I live with at present: she is to be married soon to Mr. Osborne, and may Hydra, the god of marriage, tie the gorgon knot; whereof I heard your ladyship is to be one of the ceremonials.

Clara. I am invited, and shall be there. But, pray, Mrs. Trip, what is your opinion of Mr. Osborne?

Mrs. T. Oh, lard! ma'am, consarning Mr. Osborne—I heard a small bird sing.

Clara. A small bird sing!

Mrs. T. Yes, ma'am.

Clara. Of what feather was this fowl?

Mrs. T. Foul! No, I assure you, your ladyship, as fair a speechified person as any in England; whereof he has a great valiation for me.

Clara. Well.

Mrs. T. And so, the secret is that Mr. Osborne has won almost all Sir Harry's estate.

Clara. Indeed!

Mrs. T. And, moreover, has pretended to be a synagogue, and a Jew, and has lent money in other people's names, on mortgagees and nuitants, whereof my friend has been a party consarned.

Clara. Good heaven, what villany! (Aside.) And pray, who is your friend, Mrs. Trip?

Mrs. T. Oh! ma'am, I hope your ladyship won't intoxicate me on that head, for I know Mr. Timid too well to—

Clara. Oh! it was Mr. Timid?

Mrs. T. Why—that is, ma'am—I didn't mean—Mercy! what have I said?

Clara. You may assure yourself, Mrs. Trip, I shall be careful not to do you any prejudice.

Mrs. T. I am sure, I am supinely obligationed to your ladyship. [Exit.]

Clara. Poor Sir Harry! He has a heart that does honour to mankind, that does not merit distress; yet, if I augur right, it must shortly feel the severest pangs false friendship can inflict. Ungrateful Osborne! I must warn Melissa to beware of him, and if possible, to detach Sir Harry from the gaming-table. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Sir Harry Portland's House.

Enter SIR HARRY PORTLAND, CLARA, MELISSA, and VANDERVELT.

Clara. Ha, ha, ha! Sir Harry, you are a happy man.

Vand. Ay, Sir Harry, you are a happy man.

Mel. Such an accomplished spouse!

Clara. And so kind an uncle!

Sir Harry. Upon my soul, I can't help laughing; and yet the more I reflect on the affair, the more I am amazed; Sir Hornet is whimsical, 'tis true, but no fool.

Vand. Fool, Sir Harry! no, no; he is always the readiest to spy the fooleries of other people: many a time have I laughed at his whims and jokes; an odd mortal he is.

Clara. Nay, if he be so fond of a joke, who knows but he may have sent them on this errand for the joke's sake?

Vand. By dad, turtle, thou hast hit it. As sure as can be, that's it; it is for the joke's sake.

Sir Harry. Impossible: the affair is too serious to be intentional caprice.

Mel. But I thought, when I left you, you were coming to an eclaireissement.

Sir Harry. Coming to an eclaireissement! Why, I told them, as plain as I could speak, that no alliance whatever could take place between the families. [then.

Mel. 'Tis certain they have not understood you,

Sir Harry. Well, there the matter must rest till I can find an interpreter, for I can't make myself more intelligible. [scene yet?

Clara. And you have not had one tender love

Sir Harry. Not one. I am amazed at the girl's simplicity, it equals her ignorance; she speaks and looks so totally unconscious of impropriety, so void of intentional error, that I don't know how to reply.

Clara. Suppose, then, you were to practise a little. Come, I'll stand up for the young lady.

Sir Harry. I shall still find a difficulty to speak.

Clara. Surely!

Sir Harry. In very truth, ma'am. But it will be from a quite different motive.

Clara. Oh! for the love of curiosity, Sir Harry, explain your motive.

Vand. Ay, Sir Harry, explain your motive.

Sir Harry. I cannot, sir.

Vand. Cannot! Sir Harry, why so?

Sir Harry. For reasons, sir, which are far more easily imagined than described.

Vand. Nay, don't be afraid, Sir Harry. My turtle knows how to answer interrogatories; you won't find her a simpleton, I warrant.

Sir Harry. No, sir; the danger is that she might find me one.

Vand. I fancy, Sir Harry, you are a little like me: cautious with the ladies, lest you should be made ridiculous. I am very circumspect in those matters.

Sir Harry. You are very right, sir; it is not every one who has the gift of wearing a fool's-cap with a grace.

Clara. Ay, but notwithstanding all this, Sir Harry, I should like to have a love-scene with you.

Vand. How, turtle!

Clara. In the character of Miss Turnbull.

Vand. Oh! ay, do, Sir Harry, have a love-scene with my turtle.

Sir Harry. Anything to oblige you, sir.

Vand. Come, then, begin. (Clara sets herself in an awkward, silly attitude.) Ha, ha, ha! Look, look at my Turtle lovey-dovey.

Sir Harry. (Addressing Clara.) My uncle, Sir Hornet Armstrong, madam, is desirous that I should gain the inestimable blessing of your hand.

Clara. Anan!

Vand. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Harry. And give me leave to say, madam, however unworthy I may be of the happiness and honour intended me, no person can be more sensible of them.

Clara. What! that be as much as to say you wunt ha' me, I zuppose. (Whimpers.)

Vand. Ha, ha, ha! Nay, but don't cry in earnest, lovey-dovey.

Sir Harry. Oh! dry those heavenly eyes, madam, and believe me, when I call every sacred power to witness my affection, I love, I adore, I die for you. Suffer me to wipe away those pearly tears that hide the beauties of your cheek. (Offering to salute her.)

Clara. Hold, hold, Sir Harry!

Vand. Ay, hold, hold, Sir Harry.

Sir Harry. Why so, sir? 'Tis quite in character.

Clara. Deuce take you, Sir Harry, you—you are too passionate in your feigned addresses; so warm and pressing—

Vand. Ay, so warm and pressing.

Clara. One was not aware.

Sir Harry. I was taken by surprise myself, madam. The bounteous god of love kindly contrived an opportunity which my profound adoration, and a conscious want of merit, had totally deprived me of. Pardon me, if, for a moment, I forgot that respect which every one, who beholds you, cannot help feeling.

Vand. Why, what's this, Sir Harry? You are not in downright earnest, are you?

Sir Harry. Sincere as dying sinners imploring mercy.

Vand. What, in love with my turtle?

Clara. Pooh! Why, no, to be sure. We were only acting a supposed scene.

Vand. Supposed! By dad, I think it was devilishly like a real scene. You both did your parts very naturally.

Sir Harry. Oh! sir, no actor who feels as forcibly as I do, can ever mistake his character.

Vand. Feels forcibly! Your feelings are forcible, indeed.

Mel. Come, come, let us adjourn to the drawing-room; I want to have your opinions on a painting of Coreggio's that my brother has made me a present of.

Vand. Favour me with your hand, young lady; and, Sir Harry, do you take my turtle's; but don't you let your feelings be too forcible. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—The Hall in Sir Harry Portland's house.

Enter SIR HORNET ARMSTRONG and Servant.

Sir Hor. Are the trunks, safe, sirrah, George?

Serv. Yes, sir.

Sir Hor. And did you order that dog of a postillion to take care of the poor devils the horses?

Serv. I did, sir.

Sir Hor. And of himself?

Serv. I did, sir.

Sir Hor. You did, sir? Why, then, do you go and take care of yourself, you rascal.

Serv. I will, sir.

Sir Hor. And do you hear, George?

Serv. Sir?

[break your bones.

Sir Hor. If I find you disobey my orders, I'll

Serv. I'll be very careful, sir, I assure you. [Exit.

Enter TIMID and SCRIP.

Timid. Brokerage comes rather heavy, Mr. Scrip, when the sum is large.

Scrip. Heavy! no, no; a d—d paltry pittance; five-and-twenty pounds only, you see, for selling out twenty thousand. Get more by one lucky hit than fifty of these would produce.

Timid. Ay!

Scrip. Oh! yes; jobbing—stock-jobbing, between you and I, is the high road to wealth.

Timid. Lackaday! may be so. Well, good day. (Scrip is going, but seeing Sir Hornet, stops to listen.)

Sir Hor. What, old Lackaday!

Timid. Ah! Sir Hornet.

Sir Hor. What's the best news with you?

Timid. Ah, lackaday! the best news I know is scarcely worth relating.

Scrip. Beg pardon, sir, (to Sir Hor.) beg pardon—bad news in town, did you say?

Sir Hor. Bad! sir; not that I have heard.

Scrip. Exceedingly sorry for it.

Sir Hor. Sir?

Scrip. Never was more distressed for bad news.

Sir Hor. Distressed for bad news!

Scrip. Excessively! The reduction of Gibraltar, the taking of Jamaica, or the destruction of the grand fleet, one of the three would make me a happy man for life. [you happy for life?

Sir Hor. The destruction of the grand fleet make Scrip. Completely.

Sir Hor. Here's a precious scoundrel!

Scrip. No great reason to complain, to be sure; do more business than any three doctors of the college; generally of the sure side; made a large fortune, if this does not give me a twinge; rather overdone it; but any severe stroke, any great national misfortune, would exactly close my account.

Sir Hor. Hark you, sir!

Scrip. Sir?

Sir Hor. It is to be hoped—

Scrip. Yes, sir, it is to be hoped. [account.

Sir Hor. That a halter will exactly close your

Scrip. Sir?

Sir Hor. You raven-faced rascal! Rejoice at national misfortunes! Zounds! I thought such language was nowhere to be heard from the mouth of an Englishman, unless he were a member of parliament.

Scrip. Lord! sir, you don't consider that I am a bear for almost half a million.

Sir Hor. You are an impudent villain! Rejoice at the distress of your country!

Scrip. Why, Lord! sir, to be sure; when I am a bear. There's not a bear in the Alley but would do the same. Were I a bull, indeed, the case would be Sir Hor. A bull! [altered.

Scrip. For instance, at the taking of Charles-Town, no man was merrier, no man more elate, no man in better spirits.

Sir Hor. How so, gentle sir?

Scrip. Oh! dear sir, at that time I was a bull to a vast amount, when, very fortunately for me, the news arrived; the guns fired, the bells clattered, the stocks mounted, and I made ten thousand pounds. Enough to make a man merry. Never spent a happier night in my life.

Sir Hor. Aha! then, according to that arithmetic, you would be as merry and as happy to-night, could you accomplish the destruction of this said British fleet.

Scrip. Happier, happier by half! for I should realize at least twice the sum—twice the sum.

Sir Hor. Twice the sum!

Scrip. Ay, twice the sum. Oh! that would be a glorious event, indeed. Never prayed so earnestly for anything since I was born; and who knows—who knows what a little time may do for us?

Sir Hor. Zounds! how my elbow aches! (Aside.)

Scrip. I shall call on some leading people—men of intelligence—of the right stamp.

Sir Hor. You shall?

Scrip. Yes, sir.

Sir Hor. Why, then, perhaps you will be able to destroy the British fleet between you.

Scrip. I hope so, I hope so—do everything in my power. Oh! it would be a glorious event.

Sir Hor. Hark you! sir, do you see that door?

Scrip. Sir?

Sir Hor. And this cane?

Scrip. Why, but, sir—

Sir Hor. Make your exit, you imp!

Scrip. But, sir—

Sir Hor. Get out of the house, you vile rascal, you diabolical—[Drives Scrip off.] A son's son of a scoundrel! Who is he? What business had he here?

Timid. Lackaday! sir, he is a stock-broker, that Sir Harry employed, at his sister's request, to sell out for her; because she chooses to have her fortune in her own possession against to-morrow. I have been paying him the brokerage, and receiving the money, which I shall deliver to madam Melissa directly.

Sir Hor. An incomprehensible dog! Pray for the reduction of Gibraltar, the taking of Jamaica, or the destruction of the British fleet!

Timid. Lackaday! sir, it is his trade.

Sir Hor. Trade! a nation will never flourish that encourages traders to thrive by her misfortunes. But come, tell me something of my own affairs: where is Harry? how does he go on?

Timid. Ah, lackaday!

Sir Hor. What, is he a wild young dog? Does he get into thy books?

Timid. Ah, lackaday!

Sir Hor. Ah, lackaday! Zounds! don't sigh, man: he won't die in thy debt.

Timid. Ah, lackaday! Sir Hornet, he should be welcome to the last farthing I have in the world.

Sir Hor. Should he, old Truepenny? then give me thy hand; thou shalt be remembered in my codicil: but, what, he shakes his elbow, I suppose, eh? Seven's the main?

Timid. Ah, lackaday! Sir Hornet, what between main and chance he has been sadly nicked.

Sir Hor. Has he? I'll score his losings upon his pate, a dog—that is, if he will let me. But where is Miss Turnbull? she'll soon reform him; her angelic smiles will teach him—

Timid. Sir?

Sir Hor. Sir! Zounds! you stare like the wooden heads of the twelve Cæsars. Miss Turnbull's charms I say, will find employment for all his virtues and wean him from all his vices.

Timid. Will they, sir?

Sir Hor. Will they, sir! Yes, they will, sir.

Timid. Lackaday!

Sir Hor. Lackaday! What ails you?

Timid. Nothing, sir, nothing; only that I am afraid my eyes begin to grow dim.

Sir Hor. Your head, I believe, begins to grow very thick.

Timid. Ah, lackaday! sir, like enough, like enough.

Sir Hor. Be kind enough to answer me a few questions: is not Miss Turnbull a beautiful girl?

Timid. May I speak truth? [may.

Sir Hor. May you speak truth! to be sure you

Timid. Then I answer no, sir.

Sir Hor. No!

Timid. No.

Sir Hor. Is she not an elegant girl?

Timid. No.

Sir Hor. Nor a witty girl?

Timid. No. [she, in your opinion?

Sir Hor. Tol de rol lol! tititum! Pray, what is Timid. A silly, ignorant, ill-bred, country girl, and very unfit for Sir Harry's wife.

Sir Hor. Tol de rol lol! ladtum! Let me look in your face. Yes, yes; he has it; the moon's almost at full. Poor Lackaday! which is your right hand? (Timid holds it up.) Indeed! wonderful! And are you really in your sober senses?

Timid. Why, indeed, sir, I begin to be rather in doubt: I believe so; but lest I should lose them, I will wish your honour a good morning. [Exit.

Sir Hor. Lackaday! Ha, ha! Not beautiful, nor witty, nor—tol de rol lol! The old fool has a mind to set up for a wit, and has begun by bantering me. Zounds! I was neither drunk nor mad; and to the best of my knowledge, I am not now in a dream.

The brother, indeed, is a booby; and does not appear to be of the same family—hardly of the same species; though he had sense enough to snap at the offer immediately. I remarked he did not stand on ceremony. Surely, I have made no mistake in the business—'Sblood! if it prove so! Parson Adams the second! I shall—Eh! who's this? No, no, no—it is; 'tis she herself, in propria pers—[Enter CLARA.]—Miss Turnbull, I most heartily rejoice to Clara. Miss Turnbull! (Aside.) [see you.

Sir Hor. Your presence has relieved me from one of the oddest qualms—but the sight of you has given me a cordial.

Clara. What do you mean, Sir Hornet?

Sir Hor. Mean, my angel! why, here has been a bantering, lying, enigmatical son of a scoundrel, with a bundle of ironical, diabolical tales, railing at your beauty and accomplishments, till, egad! I began to fancy my fine-flavoured pine-apple a crab.

Clara. This is delightful! But I cannot find in my heart to undeceive him. (Aside.) There is no answering for the difference of taste, sir.

Sir Hor. True. Asses prefer thistles to nectarines; but yet he must be an ass, indeed, who could not distinguish St. Paul's from the pillory.

Clara. Taste, Sir Hornet, is a sort of shot silk, and has a variety of shades: one says 'tis blue, another black, and a third is positive 'tis yellow. It would be a vain attempt, therefore, for Miss Turnbull to endeavour to please the whole world.

Sir Hor. An old booby! I would not give a hair of the pope's beard to please him. But how is it with Sir Harry? is he in raptures? is he dying for you?

Clara. No, sir; he eats and drinks as usual, and is, for aught I can discover, in tolerably good health.

Sir Hor. Is he? an audacious dog! in good health! If I find him in good health I'll pistol him. But you mistake the matter, perhaps: the rascal's proud, and not willing you should see his sufferings; he is a stricken deer, and sheds his tears in solitude and silence, mayhap. Do you discover no symptoms of the sighing swain? Does he never cut his fingers? or scald himself? or run against a post, and beg its Clara. No, sir. [pardon?

Sir Hor. I doubt he is a sad dog. But no, no; I am certain he adores you; 'tis impossible he should do otherwise. But there is another material point, about which I am not quite so certain.

Clara. What is that, sir?

Sir Hor. Has he found any place in your affections? 'Tis true, he's a fine fellow. I don't mean by that, one that is pickled in cosmetics; preserved in musk and marechal powder; and that will melt away, like Lot's wife, in the first hard shower: none of your fellows that are too valiant to give a woman the wall, and too witty to let her have the last word; but one that is—in short, his own manner will best describe what he is. [so short.

Clara. True, Sir Hornet, but the time has been

Sir Hor. Short! Ah! madam, if he did not do the business with a coup d'œil, at once, I would not give a feather of a goose-wing for all the arrows his Cupid has in his quiver. But come, Miss Turnbull, I know you are above the silly prejudices that ordinary minds are swayed by; tell me sincerely, has he made any impression on your heart? Is he the man?

Clara. To speak ingenuously, Sir Hornet, that is a point entirely undetermined, at present.

Sir Hor. Undetermined! why, what—

Clara. Sir Harry's person is engaging, his manners delightful, and his understanding unexceptionable. [hear you say so.

Sir Hor. Bravo! my dear girl! you charm me to Clara. I will say more, Sir Hornet. I find my heart interested in his behalf, and sincerely believe I shall never see another man with whom I could be half so happy.

Sir Hor. My dear Miss Turnbull!

Clara. But yet I have too many reasons to fear it will be impossible we should ever be united.

Sir Hor. Impossible!

Clara. I firmly believe, Sir Harry possesses a thousand virtues, but they are all discoloured by a failing, which, if not as erroneous as some other vices, is more destructive than any.

Sir Hor. I understand you.

Clara. This will for ever deter a woman, who values her own peace, from cherishing a passion that must, in its consequences, be so fatal.

Sir Hor. But you, my angel, will soon cure him of this: it is not a rooted vice—

Clara. Permanently, or my intelligence says false.

Sir Hor. Well, but we have hopes that Mr. Osborne will find means to reclaim him; he is continually with him, continually warning him, and—

Clara. Mr. Osborne, Sir Hornet, is an interested physician, and would rather encourage than cure the disease. [of this?

Sir Hor. Heaven forbid! But who informs you

Clara. Those who are in the secret, I assure you, sir. I am afraid Mr. Osborne is a wicked man; he is—what I dare not speak.

Sir Hor. I confess you alarm me, though I hope without cause. Osborne assumes every appearance of rigid virtue; and, if this were true, he would be the worst of villains. However, suspend your opinion awhile; I'll soon sift the affair: and in the meantime, let me beg of you to think as well of Sir Harry as your doubts will permit you.

Clara. I shall do that, Sir Hornet, without an effort. [Exit.

Enter VANDERVELT.

Vand. (Sees Clara going off.) Why, turtle, why—Ah! Sir Hornet, I am glad to see you.

Sir Hor. Ah, ha! friend Van! why, you look tolerably well. [should I not?

Vand. Tolerably well! Ay, to be sure. Why

Sir Hor. Why should you not! Let me see: there are, as near as I can guess, about seventy reasons why you should not.

Vand. Humph! Oh! what, my age? No, no: let me tell you, Sir Hornet, I—I am not an old man.

Sir Hor. No?

Vand. No; nor you neither.

Sir Hor. Indeed! I am exceedingly glad of that: and, pray, when did you make this discovery?

Vand. Make it! why, I have been making it these twenty years and upwards.

Sir Hor. Oh, ho! And how do you prove it?

Vand. By comparison and reflection. I'll tell you—hold! first, I'll shew you what I call my list of worthies: there, look at that. (Gives a commonplace book.)

Sir Hor. What the devil have we here? (Reads.) "Patrick O'Neal, married, for the seventh time, at the age of one hundred and thirteen; walks without a cane, never idle; children and great-grand-children to the number of one hundred and twenty-three."

Vand. There's a fellow! I warrant that man is alive and hearty at this moment.

Sir Hor. Humph! And, pray, do you think to imitate this worthy, as you call him? Will you be married seven times, and have a hundred and twenty-three children?

Vand. That's more than I can tell.

Sir Hor. Ha! (Reads.) "Thomas Parr, being aged one hundred and twenty, fell in love with Catherine Milton." [the church-door.

Vand. Ay, and did penance in a white sheet at

Sir Hor. Humph! (Reads.) "Henry Jenkins"—

Vand. Ay, there's another: corrected his great grandson, a youth of seventy, with his own hand, for being idle.

Sir Hor. (Reads.) "Johannes de Temporibus, or John of Times, armour-bearer to the emperor Charlemagne, died, aged three hundred threescore and one year."

Vand. Very well; now tell me, when you compare me to Johannes Temporibus, that is, when you compare sixty-seven to three hundred threescore and one, can you say I am an old man?

Sir Hor. An old man! By the beard of Methuselah, thou art scarce an infant; it will be, perhaps, these five years yet before thou art perfectly a child.

Vand. Nay, Sir Hornet, let me beg of you to be serious; you are an old friend, and know the world; I shall be glad of your advice: I ruminate on these things by myself, till I am quite melancholy; now, if I had but somebody to bear half my griefs, I should suppose they would be lessened. [so.]

Sir Hor. Why, true, as you say, one would imagine

Vand. Don't you think, then, if I were to take a handsome, young wife, I should, perhaps, find a cure for all my ills?

Sir Hor. An infallible one.

Vand. And this is, seriously, your opinion.

Sir Hor. Seriously.

Vand. Then tell me—you were talking with the young lady that went out as I entered—

Sir Hor. Well, what of her?

Vand. Is she not very beautiful?

Sir Hor. A divinity.

Vand. Finely accomplished?

Sir Hor. Beyond description.

Vand. That's right. You are a sensible, discerning man, Sir Hornet; and I am delighted to find you approve my choice.

Sir Hor. Your choice!

Vand. My choice. That is the young lady, you must know, to whom I intend to pay my addresses.

Sir Hor. Your what!

Vand. The lady I mean to marry.

Sir Hor. Ha, ha, ha!

Vand. Nay, Sir Hornet—

Sir Hor. Ha, ha, ha! all mad; every soul.

Vand. I don't understand.

Sir Hor. Most reverend youth, I beg your pardon. Ha, ha, ha!

Vand. You see things in a mighty strange light, Sir Hornet. Is it any miracle that a man should love a beautiful woman?

Sir Hor. Ha, ha, ha! Love! why thou'rt another Ætna—Cupid's burning mountain. Your nose has taken fire at your fancy, and become a beacon to warn all young gentlemen of three-score and ten, of the rocks and quicksands hidden in the sea of amorous desires.

Vand. Upon my word, Sir Hornet, this is exceedingly strange.

Sir Hor. Ha, ha, ha! You must excuse me. What a rosy youth! Harkye! friend Vanderveldt, it's my opinion you have been bantering me.

Vand. Od! that's a good thought. (Aside.)—Bantering you! why, ay, to be sure I have. Ha, ha, ha! (Forces a laugh.)

Sir Hor. Oh! you have?

Vand. Certainly. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Hor. Ha, ha, ha! (With the same tone.)

Vand. Didn't you perceive that before? Ha, ha!

Sir Hor. No, 'faith! Ha, ha, ha!

Vand. That's a good joke. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Hor. Excellent! Ha, ha, ha! (During the laugh, Sir H. imitates Vandervelt.)—Now let us be serious.

Vand. With all my heart.

Sir Hor. And I'll tell you a story.

Vand. Do.

Sir Hor. There was a certain antient personage of my acquaintance, called Andrew Vandervelt—

Vand. What, is your story about me?

Sir Hor. Give me leave, young gentleman, and you shall hear.—Everybody imagined him to be a prudent, sedate, grave person, with a moderate share of common sense—

Vand. Well!

Sir H. And, as it was evident his beard was grey, his limbs palsied, his skin shrivelled, and his sinews shrunk—

Vand. How, Sir Hornet?

Sir H. They naturally concluded, he had made his will, wrote his epitaph, and bespoke his coffin—

Vand. Mercy upon me!

Sir Hor. But instead of meditating, like a pious Christian, on the last four things, a crotchet takes him in the head, he buys a three-penny fiddle, scrapes a matrimonial jig, claps a pair of horns upon his head, and curvets through the town, the sport of the mob, derided by the young, pitied by the old, and laughed at by all the world.

Vand. Heaven deliver me, what a picture!—But you forget, Sir Hornet; didn't I explain to you that it was only a joke?

Sir Hor. Oh! true. Ah! witty rogue! Well, adieu. I'll remember the joke. Ha, ha, ha!

Vand. Ay do. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Hor. Oh! for a song to the tune of "Room for Cuckolds!" [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Chamber at Sir Harry Portland's.

Enter SIR HARRY PORTLAND.

Sir Harry. (Much agitated.) May the everlasting curse of heaven consume those implements of hell, those deceitful, infernal fiends! I'll never touch, never look on cards or dice again. If I ever make another bet, may all the horrors of a ruined fortune haunt me, sleeping and waking; may I be pointed at by children, and pitied by sharpers. Distraction! May I be—I am already ruined, past redemption.

Enter a Servant, who delivers a letter to Sir Harry.

Sir Harry. (Breaks open the letter hastily.) Um—Um—Stay, sir. (To the Servant.) D——n! Is it possible! In league with sharpers. Who brought this letter, sir?

Servant. A porter, sir.

Sir Harry. Where is he? [in a hurry.]

Servant. Gone, sir; he ran off round the corner

Sir Harry. You may go, sir. [Exit Servant.]

Enter OSBORNE.

Osborne. You seem moved, Sir Harry; may I enquire the cause?

Sir Harry. You are the cause, sir.

Osborne. I!

Sir Harry. Yes, you. There, read, sir.

Osborne. (Reads.) "Beware of a false friend; the person who gives you this caution, would sacrifice a life to preserve you from the destruction that threatens you. Mr. Osborne is in league with Jews and sharpers, and you are a victim to his avarice and duplicity." So, so. Well, Sir Harry, do you give any credit to this epistle?

Sir Harry. Nay, sir, you are to tell me how much or how little credit it deserves.

Osborne. Why, look you, Sir Harry, I cannot, nor I will not, enter into explanations.

Sir Harry. Sir! Cannot, nor will not, enter into explanations!

Osborne. No, sir.

Sir Harry. But I say, sir, you shall.

Osborne. Shall!

Sir Harry. Yes, sir, shall.

Osborne. Ay, sir? Who is he that shall make me?

Sir Harry. I am he, sir.

Osborne. Indeed!

Sir Harry. Friendship, honour, honesty, ought to make you; but present appearances declare you void of these.

Osborne. Present appearances declare you void of reason, sir, otherwise you would remember me for one of those who are not to be terrified by a loud tongue, or an angry brow. I repeat it, I will not now enter into explanations. I have played with you, I have staked my money, and won yours. Would it have been dishonourable had you won mine? I have disposed of that money as I thought proper. No matter whether with Jews or Christians; and, I should have supposed, your passion and suspicion would have required better proof, than the malevolent aspersion of an anonymous letter, ere they ought to have incited you to a quarrel with your friend.

Sir Harry. I beg your pardon, dear Osborne; I am to blame; nothing but the severity of my late losses can plead for me; I know you to be a noble-hearted, worthy fellow, and explanations, on such an accusation, are as much beneath you to give, as me to demand. Forget my silly warmth: it is my weakness.

Osborne. Do you forget the cause of it, Harry, and it is forgot.

Sir Harry. It was madness—I am above suspicion—'tis ungenerous—'tis damnable—pray excuse—pray forgive me.

Osborne. Well, well, think no more on't; only guard against suspicion for the future. [Exit.]

Sir Harry. No, no, it cannot be; there is an open fortitude in his manner, a boldness that can only result from innocence.

Enter MELISSA.

Mel. Oh! brother, I am glad I have found you. Why did you send these troublesome things to me? Why did not you take care of them for me? Trust a giddy girl, indeed, with a parcel of bank bills. Here, here, here they are, take 'em, take 'em, they will be safe with you; I have been in a panic, ever since they were in my possession, lest they should take wing, and fly through the key-hole, or in some other unaccountable way. I am unused to such large sums, and don't feel happy while they are about me.

Sir Harry. But what am I to do with them?

Mel. Keep them till to-morrow, and then, you know, when you give my hand to your friend, you may give them too, to make it the more acceptable; there are just twenty, of one thousand each. So, now I am easy—good b'ye: I am going to purchase a few knick-knacks. [Exit.]

Sir Harry. Well, but, sister! Melissa! She's gone, flown on the light wings of innocence and happiness, while I, depressed by folly, feel a weight upon my heart, that hope itself cannot remove. What is a ruined gamester? An idiot, who begins for his amusement, who continues hoping to retrieve, and who is ruined before he can recollect himself; a wretch, deserted, solitary, forlorn; ashamed of society, yet miserable when alone; shunned by the prosperous; despised by the prudent; deservedly exposed to the poisoned shafts of insolence and envy; a by-word to the vulgar, and a jest to the fortunate; haunted by duns, preyed upon by usurers, persecuted and curst by creditors. Inexplicable infatuation! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Apartment.

Enter CLARA, MELISSA, and 'SQUIRE TURNBULL.

Mel. Mr. Turnbull, I must beg, sir, you'll desist.

Turn. Desist, why, to be sure; I'll go and buy license out o'hand, make hay while the sun do shine, and don't lose the zheep for a ha'porth o'tar; what tho', the pepper-box must ha' a lid; a bushel o'words wunt vill a basket; when the owl goes a hunting, 'tis time to light the candle.

Clara. Ha, ha, ha! If you'll permit me, my dear, I think I can relieve you from this embarrassment.

Mel. Permit you! I am sure if you can, you shall be canonized, and have churches erected to your memory.

Clara. I'll talk to him in his own language, he can comprehend no other.

Turn. Well, vair lady.

Clara. Well, zir.

Turn. You do zee how the nail do drive. Be you to be one at bridal!

Clara. No.

Turn. No! Why zo? you'st be bride-maid.

Clara. No, but I wunt.

Turn. Wunt you?

Clara. No; nor you'st not be bridegroom, nother.

Turn. No!

Clara. No.

Turn. How zo!

Clara. Because you've zold the zkin afore you've catshed the vox. You've reckoned your chickens bevore they be hatched.

Turn. Nay, nay; stop at the dike; zure I do knaw my own mind, an miss be agreed.

Clara. But miss ben't agreed.

Turn. No! That's a good joke; but she be,

Clara. But she ben't, though. [though.]

Turn. But I'm zure she be.

Clara. But I'm zure she ben't.

Turn. No! Why, miss, ben't you agreed?

Mel. No, sir.

Turn. No!

Clara. You may gape, but the cherry won't drop; too much mettle is dangerous in a blind horse; misreckoning is no payment; John would ha' wed, but Mary war na willing.

Mel. You seem surprised, sir; I can only say, it is without reason; you have deceived yourself, in supposing such an alliance possible, and I hope your own good sense will inform you, that, after this declaration, any renewal of your addresses to me must be considered an insult.

Turn. An' zo, then, the meaning of all this vine zpeech, I zuppose, is, that you wunt ha' me?

Mel. It is.

Clara. "Make hay while the sun do shine; don't lose the zheep for a ha'porth of tar; a bushel of words wunt vill a basket; when the owl goes a hunting, 'tis time to light the candle." Your most obedient, gentle 'squire. Ha, ha, ha!

[Exit, with Clara.]

Turn. Zo, then, it zeems I ha' been reckoning without my host here. Well, what though, zoon hot zoon cold; zoon got zoon gone; care's no cure; zorrow won't pay a man's debts; he wanted a zinging-bird, that gave a groat for a cuckoo; an' he that loses a wife and zixpence, has lost a tester. —[Enter MISS TURNBULL.]—Why, Barbara, what be's the matter wi' thee? Where hast thee been?

Miss T. Been! Why I ha' bin wildered.

Turn. What, lost!

Miss T. Ees; an' if I had na' by good hap met wi' John, who has got direction in written hand, it were vive golden guineas to a brass varthin I'd been kidnapped an' zent to America, among the Turks.

Turn. Zerve thee right, thee must be gadding; but I ha' news vor thee, the cow has kicked down the milk; it's all off 'tween miss and I.

Miss T. Zure! rabbit me an I didn't guess as much.

Turn. Ees, the nail's clenched; zhe and I ha' zhook hands, an' parted.

Miss T. My gracious! What, won't yo' ha' zhe?

Turn. No, I wunt; her may whistle, but I zha'n't hear; her may beckon, but I zha'n't come; catch me an' ha' me, I'm no vool; zo, do you zee, an' you be minded to wed, zay grace an' vall to; vor I don't like your London tricks, an' zo I st leave it as vast as I can.

Miss T. An' when be I to be wed?

Turn. Why, I do vind Zir Hornet be come; zo, when yo' do zee Zir Harry, yo' may zettle't; an', d'ye hear, Barbara, don't let me vind yo' at any o'these skittish off an' on freaks; I ha' zeen too much on 'um lately. Oh! here be Zir Harry coming, an' zo I'st leave you to make love your own way; I'st not play my ace o'trumps out yet. [Exit.]

Enter SIR HARRY PORTLAND.

Sir Harry. So, here's my good whimsical uncle's nonpareil, as he calls her—his phoenix. All alone, Miss Turnbull?

Miss T. Ees; brother be just gone; a's vallen out wi' miss, an' a's plaguily frumped.

Sir Harry. Sure! [make love.]

Miss T. Ees; a zaid, too, 'at yo' an' I be to Sir Harry. He did!

Miss T. Ees; and I do know his tricks; a'll be in a woundy rage, an I don't do as he bids me.

Sir Harry. What, will he be surly?

Miss T. Zurly! a'll snarl worser than our great dog, Jowler, at a beggar.

Sir Harry. He is ill-tempered, then?

Miss T. Oh! a'll zulk vor a vortnight round, an' when a comes about again, a'll make a believe to romp; an' then a' lumps, an' gripes, an' pinches, till I am quite a weary on't.

Sir Harry. Well you may, I think. Poor thing. (Aside.) And which way are we to make love?

Miss T. My gracious! don't you know?

Sir Harry. I believe I can give a guess; you, I suppose, are to hang down your head and titter.

Miss T. Ees.

Sir Harry. I—hem! and look sheepish.

Miss T. Ees. [thumbs.]

Sir Harry. You gnaw your apron; I twirl my

Miss T. He, he! Ees.

Sir Harry. You say—it's a very fine day, sir, and I answer, yes, ma'am, only it rains.

Miss T. He, he, he! Ees, iveck, that be vor all the world the very moral of our country vashion. Oh! but here be zomebody coming.

Enter SIR HORNET ARMSTRONG, CLARA, and VANDERVELT.

Sir Hor. Why, Harry, you dog, what, have you hid yourself, because you would not see me?

Sir Harry. Dear sir, I am exceedingly glad to see you, but it is not a quarter of an hour since I heard of your being in town; and I suppose, sir, you will scarcely be angry at finding me in this company. (Vand., Sir Harry, and Miss T. retires.)

Sir Hor. Finding you in—Zounds! what awkward cargo of rusticity has he got there? (To Clara.)

Clara. A young lady from Somersetshire, with a tolerably good fortune, that Sir Harry, it is thought by some, intends to marry.

Sir Hor. Marry! He should as soon marry the mummy of queen Semiramis.

Clara. She has been strongly recommended to the family, sir.

Sir Hor. Recommended! By whom?

Clara. By one you are very intimate with, and who has very great influence with Sir Harry, as well as with yourself.

Sir Hor. Ay! Who is that?

Clara. Pardon me there, Sir Hornet.

Sir Hor. Certainly the fellow cannot be foolish enough to admire her; but I shall soon discover that, by what he thinks of you. Harkye, Harry!

Sir Harry. Sir.

Sir Hor. I cannot, upon the whole, tell very well what to make of you. Are you thoroughly convinced that you are, at this instant, legally capable of making your will?

Sir Harry. My will, sir!

Sir Hor. Ay, are you of sound mind?

Sir Harry. I believe so, sir.

Sir Hor. Then pray tell me, now we have you face to face, what is your opinion of Miss Turnbull?

Sir Harry. Sir, that is by no means a question proper to be answered in this company.

Sir Hor. Psha! D—n your delicacy. Make your panegyric, and I'll blush for her and you, too.

Sir Harry. Sir, I have no panegyric to make.

Sir Hor. Sir!

Sir Harry. Even so.

Sir Hor. Why you impudent, confounded—Have you the barefaced effrontery, with such a picture before your eyes, to—

Sir Harry. You have applied the torture, and my own ease requires confession.

Sir Hor. Humph! And so you—Now, pray, all be attentive, for Bacon's brazen head is going to utter. So you do not think Miss Turnbull a most engaging—(Sir Harry smiles.)—Why, you intolerable—

Sir Harry. I am concerned to see you so serious on the subject. I must acknowledge, that in this case, sir, I have either a most perverse or stupid imagination, and, cannot, for the soul of me, discover the latent wonders in the young lady, which your better sight has so distinct a view of.

Sir Hor. Ha!

Sir Harry. I am, however, exceedingly willing to try the utmost strength of my faith, to believe as much as I can, and take the rest for granted; provided you will not inflict the punishment of a wife upon my superstition.

Sir Hor. Obliging youth! (Bows.) Inflict the punishment of a wife upon your superstition! And so you think, no doubt, a wife a burthen much too heavy for the back of so fine and pretty a town-made gentleman as yourself.

Sir Harry. With the addition of Miss Turnbull's accomplishments, I most undoubtedly do, sir.

Sir Hor. You do! Humph! Pray, most civil sir, permit me to ask—perhaps there may be some other lady in this good company, to whom your profound penetration would give the preference?

Sir Harry. If such preference could, in the least, make me deserving of her, I have no scruple to say there is.

Sir Hor. Miracle of modesty! There is?

Sir Harry. Most assuredly. But, though to possess the lady you hint at, would make me blessed beyond description, I have never dared to declare so much before, because I am conscious of being unworthy of such a profusion of charms and accomplishments.

Clara. Generous diffidence! (Aside.)

Sir Hor. Charms and—What the devil is all this? Where am I, at sea, or on shore? Have I a calenture in my brain, or is this my nose! They—they call you Sir Harry Portland, don't they, sir?

Sir Harry. And your nephew, sir.

Sir Hor. No; that's rather dubious. Well, then, Mr. Harry, or Sir Harry, or what you please, you are pretty well convinced, I suppose, that I have had some slight regard for you.

Sir Harry. Perfectly, sir, and remember it with gratitude.

Sir Hor. That remains to be proved, friend. Ever since your father's death, if I don't mistake, I have been tolerably busy, a little active, or so, in forming your mind and manners, and moulding you into a sort of being, a man might behold without blushing.

Sir Harry. It is impossible, sir, I should ever forget your goodness, though I am happy to be reminded of it.

Sir Hor. That's a lie, I believe. However, sir, among the rest of my cares, I was anxious to find a woman worthy of you; nay, so solicitous was I about adjusting preliminaries, that though the gout had laid an embargo upon a parcel of my fingers and toes, I resolved to forego my own ease, and set sail immediately, that I might convoy you safe into the harbour of happiness.

Sir Harry. I am very sensible of the benevolence of your intentions, sir, and only wish you had done me the honour to—

Sir Hor. Well, I have only a word or two more to say on the subject: I have been an enthusiastic old blockhead, 'tis true, and was fool enough to think all men had eyes; however, if you have not either the complaisance, the wit, or the love, to hit upon some expedient to make your peace with Miss Turnbull, I will never see, never know, never speak to you again. And now, sir, you will act as your great wisdom shall direct.

Sir Harry. Indeed, sir, I am distressed to see you so intent upon this business; I am exceedingly unhappy to do the least thing to incur your displeasure, at this moment especially: I have a thousand reasons to be dissatisfied with myself, and am grieved to add your anger to the list. I would do anything in my power to preserve your friendship and affection; but this is too severe a task; I cannot totally forget common sense: I cannot entirely command so delicate a passion as that of love. A little time will discover whether I am ever to think of love or happiness again! of this, however, I am certain, I never can possess either with Miss Turnbull. [Exit.]

Sir Hor. Indeed, youngster! so resolute!

Clara. What a noble fortitude! (Aside.)

Sir Hor. We shall see who will first read their recantation. An insensible, blind puppy! I'll be a greater torment to him, than a beadle to a beggar, a cat to a rat, or a candle to a moth: I'll singe his wings; I'll plague him worse than Moses did the Egyptians. [ther opinion.]

Clara. Oh! Sir Hornet, you'll soon be of ano—

Sir Hor. Never, never, never!—[Enter SQUIRE TURNBULL, unperceived.]—However, let him act as he will, Miss Turnbull shall have no cause to repent her coming to London. [zights?]

Miss T. What! will yo' take me to zee the Turn. Who the devil bade that goose cackle?

Sir Hor. A cursed idiot, or I have no skill in physiognomy.

Turn. What, Barbara! Ees, that her be, though no vool, neather: her do know better than to thatch her house wi' pancakes.

Sir Hor. Psha! Miss Turnbull! (To Clara.)

Miss T. Ees, I be here.

Sir Hor. Again! (Takes Clara by the hand.) Give me leave, I say, dear Miss Turnbull, to—

Vand. Eh! Sir Hornet!

Clara. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Hor. Why, what— [bull, sure?]

Vand. You don't take my turtle for Miss Turn—

Sir Hor. Your turtle! I don't know what you mean by your turtle; but I take this young lady for Miss Turnbull, sure.

Vand. You do!

Sir Hor. Yes, I do. (Vand. and Clara laugh.) Why, what the devil—Eh!—why, sure—

Vand. Ha, ha, ha! This is a good joke.

Sir Hor. A good joke! Why, madam—'Squire—Zounds!—

Vand. Ha, ha, ha! I would not have missed this for a thousand pounds in new coined guineas.

Sir Hor. Mr. Turnbull, sir, is not this your Turn. Zister! [sister, sir?]

Sir Hor. Yes.

Turn. What thic!

Sir Hor. Yes.

Turn. Thic Barbara!

Sir Hor. Zounds! yes, I tell you.

Turn. Why, no, to be zure. Thic be Barbara!

Clara. Ha, ha, ha! [fleered.]

Vand. Ha, ha, ha! the biter bit; the fleerer

Sir Hor. (Whistles.) Thic be Barbara!

Turn. Ees, thic be Barbara!

Miss T. Ees, I be Barbara.

Vand. Why, what a numskull your nephew is, Sir Hornet.

Sir Hor. Do you think so?

Vand. A blind, insensible puppy!

Sir Hor. Is he?

Vand. But you'll torment him; you'll singe his wings; you'll plague him worse than Moses did the Egyptians. What a discovery!

Sir Hor. Oh! yes; I have made more disco—

Vand. Ay, what are they? [veries.]

Sir Hor. Why the first is, you're an old fool; the next is, I am another; and the third is, that we are not the only fools in company.

[Exit, followed by Clara and Vand.]

Turn. Barbara.

Miss T. Ees.

Turn. How does thee like London?

Miss T. I know not; it do zeem a strange place.

Turn. A strange place!

Miss T. Ees, I do think it be.

Turn. Thee dost?

Miss T. Ees.

Turn. An' zo do I; whereby, dost zee? I'll get out on't as vast as I can. A pretty chace, as the man said that rode vifty miles a'ter a wild goose. London! An this be London, the devil take London. Come, pack up thy ribands an' vlappets, an' make thyzel ready.

Miss T. Neea, zure; you wunt go zo zoon.

Turn. Wunt I? An' I stay in thic town to-night, I'll eat it vor breakvast to-morrow.

Miss T. My gracious!

Turn. Come, come, don't stand mauxing and dawdling, but make thyzel ready.

Miss T. Lard! why I a' zeen nothing yet.

Turn. No, nor nothing thee zhalt zee, that I promise thee; zo stir thy stumps, I tell thee.

Miss T. My gracious! Mun I go down into t' country again like a vool, an' ha' nothing to zay vor myzel?

Turn. Why, look thee, Barbara; come along; vor thee have come up like a vool, zo there can be no harm in thy going down like a vool. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Library in Sir Harry Portland's house.

SIR HARRY PORTLAND and TIMID discovered.

Timid. Indeed, sir, you have always been the best of masters to me.

Sir Harry. No, Timid, no; I have been a very weak, idle, fellow; and have put it out of my power to be a good master to any one.

Timid. Lackaday! Sir, don't say so; I am afraid I have been a bad servant; a very bad servant.

Sir Harry. Never.

Timid. Lackaday! sir, you don't know, you don't know! Lackaday! I thought all for the best.

Sir Harry. You have only done what I commanded.

Timid. To be sure, sir. But, lackaday! I wish I dared to open my mind to him. I am terrified; he will never believe me innocent. (Aside.)

Sir Harry. My ruin is all my own work. Here, Mr. Timid, take this ring and remember me; it may be the last present I shall ever make you.

Timid. Pray don't say so, sir. I am terrified.

Sir Harry. I am going to Mr. Osborne's.

Timid. To Mr. Osborne's!

Sir Harry. Yes, if you should not see me to-morrow morning; if any accident should happen—

Timid. Lackaday!

Sir Harry. Give the state of my affairs, which I ordered you to draw up, to my uncle, and this picture to Clara, the young lady that is with him.

Timid. Sir! What do you mean?

Sir Harry. Oh! nothing, nothing; I'm not very well; I—a slight swimming in my head, that's all; but there is no knowing what may happen.

Timid. Lackaday! Sir, you terrify me, you talk like a dying man making his will.

Sir Harry. No, no, not so; I have nothing to leave: and, as to dying, men must die; live as long as they can, they must all die at last.

Timid. Shall I go for Sir Hornet, or your sister, or the young lady?

Sir Harry. No; no young ladies for—Oh!

Timid. Lackaday! my heart aches.

Sir Harry. I am going to Mr. Osborne's presently.

Timid. Lackaday! I wish he knew—I'll take the mortgage of the Kentish estate; Mr. Osborne ordered me to bring it: I'll lay it open on Mr. Osborne's table. I hope my dear master will see it; I hope he will discover all. (Aside.)

Sir Harry. Heigho!

Timid. Dear sir, don't sigh so; don't look so: tell me what I can do to serve you, to oblige you, to make you happier?

Sir Harry. Nothing, nothing; past hope, past cure; quite, quite—

Timid. Lackaday!

Sir Harry. A thoughtless, profligate, idle, dissipated fellow. Oh! my head, my head!

Timid. I cannot bear to see him so. I'll hurry to Mr. Osborne's; I'll try if I can yet persuade him to be a true friend; I'll beg, I'll pray, I'll go down on my knees; I'll do anything. [Exit.]

Sir Harry. Clara! an angel! a cherub! And what am I? Well, well, it will soon be all over; there will be a sudden stop—a speedy end. (Laughing without.) So happy—Heaven—Heaven increase your joys! mine are for ever fled—light laughter, innocent smiles, and social mirth are fled for ever, for ever. Oh, folly! Oh, madness! [Exit.]

Enter SIR HORNET, VANDERVELT, and CLARA, (Laughing.)

Sir Hor. Ay, ay, pray laugh, laugh heartily, I beseech you; I deserve, and I desire no mercy.

Clara. It is one of the oddest adventures.

Vand. How the deuce could you mistake that blowzabel, Miss Turnbull, for my turtle?

Sir Hor. Why, true, as you say, friend Van; but that happens to be a blunder which I never did, nor ever could make. I should as soon take myself for a king, or you for a conjuror. I only mistook this lady to be Miss Turnbull, not Miss Turnbull to be this lady.

Vand. Mistook Miss Turnbull and this lady, and—I don't understand it.

Clara. Be kind enough, Sir Hornet, to explain the matter.

Sir Hor. You remember, madam, I had some conversation with you in the rooms at Bath.

Clara. Perfectly.

Sir Hor. And you could not but perceive how forcibly I was struck with your wit, beauty, and accomplishments.

Clara. I recollect you were very polite, sir, and were pleased to say abundance of obliging things.

Sir Hor. Not half so many as I thought, I assure you, madam.

Vand. Well said, Sir Hornet. My old friend is quite enamoured with you, turtle.

Sir Hor. Yes, sir, so I am; though I do not intend to marry the lady.

Vand. Hem!

Sir Hor. My grand object, the thing that, of all others, I have most at heart, is to see my nephew, Sir Harry, happy; as for myself, I feel I am growing old apace, and am almost tired of the farce of life.

Vand. Why so, Sir Hornet? I am sure you play your part excellently.

Sir Hor. No, no; I am rolling down hill apace, and as the first steep declivity may precipitate me to the bottom, there are certain affairs I wish to see finished, one of which is the marriage of Sir Harry.

Clara. So the person you asked concerning me, when I went out of the rooms, mistook the question, and thought you meant Miss Turnbull?

Sir Hor. So it appears, madam; and I was too much enraptured to stay to rectify mistakes. When I negotiated the affair with 'Squire Turnbull, I studiously avoided an interview with his supposed sister, for fear the business should wear a face of precipitate indelicacy; and I thought if I could once bring you and Sir Harry together, I would leave the contingent possibilities to love, and the superior good qualities and penetration of the parties, which I, rationally enough, concluded could not fail to produce the desired effect.

Clara. But, Sir Hornet, how did it happen that you did not enquire of me myself who I was?

Sir Hor. Why, 'faith! madam, I had been so particular with you, and had spoken so freely on the subjects of love and matrimony, that I was afraid, if I made those kind of inquiries, you would mistake the matter, perhaps, and think I wanted to make love to you in my own proper person. Hey! young Van. (Aside.)

Vand. Heigho!

Clara. Oh! no, Sir Hornet, I assure you, I had a better opinion of your understanding.

Vand. Hem!

Sir Hor. Certainly, had I been capable of such a whim, I should have made myself cursedly ridiculous. Hey! young Van. (Aside.)

Clara. Beyond dispute!

Vand. Heigho!

Enter TIMID, looking wild and frightened.

Sir Hor. Heyday! What's the matter with you, old Lackaday?

Timid. I'm terrified, I'm terrified, I'm terrified!

Sir Hor. Terrified! What's the matter? Zounds! why don't you speak?

Timid. Lackaday! I can't, I can't speak.

Sir Hor. Make signs then.

Timid. I'm a miserable old man; I ran all the way to tell you—

Sir Hor. What?

Timid. Mr. Osborne!

Sir Hor. Mr. Osborne! What of him?

Timid. Lackaday! Sir Harry!

Clara. Heavens! A duel.

Timid. I have put my trust in man, and am deceived; I have lean'd upon a reed, and am fallen; I have seen the shadow of friendship and—

Sir Hor. Curse light on your metaphors; come to facts: What of Osborne? What of Sir Harry? Where are they? What have they done? What are they doing?

Timid. Gambling!

Sir Hor. How!

Timid. I was at Mr. Osborne's when Sir Harry came; I was there with the mortgage of the Kentish estate.

Sir H. Of what? [ish estate.]

Timid. It was executed this very day; I am a miserable old man—all lost!

Sir Hor. Lost!

Timid. Lackaday! that's not all; I went into the next room and heard Sir Harry go to gaming with a gang of sharpers that were there on purpose; Sir Harry had lost everything he had in the world; Mr. Osborne has got all, all the mortgages of all his estates, I saw 'em, left 'em all in a box on his table.

Sir Hor. Mortgages of all his estates! Perdition! How did he get them? How came you to know?

Timid. Lackaday! I am terrified, I dare not tell; I am an accomplice! A wicked, innocent, miserable old man.

Sir Hor. D——n! Order the coach, there; I'll tear him to atoms; I'll rend him piecemeal—my poor boy—an intolerable villain! Dear madam, you don't know what I feel.

Clara. Pardon me, Sir Hornet, if you knew my heart, you would not say so; I detest the treachery of Mr. Osborne as much as you do; and, woman as I am, would risk my life to see it properly punished.

Sir Hor. A smooth-tongued, hypocritical villain, that owes his life to my boy.

Clara. Dear Sir Hornet, excuse my weakness; I am in the utmost terror—in dread of consequences still more fatal.

Timid. Lackaday! sir, so am I; I am terrified. Sir Harry gave me this ring for a remembrance, and bade me deliver this picture to you, madam.

Clara. (Bursts into tears.) It is his own.

Timid. He looked so melancholy, and so furious; he had his pistols.

Clara. His pistols! Oh! for pity's sake, Sir Hornet, let us fly.

Sir Hor. Instantly.

Timid. I'm a miserable old man. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Mr. Osborne's House.

Enter SIR HARRY PORTLAND excessively agitated, followed by Osborne with a brace of pistols that he had wrested from him.

Osborne. How now, Sir Harry; what is the cause of this sudden phrenzy? Why expose your want of temper and fortitude thus to the company? You have driven them away, they are all going—

Sir Harry. Oh! horror!

Osborne. If you must wreak vengeance on yourself, let it be a becoming one at least.

Sir Harry. Insupportable horror!

Osborne. Fie, fie, recover your temper; be, or seem to be a man. What—You knew you were ruined before this event.

Sir Harry. Oh, Osborne! Oh, Melissa! I cannot speak—I cannot utter it; I'm a wretch—a villain, the meanest, the worst of villains, and infamy, eternal infamy is mine.

Osborne. Why, what have you done?

Sir Harry. Ruined you, ruined my sister.

Osborne. How!

Sir Harry. And branded myself, everlastingly, a villain. [Way?]

Osborne. Ruined me! ruined your sister! which

Sir Harry. The money I have lost within.

Osborne. Well.

Sir Harry. Is her's—Is your's.

Osborne. Mine!

Sir Harry. Melissa's—her fortune—she put it into my hand this very day.

Osborne. D—n!

Sir Harry. Have compassion on me, give me the pistols, let me at once put an end to my misery and shame.

Osborne. Thoughtless, weak man! Do you think the momentary pang of death a sufficient punishment for the ruin and destruction you have entailed upon all those who have had the misfortune to love, or to be related to you? Do you think that to die, and to forget, at once, your infamy and crimes, is a compensation for the havoc you have made with the peace and property of those who were dearest to you, who must live to feel the effect of your vices, and bear, unjustly, the reproach of your abandoned conduct.

Sir Harry. Oh, torture!

Osborne. Was it not enough that you had reduced yourself, from affluence and honour, to contempt and beggary, but you must wantonly, wickedly, sport with what was not your own; and involve the innocent and unborn in your wretchedness? Shall not your sister's offspring, whom your intemperance shall have reduced to poverty and misery, detest your memory, and imprecate curses on your name?

Sir Harry. Oh, hell!

SIR HORNET ARMSTRONG speaks without, and afterwards enters, followed by CLARA and TIMID.

Sir Hor. Where are they? which is the room? So, Mr. Lucifer—could you decoy your friend to no other place to rob him, but your own house?

Osborne. Did you address yourself to me, Sir Hornet.

Sir Hor. Yes, I did, Sir Satan, and if—

Sir Harry. Dear sir, forbear; I alone am the proper object of anger—of vengeance—a wretch—a despised and miserable outcast; and bitterness and despair are deservedly my portion.

Sir Hor. You are a dupe, a poor fascinated fool; you have beheld the serpent's mouth open, have felt the influence of his poisonous breath, yet stupidly dropped into his ravenous jaws, and sung a requiem to your own destruction.

Osborne. You are liberal, sir, of your epithets and accusations. What do you mean by them?

Sir Hor. Horrible impudence! Have you not taken a vile, a rascally advantage of the want of temper in the man, for whom you professed the most perfect friendship? Have you not stripped him of his estate, by the most villanous arts, by plotting with Jews and scoundrels?

Osborne. You talk loud, sir. [was true.]

Sir Harry. Osborne plotting! the letter then

Sir Hor. Yes, plotting! He is the principal, the leader of the hellish gang that has been plundering you.

Osborne. Well, sir! suppose it—What then?

Sir Hor. What then! Halts!

Osborne. Why so, sir? He has persisted in bringing destruction upon himself, and must suffer the effects of his obstinacy. What crime was there in my receiving what he was resolved to throw away? He had not been a month returned from his travels, before his passion for play made him the jest of every polite sharper in town. They saw there was an estate to be scrambled for, and every one was industrious to obtain a share. After squandering a part of his fortune among these adventurers, he engaged at play with me, and after losing one sum, was never easy till he had lost another. Am I, then, to be accountable for his folly? [it?]

Sir Harry. Infernal treachery! Dares he avow

Osborne. Dare! Yes, sir, I dare.

Clara. Righteous heaven! Is there no peculiar, no quick vengeance for ingratitude? (Aside.)

Sir Hor. The deeds, the annuities you have granted, the mortgages you have made, are in his possession; he owns he has them all.

Sir Harry. He!

Osborne. Yes, sir, I.

Sir Harry. Madness! Remember and beware, remember and tremble, though I have no longer the fortune of Sir Harry Portland, I have still Harry's spirit, and dare chastise insolence and perfidy.

Osborne. No doubt; the man who is rash enough to risk his estate upon the chance of a die, has, generally, valour enough to wish to cut the winner's throat. Friendship is no protection.

Clara. Friendship! Monstrous prostitution! Friendship! Deeds, Mr. Osborne, are the best proofs of friendship, and that preacher will gain but little credit who is a detected villain, while he is describing the fitness and beauty of moral virtue.

Sir Hor. Friendship! Where are the deeds, the mortgages?

Osborne. There they are, sir. (Points to a box.) They are mine; the annuities he has granted, and the mortgages he has made are mine; his effects are mine, his houses are mine, his estates are mine, his notes are mine, his all is mine, except his poverty and spirit, which, as he says, are his own.

Sir Harry. Heavens! must I bear this?

Sir Hor. Oh! for ratsbane or hemp.

Osborne. Nay more, sir: (To Sir Harry.) I was not only aware, but certain of my own superior address, or I had not been weak enough to have risked any part of my fortune. I have not yet acquired your heroic contempt for riches; as it was, I used every art to stimulate and incite you to play; took every advantage, studied every trick, improved every lucky chance, and rejoiced at every and all of your losses, till I had you totally in my power; I beheld distress accumulating on your head, and was happy at it; remarked the agitation of your mind, and increased it; saw the infirmity of your temper, and aggravated it.

Sir Harry. D——n! Are you a man?

Osborne. Try me.

Sir Harry. Dare you give me the satisfaction—the revenge of a man?

Osborne. I'll give it you instantly, sir. (As Sir Harry offers to go, Osborne seizes his arm, and before he speaks, his countenance changes from assumed anger and contempt, to the most tender and expressive friendship.) There, there lies your revenge! there is your satisfaction! Take them, remember your former folly, and be happy.

Sir Harry. Sir!

Sir Hor. What?

Clara. Astonishment!

Osborne. Why do you seem surprised? My heart is your's, my life is your's! I owe you everything; a debt which never can be repaid, and never will be forgotten. When sinking beneath the murderous hand of villany, it was the benevolent ardour of your soul, it was the intrepid valour of your arm that rescued me!

Sir Harry. Generous friend!

Osborne. In that box is contained all that I have ever won of you, and almost all you have ever lost. I have become an associate with sharpers to protect you from them; and, by sacrificing a little, have preserved the rest. I have worn the mask till it is become too painful, and now gladly cast it off. If my conduct have yet a dubious appearance, I have a witness that will be instantly credited.—(Goes to the chamber-door, and calls Melissa.—MELISSA enters, and runs to Sir Harry.)

Mel. My brother!

Sir Harry. Sister! Osborne!

Clara. Oh, my heart!

Sir Hor. (After a pause.) Tol de rol!

Timid. Lackaday! I'm a happy old man! He's a friend, he's a true friend! I'm a happy old man!

Sir Harry. Can you, too, sister, forgive my folly? you that I have injured so unpardonably?

Mel. Dear brother, you are not so guilty as you suppose. It was a plot upon you; you were led into it, to shew you what a losing gamester is capable of?

Sir Hor. Harkye, sir! (To Osborne.) All the mortgages and deeds are there, you say?

Osborne. All, sir; together with whatever money that has, at any time, been won of him, since I have been concerned in this transaction.

Sir Hor. All in that box?

Osborne. All.

Timid. I'm a happy old man!

Sir Harry. My dear uncle!

Sir Hor. Let me alone—Tol de rol!—(Goes to Osborne, and takes his hand.) Will you forgive me, Osborne? will you—will you forgive my boy?

Sir Harry. (Takes Osborne's other hand.) Osborne!—I cannot speak—

Clara. Indeed, Mr. Osborne, I don't know how to tell you what I think. Esteem, admiration, are poor expressions to convey my feelings. I have been mistaken and to blame. I trembled for Sir Harry; I condemned you; and wrote a letter—

Sir Harry. Dear madam, was that letter your's?

Clara. It was.

Sir Harry. How much obliged am I to you, and to you all.

Clara. I am sorry; I was to blame.

Osborne. Nay, madam; nobody was to blame. And now, dear Harry, suffer me to say one word: let this transaction be a powerful, an everlasting memento to you. Remember the blood that has been spilt in the moment of passion and distress, in consequence of indulging in this shocking vice; remember the distracted wife and widow's curse, the sting of desperation, and the red and impious hand of suicide! Despise the folly that made the practice fashionable; oppose its destructive course; and for ever shun, for ever abominate, the detestable vice of gaming.

Sir Harry. Professions of resolution from me, Osborne, come with an ill grace. I am ashamed of my folly: I despised, even while I practised it; but the punishment you have inflicted has been so judicious, so severely generous, I think I can safely say there is no probability of a relapse.

Sir Hor. Well, but, Harry, turn about—look at this lady; surely, you have not forgotten Miss Turnbull, have you?

Sir Harry. Your Miss Turnbull, sir, I shall never forget.

Sir Hor. Oh! what you have heard the renowned history of my Bath adventure?

Sir Harry. I have, sir.

Sir Hor. Well, and what say you to—eh! my cherub? You told me, you know, you had no aversion to the fellow.

Clara. Nay, Sir Hornet, is that the part of a confidante?

Sir Hor. Why, yes, it is; for, as I take it, a confidante is but a kind of a go-between to bring the parties together—And here comes the blooming youth—[Enter VANDERVELT.—here comes Johannes de Temporibus to second the motion.

Vand. To second what motion, Sir Hornet?

Sir Hor. An hymeneal motion.

Vand. Can't tell. Who are the candidates?

Sir Hor. Harry Portland and Clara Forester.

Vand. Hold, hold! Sir Hornet, not so fast! that lady is my ward. [wife.]

Sir Hor. Yes, and may, if she please, be your Vand. Nay, I—I did not say so, Sir Hornet.

Sir Hor. No, but I did, young Van. But, harkye! (takes him aside) resign all your silly pretensions peaceably, throw your worthies into the fire, and give up the lady to her lover; or you shall be held up, in terrorem, an object of ridicule, to frighten all the dangling, whining, old fools in Christendom, who are turned of three-score.

Vand. Well, well, speak in a lower key.

Sir Hor. May I be certain of your consent, then?

Vand. Why, yes, yes—Heigho!

Sir Hor. Dear madam, this worthy, old gentleman, your guardian, most humbly implores you would have pity upon Sir Harry.

Clara. Did you say so, papa?

Vand. Me! no.

Sir Hor. How?

Vand. Not in those exact words; but something very like it, turtle. Heigho!

Mel. Come, my dear Clara, let me have the happiness to call you sister.

Osborne. Let me intercede, madam.

Clara. Psha! here is everybody interceding, but him that can intercede most to the purpose.

Sir Harry. Forgive me, dearest Clara! my fate is suspended on your lips; and I am so conscious of unworthiness, and so much affected by the fear of a severe sentence, that I have not power to plead for mercy.

Clara. Yes; but you have a partial, tender-hearted judge.

Sir Hor. Ay, "and a wise young judge," too.

Clara. Well, well! I cannot dissemble. A generous heart, a noble mind, are seldom met and seldom merited. When happiness like this presents itself, to reject is not to deserve it. [Exeunt.]

LADY FRIENDLY
DAME PHILIPPA STRAITLACE
MISS DINAH

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in Friendly Hall.

Enter SIR THOMAS and LADY FRIENDLY.

Sir T. I tell you, my lady, I am convinced I am right. The girl is positively struck—

Lady F. Struck with such an immovable creature as Mr. Blushington. Impossible, Sir Thomas! Why, they have never spoken to one another; never seen one another—except at church: nay, I don't think that he has ever seen her even there; for he never looks at anything but his prayer-book.

Sir T. While you and most of the congregation generally look at everything—but your prayer-books. No matter for that; Dinah is smitten with him, I'm certain. I watched her narrowly all last Sunday; and, during the whole of the service, she never had her thumb off the page of matrimony, nor her eyes off the young fellow.

Lady F. He is certainly very well endowed in point of figure,—

Sir T. Which will satisfy, Dinah; and very well endowed in point of fortune, which will satisfy us: so the sooner we make it a match the better.

Lady F. True; but how is it to be brought about?

Sir T. Leave that to my management: you know how well I manage things. I'll send him an invitation to dine with us; introduce him to the girl; and, once together, they'll settle the business by themselves, much quicker than we can settle it for them, I'll be bound.

Lady F. But he has so much mauvaise honte, so much timidity about him!

Sir T. Dinah will soon rid him of all that: 'tis merely the fault of his education. Recollect, he was bred up with no expectations; was sent a poor scholar to Cambridge; was never introduced into society; and now, by the death of his father and uncle, he is, all at once, left as rich as a nabob, and perfectly his own master! Why, it is enough to overturn any head! I don't know, with all my management, if even I should have been able to have continued perfectly myself, under such circumstances. I'll go and send the invitation directly.

Lady F. Well, as you like, my dear Sir Thomas. As he has so large an estate, it will certainly be but kind of us to marry him into the family: he may get into improper hands else: and if Dinah is in love with him, it would be cruel in us to balk the poor girl's fancy!

Sir T. Very true, my love. We'll not lose a moment about it. Poor young man! I really feel for his unprotected situation! His fortune must be taken care of: he must marry Dinah. Yes, yes; I'll manage the thing at once. Come, my lady—Oh! hang this gout! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Library in Blushington House.

Enter BLUSHINGTON and GYP.

Blush. 'Tis of no use your attempting to persuade me; I shall not go out this morning, Gyp.

Gyp. Let me prevail on you, sir; do rub off the rust a little bit amongst your country neighbours. Consider, sir, you are not at college now, that you're to shut yourself up, day after day, amongst a parcel of musty old books. Come, sir, do venture abroad.

Blush. 'Tis impossible, Gyp; my bashfulness was born with me: I was almost too ashamed to come into the world; teased my poor mother terribly through it. When a boy, behind my father's counter, my cursed modesty rendered me perfectly useless: I could never muster up courage enough to look anybody in the face, and committed all sorts of blunders; gave the customers sand for salt, salt for sugar, and brick-dust for Cayenne.

Gyp. Common, every-day mistakes, sir; occur in the best regulated shops.

Blush. That's not all: I served them vinegar for small beer, and fly-water for ketchup; so finding me good for nothing, father thought the best thing he could do with me, was to send me to college; where I went a poor scholar, and have returned a rich ignoramus.

Gyp. The death of your father and uncle, sir, have left you nothing to desire, in point of wealth, Zounds! sir, take heart. What have you to fear?

Blush. Nothing, and yet everything. Go out in the open air, in broad day? Impossible! Whenever I sally forth, I imagine all eyes are fixed upon me, and am ready to start at every post I meet, fearing it may be some great man.

Gyp. Nothing unnatural, sir. Posts and great men are pretty inseparable now-a-days.

Blush. As if my bashfulness wasn't enough to perplex me, I must be plagued with the curse of near-sightedness: can't see an inch beyond my nose; nay, sometimes, not so far. Then I can't wear spectacles, conscious I am spectacle enough without; and as to using a quizzing-glass, that would make me the quiz of the whole county. This subjects me to all sorts of mistakes. 'Twas but the other day, I pulled off my hat to a shabby-gentle beggar, and requested the honour of his acquaintance; and directly after that, gave a shilling to the rich banker of the next town, telling him I particularly liked to relieve distressed tradesmen.

Gyp. Rich bankers not unfrequently come under that denomination. But consider, sir; a tall, fresh-looking gentleman like you, only five and twenty, with a thorough knowledge of the classics, and a princely fortune—zounds! sir, your company will be courted by all the families of consequence for fifty miles round.

Blush. Yes, that have marriageable daughters. I think I certainly am rather good looking, Gyp?

Gyp. Why, yes, sir; we don't want for beauty here. Ah! sir, only take the advice of your faithful Gyp. You've no better friend, sir; no, not even in your tutor, Doctor Starch; nor your maiden aunt, Dame Phillippa Straitlace. Consider how carefully I always made your bed at college—

Blush. And stole my tea and sugar, Gyp: I do!

Gyp. I'm a sincere well-wisher, sir. How punctually I used to call you up to prayers in a morning!

Blush. And pocket half my candles while I was gone. I remember it well, Gyp. Haven't I rewarded you for it, by placing you at the head of my domestics?

Gyp. Yes, sir; made me own gentleman and private secretary.

Blush. I can do things very well when I'm by myself. I'm sure, I uttered as fine an oration the other day, to the Chinese mandarins over my chimney-piece as man would wish to hear; I spoke with such fire and force, that, hang me, if they didn't keep nodding their heads in approbation for above half-an-hour afterwards; and as for making love, you should have seen me with the plaster of Paris Venus, on our staircase, yesterday; but when it comes to the real thing, somehow—

Gyp. It's just like bathing sir; one plunge, and the thing's done. Do just go out for a short walk, now, if its only to try over your new bow, that I've got the dancing-master to teach you; as there is nothing like practice to familiarize you to the company of distinguished characters. Suppose me one.

Blush. Well, just by way of practice, I don't care if I do, for once.

Gyp. 'Tis well said. Now, then, first position! How lucky it was for you, I found out the professor who undertook to teach grown gentlemen to dance so easily. Mind you don't fall, sir! The few private lessons you've taken of him, have done you a world of good. Now, then, sir, you're to take me for a duke. You're advancing to address me. Second position: you wish to kiss my hand. Third position: I beckon you towards me. Fourth position: you are coming.—

Blush. (Stumbling.) No, I a'n't; I'm going.

Gyp. Fifth position—

Enter JOHN.

John. A letter from Sir Thomas Friendly Baronet, sir.

Blush. (Kicking Gyp.) Zounds! Gyp, rascal! you are making me expose myself again.

Gyp. Pardon me, sir; but you raised your foot rather too high for the fifth position, then!

Blush. Will you be quiet, sir? A letter from Sir Thomas Friendly! Bless my soul! I'm all in a tremble! Then for John to see me in such a situation! I'm crimsoning like a carnation! Who brought it, John?

John. One of Sir Thomas's boys, sir.

Blush. Why haven't you asked the gentleman to walk in?

John. Walk in, my lad.

Enter NICK.

Blush. (To Nick.) I'm sure, I beg ten thousand pardons for keeping you waiting. Have the goodness to take a chair, sir.

Nick. With all my heart, sir. What a civil gentleman! I'll take a chair, and anything else you like to give me besides.

Blush. Ay, very true; certainly, by all means. How could I be so neglectful! Give the gentleman a glass of wine, John.

Nick. If it makes no difference to you, sir, I'd rather have ale.

Blush. By all means. How could I make such a mistake! I declare I'm quite ashamed. Take Sir Thomas's gentleman into the cellar, John, and give him some ale.

John. I will, sir; and I'll take myself there, too. What's good for the goose—This way, Sir Thomas's gentleman. [Exeunt John and Nick.]

Blush. How very ill-bred of me not to behave better. A letter from Sir Thomas Friendly! What can he have to say to me? Dear, dear! if I a'n't quite afraid to look at it! Open it, Gyp; open it, and read.

Gyp. I will sir.—“Sir Thomas, Lady Friendly, and Miss Dinah's best compliments to Mr. Blushington; they can take no denial of his company at dinner, to meet a select party at Friendly Hall to-day. Dancing in the evening.”

Blush. What's to be done?—“Can take no denial!”

Gyp. No; so you see you must go.

Blush. “Dancing in the evening, too!”

Gyp. Yes; you've just learnt in time. It will give you an opportunity to shew off the fifth position, eh, sir!

Blush. Then Miss Dinah, the pretty young lady I took a sly peep at, from under my hat, last Sunday, when I entered church. Oh! I'm in agonies!

Gyp. Ah! there's an inducement! What a partner for you! Oh! you must go!

Blush. Must I? Was there ever anything so embarrassing? Do, my dear Gyp, give me your advice. If I could but get over the first introduction, I wouldn't so much mind.

Gyp. Suppose you were to arrange a few sentences in your mind, before-hand, to deliver to Sir Thomas, on your first meeting. Something after this fashion: I'll suppose that I am you; you observe my manner; no embarrassment about me; you see how easy and free I am!

Blush. Yes, free enough, I must own!

Gyp. There's nothing like it, sir: only copy me.—“My dear Sir Thomas, I exceedingly rejoice in this opportunity of becoming acquainted with you; and trust this meeting will prove the means of cementing a long and agreeable intimacy. Hope Lady F. is well, and all the small F.'s.” There, sir! what do you think of that, in a pair of silk-stockings and pumps; standing in the fifth position, after your best bow, eh?

Blush. Why, I think it will make an impression.

Gyp. It will do the business, sir. I'll go and get your things ready to dress directly; for it will soon be time to be off.

Blush. Dear me, I wish it wasn't so late, and that I had a little leisure to prepare myself. But, hang it! I'll take heart for once. I can walk now without tottering; and, thanks to the mathematics, know the equilibrium of my body, and the due adjustment of the centre of gravity to the five positions, as well as any one; so I'm determined I'll conquer my timidity, and go. Let me run over it: “My dear Thomas—rejoice—this meeting—better acquaintance—reciprocal intimacy—little F.'s—” It's all right; I shall be able to get through it!

Gyp. Nothing can be better. This way, my dear sir; this way. Lady Friendly and Miss Dinah will be delighted to see you; they'll say—(As they are going very ceremoniously out, they run against John and Nick, who are entering, rather the worse for the cellar.)

Nick. Anything to go back, your honour?

Gyp. Go back? zounds! you're sending us back.

Blush. Oh, dear! oh, dear! I beg ten thousand pardons, sir; I really didn't mean any incivility.

John. The young man's had some ale, sir, and wants to know if there's any answer to go back.

Blush. This unlucky rencontre has upset all—me into the bargain. I shall never be able to summon resolution, after this, Gyp. Suppose I had run bump up against my Lady Friendly and Miss Dinah, in this manner, what would they have thought?—He'd better say I can't come.

Gyp. I'll tell him so, sir. You're to give my master's compliments, and say he'll come. You can't retract, sir. Make haste, that Sir Thomas may have time to get everything ready, and receive us with proper ceremony.

Blush. Ceremony! I shall expire with confusion. You'll be the death of me, Gyp. I shall never be able to muster courage again: it's no use attempting.

Gyp. Nonsense, sir; take a little breath. What are you waiting for! Go directly, and say my master's coming.

Nick. Oh! I'll go. Main strong ale!—Good b'ye, Mr. John; shall be glad to see you at the Hall, any time, in return: rare good stingo there!

Blush. Why, he can't stand! Why don't you assist the gentleman to the door, John?

John. Oh! I'll assist him, sir, never fear.

[Both stagger off.]

Blush. I shall never be able to look Sir Thomas in the face, after this. What will he think of my making his gentleman drunk?

Gyp. Think, sir! why, he'll make you drunk in return. You couldn't have taken a heartier way of expressing your pleasure at receiving his invitation. At all events, you must keep your word; so, go and dress at once: your pumps are all ready. This way.

Blush. You'll be the ruin of me: I shall never survive it! How could I ever consent to go! Dinner; after that, comes the dessert; and I shall get kicked out. Eat before half-a-dozen people! zounds! I shall be afraid they are going to eat me. It won't do, Gyp; I sha'n't be able to open my mouth. I shall be as mute as a cod-fish: they'll take me for the salamander. It won't do! Oh, dear! oh, dear!

Gyp. You must go, sir: there can be no refusing. This way, sir.

[Exit Blushington, hurried off by Gyp.]

SCENE III.—An Apartment in Friendly Hall.

Enter DINAH and FRANK FRIENDLY.

Frank. And so, sister Di, you've fallen in love with my old fellow-collegian, Ned Blushington, have you? Truly, I admire your choice. Ned is young and healthy, rich, and well-studied: a girl can't well desire more. There's only one thing: by the lord! you must court him; for he'll never be able to muster up courage enough to court you! Let me see: it isn't leap-year this year, is it? That's unfortunate!

Dinah. Dear brother, how you talk!—

Frank. Nay, nay; confess it: 'tis useless your attempting to conceal it; 'tis written in every action, every feature. Love, like smoke, (alas! too like it, too fleeting in its stay,) cannot be concealed. Sister, you love!

SONG.

*Sister dear, that downcast eye;
Sister dear, that trembling sigh;
That pearly tear's soft flow;
That bosom's trembling glow;
That wild and hurried air;
Thy young heart's truth declare:
Sister dear, too plain they prove
You love!*

*Sister dear, that cheek's warm blush;
Sister dear, that timid flush;
The tear that downward steals;
Far more than speech reveals;
Thy silence even tells
All in thy heart that dwells:
Sister dear, too plain they prove
You love!*

Dinah. I'll revenge myself on you, one of these days, when Miss Wright comes to town!

Frank. With all my heart. Poor Ned! We us'd to call him the deepest red scholar in the college; because he always coloured so at everything; in fact, we laughed at him, till he became so timid, that the whole town styled him the sensitive plant of Brazen Nose. Well Di, you shall not want for my assistance in urging him on to declare himself. I think he has a sneaking kindness for you.

Dinah. La! Frank, I declare you make one quite ashamed.

Frank. And I'm sure there's no occasion for that; he'll be plenty ashamed for both. I must assist him. Yes, with such fine sporting-grounds as he has, he'll make a charming brother-in-law: we shall agree famously. I'll keep his game in order for him; for, notwithstanding all his opportunities, hang me! if I think he can boast the achievement of a pair of horns yet. But marriage will improve him: he'll do better, then.

Dinah. What a rattle you are, Frank! But let us get out of the way. Our worthy father will be here soon: he's with Evans, the butler; no doubt, giving him directions about to-day; for I think I heard him say he had asked Mr. Blushington to dinner. I'm sure I don't know what possesses you all about the poor man; teasing one! It's mighty foolish, that I must say.

Frank. Yes, but mighty pleasant, for all that. It shall be a match! 'Tis no use your tongue denying you love him; for your eyes confess it, and they're the only true oracles in love. 'Tis no disgrace to you, Di; so, look up, girl! and rely on the affection of a brother.

DUETT.—FRANK and DINAH.

Though the heart may conceal, and the tongue may decay,

*When affection's fond secret you'd seek;
Like a baby, love lurks in a glance of the eye,
And teaches his pupil to speak.*

*In vain its soft lashes the rogue would repel;
There he looks and he lives till he dies;
'Gainst the heart and the tongue he alike will rebel:
Love tells all through a glance of the eyes.*

The eyes are love's weapons, with which he works woe

*And conquest, as plainly is seen;
Their lashes, his bow-string; their brows, the rogue's bow;*

Their glances, his arrows so keen. [Exeunt.

Enter SIR THOMAS EVANS, NICK, and Servants.

Sir T. Nicholas, Nicholas, you should not have got drunk in this manner! What will Mr. Blushington conceive of me? Don't you know that the master is always judged by his servants. Nothing but the peculiarity of the occasion excuses you.

Nick. It warn't my fault, Sir Thomas; the 'squire ware so mortal free and pressing, I couldn't find it in my heart to refuse him. "Nicholas, my boy," says he, "you must taste my ale;" so, just by way of drinking your honour's health, and the like, and the good family's, I tasted and tasted—

Sir T. Till you got drunk, Nicholas. Well, let it pass, and don't be guilty of the like in future. I'm glad to find Mr. Blushington is so free, though: he only wants a little encouragement. Now, Evans,—

Evans. Yes, Sir Thomas.

Sir T. I leave the management of Mr. Blushington's first reception entirely to you. You'll be in waiting in the great hall, with the whole of the servants and tenantry, all in their best bibs and tuckers; and directly you see him enter the courtyard, go forward to meet him: let all the household then form an avenue for him to pass through, bowing and courtesying all the way, to convince him of the respect I have for him. In this form and state, you will conduct him to the library, where I will be in waiting with my lady to receive him in person.

Evans. I'll take care, Sir Thomas.

Sir T. These little ceremonies and attentions will inspire him with confidence in us. Now mind you make no mistake: let me have this meeting well managed, then leave the rest to me. Did you desire the porter to let the great half-hour dinner-bell be rung, that every body may have full time to prepare themselves?

Evans. I did, Sir Thomas.

Sir T. Well, then, now away with you, rogues and baggages! I'm obliged to have a head for all the family:—[Exeunt Servants.]—I'm obliged to manage everything—Oh! this gout; it twinges me sadly. I wish I could manage to get rid of that! I'll hobble at once to the library. I dare say, Mr. Blushington will not be long. [Exit.

SCENE IV.—Court Yard of Friendly Hall.

Enter GYP, pulling in BLUSHINGTON, who has his head turned off the stage.

Blush. We're not near the house yet, are we, Gyp?

Gyp. Courage, courage, sir! you sha'n't be taken by surprise.

Blush. Dear me, what a palpitation I'm in! You couldn't get me a little drop of something to keep up my spirits, could you, Gyp? Such a thing as half a glass of brandy, now, or a little cherry-bounce.

Gyp. Psha! sir, you've passed the Rubicon; there's nothing to intimidate you.

Blush. Do you think not? Well, I'll endeavour to compose myself. (Dinner-bell rings.) Eh! Lord bless me, what's that?

Gyp. Only the dinner-bell.

Blush. The dinner-bell! Ah! then, you see, we're too late: they've begun. We'd better go back. No doubt we've kept them waiting: I dare say everything's spoiled, and they'll look as black as thunder at us. I'm all in a twitter: my courage fails me. I'll go back, and send word I'm ill.

Enter EVANS, NICK, Servants, and Tenantry.

Gyp. There's no retreating, now, sir; for we're in sight of the house, and here's part of the family coming out to meet you.

Blush. You've put my heart in my mouth. In sight of the house—part of the family coming—

Gyp. Yes; here's a gentleman at the head of a whole train of servants.

Blush. Ah! the Baronet and the whole village. You've taken away all my breath at once.

Gyp. Remember the speech.

Blush. I wish I could. I shall be the laughing-stock of everybody! (Nick, Servants, and Tenants, range themselves on each side of the stage. Evans advances towards Blushington.) Don't leave me, Gyp. Bless me! they've hemmed me in on all sides: there's no escape. How awful they look! (Casts a timid glance first on one side, and then on the other. Servants and Tenants bow, &c.; he awkwardly returns it, not daring to look at them.)

Evans. Welcome to Friendly Hall, sir.

Blush. Sir, did you speak? I beg pardon; pretty well, I thankye.—Don't leave me, Gyp.

Gyp. (Apart to Blushington.) Now for the speech, sir: make an impression at once. "My dear Sir Thomas"—(Prompting.)

Blush. Dear Sir Thomas, hope you're well—fine day—little F.'s—the dinner—sorry—my lady—reciprocal intimacy—meeting—Miss Dinah—better acquainted—and—and—very much obliged—I've got through it, Gyp: I breathe again! Do you think it will do? (Apart to Gyp.)

Evans. Sir Thomas, Mr. Blushington is waiting for you in the library. I have only the honour to be the butler, Evans.

Blush. The butler! I beg pardon.—Here's another mistake again. "Sir Thomas—Evans, the butler." I shall be the jest of the whole family! They're smothering their ridicule, now; I can hear them quit plain: they'll burst into a horse-laugh, directly my back's turned. I'm all in a flame! burn like a capsicum. Should be a good figure for the Red Lion of Brentford. I sha'n't be able to say another word, after this. Get me away, Gyp; get me away! [sir.

Evans. Allow me to conduct you to Sir Thomas,

Blush. Eh!—Oh, dear! I—I—couldn't think of such a thing—that is, you—you're very good.—Don't leave me, Gyp: they're conveying me to execution, and this fellow is the Jack Ketch. Here's a mob at my heels! My courage oozes out at every pore! I lose a pound a moment: shall dissolve into nothing soon!

Evans. Now, sir, if you will permit me—

Blush. By no means—that is, I'm shocked to give you so much trouble—that is, certainly—that is—anything you like. Oh, dear! oh, dear! oh, dear! I'm turned off! I'm gone!

Evans. Why don't you welcome the gentleman, villains?

TRIO AND CHORUS.

BLUSHINGTON, GYP, EVANS, and Attendants.

Cho. Welcome, welcome, noble 'squire!

Welcome, sir, to Friendly Hall.

[Blushington, who has been kept up by Gyp in the latter part of this scene, goes off in an agony of shame and timidity, followed by Gyp. Evans, Nick, and Servants, tittering through a smothered laugh.

SCENE V.—Library in Friendly Hall. At the back, a handsome rose-wood table, on which is a head of Hercules and an elegant ink-stand; over that, on a sort of shelf, a superb edition of Xenophon, in sixteen volumes.

Enter SIR THOMAS and LADY FRIENDLY.

Lady F. But why not receive Mr. Blushington in the great drawing-room, Sir Thomas?

Sir T. There's my management, my lady! Being a scholar, Mr. Blushington will feel, at once, the delicacy of the compliment I pay him, by first introducing him to the library; besides, the apparent number of books he will see here, will give him a high opinion of my erudition: there's management again? Wouldn't any one think, to look at it, that was really a fine edition of Xenophon, in folio; instead of which, it's merely a deal-board, covered with some gilded leather, for the maids to put their pails and brushes behind. All my contrivance! But, mum! here he comes. Oh! this plaguy gout!—But I must get up, and receive him.

Enter BLUSHINGTON, pushed on by GYP; preceded by EVANS, and followed by NICK and Servants.

Evans. Mr. Blushington, Sir Thomas.

Blush. Don't leave me, Gyp; the awful moment has arrived.

Sir T. Mr. Blushington, I rejoice to meet you.

Gyp. Fifth position, sir. (Blushington in endeavouring to put himself into an attitude, stumbles and pitches on Sir Thomas's gouty foot.)—Oh! confound the fellow, he's murdered me. (Aside.)

Blush. You infernal scoundrel, Gyp! you've made me tread Sir Thomas's toe off. My dear Sir Thomas, I beg ten thousand pardons; but—but—

Sir T. No apologies, I beg: these little accidents will happen. It's over, now: yes, as we scholars say, its gone in toto.

Gyp. All's right, sir!—Now for the speech. (Apart to Blush.)

Blush. (Apart to Gyp.) My tongue sticks to my throat: I couldn't utter a syllable to save my life.

Sir T. Allow me to introduce you to Lady Friendly. Lady Friendly, Mr. Blushington—

Blush. Happy—proud—dinner—sorry—acquaintance—

Sir T. Ay, ay; well thought of. Go, varlets, and hurry the dinner. No giggling, hussies!—Away!—[Exeunt Nick and Servants.]
Evans, take Mr. Blushington's man into the pantry, and make him welcome.

Blush. Oh, dear! no; no occasion for that, Sir Thomas. Lord bless me! don't leave me, Gyp. What shall I do by myself, if they take my only prop away. (Aside to Gyp.)

Gyp. Courage, sir! you get on famously. I must go, you see—can't help it. (Aside to Blushington.) Poor fellow!

Evans. This way, if you please; sir.

[Exeunt Gyp and Evans.]

Blush. What will become of me! without guide or rudder! I'm lost!

Sir T. Take a chair, Mr. Blushington: you seem warm.

Blush. (Aside.) I'm frying!

Sir T. You perceive, Mr. Blushington, we're like you—dabble in literature a little; smack of the classics a bit!

Blush. The classics: I can launch out here; I'm on safe ground. Yes, Sir Thomas—certainly—by all means.

Sir T. Delightful study. I fagged d—d hard at college, Mr. Blushington; and was, I can assure you, very near being elected senior wrangler.

Blush. I don't doubt it. I chafelike a bull. (Aside.)

Lady F. We are all great readers, Mr. Blushington; my daughter Dinah in particular; before she was twelve years old, she had gone twice through "The Complete Housewife," and "The Whole Duty of Man." You'll suit one another to a T. in that respect.

Blush. Hum! Oh, yes, certainly, my lady, by all means; though I can't say I've been through "The Whole Duty of Man," and "The Complete Housewife." They're rather ignorant; I must astonish them a little bit, with the extent of my learning. I begin to get more courage than I thought for. Yes, I'll surprise them now. (Aside.) Bless me, that's a very remarkable edition of Xenophon there—sixteen volumes folio: allow me to examine it. (Getting up.)

Sir T. (Rising.) Stop, stop, my dear Mr. Blushington, I—

Blush. Oh! Sir Thomas, I couldn't think of giving you the trouble. (Goes, as he supposes, to lay hold of one of the volumes, when the board falls down on the slab, breaks the Hercules's head, and upsets the ink-stand.) Hey! what the devil have I done? what the devil shall I do? I beg ten thousand pardons, Sir Thomas; upon my soul I didn't mean to do it. If I'd known it had only been sham—bless me! here's all the ink down too. Oh, dear! Oh, dear! what an accident.

Lady F. I thought what would come of your fine management, Sir Thomas. Where's a cloth? the table will be spoiled!

Blush. Here's a cloth, my lady. (Takes his white cambric handkerchief and begins wiping up the ink.) Bless me! I'm inking my handkerchief. (Folds up the handkerchief, the inky part inside, and puts it in his pocket.) Excuse my awkwardness, my lady: I—I—oh, lord! that I could but run away. If Gyp was but here!

Enter EVANS.

Evans. Dinner's on table, Sir Thomas.

Blush. Here's a relief, then. I'm in a furnace.

Sir T. I won't have another word on the subject; there's no harm done; only the cover taken off the books, Hercules's head broke, and Mr. Blushington's handkerchief stained. You've received no material contusion yourself, I hope, my dear young friend?

Blush. Oh, dear, no! I'm in no material confusion at all: quite cool, I assure you. I wish I could jump out of the window. Mount Vesuvius is an ice-house to this. (Aside.)

Sir T. Come along, then, and I'll introduce you at once to Dinah and dinner.

Blush. More trials! what shall I have to go through next? Heaven preserve me! Lady Friendly, allow me to offer my arm. (Offers his arm to Evans by mistake, and lugs him off unknowingly.)

Sir T. I'll take your other wing, as I'm rather lame. Stop, stop. Eh! zounds! you young fellows are so brisk. I can't run races now. Why, curse me if he hasn't carried off the butler! [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—The great Dining-room in Friendly Hall; tables laid out for dinner.

Enter DINAH and FRANK.

Frank. Now, then, Di. for the important moment. A'nt you all in a twitter?

Dinah. La, Frank, how you do go on! Has Evans summoned the family to dinner yet?

Frank. He is gone now. Poor Ned! I can well conceive the agony he is in at this moment; blushing like a full-blown rose, every step he takes. Hey! here they come.

Enter SIR THOMAS, LADY FRIENDLY, and BLUSHINGTON; followed by EVANS, GYP, NICK, and Servants.

Ha! my dear Blushington! Welcome, welcome! I rejoice to meet a fellow cantab, a brother soph, once again. Allow me to introduce you to my sister. Brother Soph, sister Di.; sister Di. brother Soph.

Blush. Thankye my dear fellow, thankye—hope you're well with all my heart and soul. (Advances timidly, and, without looking towards Dinah, shakes her heartily by the hand, supposing her to be young Friendly.)

Sir T. Eh! that's Dinah. This is Frank.

Blush. Happy to see you, miss—hope you're quite well, miss. (Bowing to Frank, who has taken Dinah's place, supposing him to be Dinah.)

Frank. Nay, nay; here's Dinah.

Blush. Oh! yes, certainly—by all means. Another mistake. (Aside.) Extremely proud, Mr. Friendly—great honour—happy—see—Miss Dinah—

Dinah. Very gratified, Mr. Blushington, to have the honour of meeting any friend of my brother.

Sir T. But come, take your places; the dinner's getting cold. Mr. Blushington, you will sit by my daughter.

Blush. Yes, certainly; by all means—that is—oh! with great pleasure. What will become of me? that d—d Xenophon. I feel my cheeks burning like a firebrand; and misfortunes never come alone. (Aside.) Dear me; if I hav'n't taken the young lady's chair: beg pardon. (After some blunders on the part of Blushington, with the chairs, they sit down to dinner; he first, by seating himself in Dinah's lap by mistake; the Baronet and his lady sit at the back, fronting the audience; Frank on one side, and Dinah and Blushington on the outside, nearest the audience, so that they can see the motions of all parties.)

Sir T. Now, then, Mr. Blushington, allow me to send you some soup, and you, Dinah; 'tis turtle, and fit for young lovers.

Blush. You're very good—a little drop—I'm getting somewhat cool now, if it does but last. (Aside.) Bread, Miss Dinah; allow me to help you. Eh! bless me; if I hav'n't knocked over the salt. Oh, dear! oh, dear! Excuse my awkwardness, miss. I'm at it again. (Aside.)

Dinah. Don't mention it, I beg; 'tis not of the slightest consequence. We are not in the least superstitious here.

Sir T. Throw a little over your left shoulder, Mr. Blushington. (Blushington in throwing some of the salt over his left shoulder, almost blinds Nicholas, who is standing behind him with his mouth open, and receives it in his face; endeavouring to amend the error, he then salutes Sir Thomas in a similar manner, and, in his confusion, tilts his plate of hot soup into his lap.)

Blush. Oh, dear! Oh, dear!

Sir T. Hey! zounds, what's the matter now?

Nick. 'Squire ha' tilted the hot soup over his breeches, Sir Thomas.

Sir T. Dear! dear! what an accident. Some clean cloths, rascal.

Lady F. It's always unlucky to upset the salt. I thought something fatal would happen through it.

Dinah. I hope no material injury is likely to occur from this, Mr. Blushington!

Frank. You hav'n't completely scalded yourself. Nothing fatal, is there Ned? Why don't you bring some napkins, Nicholas.

Blush. I mus'n't appear to mind it, though I am more than three parts parboiled. (Aside.) Not at all—not at all—'tis a mere trifle.

Nick. I'll wipe you down, sir. Nothing shall be spoiled: your silks will be as good as ever with a little washing. It hasn't taken the skin off, has it, sir? There, now you're as well as if nothing had happened.

Blush. (Aside.) As well as if nothing had happened, after such a fomentation as this. Why my legs and thighs seem stewing in a boiling cauldron. Oh, dear! oh, dear! if anybody would but chuck me into the New River now,

Sir T. Here, Nicholas, take away the soup. You don't wish for any more, do you Mr. Blushington?

Blush. Not a drop, I can assure you.

Sir T. No; I think we've had enough. Shall I trouble you to cut up that capon?

Blush. Carve a capon! Lord bless me, I couldn't carve a cabbage; but I must not let them see my ignorance. I must try and hack it somehow. (Aside.) Oh, yes; certainly, by all means. Eh! there, if I haven't knocked over the butter-boat. Nothing but misfortunes. Oh! that I could but hide myself for ever from the light of day!

Lady F. Allow me, Mr. Blushington. You young bachelors are not so used to carving as us old married folks: Dinah is as awkward at carving as any one. Matrimony is the only thing to make good carvers.

Blush. Certainly; by all means! Your ladyship is extremely good.—I'd give a thousand pounds if dinner was but once well over. (Aside.)

Frank. Mr. Blushington, Dinah will take a glass of wine with you.

Blush. Oh! yes, certainly; by all means! Lord bless me! Shall I take the liberty, miss?

Dinah. I beg your pardon, Mr. Blushington, but that is the vinegar cruet you have in your hand; there is the bucellas.

Blush. Ask ten thousand pardons, I'm sure; but my sight—(takes hold of a jug of beer.)

Dinah. No; that is the beer.

Blush. True: yes, certainly; by all means! that is the beer: this is the wine. Very laughable! Can't think how I can make so many mistakes! Am extremely happy to nob and hob—that is, hob and nob.

Sir T. Let me recommend a piece of this pudding, Mr. Blushington: you'll find it uncommonly good; I can assure you, I do.

Blush. Oh! yes; certainly, by all means. (Sir Thomas helps Blushington to some pudding; he cuts a piece, and is about to put it into his mouth,)

Dinah. Shall I trouble you for a part of that widgeon, Mr. Blushington?

Blush. Oh! yes; certainly, by all means. (Pops the piece of pudding into his mouth.) Eh! oh! ah! I—my mouth! my mouth!—fire! water!—I'm burnt! I'm—oh! ah! eh!

Sir T. God bless me!—Ah! there's nothing so bad as hot pudding. Some water there, Nicholas!

Lady F. No; oil is the best for drawing out fire, Sir Thomas. The poor, young man is full of accidents!

Dinah. If I might advise Mr. Blushington, I would recommend wine.

All. Ay, ay; a glass of sherry.

Frank. Nicholas, bring a glass of sherry, rascal!

Nick. (Aside.) Sherry! I'll give him a little brandy. He needs something, so dashed as he is: besides, he gave me some strong ale this morning, and one good turn deserves another.—Here it be, sir. (Gives Blushington a glass of brandy.)

Blush. Certainly, by all means—thankye. (Drinks) Oh! murder, murder; I'm scarified—I'm skinned—I'm—Oh, dear! oh, dear!—the brandy, the brandy!

Gyp. I must get him away; he's incurable.

Sir T. What do you mean, scoundrel, by giving the gentleman brandy! You incendiary, do you think we were playing at Snap-dragon? Silence your giggling there, or I'll discharge the whole of you! Compose yourself, Mr. Blushington. Be cool! Sit down a bit.

Blush. I'm in a perspiration—a conflagration! Where's my handkerchief? (Takes his inky handkerchief, and blacks his face.)

Sir T. Oh! d—e, but I can't stand that.

Gyp. I must get him away, Leave the place, sir. (Taking away his chair to give him room.)

Blush. Eh! leave the place, Gyp! certainly, by all means. I—[Blushington rushes off, drawing the tablecloth (which he has fastened to his button-hole) after him, overturning the whole of the dinner things.—Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Gardens of Friendly Hall.

Enter SIR THOMAS FRIENDLY, LADY FRIENDLY, FRANK, and DINAH.

Sir T. I give him up; such inveterate bashfulness is incurable.

Dinah. Very true, pa; therefore, you know, of course, it's no use my marrying him.

Frank. Hum! that is your opinion: now mine is different. Will you be guided by me, and resign him wholly to my management?

Sir T. With all my heart, Frank; but after my management has failed, I fear there is but very little hope of your's.

Frank. We shall see: are you content, Di? for you're the party most interested.

Dinah. Oh! I'm sure I don't care anything at all about it, for my part.

Frank. That's a fib, Di, but no matter. As you're all agreed, the first thing we'll do is, to send him a letter inviting the whole of ourselves to dine with him to-day.

Sir T. What?

Frank. This won't be half; but I'll detail my plans at full as we go along: and if our impudence don't cure him of his bashfulness, say I've been brought up at Brazen-nose for nothing, that's all. Away with you! and while you're dressing, I'll send off the note and prepare. No words: you've agreed to leave it all to me.

Sir T. Well, well! Frank has some nous, my lady.

Dinah. I certainly should like to see how Mr. Blushington plays the host, that I must say.

Frank. Ay, and the husband, too, Di.

Lady F. But taking the young man at such a nonplus—

Sir T. Come along, my lady; Frank shall have his way for once, that I'm determined upon. Go on, and prosper, my boy! come, my lady; come, Di.

Frank. I'll not fail for want of trying, at all events. So here's at it.

[Exeunt Sir T. Lady F. and Frank.]

Dinah. How will Frank succeed? What a tumult is in my bosom! 'tis Cupid has stolen there. Yes, 'tis the fluttering of his wings I feel. Oh! love, love! either compose thyself to peace, and let this breast feel but the soft down of thy pinions, or take thy flight for ever.

SONG.—DINAH.

*Love came one day to beauty's bow'rs,
And begg'd her nursery-man to be;
Engaging she the sweetest flow'rs
Should ever in her garden see.*

*Beguil'd, she hir'd, ah! woe for her!
The rogue to be her gardener;*

*Soon with the gales of gentle sighs,
Each drooping flow'r he cherish'd there,
While dewy tears from dotting eyes
Kept all her roses fresh and fair.*

But mark, alas!

What came to pass.

*While summer reign'd, the rogue remain'd,
And joy and peace, and sunshine shed;*

But winter came—ah! can I name

*Love's treachery! the urchin fled,
And sadly beauty—woe for her!*

Miss'd, in the storms, her gardener.

Her flowers all died, her shrubs declin'd,

Her blooming beds were all left bare;

No solace could poor beauty find,

Love left but thorns and wild weeds there.

SCENE II.—A gloomy Apartment in Blushington house.

Enter BLUSHINGTON and GYP.

Blush. Shut up the doors, block up the windows, lock up the house, never let me see the light of day nor the face of man again. After this last catastrophe, it's very plain I never was intended to be one of the sons of Adam, but was born by mistake. I shall never be able to venture abroad again, so I'll become a monk of my own making; have my victuals sent me through a hole in the door, let my beard grow, and pass my life in trying to find out the philosopher's stone.

Gyp. But why?

Blush. Why, sha'n't I be an universal laughing-stock—a perpetual jest—awkwardness personified? won't every one point and jeer at me whenever they see me? I've sent to Doctor Stareh, and Dame Straitlace, my aunt, to come and take charge of my estate, and then I'll seclude myself from the world for ever.

Gyp. Nonsense, sir; have more philosophy; turn your thoughts to some other subject; seek consolation from your books.

Blush. Books! I shall never touch a book again but I shall think of that d—d Xenophon, and revive all my shame and mortification.

Gyp. Well then, sir, betake yourself to your studies; go on with your writings.

Blush. Writings! No, no; I've had enough of ink for one while. Didn't I print a map of the world upon my face with that cursed handkerchief? haven't I borne the mark of Cain upon my forehead? Oh! that was a black business! it wrote my disgrace in indelible characters; 'tis never to be washed out.

Gyp. Well, then, suppose you let me get your things ready to dress, and take a ride.

Blush. Dress! Do you want to drive me mad, Gyp? I shall never go to dress but I shall remember my infernal black breeches, and feel the scalding of the hot soup again. Talk of dressing to a man whose extremities have been just stewed! who has had the lower half of him boiled! If you had sent me a surgeon to dress me after such an excoriation you'd have done something.

Gyp. Well, at all events, don't starve yourself; take a little something, and make up your mind what you'll have for dinner.

Blush. Dinner! You put me on the rack. Haven't I had enough of dinner to last me all my life? Oh! that diabolical pudding! and that still more devilish brandy! Haven't I been flayed and blistered alive with ardent spirits? hasn't my tongue and mouth been grilled? a'n't my throat and palate as raw as beef? a'n't I suffering the torments of a goblin d—d? and yet, to talk to me of dinner! Horrible word! source of all my agonies! all my confusion! Never breathe it in my ear again; bury it for ever in oblivion, Gyp.

Gyp. Compose yourself, sir; take a chair; sit down for a few minutes.

Blush. A chair! There you touch another of the many chords of my mortification: through missing my chair, didn't I bring down the whole contents of the table upon me? bury myself under a huge mountain of fish, flesh, and fowl? wasn't my chops completely choked up with custards? wasn't one eye nearly poked out with the latter end of a goose, and the other completely closed up with a cod's head and shoulders? saying nothing of my nose being crushed as flat as a flounder with the butt end of a buttock of beef: and yet, you talk to me of dinner! Odious sound! terrible meal! Give me ratsbane, arsenic, anything but dinner.

Enter JOHN.

Well, what do you want? Come to stare at me, as if I were some remarkable monster, I dare say. I shall be the shew of the place soon.

John. A letter from Sir Thomas. Friendly, sir.

Blush. Ah! demanding payment for his crockery, and wanting to have the Hercules' head made good, I dare say. Give it me: I'm desperate.

John. Sir Thomas's gentleman, Mr. Nicholas, brought it, sir; and says he hopes you'll excuse the little mistake of the brandy at dinner, yesterday.

Blush. Dinner again! Get out of my sight, you infernal scoundrel! do. Don't you know that I've discarded dinner from these walls for ever?

John. (Aside.) Yes; but I haven't, though.

Blush. The brandy, too! I told you everybody would throw it in my face. (To Gyp.) But let's see what Sir Thomas charges; I'll pay it at once and have done with it. (Opens the letter.) Here's a note, but where's the bill? I suppose he lumps all the articles together. Read it, Gyp.

Gyp. (Reads.) "Sir Thomas, Lady Friendly, Mr. Francis, and Miss Dinah's compliments, hope Mr. Blushington has recovered from the little disarrangements of yesterday—"

Blush. Little disarrangements they call them! to be boiled, devilled, and half smothered! Go on.

Gyp. (Reads.) "If perfectly convenient, Sir T. Lady F., Mr. F., and Miss D. F.—"

Blush. Why, zounds! there's half the alphabet—will be glad of the money, I suppose?

Gyp. No. (Reads.) "Will do themselves the pleasure of taking dinner—"

Blush. What! Dinner?

Gyp. (Reads.) "Of taking dinner with Mr. Blushington to-day, at Blushington-house."

Blush. Ten thousand devils! They are not satisfied with having driven me mad with one dinner, but they want to set me raving with another. Say I'm dead; tell them I'm buried; that I'm going to be made a dinner of myself.

Gyp. But consider, sir; common politeness, common decency—you must receive them in return: you wouldn't violate the rights of hospitality, would you? besides, what a glorious opportunity it will afford you of retrieving yourself! you'll be able to put everything right again.

Blush. Yes; my boiled thighs, and fricasseed throat, for example. No, no, Gyp; I'll not be way-laid into another dinner. I'll run away. Get my horse saddled: I'll ride to the middle of Hounslow-heath—go down in the diving-bell—call on the chancellor—anything to get out of the way of dinner. Yes, quick is the word! I'll be off; I'll—[Enter JOHN.—You have just arrived in time: saddle my horse directly, John.

John. Sir Thomas, Lady Friendly, Mr. Francis, and Miss Dinah, sir.

Blush. What, come? Nothing can save me—my ruin is complete—all hope forsakes me—I'm utterly undone! You may bid me good b'ye, Gyp; my cheeks are growing into chalk.

Enter SIR THOMAS FRIENDLY, LADY FRIENDLY, FRANK, and DINAH.

Sir T. My dear young friend, we don't stand upon ceremony, you see; couldn't avoid the opportunity of a leisure day to inquire how you are after yesterday, and take a friendly chop with you. I assure you, I've reprimanded Nicholas severely about the brandy.

Blush. That infernal brandy again! I shall never hear the last of it. (Aside.) Very proud, Sir Thomas—happy—the honour—certainly, by all means.

Sir T. But, egad! you're looking charmingly after it. Why, you've a colour like a maid.

Blush. Pray, don't; you overpower me.

Lady F. Charmingly, indeed! doesn't seem to have had the slightest effect on him.

Blush. Oh! really, you distress me.

Frank. Why, not to compliment Mr. Blushington, I must say I never saw him look better.

Blush. Oh! upon my word—This is too much! (Aside.)

Dinah. Discords often create harmony, and flowers are sometimes fresher after a storm.

Blush. They're roasting me by a slow fire! but I was born to suffer. (Aside.)

Sir T. I'm so happy we found you at home.

Blush. (Aside.) That infernal John to let them in!

Sir T. But I thought you wouldn't be out to-day. You're very pleasantly situated here, Mr. Blushington.

Blush. Yes, very pleasantly, indeed!

Sir T. Only want Mrs. Blushington. Don't let us interrupt you in giving your orders; dinner must be attended to. You can leave us whenever you please; we shall make ourselves quite at home.

Blush. I'm petrified! (Aside.) Certainly, by all means, Sir Thomas. Should be extremely proud—no doubt—dinner—great pleasure—but—bachelor—no convenience—suitable—distinguished honour—want—attendance.

Sir T. Oh! make no apologies, my dear friend, I beg; I've provided against that, knowing you have only a bachelor's establishment: we've brought the whole of our servants with us.

Blush. The devil they have! there's no escape; they've hemmed me in; they'll give me no quarter. (Aside.)

Sir T. If you'll just give my butler the keys of your cellar, he'll look at the wine: you needn't be afraid of him, he's an excellent judge, and will be sure to give us the best you have; leave him alone for a choice article.

Blush. Rather free, though; it's what I could not do; but I suppose it's good breeding! (Aside.)

Sir T. Here, Evans!

Enter EVANS.

Evans. Sir?

Sir T. Take the keys of Mr. Blushington's cellar; taste the different bins, and select a dozen or two of the rarest wines against dinner time.

Evans. Very well, Sir Thomas; I have been inquiring of Mr. John, and know where to pitch upon the oldest champagne and madeira already.

Sir T. And mind you don't go to get drunk there, and do any mischief.

Evans. I'll take care, Sir Thomas.

Sir T. Mr. Blushington, shall I trouble you for the keys?

Blush. Oh! yes, certainly, by all means: rather impudent, but I suppose it's the fashion. (Aside.)

Sir T. I've sent my cook to your butcher's, and ordered some venison and turtle; so you may depend on everything being right in that particular; therefore, give yourself no anxiety about there not being enough.

Blush. Sent his cook to my butcher's; this wasn't manners in my day; how times are changed! I'm confounded! shall never do for society. (Aside.)

Lady F. While dinner is getting ready, Sir Thomas, as Mr. Blushington and Dinah may have their little secrets between them to talk over, we'll leave them.

Blush. By no means, certainly not; I've no little secrets between me and the young lady, upon my soul I haven't! This is worse than all.

Lady F. Hush, hush! we know; young folks will be young folks. I'll go and gather some flowers in the garden; you've some very valuable tulip beds, I hear.

Sir T. I'll stroll into your library and tumble your books about, kick up a dust among the sages. You know I'm rather literary.

Blush. Xenophon to wit! Tumble my books about—the fellow had better cut my throat at once. (Aside.)

Sir T. I hear, you've some very rare and curious manuscripts there; I shall rummage them all out.

Blush. Rummage my manuscripts! D—n his education; but he's one of the polite world.

Frank. While dad is amusing himself with your books, Blushington, I'll take a turn over your grounds, pop at your partridges, beat up your preserves, kiss your game-keeper's daughter, rumple your dairy-maid, and so on: but you must lend me your fowling-piece.

Blush. Going to poach upon another man's grounds, and asks him to lend him a fowling-piece! I've often heard of the height of impudence, but this is one of the most complete illustrations of it I've met with yet. Oh! I'm miserably ignorant of good-breeding; they'll ask me for some of my teeth presently, and expect me to hand them the tongs to draw them with; or, perhaps, ask me to draw them myself, by way of a treat.—My servant, sir, will give you the fowling-piece.

Frank. Then D. I. O. my boy. I'll be sure to be back in time for dinner. [Exit.

Lady F. Ay, ay; we'll none of us forget that. A pleasant tête-à-tête to you, Mr. Blushington. [Exit.

Sir T. I'll follow their example, and be off too; my company is not wanted now. Come friend, (to Gyp) your master has no occasion for your presence at present, he's more agreeably engaged; so I'll take care of you. Shew me the way to the library—Nothing so bad as interruptions in situations of this kind. (Aside to Blush.)

Gyp. I can't stay to help you—I must go, sir—very sorry—make the best of it—I'm coming, sir.

[Exit Gyp and Sir T.]

Blush. (Aside.) Why, I declare, if they haven't all gone, and left me alone with miss! I would not have minded if it had been an old woman so much, but such a young and pretty one, oh, it's cruel! (Takes a chair, and sits down.) Eh! bless me, what am I doing? keeping the young lady standing! (Offers Dinah a chair, she sits.) Dear me, now I feel just for all the world as if I'd left the chair, and were on my legs for a speech. I suppose, if I don't speak to her, they'll call me rude; and I mustn't be rude to the ladies. But what am I to say? I wish she'd speak first. Not a word! that ever a woman should be backward at talking! the world will soon be at an end.

Dinah. (Aside.) Poor fellow, I must take pity on his situation, and say a few words to encourage him. Did you speak, Mr. Blushington?

Blush. I thought she couldn't keep silence long. (Aside.) No—o—miss—yo—you were saying something I—I believe.

Dinah. I was about to remark, Mr. Blushington, that I imagined, you were about to remark something.

Blush. Very true, I ought to have remarked something, sure enough. What the devil shall I remark? I'll be bound, I look now just like a fellow that's going to steal a pint-pot—I have it.—(Aside.)—I was about to remark, miss, that this is very fine weather.

Dinah. Yes, it's clearing—a little dull just now, though—but brightening up at last.

Blush. It has been rather overcast; but it is as you say, miss, rather brightening. What charming eyes she has! I will endeavour to be a little civil to her, if I die for it: there's no one to see me—no scalding soup to upset—no red-hot pudding to swallow.

Dinah. A little sunshine, after so much cold weather, Mr. Blushington, cannot but be extremely agreeable.—He improves. When the temperature of our barometer rises to fine, the buds of promise spring into blossoms of performance, and ultimately grow into flowers of perfection.

Blush. (Aside.) What a botanist! Her sunny smiles quite create a holyday in one's heart. I wish Gyp was here to see me now: I feel all life and vigour in this summer of her complaisance; I'm quite growing into perfection, as she says; I'll go a little nearer to her. What a sensitive plant I am! (Aside.)

Dinah. Warmth is a generous, a delightful element, Mr. Blushington.

Blush. In a proper place, certainly, by all means, Miss Dinah; but confound it, when it attacks one's thighs and cheeks, in the shape of soup and pudding. (Aside.)

Dinah. It draws forth all that is inspiring and charming in our natures— [exactly.

Blush. (Aside, rubbing his thighs.) Hum! not

Dinah. It melts the most frigid, draws forth the most backward.

Blush. (Edging closer to her.) Oh! yes, certainly, by all means.

Dinah. Gives to the flowers their beauty, their fragrance, their maturity—

Blush. (Getting closer.) It does—it does—no doubt—certainly—by all means—where the devil am I going to? (Drawing back.)

Dinah. The most retiring object gains strength at its approach—

Blush. I'm getting on rather too fast, but I can't resist. Your words are all wisdom, charming Miss Dinah! With such a lovely directress as you of my future life, I—

Dinah. Sir?

Blush. Beg pardon, didn't mean to offend—She's thrown me all on my back again—I've put my foot into it—I've affronted her—I've gone on too far—I must apologize. I was merely going to say, that if it was my happy lot to have a partner like—No, that's not it—I mean, that the warmth you were speaking about, d—n me, I'm all in a blaze—the warmth, beauty, inspiring passion, happy mortal, would give me confidence to—I beg pardon—I really—If I've offended—on my knee, I—

Enter SIR THOMAS FRIENDLY, LADY FRIENDLY, and FRANK.

Sir T. Eh, zounds, we're interrupting.

Frank. I give you joy, my boy—Di, I congratulate you.

Sir T. D—d sorry, we should pop in so mal-à-propos.

Frank. Interrupt such a tender tête-à-tête!

Blush. Sir Thomas, my lady, upon my soul I—that is, Miss Dinah—

Sir T. Psha! never try to conceal it, my dear boy; the admiration of a pretty girl was never yet accounted a fault by the most fastidious, and there are worse wenches than Di.

Blush. Certainly, by all means, but—

Frank. The love of woman is the proudest boast, as it is the greatest glory and brightest merit of man.

Blush. Oh! certainly, by all means—They've caught me in a pretty situation, I can't back out.

Frank. In the admiration of women, bashfulness becomes a crime, and backwardness a disgrace.

Blush. That's very true, so I'd better hold my tongue. Hey, here's a reference!

Enter EVANS.

Evans. I've looked out the wine, Sir Thomas.

Enter NICK.

Nick. Dinner be all ready, Sir Thomas, and I'll take care there shall be no mistake with the brandy again.

Blush. Oh, that infernal brandy! my gums tingle at the very thoughts!

Sir T. We'll not keep a good dinner in suspense, Frank; take your mother's arm; Mr. Blushington will do the same good office for Dinah, and I'll hobble on after you.

Blush. I must say, they're uncommonly free and easy; and as it's my own dinner, I'll pluck up courage and be free and easy too; I'll take care not to have any soup or pudding, though. After you: I couldn't hear of such a thing—Come, I think that's pretty polite to begin with. Allow me the honour, Miss Di. Dear me, I'm making a mistake again; taking her arm instead of offering mine. This way—Hum, that's not so bad, though.

Frank. He is smitten; you have conquered, Di! The day is your own, like another Iphigenia, you have inspired another Cymon. Go on, complete your conquest, and polish the aboriginal!

Sir T. Away with you, I'll not be long following. Oh, this plaguy gout! [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Another Apartment in Blushington house.

Gyp. They've got him in, it's all right! They've seated him by miss again: it will do! They'll cure him of some of his bashfulness to a certainty. Well, it's high time, for what with my modesty, and his shamefacedness, I should get but very few vails in his service. I didn't mind it so much at college, though he was bad enough there, heaven knows! Why, I've known him dine off my herrings, in the dog-days, and bear all the horrors of a raging thirst, because he was too bashful to ask for some beer. They've got up plenty of wine; if they do but ply him well, to encourage him, they may accomplish wonders. If they can only once break the ice—(Knocking without.) Eh! who's this? As I live, Doctor Starch and Dame Philippa Straitlace. Was ever anything so mal-à-propos! They will spoil all; I must set my wits to work to prevent it.

Enter JOHN, shewing in DOCTOR STARCH and DAME PHILIPPA.

John. This way, if you please; master's very particularly engaged at present, but if you'll wait—

Dame P. Poring over his books, no doubt. Let the dear boy know of our arrival. Poor child, he's longing bad enough to see us!

John. I'll tell him, ma'am, certainly, but—

Dame P. Go directly; the dear youth must not be suffered to mortify himself too much; moping as he is, our company will be particularly acceptable.

Gyp. (Aside.) I wouldn't have you be too sure of that.

Doctor S. Ay, ay! Go, young man.

John. Very well, sir. [Exit.]

Doctor S. In this quiet, sober solitude, unbroken by the voice of riot, or—(Loud laughing without.) Eh, bless me, what's that?

Dame P. Some of the servants, taking advantage of their dear master's quietness. ah! it is time one came to bring them in order! (Noise of rapping on the table, and cries of Bravo! Bravo!) Scandalous! such an outcry! but I'll soon put a stop to it. What's this?

Enter EVANS and NICK, crossing the stage.

Evans. Go you, and carry in the devilled biscuits, while I get another magnum of champagne! Do you hear, Nick? [Exit.]

Doctor S. Devilled biscuits! and champagne!

Dame P. I'm thunderstruck! What does all this mean?

Gyp. Master's only amusing himself ma'am.

Enter JOHN.

John. I haven't interrupted him, as he seemed so happy and jolly. (Aside.) Master's compliments, ma'am, to you and the Doctor, he's busy dining with a few friends at present, but he'll be glad to see you by-and-by, to take a glass of port and an olive.

Doctor S. After all my good lessons, there is something more than natural in all this.

Dame P. 'Tis magic! the poor child is bewitched!

Doctor S. (Noise of revelry without.) Again! some of his racketty fellow-students, I suppose;

but my presence will soon strike them with proper awe—reciting Anacreon no doubt.

Gyp. With submission, I rather think he's reciting Ovid.

Doctor S. Why, ay, here are metamorphoses enough to warrant such a supposition.

Gyp. Nay, it's his Art of Love, I should think, is the theme now; or the ladies' charms are not so potent as they appear to be.

Dame P. Ladies! Are there ladies there? It's high time I should make one among them.

EVANS and NICK enter, crossing the stage.

Evans. More wine, Nick! Take care of the iced punch for the turtle! They're waiting—quick.

[Exit Nick and Evans.]

Dame P. Is this the life of seclusion he wrote us word he was going to lead? The poor boy's simplicity has been imposed upon; but I'll undeceive him. Lead me to him instantly. Come Doctor. (More laughing, &c. without.)

Doctor S. These are the sounds of Belzebub: of a truth, I am shocked.

Gyp. There'll be a rare blow-up—Well, everything's for the best. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Great Dining-room in Blushington-house.

BLUSHINGTON discovered on an elevated seat at the head of the table. MISS DINAH at his right hand, LADY FRIENDLY at his left; SIR THOMAS FRIENDLY and FRANK next to them. EVANS, NICK, JOHN, and Servants in attendance.

Sir T. Now then, clear the dinner things away, Evans, and let the dessert be brought in. Mr. Blushington, I'll take another glass of wine with you.

Blush. Oh! yes, certainly, by all means; every fresh glass I take doubles the pleasant reflections of the one before it. (Drinks and rises.) I've got through dinner famously; made no particular mistake, except spurning the gravy of the goose over the Baronet's wig by a slip of my fork, and sugaring the apple-pudding with salt. I begin to find that the height of good breeding is doing as company do; and as they've done nothing here but eat and drink, I've had no great difficulty in following their example. Oh! I'm getting very polite. (Aside.)

Sir T. Mr. Blushington, now the cloth's drawn, we shall have no objection to taking a toast from your wise, old-fashioned people.

Blush. A toast! oh! yes, certainly, by all means: dry, or buttered?

Sir T. Psha! A toast to drink.

Blush. To drink! well, that must be a dry one. Oh! now I understand—I beg pardon, upon my soul. I'm putting my foot in it—swearing before ladies; but I'll shew them my manners now. (Aside.) I should be very happy, Sir Thomas, but I couldn't think of drinking before you—that is, not first. After you, certainly.

Sir T. Ha, ha, ha! Well, you shall have your way; come, fill—a bumper, and I'll give you "A health to all good fellows."

Blush. "A health to all good fellows!" (Drinks.) That's a compliment to me. (Aside.)

Sir T. He's getting on; the real man breaks out; all is as it should be. (Aside.) As we intend to walk after dinner, we'll not permit the ladies to go, Mr. Blushington; but—

Blush. Certainly not; by no means. Bless my soul, how extremely well-bred I am growing! (Aside.)

Sir T. They'll feel great pleasure on this particular occasion, I'm sure, in honouring your sentiment, Mr. Blushington; that is, if you press them.

Blush. Press them! Oh, lord! Sir Thomas, couldn't think of such a thing in public. How extremely genteel I feel! (Aside.) It will be the height of good manners to drink the ladies' healths, though; so, Sir Thomas, I beg to give you the health of the ladies.

Sir T. Hum! we usually wait for their absence to drink that: no matter.

Blush. Bumpers; now then, all on your legs, if you please. That's good breeding, certainly. (Aside.) "The ladies!" [hurrah!]

Sir T. and Frank. "The ladies!" Hip, hip,

Frank. To complete the obligation you've laid us under, Mr. Blushington, you've only now to favour us with a song, and—

Blush. A song! Oh, lord! no; I never can sing; I've no voice; I've got a cold; I can't remember—

Sir T. Song, song! we can take no excuse. You really must oblige us, my dear boy. Only try; you'll succeed admirably.

Blush. Oh, dear me! I never shall be able to get through it; I must wet my throat. (Drinks.) Hem, hem! I—that's too high; I—that's too low; I—I think that will do. I'll make an attempt.

SONG.—BLUSHINGTON.

AIR—Turnpike Gate.

Those who may think a life at college,
Fagging and tagging, poring, boring,
Haven't their nobs o'erstock'd with knowledge;
Life in a college is full of glee:
'Tis learning, quaffing, joking, laughing,
Cheating the grave wigs, so merrily
Revelling, cavilling, holydays, jolly days,
Logic and sophistry thought go free.

(Speaking.)—Oxford Coachman—Now, sir, going to Oxford? starting for college, sir? Brazen-nose, sir?—(Collegian.) No; it's that gentleman with the red face that's going to Brazen-nose.—(Coachman.) Catherine Hall then, perhaps, sir?—(Old Lady.) Catherine Hall, indeed! I'd have you to know, fellow! my nephew has nothing to do with such hussies.—(Collegian.) No, friend, I'm going to Magdalen.—(Coachman.) On the foundation, sir?—(Collegian.) No; on the box, coachee.—(Coachman.) Well, then, sir, you couldn't apply to a better man than I am to take you, sir: I'm the well-known Jemmy Jarvis, the classical coachman, as they calls me. Lord bless you, sir! Hell-fire Dick was a fool to me! just look at those here leaders of mine, sir; they trot along like a Pindaric: only scan their feet, sir; see how prettily they amble. Those near horses I calls my Homers, because I always drives my last stage into town with them: that one with the blinkers is the eyelid, (Iliad,) and that t'other, with the one eye, is the odd eye see (Odyssey.) That right leader I calls my Wirgil, on account of his being in-kneed (Æneid); and that off-leader, my Horace, because of his carmen; he was a cart-horse once. You'll drive a long way before you find one more experienced in the Greek accidentance than I am.—(Old Lady.) Mercy on me! experienced some great accidents, did you say, coachman? I hope not.—(Coachman.) Never fear, ma'am; I mean in parsing on the road.—(Old Lady.) Ah! that causes all the mischief: I hope you won't attempt to pass anything on the road here; it's contrary to act of parliament, you know: I shall certainly let Mr. Martin hear of it, if I see anything like racing going on.—(Coachman.) It's all right, ma'am, depend upon that.—(Collegian.) I say, coachee! coachee, my boy! just let me take the reins for a mile or so, now the shower's over, will you, eh!—(Coachman.) Shouldn't have any objection in life, 'squire, to let you handle the ribands for a stage or two; but four-in-hand, you know, requires.—(Collegian.) I know, four-in-hand from me—there's a couple of brace of half-crowns for you; so, now hand over the leathers.—(Coachman.) Touching the bit alters the case, sir: there they are. Let 'em feel their mouths—down hill with you, sir. I'm obliged to be a little partickler, sir: I've got three fellows inside.—(Collegian.) Three fellows! that's odd.—(Coachman.) Yes, odd fellows, sir; all as grumpy and queer as can be; but you know what they are, sir.—(Collegian.) To be sure I do; I'll take care, coachee. Who's that fat gentleman that's just got in?—(Coachman.) That fat gentleman's a sizer from Corpus.—(Old Fellow, inside.) Coachman, I decidedly object to that young gentleman's taking the reins; our lives a'n't safe.—(Coachman.) It's all right, sir. Steady with my Homers, as you turn the corner; you know they're blind, sir. Mind Wirgil don't make a false quantity; take care of his Hocks-ameters, as I call 'em, he's apt to stumble. Soho! gently, there!—(Collegian.) Pray, coachee, what's the name of this place?—(Coachman.) Shot-over Hill, sir—Eh! zounds, 'squire! we shall be shot over, if you don't mind.—(Old Fellow, inside.) Eh! bless me! what is that? Really, coachman, I positively shall get out and walk.—(Coachman.) Only young Phaeton got his horses in the sun, sir.—(Old Fellow, inside.) If you let that young gentleman continue to hold the reins.—(Coachman.) It's all right, I can assure your honour.—(Old Fellow, inside.) Your assurance won't satisfy me; you've a little too much of it.—(Coachman to Collegian.) Never mind him, 'squire. Now, sir, we change here. There's a pretty pair of wheelers; we calls that bay, Lucretius, because he knows the nature of things so well; he's seed such sarvice; and that 'ere white mare the Goddess of Morning; and what do you think we calls her the Goddess of Morning for, sir?—(Collegian.) Really, coachee, I can't tell.—(Coachman.) Why, because she's a roarer (Aurora). So, ya, hip! then dash along.

Those who may think a life at college,
Fagging and tagging, poring, boring,
Haven't their nobs o'erstock'd with knowledge;
Life in a college is full of glee.

Fellows at college, rare odd fellows;
Very good fellows, getting mellow,
Carol old rose and burn the bellows:
Jolly young students, tutors grave.
Proctors cheating, slyly meeting,
Slighting the sages, some pretty girl's slave;
Funning and punning, and dunning and running,
Caring for nought, if their bacon they save.

(Collegian.) Now, then, Gyp, that I'm comfortably settled at college, to keep my terms, and eat my commons, damme, let's be jolly. Hang my old musty prig of a tutor and his mathematics, I say; give me a glass and a lass; and as for making extracts from Bacon, let me cut away at this ham here. All I shall study from Ovid, is his Art of Love, with perhaps an occasional touch at his Metamorphoses, when I want to escape from a dun, or give a tradesman the double. What's the use of translations, unless it is translating a pretty girl from the outside to the inside, as we did the glover's daughters last night, and as I did Sal Spanker under my gown, after hours yesterday evening, under the very nose of our old buzzard of a porter, without his having any suspicion; though that wasn't a bad thing of Ned Bumper, who, on his receiving his last hamper of wine, translated Inveni Portum into I've found some Port; that was proper Port Royal Latin, that was—Eh! who the devil's that at the door?—(Bed-maker.) Old Smouchey Solomon, sir, the Jew money-lender.—(Collegian.) Let him come in; I must make use of the old rascal: haven't a rap left of the last 500 dad sent. Well, Smouchey, come in, my old boy; we'll have a rasher together. Eh! zounds, you are not going to be one of the tribe of Gad, instead of one of the sons of Ham: what do you want?—(Jew.) Vant my moniesh, Mr. Blushington.—(Collegian.) So do I, Smouchey; and what's more, I must have it: give you a post obit for it on the family-estates; that's the only bit of Latin you care a curse for, the only part of the dead languages that sets you alive.—(Jew.) I tell you vat it is, Mr. Blushington, you owes me a thousand pounds already, and I've never seen the colour of your moniesh, and vat's more.—(Collegian.) I must have more, Smouchey; so, none of your nonsense. Eh! zounds, who's that?—(Bed-maker.) Sir, sir, here's your tutor, Doctor Stiffwig, coming up stairs.—(Collegian.) Eh! my tutor? what the devil's to be done, Gyp? he cuts off all retreat. Put the glover's daughter in the coal-hole and give old Smouchey a book.—(Bed-maker.) What book, sir?—(Collegian.) Zounds! the interest book; if that don't interest him, the devil's in it. Not a word for your life, Smouchey. Good morning, sir.—(Tutor.) Good morning, young man; how is it I find you occupied? Strange rumours have.—(Collegian.) I've been amusing myself with some Fugitive Pieces, sir; and making the extracts from Bacon you spoke of.—(Tutor.) Hum! Very light study. I hope you always commit your loose thoughts to paper; it may be advisable I should see them sometimes. But, eh! who is that strange looking character in the beard there?—(Collegian.) Eh! that, that, sir—that is a great Hebrew rabbi, the learned Ben Ham-eat, Ben Isaac, Ben Moses, Ben Solomon, Ben Nebuchadnezzar, come to discuss the extraction of some Hebrew roots with me.—(Tutor.) Eh! a professor of languages; I will hold converse with him. Are you acquainted with Anacreon and Theocritus, friend?—(Jew.) Never had any dealings with 'em in all have any soup or pudding, though. After you: I couldn't hear of such a thing—Come, I think that's pretty polite to begin with. Allow me the honour, Miss Di. Dear me, I'm making a mistake again; taking her arm instead of offering mine. This way—Hum, that's not so bad, though.

Frank. He is smitten; you have conquered, Di! The day is your own, like another Iphigenia, you have inspired another Cymon. Go on, complete your conquest, and polish the aboriginal!

Sir T. Away with you, I'll not be long following. Oh, this plaguy gout! [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Another Apartment in Blushington house.

Gyp. They've got him in, it's all right! They've seated him by miss again: it will do! They'll cure him of some of his bashfulness to a certainty. Well, it's high time, for what with my modesty, and his shamefacedness, I should get but very few vails in his service. I didn't mind it so much at college, though he was bad enough there, heaven knows! Why, I've known him dine off my herrings, in the dog-days, and bear all the horrors of a raging thirst, because he was too bashful to ask for some beer. They've got up plenty of wine; if they do but ply him well, to encourage him, they may accomplish wonders. If they can only once break the ice—(Knocking without.) Eh! who's this? As I live, Doctor Starch and Dame Philippa Straitlace. Was ever anything so mal-à-propos! They will spoil all; I must set my wits to work to prevent it.

Enter JOHN, shewing in DOCTOR STARCH and DAME PHILIPPA.

John. This way, if you please; master's very particularly engaged at present, but if you'll wait—

Dame P. Poring over his books, no doubt. Let the dear boy know of our arrival. Poor child, he's longing bad enough to see us!

John. I'll tell him, ma'am, certainly, but—

Dame P. Go directly; the dear youth must not be suffered to mortify himself too much; moping as he is, our company will be particularly acceptable.

Gyp. (Aside.) I wouldn't have you be too sure of that.

Doctor S. Ay, ay! Go, young man.

John. Very well, sir. [Exit.]

Doctor S. In this quiet, sober solitude, unbroken by the voice of riot, or—(Loud laughing without.) Eh, bless me, what's that?

Dame P. Some of the servants, taking advantage of their dear master's quietness. ah! it is time one came to bring them in order! (Noise of rapping on the table, and cries of Bravo! Bravo!) Scandalous! such an outcry! but I'll soon put a stop to it. What's this?

Enter EVANS and NICK, crossing the stage.

Evans. Go you, and carry in the devilled biscuits, while I get another magnum of champagne! Do you hear, Nick? [Exit.]

Doctor S. Devilled biscuits! and champagne!

Dame P. I'm thunderstruck! What does all this mean?

Gyp. Master's only amusing himself ma'am.

Enter JOHN.

John. I haven't interrupted him, as he seemed so happy and jolly. (Aside.) Master's compliments, ma'am, to you and the Doctor, he's busy dining with a few friends at present, but he'll be glad to see you by-and-by, to take a glass of port and an olive.

Doctor S. After all my good lessons, there is something more than natural in all this.

Dame P. 'Tis magic! the poor child is bewitched!

Doctor S. (Noise of revelry without.) Again! some of his racketty fellow-students, I suppose;

but my presence will soon strike them with proper awe—reciting Anacreon no doubt.

Gyp. With submission, I rather think he's reciting Ovid.

Doctor S. Why, ay, here are metamorphoses enough to warrant such a supposition.

Gyp. Nay, it's his Art of Love, I should think, is the theme now; or the ladies' charms are not so potent as they appear to be.

Dame P. Ladies! Are there ladies there? It's high time I should make one among them.

EVANS and NICK enter, crossing the stage.

Evans. More wine, Nick! Take care of the iced punch for the turtle! They're waiting—quick.

[Exit Nick and Evans.]

Dame P. Is this the life of seclusion he wrote us word he was going to lead? The poor boy's simplicity has been imposed upon; but I'll undeceive him. Lead me to him instantly. Come Doctor. (More laughing, &c. without.)

Doctor S. These are the sounds of Belzebub: of a truth, I am shocked.

Gyp. There'll be a rare blow-up—Well, everything's for the best. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Great Dining-room in Blushington-house.

BLUSHINGTON discovered on an elevated seat at the head of the table. MISS DINAH at his right hand, LADY FRIENDLY at his left; SIR THOMAS FRIENDLY and FRANK next to them. EVANS, NICK, JOHN, and Servants in attendance.

Sir T. Now then, clear the dinner things away, Evans, and let the dessert be brought in. Mr. Blushington, I'll take another glass of wine with you.

Blush. Oh! yes, certainly, by all means; every fresh glass I take doubles the pleasant reflections of the one before it. (Drinks and rises.) I've got through dinner famously; made no particular mistake, except spurning the gravy of the goose over the Baronet's wig by a slip of my fork, and sugaring the apple-pudding with salt. I begin to find that the height of good breeding is doing as company do; and as they've done nothing here but eat and drink, I've had no great difficulty in following their example. Oh! I'm getting very polite. (Aside.)

Sir T. Mr. Blushington, now the cloth's drawn, we shall have no objection to taking a toast from your wise, old-fashioned people.

Blush. A toast! oh! yes, certainly, by all means: dry, or buttered?

Sir T. Psha! A toast to drink.

Blush. To drink! well, that must be a dry one. Oh! now I understand—I beg pardon, upon my soul. I'm putting my foot in it—swearing before ladies; but I'll shew them my manners now. (Aside.) I should be very happy, Sir Thomas, but I couldn't think of drinking before you—that is, not first. After you, certainly.

Sir T. Ha, ha, ha! Well, you shall have your way; come, fill—a bumper, and I'll give you "A health to all good fellows."

Blush. "A health to all good fellows!" (Drinks.) That's a compliment to me. (Aside.)

Sir T. He's getting on; the real man breaks out; all is as it should be. (Aside.) As we intend to walk after dinner, we'll not permit the ladies to go, Mr. Blushington; but—

Blush. Certainly not; by no means. Bless my soul, how extremely well-bred I am growing! (Aside.)

Sir T. They'll feel great pleasure on this particular occasion, I'm sure, in honouring your sentiment, Mr. Blushington; that is, if you press them.

Blush. Press them! Oh, lord! Sir Thomas, couldn't think of such a thing in public. How extremely genteel I feel! (Aside.) It will be the height of good manners to drink the ladies' healths, though; so, Sir Thomas, I beg to give you the health of the ladies.

Sir T. Hum! we usually wait for their absence to drink that: no matter.

Blush. Bumpers; now then, all on your legs, if you please. That's good breeding, certainly. (Aside.) "The ladies!" [hurrah!]

Sir T. and Frank. "The ladies!" Hip, hip,

Frank. To complete the obligation you've laid us under, Mr. Blushington, you've only now to favour us with a song, and—

Blush. A song! Oh, lord! no; I never can sing; I've no voice; I've got a cold; I can't remember—

Sir T. Song, song! we can take no excuse. You really must oblige us, my dear boy. Only try; you'll succeed admirably.

Blush. Oh, dear me! I never shall be able to get through it; I must wet my throat. (Drinks.) Hem, hem! I—that's too high; I—that's too low; I—I think that will do. I'll make an attempt.

SONG.—BLUSHINGTON.

AIR—Turnpike Gate.

He says, sir, that—that Anacreon and Theocritus are shopkeepers, sir; that is, that their works don't sell, and that he's not over partial to them; likes something more solid.—(Tutor.) Hum! ha! You will get ready for your examination to-day: when I hope that the pains I have taken to prepare you, will not have been thrown away; but that you will speedily arrive at the highest of college honours—Vale.—(Collegian.) Good b'ye, sir. Glad the old Prig is gone. Bring out the glover's daughter. Send old Smouchey home for the blunt; uncork another bottle, and let's be jolly.

*Those who may think a life at college,
Fagging and tagging, poring, boring,
Haven't their nobs o'erstock'd with knowledge;
Life in a college is full of glee.*

*Doctors, proctors—Greek and Latin,
Curs'd dry study, brain gets muddy;
Tutor pops a sentence pat in;
Gain a degree, make holyday.
Read old Homer, get diploma,
While others are pluck'd and sent away;
Spluttering, muttering, hammering, stammering:
We are the true Greeks—huzza, huzza!*

"When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war."—(Row in the street.) Town, gown! Town, gown!—(Collegian.) What the devil's the matter in the High-street, there?—(Bed-maker.) Only a row between the stupid and the students, the townsmen and the gownsmen, about a silly wench of a shop girl; that's all, sir.—(Collegian.) Oh! d—e, Gyp, must make one among them; must support the gown. Call them out there. "Town, gown!—gown, town!" There'll be more heads than Priscian's broken to-day.—(Bed-maker.) Sir, sir, we must be off; there's four heads of houses coming down the next street.—(Collegian.) Four houses coming down on our heads in the next street; you're right; then, egad, it's high time to be off, 'faith.—(Bed-maker.) Chapel-bell has rung long ago; and then there's the examination in the Hall to-day, you know, sir; and after this row.—(Collegian.) I shall be more fitted than ever to be Senior Wrangler. Ah! Gyp, hope I sha'n't get plucked; funk confoundedly: no matter, I must put a bold face on it. I say, Tom, what the devil's that bit of red under your gown there?—(Fellow Collegian.) Hold your tongue, you fool; only my hunting frock: hadn't time to pull it off. I've been rusticated.—(Collegian.) Take care they don't rusticate you, that's all. You know it's against College rules to hunt or race; and, as to coming to chapel in your hunting togger—(Fellow Collegian.) It was on the spur of the moment; just in time to show, however. (Prayers are read.)—(Cryer.) Now, then, to the Hall, gentlemen.—(Collegian.) Eh! who the deuce is that going up, the Welshman from Caius, poor Shenkin-ap-Watkins. Poor fellow, stews like roasted cheese; they're going to try him in Greek. Zounds! if he were going to be tried at the Old Bailey, he couldn't be more frightened: and old Doctor M'Jargon, the Scotch proctor, one of the examiners; he'll be plucked to a certainty, like a poor pigeon as he is. Never mind, we're the Greeks that are never plucked: only hear him.—(Doctor M'Jargon.) Now, Mr. Shenkin-ap-Watkins, we will proceed to Homer, d'ye ken—Dinna be in sic a muckle-puckle! there's nowt to be alarmed at: fair and softly; there's na need to be in sic a hurry and splutter. (Mr. Shenkin-ap-Watkins, reading with a strong Welsh accent, and evidently dreadfully nervous and frightened.)

"TON D'APAMEIBOMENOS, PROSEPHE PODAS OKUS
ACHILLEUS;
ATREIDE, KUDISTE, PHILOKTEANOTATE PANTON,
POS GAR TOI DOSOUSI GERAS MEGATHUMOI ACHAIOT!
OUDE TI PO IDMEN XUNEIA KEIMENA POLLA!
ALLA TA MEN POLION EXEPRATHOMEN TA DEDASTAI
LAOUS D'OUK EPEOIKE PALILLOGA TAUT' EPAGEI-REIN."

(Doctor M'Jargon.) Hauld, hauld! Troth, Mr. Shenkin-ap-Watkins, ye have nae the true Doric accent, the pure pronunciation o' the Greek language. Ye should speak it after this fashion, d'ye ken, and na let yer words hop about like sae mony kids on ane of yer mickie Welsh mountains. (Reading with a strong deliberate Scotch accent)—

"TON D'APAMEIBOMENOS," &c.

That is the way the Greek language ought to be spoken, chiel. Ye may gang down, Mr. Shenkin-ap-Watkins: we must e'en send him back to his native goats again; he'll never be able to feed his flocks with Virgil or The- ocritus, I trow. Call Mr. Terence O'Terry.—(Cryer.) Mr. Terence O'Terry.—(Mr. Terence O'Terry.) 'Faith, here am I, sir.—(Doctor M'Jargon.) Now, Mr. Terence O'Terry, I hope ye're a' prepared?—(Mr. Terence O'Terry.) You may take your oath of that, sir, all the same as if it was my own mother tongue. (Reading very rapidly, and with a strong Irish accent)—

"TON D'APAMEIBOMENOS," &c.

(Doctor M'Jargon.) Stop, stop, Mr. Terence O'Terry! what, in the de'il's name, d'ye call that! O' my conscience, ye bellow like a bull, and have got a burr like a knife-grinder's wheel on the tip of your tongue; troth, if that's Greek, it's St. Giles's Greek, and nae the Greek of that auld chield, Homer. Break up the Hall; we've had enough for one day, at all events; he mun gang back to the bogs again, he winna do here. As for you, Mr. Blashington, you are entitled to your degree.—(Collegian.) Huzza, huzza! now for fun and jollity.

*Those who may think a life at college,
Fagging, tagging, poring, boring,
Haven't their nobs o'erstock'd with knowledge;
Life in a college is full of glee.*

Enter GYP, shewing in DAME PHILIPPA STRAITLACE and DOCTOR STARCH.

Blush. My aunt Straitlace! Zounds! I must face her out. (Aside.) Another glass of wine, Sir Thomas. (Drinks.) Doctor Starch, too! he'll read me a rare lecture! (Aside.) Another glass of wine, Sir Thomas. (Drinks.)

Dame P. The world is certainly turned upside down! here's goings on! I'm shocked!

Gyp. Yes, it isn't a sight fit to contaminate your chaste eyes, ma'am; you'd better go away.

Dame P. Nephew, nephew, how has your innocence been abused! Where is all your artlessness and purity gone to? Didn't you write me word that you wished to put your household under the superintendence of some discreet female?

Blush. Yes, I did; but I meant a young and pretty one; relations are apt to disagree, you know. I'm sorry you've had your journey for nothing, but I'm provided. Your health, Miss Dinah. (Drinks.) Must be polite to aunt Phil, though. (Aside.) Will you take a bumper of Madeira and a devilled biscuit after your walk?

Dame P. The devil possesses you all; but I'll take outa statute of lunacy.

Doctor S. My dear pupil, let the lessons—

Blush. I beg your pardon, Doctor, but I'm not at school now.

Doctor S. Didn't you say that you wished for a person to be a second father to you?

Blush. I did, and I've found one—Sir Thomas; and I don't care how soon he makes me his son-in-law.

Sir T. Well said! The fact is, Doctor, and you, my good madam, with a little of my management, my family and I have succeeded in giving to society one who promises to become not its least best ornament; one who, under your guidance, would have been lost to it for ever.

Blush. Yes, but having once broken through the ice of ceremony, it shall never freeze up my faculties again. I've become sensible of the sweet influence of a young and lovely woman; I've felt the delight of friendship and good fellowship; I find that properly fulfilling the duties of society brings its own reward with it; I have determined to marry, to become a citizen of the world.

Dame P. I'll not stay to witness it. He is quite lost to remorse, and must ruin himself his own way. Come, Doctor.

Doctor S. Very much at your service, Miss Philippa. Oh! my hopeful pupil! Oh! my poor hopes of profit in managing his estate for him! Oh, tempora! oh, mores! [Exit with Dame P.]

Blush. I am glad they're gone; I now only feel bashful in one point—that of having deserved the approbation of my friends. Assured of their good opinion, I shall laugh at the censures of prudes and pedants, and pass my future life in endeavouring to retain it. [Exeunt.]

MISS WALSHINGHAM

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment at Belville's.

Enter CAPTAIN SAVAGE and MISS WALSHINGHAM.

Capt. S. Ha, ha, ha! Well, Miss Walsingham, this fury is going. What a noble peal she has rung in Belville's ears.

Miss W. Did she see you, Captain Savage?

Capt. S. No, I took care of that; for though she is not married to my father, she has ten times the influence of a wife, and might injure me not a little with him, if I didn't support her side of the question.

Miss W. It was a pleasant conceit of Mr. Belville, to insinuate that the poor woman was disordered in her senses.

Capt. S. And did you observe how the termagant's violence of temper supported the probability of the charge?

Miss W. Yes, she became almost frantic in reality, when she found herself treated like a mad woman. [admirable.]

Capt. S. Belville's affected surprise, too, was Miss W. Yes, the hypocritical composure of his countenance, and his counterfeit pity for the poor woman, were intolerable.

Capt. S. While that amiable creature, his wife, implicitly believed every syllable he said.

Miss W. And felt nothing but pity for the accusation. But pray, is it really under a pretence of getting the girl upon the stage, that Belville has taken away Mrs. Tempest's niece from the people she boarded with?

Capt. P. It is. Belville, ever on the look out for fresh objects, met her in those primitive regions of purity, the green boxes; where, discovering that she was passionately desirous of becoming an actress, he improved his acquaintance with her, in the fictitious character of an Irish manager, and she eloped last night, to be, as she imagines, the heroine of a Dublin theatre.

Miss W. So, then, as he has kept his real name artfully concealed, Mrs. Tempest can, at most, but suspect him of Miss Leeson's seduction.

Capt. S. Of no more; and this only from the description of the people who saw him in company with her at the play; but I wish the affair may not have a serious conclusion, for she has a brother, a very spirited young fellow, who is a counsellor in the Temple, and who will certainly call Belville to an account the moment he hears of it.

Miss W. And what will become of the poor creature, after he has deserted her?

Capt. S. You know that Belville is generous to profusion, and has a thousand good qualities to counterbalance this single fault of gallantry, which contaminates his character.

Miss W. You men, you men! You are such wretches, that there's no having a moment's satisfaction with you; and what's still more provoking, there's no having a moment's satisfaction without

Capt. S. Nay, don't think us all alike. [you.]

Miss W. I'll endeavour to deceive myself; for it is but a poor argument of your sincerity, to be the confidant of another's falsehood.

Capt. S. Nay, no more of this, my love; no people live happier than Belville and his wife; nor is there a man in England, notwithstanding all his levity, who considers his wife with a warmer degree of affection: if you have a friendship therefore, for her, let her continue in an error, so necessary to her repose, and give no hint whatever of his gallantries to anybody.

Miss W. If I had no pleasure in obliging you, I have too much regard for Mrs. Belville, not to follow your advice; but you need not enjoin me so strongly on the subject, when you know I can keep a secret.

Capt. S. You are all goodness; and the prudence with which you have concealed our private engagements has eternally obliged me; had you trusted the secret even to Mrs. Belville, it would not have been safe; she would have told her husband, and he is such a rattleskull, that, notwithstanding all his regard for me, he would have mentioned it in some moment of levity, and sent it in a course of circulation to my father.

Miss W. The peculiarity of your father's temper, joined to my want of fortune, made it necessary for me to keep our engagements inviolably secret; there is no merit, therefore, either in my prudence, or in my labouring assiduously to cultivate the good opinion of the General; since both were so necessary to my own happiness: don't despise me for this acknowledgment now.

Capt. S. Bewitching softness! But your goodness, I flatter myself, will be speedily rewarded; you are now such a favourite with him, that he is eternally talking of you; and I really fancy he means to propose you to me himself; for, last night, in a few minutes after he had declared you would make the best wife in the world, he seriously asked me if I had any aversion to matrimony?

Miss W. Why, that was a very great concession, indeed, as he seldom stoops to consult anybody's inclinations.

Capt. S. So it was, I assure you; for, in the army, being used to nothing but command and obedience, he removes the discipline of the parade into his family, and no more expects his orders should be disputed in matters of a domestic nature than if they were delivered at the head of his regiment.

Miss W. And yet, Mrs. Tempest, who you say is as much a storm in her nature as her name, is disputing them eternally.

Enter MR. and MRS. BELVILLE.

Bel. Well, Miss Walsingham, haven't we had a pretty morning's visitor?

Miss W. Really, I think so; and I have been asking Captain Savage how long the lady has been disordered in her senses.

Bel. Why will they let the poor woman abroad, without somebody to take care of her?

Capt. S. Oh, she has her lucid intervals.

Miss W. I declare I shall be as angry with you as I am with Belville. (Aside to the Captain.)

Mrs. B. You can't think how sensibly she spoke at first.

Bel. I should have had no conception of her madness, if she had not brought so preposterous a charge against me.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Lady Rachel Mildew, madam, sends her compliments, and if you are not particularly engaged, will do herself the pleasure of waiting upon you.

Mrs. B. Our compliments, and we shall be glad to see her ladyship. [Exit Servant.]

Bel. I wonder if Lady Rachel knows that Torrington came to town last night from Bath.

Mrs. B. I hope he has found benefit by the waters, for he is one of the best creatures existing; he's a downwright parson Adams in good nature and simplicity.

Miss W. Lady Rachel will be quite happy at his return, and it would be a laughable affair, if a match could be brought about between the old maid and the old bachelor.

Capt. S. Mr. Torrington is too much taken up at Westminster Hall to think of paying his devoirs to the ladies; and too plain a speaker, I fancy, to be agreeable to Lady Rachel.

Bel. You mistake the matter widely; she is deeply smitten with him; but honest Torrington is utterly unconscious of his conquest, and modestly thinks that he has not a single attraction for any woman in the universe.

Mrs. B. Yet my poor aunt speaks sufficiently plain, in all conscience, to give him a different opinion of himself.

Miss W. Yes, and puts her charms into such repair, whenever she expects to meet him, that her cheeks look for all the world like a raspberry ice upon a ground of custard.

Capt. S. I thought Apollo was the only god of Lady Rachel's idolatry, and that in her passion for poetry she had taken leave of all the less elevated affections.

Bel. Oh! you mistake again; the poets are eternally in love, and can, by no means, be calculated to describe the imaginary passions, without being very susceptible of the real ones.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. The man, madam, from Tavistock-street, has brought home the dresses for the masquerade, and desires to know if there are any commands for him.

Mrs. B. Oh! bid him stay till we see the dresses. [Exit Servant.]

Miss W. They are only dominos.

Bel. I am glad of that; for characters are as difficult to be supported at the masquerade, as they are in real life. The last time I was at the Pantheon, a vestal virgin invited me to sup with her, and swore that her pocket had been picked by a justice of peace.

Miss W. Nay, that was not so bad as the Hamlet's Ghost that boxed with Henry the Eighth, and afterwards danced a hornpipe to the tune of Nancy Dawson. Ha, ha, ha! we follow you, Mrs. Belville. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Leeson's Chambers in the Temple.

Enter LEESON.

Lee. Where is this clerk of mine? Connolly!

Con. (Behind.) Here, sir.

Lees. Have you copied the marriage-settlement, as I corrected it?

Enter CONNOLLY, with pistols.

Con. Ay, honey, an hour ago.

Lee. What, you have been trying those pistols?

Con. By my soul, I have been firing them this half hour, without once being able to make them

Lee. They are plaguy dirty. [go off.]

Con. In troth! so they are; I strove to brighten them up a little, but some misfortune attends every thing I do, for the more I clane them the dirtier they are, honey.

Lee. You have had some of our usual daily visitors for money, I suppose?

Con. You may say that; and three or four of them are now hanging about the door, that I wish handsomely hanged anywhere else, for bodering us.

Lee. No joking, Connolly; my present situation is a very disagreeable one.

Con. Faith! and so it is; but who makes it disagreeable? Your aunt Tempest would let you have as much money as you please, but you won't condescend to be acquainted with her, though people in this country can be very intimate friends, without seeing one another's faces for seven years.

Lee. Do you think me base enough to receive a favour from a woman who has disgraced her family, and stoops to be a kept mistress? You see, my sister is already ruined by a connexion with her.

Con. Ah! sir, a good guinea isn't the worse for coming through a bad hand; if it was, what would become of us lawyers? And by my soul, many a high head in London would, at this minute, be very low, if they hadn't received favours even from much worse people than kept mistresses.

Lee. Others, Connolly, may prostitute their honour as they please; mine is my chief possession, and I must take particular care of it.

Con. Honour, to be sure, is a very fine thing, sir, but I don't see how it is to be taken care of, without a little money; your honour, to my knowledge, has'n't been in your own possession these two years, and the devil a crum can you honestly swear by, till you get it out of the hands of your creditors.

Lee. I have given you a licence to talk, Connolly, because I know you faithful; but I haven't given you a liberty to sport with my misfortunes.

Con. You know I'd die to serve you, sir; but of what use is your giving me leave to spake, if you oblige me to hould my tongue? 'tis out of pure love and affection that I put you in mind of your misfortunes.

Lee. Well, Connolly, a few days will, in all probability, enable me to redeem my honour, and to reward your fidelity; the lovely Emily, you know, has half consented to embrace the first opportunity of flying with me to Scotland, and the paltry trifles I owe, will not be missed in her fortune.

Con. But, dear sir, consider you are going to fight a duel this very evening, and if you should be kilt, I fancy you will find it a little difficult to run away afterwards with the lovely Emily.

Lee. If I fall, there will be an end to my misfortunes.

Con. But surely it will not be quite genteel, to go out of the world without paying your debts.

Lee. But how shall I stay in the world, Connolly, without punishing Belville for ruining my sister?

Con. Oh! the devil fly away with this honour; an ounce of common sense is worth a whole ship load of it, if we must prefer a bullet or a halter to a fine young lady and a great fortune.

Lee. We'll talk no more on the subject at present. Take this letter to Mr. Belville; deliver it into his own hand, be sure, and bring me an answer; make haste, for I shall not stir out till you come back.

Con. By my soul, I wish you may be able to stir out then, honey. Oh! but that's true,—

Lee. What's the matter?

Con. Why, sir, the gentleman I last lived clerk with, died lately and left me a legacy of twenty guineas.

Lee. What! is Mr. Stanley dead?

Con. 'Faith! his friends have behaved very unkindly if he is not, for they have buried him these

Lee. And what then? [six weeks.

Con. Why, sir, I received my little legacy this morning, and if you'd be so good as to keep it for me, I'd be much obliged to you.

Lee. Connolly, I understand you, but I am already shamefully in your debt: you've had no money from me this age.

Con. Oh, sir! that does not signify; if you are not kilt in this d—d duel, you'll be able enough to pay me; if you are, I sha'n't want it.

Lee. Why so, my poor fellow?

Con. Because, though I am but your clerk, and though I think fighting the most foolish thing upon earth, I'm as much a gentleman as yourself, and have as much right to commit a murder in the way of duelling. [Mr. Belville?

Lee. And what then? You have no quarrel with

Con. I shall have a d—d quarrel with him though if you are kilt; your death shall be revenged, depend upon it, so let that content you.

Lee. My dear Connolly, I hope I sha'n't want such a proof of your affection. How he distresses me! (Aside.)

Con. You will want a second, I suppose, in this affair; I stood second to my own brother, in the Fifteen Acres, and though that has made me detest the very thought of duelling ever since; yet if you want a friend, I'll attend you to the field of death with a great deal of satisfaction.

Lee. I thank you, Connolly, but I think it extremely wrong in any man who has a quarrel, to expose his friend to difficulties; we shouldn't seek for redress, if we are not equal to the task of fighting our own battles; and I choose you particularly to carry my letter, because you may be supposed ignorant of the contents, and thought to be acting only in the ordinary course of your business.

Con. Say no more about it, honey; I will be back with you presently. (Going, returns.) I put the twenty guineas in your pocket, before you were up, sir; and I don't believe you'd look for such a thing there, if I wasn't to tell you of it. [Exit.

Lee. This faithful, noble-hearted creature!—but let me fly from thought; the business I have to execute will not bear the test of reflection. [Exit.

Re-enter CONNOLLY.

Con. As this is a challenge, I shouldn't go without a sword; come down little tickle-pitcher. (Takes a sword.) Some people may think me very conceited now; but as the dirtiest black-legs in town can wear one without being stared at, I don't think it can suffer any disgrace by the side of an honest man. [Exit.

SCENE III.—An Apartment at Beleille's.

Enter MRS. BELVILLE.

Mrs. B. How strangely this affair of Mrs. Tempest hangs upon my spirits, though I have every reason, from the tenderness, the politeness, and the generosity of Mr. Belville, as well as from the woman's behaviour, to believe the whole charge the result of a disturbed imagination. Yet suppose it should be actually true?—Heigho!—Well, suppose it should? I would endeavour, I think I would endeavour, to keep my temper; a frowning face never recovered a heart that was not to be fixed with a smiling one; but women, in general, forget this grand article of the matrimonial creed entirely; the dignity of insulted virtue obliges them to play the fool, whenever their Corydons play the libertine; and they must pull down the house about the traitor's ears, though they are themselves to be crushed in pieces by the ruins.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Lady Rachel Mildew, madam. [Exit.

Enter LADY RACHEL MILDEW.

Lady R. My dear, how have you done since the little eternity of my last seeing you. Mr. Torrington is come to town, I hear.

Mrs. B. He is, and must be greatly flattered to find that your ladyship has made him the hero of your new comedy.

Lady R. Yes, I have drawn him as he is, an honest practitioner of the law, which is, I fancy, no very common character. [theatre.

Mrs. B. And it must be a vast acquisition to the Lady R. Yet the managers of both houses have refused my play, have refused it peremptorily; though I offered to make them a present of it.

Mrs. B. That's very surprising.

Lady R. They allege that the audiences are tired of crying at comedies; and insist that my "Despairing Shepherdess" is absolutely too dismal for representation. [lawyer in a new light?

Mrs. B. What, though you have introduced a

Lady R. Yes, and have a boarding-school romp that slaps her mother's face, and throws a bason of scalding water at her governess.

Mrs. B. Why, surely, these are capital jokes.

Lady R. But the managers can't find them out; however, I am determined to bring it out somewhere, and I have discovered such a treasure for my boarding-school romp, as exceeds the most sanguine expectation of criticism.

Mrs. B. How fortunate!

Lady R. Going to Mrs. Le Blond, my milliner's, this morning, to see some contraband silks, (for you know there's a foreign minister just arrived,)

I heard a loud voice rehearsing Juliet, from the dining-room; and, upon inquiry, found that it was a country girl just eloped from her friends in town, to go upon the stage with an Irish manager.

Mrs. B. Ten to one, the strange woman's niece who has been here this morning. (Aside.)

Lady R. Mrs. Le Blond has some doubts about the manager it seems, though she hasn't seen him yet, because the apartments are very expensive, and were taken by a fine gentleman out of livery.

Mrs. B. What am I to think of this? Pray, Lady Rachel, as you have conversed with this young actress, I suppose you could procure me a sight of her?

Lady R. This moment if you will, I am very intimate with her already; but pray keep the matter a secret from your husband, for he is so witty, you know, upon my passion for the drama, that I shall be teased to death by him.

Mrs. B. Oh! you may be very sure that your secret is safe, for I have a most particular reason to keep it from Mr. Belville; but he is coming this way with Captain Savage: let us, at present, avoid him. [Exeunt.]

Enter BELVILLE and CAPTAIN SAVAGE.

Capt. S. You are a very strange man, Belville; you are for ever tremblingly solicitous about the happiness of your wife, yet for ever endangering it by your passion for variety.

Bel. Why, there is certainly a contradiction between my principles and my practice; but, if ever you marry, you'll be able to reconcile it perfectly. Possession, Savage! Oh, possession is a miserable whether of the appetite in love! and I own myself so sad a fellow, that though I wouldn't exchange Mrs. Belville's mind for any woman's person on earth, there is scarcely a woman's person on earth, which is not to me a stronger object of attraction.

Capt. S. Then perhaps in a little time you'll be weary of Miss Leeson?

Bel. To be sure I shall; though, to own the truth, I have not yet carried my point conclusively with the little monkey.

Capt. S. Why how the plague has she escaped a moment, in your hands?

Bel. By a mere accident. She came to the lodgings, which my man Spruce prepared for her, rather unexpectedly last night, so that I happened to be engaged particularly in another quarter,—you understand me,—and the d—d aunt found me so much employment all the morning, that I could only send a message by Spruce, promising to call upon her the first moment I had to spare in the course of the day.

Capt. S. And so you are previously satisfied that you shall be tired of her.

Bel. Tired of her? Why I am at this moment in pursuit of fresh game, against the hour of satiety: Game, that you know to be exquisite! and I fancy I shall bring it down, though it is closely guarded by a deal of that pride which passes for virtue with the generality of your mighty good people.

Capt. S. Indeed! and may a body know this wonder?

Bel. You are to be trusted with anything, for you are the closest fellow I ever knew, and the rack itself would hardly make you discover one of your own secrets to anybody. What do you think of Miss Walsingham?

Capt. S. Miss Walsingham? Death and the devil. (Aside.)

Bel. Miss Walsingham.

Capt. S. Why, surely she has not received your addresses with any degree of approbation?

Bel. With every degree of approbation I could

Capt. S. She has? [expect.]

Bel. Ay; why, this news surprises you?

Capt. S. It does indeed!

Bel. Ha, ha, ha! I can't help laughing to think what a happy dog Miss Walsingham's husband is likely to be!

Capt. S. A very happy dog, truly.

Bel. She's a delicious girl, isn't she, Savage? But she'll require a little more trouble; for a fine woman, like a fortified town, to speak in your father's language, demands a regular siege; and we must even allow her the honours of war, to magnify the greatness of our own victory.

Capt. S. Well, it amazes me, how you gay fellows ever have the presumption to attack a woman of principle; Miss Walsingham has no apparent levity of any kind about her.

Bel. No; but she continued in my house, after I had whispered my passion in her ear, and gave me a second opportunity of addressing her improperly; what greater encouragement could I desire?

Enter SPRUCE.

Well, Spruce, what are your commands?

Spruce. My lady is just gone out with Lady Ra-

Bel. I understand you. [chel, sir.]

Spruce. I believe you do. (Aside.) [Exit.]

Capt. S. What is the English of these significant looks between Spruce and you?

Bel. Only that Miss Walsingham is left alone, and that I have now an opportunity of entertaining her. You must excuse me, Savage; you must, upon my soul; but not a word of this affair to anybody, because, when I shake her off my hands, there may be fools enough to think of her, upon terms of honourable matrimony. [Exit.]

Capt. S. So, here's a discovery! a precious discovery! and while I have been racking my imagination, and sacrificing my interest to promote the happiness of this woman, she has been listening to the addresses of a married man, the husband of her friend, and the immediate friend of her intended husband. By Belville's own account, however, she has not yet proceeded to any criminal lengths; but why did she keep the affair a secret from me? or why did she continue in his house after a repeated declaration of his unwarrantable attachment? What's to be done? If I open my engagement with her to Belville, I am sure he will instantly desist; but then her honour is left in a state extremely questionable. It shall be still concealed. While it remains unknown, Belville will himself tell me everything; and doubt, upon an occasion of this nature, is infinitely more insupportable than the downright falsehood of the woman whom we love. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in General Savage's House.

Enter GENERAL SAVAGE and TORRINGTON.

Gen. S. Zounds! Torrington, give me quarter, when I surrender up my sword: I own that for these twenty years, I have been suffering all the inconveniences of marriage, without tasting any one of its comforts, and rejoicing in an imaginary freedom, while I was really grovelling in chains.

Tor. In the dirtiest chains upon earth; yet you wouldn't be convinced, but laughed at all your married acquaintance as slaves, when not one of them put up with half so much from the worst wife as you were obliged to crouch under, from a kept mistress.

Gen. S. 'Tis too true; but you know she sacrificed much for me; you know that she was the widow of a colonel, and refused two very advantageous matches on my account.

Tor. If she was the widow of a judge, and had refused a high chancellor, she was still a devil incarnate, and you were, of course, a madman to live with her. [I have been sick.]

Gen. S. You don't remember her care of me when

Tor. I recollect, however, her usage of you in health, and you may easily find a tender nurse, when you are bound over by the gout or the rheumatism.

Gen. S. Well, well, I agree with you that she is a devil incarnate; but I am this day determined to part with her for ever.

Tor. Not you, indeed.

Gen. S. What, don't I know my own mind?

Tor. Not you, indeed, when she is in the question; with everybody else, your resolution is as unalterable as a determination in the house of peers; but Mrs. Tempest is your fate, and she reverses your decrees with as little difficulty as a fraudulent debtor now-a-days procures his certificate under a commission of bankruptcy.

Gen. S. Well, if, like the Roman Fabius, I conquer by delay, in the end, there will be no great reason to find fault with my generalship. The proposal of parting now comes from herself.

Tor. Oh! you daren't make it for the life of you.

Gen. S. You must know, that this morning we had a smart cannonading on Belville's account, and she threatens, as I told you before, to quit my house if I don't challenge him for taking away her niece.

Tor. That fellow is the very devil among the women, and yet there isn't a man in England fonder of his wife.

Gen. S. Poh! if the young minx hadn't surrendered to him, she would have capitulated to somebody else, and I shall, at this time, be doubly obliged to him, if he is anyways instrumental in getting the

Tor. Why at this time? [aunt off my hands.

Gen. S. Because, to shew you how fix'd my resolution is to be a keeper no longer, I mean to marry immediately.

Tor. And can't you avoid being pressed to death, like a felon who refuses to plead, without incurring a sentence of perpetual imprisonment?

Gen. S. I fancy you would, yourself, have no objection to a perpetual imprisonment in the arms of Miss Walsingham?

Tor. But have you any reason to think, that upon examination, in a case of love, she would give a favourable reply to your interrogatories?

Gen. S. The greatest; do you think I'd hazard such an engagement without being perfectly sure of my ground? Notwithstanding my present connexion won't suffer me to see a modest woman at my own house, she always treats me with particular attention whenever I visit at Belville's, or meet her anywhere else. If fifty young fellows are present, she directs all her assiduities to the old soldier, and my son has a thousand times told me that she professes the highest opinion of my understanding.

Tor. And truly you give a notable proof of your understanding, in thinking of a woman almost young enough to be your grand-daughter.

Gen. S. Nothing like an experienced chief to command in any garrison.

Tor. Recollect the state of your present citadel.

Gen. S. Well, if I am blown up by my own mine, I shall be the only sufferer. There's another thing I want to talk of, I am going to marry my son to Miss Moreland.

Tor. Miss Moreland!

Gen. S. Belville's sister.

Tor. Oh! ay, I remember that Moreland had got a good estate to assume the name of Belville.

Gen. S. I haven't yet mentioned the matter to my son, but I settled the affair with the girl's mother yesterday, and she only waits to communicate it to Belville, who is her oracle, you know.

Tor. And are you sure the captain will like her.

Gen. S. I am not so unreasonable as to insist upon his liking her, I shall only insist upon his marrying her.

Tor. What, whether he likes her or not?

Gen. S. When I issue my orders, I expect them to be obeyed; and don't look for an examination into their propriety.

Tor. What a delightful thing it must be to live under a military government, where a man is not to be troubled with the exercise of his understanding.

Gen. S. Miss Moreland has thirty thousand pounds; that's a large sum of ammunition money.

Tor. Ay, but a marriage merely on the score of fortune, is only gilding the death warrant sent down for the execution of a prisoner. However, as I know your obstinate attachment to what you once resolve, I sha'n't pretend to argue with you; where are the papers which you want me to consider?

Gen. S. They are in my library; file off with me to the next room and they shall be laid before you; but first I'll order the chariot, for the moment I have your opinion, I purpose to sit down regularly before Miss Walsingham. Who waits there?—[Enter a Servant.]—Is Mrs. Tempest at home?

Serv. Yes, sir, just come in, and just going out again. [ready.

Gen. S. Very well; order the chariot to be got Serv. Sir, one of the panels was broken last night at the Opera-house.

Gen. S. Sir, I didn't call to have the pleasure of your conversation, but to have obedience paid to my orders.

Tor. Go order the chariot, you blockhead.

Serv. With the broken panel, sir?

Gen. S. Yes, you rascal, if both panels were broken, and the back shattered to pieces.

Serv. The coachman thinks that one of the wheels is damaged, sir.

Gen. S. Don't attempt to reason, you dog, but execute your orders. Bring the chariot without the wheels, if you can't bring it with them.

Tor. Ay, bring it, if you reduce it to a sledge, and let your master look like a malefactor for high treason, on his journey to Tyburn.

Enter MRS. TEMPEST.

Mrs. T. General Savage, is the house to be for ever a scene of noise with your domineering? The chariot sha'n't be brought; it won't be fit for use till it is repaired, and John shall drive it this very minute to the coachmaker's. [another thing.

Gen. S. Nay, my dear, if it isn't fit for use, that's

Tor. Here's the experienced chief, that's fit to command in any garrison! (Aside.)

Gen. S. Go order me the coach, then. (To Serv.)

Mrs. T. You can't have the coach.

Gen. S. And why so, my love?

Mrs. T. Because I want it for myself. Robert, get a hack for your master—though, indeed, I don't see what business he has out of the house.

[Exit, with Servant.

Tor. When you issue your orders, you expect them to be obeyed, and don't look for an examination into their propriety.

Gen. S. The fury! this has steeled me against her for ever, and nothing on earth can now prevent me from drumming her out immediately.

Mrs. T. (Without.) An unreasonable old fool! but I'll make him know who governs this house.

Gen. S. Zounds! here she comes again; she has been lying in ambuscade, I suppose, and has overheard us. [for ever.

Tor. What if she has? you are steeled against her

Gen. S. No, she's not coming, she's going down stairs; and now, dear Torrington, you must be as silent as a sentinel on an out-post about this affair. If that virago were to hear a syllable of it, she might perhaps attack Miss Walsingham in her very camp, and defeat my whole plan of operations.

Tor. I thought you were determined to drum her out immediately. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—Belville's House.

Enter MISS WALSHINGHAM, followed by BELVILLE.

Miss W. I beg, sir, that you will insult me no longer with solicitations of this nature ; give me proofs of your sincerity, indeed ! What proofs of sincerity can your situation admit of, if I could be even weak enough to think of you with partiality at all ?

Bel. If our affections, madam, were under the government of our reason, circumstanced as I am, this unhappy bosom wouldn't be torn by passion for Miss Walsingham. Had I been blessed with your acquaintance before I saw Mrs. Belville, my hand as well as my heart would have been humbly offered to your acceptance—fate, however, has ordered it otherwise, and it is cruel to reproach me with that situation as a crime, which ought to be pitied as my greatest misfortune.

Miss W. He's actually forcing tears into his eyes ! however, I'll mortify him severely. (Aside.)

Bel. But such proofs of sincerity as my situation can admit of, you shall yourself command, as my only business in existence is to adore you.

Miss W. His only business in existence to adore me ! (Aside.)

Bel. Prostrate at your feet, my dearest Miss Walsingham (kneeling,) behold a heart eternally devoted to your service. You have too much good sense, madam, to be the slave of custom, and too much humanity not to pity the wretchedness you have caused. Only, therefore, say that you commiserate my sufferings, I'll ask no more, and surely that may be said, without any injury to your purity, to snatch even an enemy from distraction. Where's my handkerchief ? (Aside.)

Miss W. Now to answer in his own way, and to make him ridiculous to himself. (Aside.) If I thought, if I could think (affecting to weep) that that these protestations were real,—

Bel. How can you, madam, be so unjust to your own merit ? how can you be so cruelly doubtful of my solemn asseverations ? Here I again kneel, and swear eternal love.

Miss W. I don't know what to say ; but there is one proof,—(Affecting to weep.)

Bel. Name it, my angel, this moment, and make me the happiest of mankind !

Miss W. Swear to be mine for ever.

Bel. I have sworn it a thousand times, my charmer ; and I will swear it to the last moment of my life.

Miss W. Why, then—but don't look at me I beseech you ; I don't know how to speak it.

Bel. The delicious emotion—do not check the generous tide of tenderness that fills me with such extasy.

Miss W. You'll despise me for this weakness.

Bel. This weakness—this generosity, which will demand my everlasting gratitude.

Miss W. I am a fool ; but there is a kind of fatality in this affair—I do consent to go off with you.

Bel. Eternal blessings on your condescension.

Miss W. You are irresistible, and I am ready to fly with you to any part of the world.

Bel. Fly to any part of the world, indeed ! you shall fly by yourself, then. (Aside.) You are the most lovely, the most tender creature in the world, and thus again let me thank you. Oh ! Miss Walsingham, I cannot express how happy you've made me ! But where's the necessity of our leaving England ?

Miss W. I thought he wouldn't like to go abroad. (Aside.) That I may possess the pleasure of your company unrival'd.

Bel. I must cure her of this taste for travelling. (Aside.)

Miss M. You don't answer, Mr. Belville ?

Bel. Why I was turning the consequence of your proposal in my thoughts, as going off—going off—you know.

Miss W. Why going off, you know, is going off ; and what objections can you have to going off ?

Bel. Why going off, will subject you, at a certainty, to the slander of the world ; whereas, by staying at home, we may not only have numberless opportunities of meeting, but at the same time prevent suspicion itself from ever breathing on your reputation.

Miss W. I didn't dream of your starting any difficulties, sir. Just now I was dearer to you than all the world.

Bel. And so you are, by heaven !

Miss W. Why won't you sacrifice the world, then, at once, to obtain me ?

Bel. Surely, my dearest life, you must know the necessity which every man of honour is under, of keeping up his character ?

Miss W. So, here's this fellow swearing to ten thousand lies, and yet talking very gravely about his honour and his character. (Aside.) Why, to be sure, in these days, Mr. Belville, the instances of conjugal infidelity are so very scarce, and men of fashion are so remarkable for a tender attachment to their wives, that I don't wonder at your circumspection. But do you think I can stoop to accept you by halves, or admit of any partnership in your heart ?

Bel. Oh ! you must do more than that, if you have anything to say to me. (Aside.) Surely, madam, when you know my whole soul unalterably your own, you will permit me to preserve those appearances with the world, which are indispensably requisite. Mrs. Belville is a most excellent woman, however it may be my fortune to be devoted to another. Her happiness, besides, constitutes a principal part of my felicity, and if I were publicly to forsake her, I should be hunted as a monster from society.

Miss W. Then, I suppose, it is by way of promoting Mrs. Belville's repose, sir, that you make love to other women ; and, by way of shewing the nicety of your honour, that you attempt the purity of such as your own roof, peculiarly, entitles to protection. For the honour intended to me—thus low to the ground, I thank you, Mr. Belville.

Bel. Laughed at, by all the stings of mortification !

Miss W. Good b'ye ; don't let this accident mortify your vanity too much ; but take care, the next time you vow everlasting love, that the object is neither tender enough to sob—sob—at your distress, nor provoking enough to make a proposal of leaving England. How greatly a little common sense can lower these fellows of extraordinary impudence !

[Exit.]

Bel. So, then, I am fairly taken in, and she has been only diverting herself with me all this time ; however, lady fair, I may chance to have the laugh in a little time on my side ; for if you can sport in this manner about the flame, I think it must, in the run, lay hold of your wings. What shall I do in this affair ? She sees the matter in its true light, and there's no good to be expected from thumping of bosoms, or squeezing white handkerchiefs ;—no, these won't do with women of sense, and in a short time, they'll be ridiculous to the very babies of a boarding-school.

Enter CAPTAIN SAVAGE.

Capt. S. Well, Belville, what news ? You have had a fresh opportunity with Miss Walsingham.

Bel. Why, 'faith ! Savage, I've had a most extraordinary scene with her, and yet have but little reason to brag of my good fortune, though she offered in express terms to run away with me.

Capt. S. Pr'ythee explain yourself, man ; she couldn't surely be so shameless !

Bel. Oh ! her offering to run away with me, was by no means the worst part of the affair.

Capt. S. No, then it must be d—d bad, indeed ; but pr'ythee hurry to an explanation.

Bel. Why, then, the worst part of the affair is, that she was laughing at me the whole time, and made this proposal of an elopement, with no other view than to shew me in strong colours to myself, as a very dirty fellow to the best wife in England.

Capt. S. I am easy. (Aside.)

Enter SPRUCE.

Spruce. Sir, there is an Irish gentleman below with a letter for you, who will deliver it to nobody Bel. Shew him up, then. [but yourself.

Spruce. Yes, sir. [Exit.

Capt. S. It may be on business, Belville; I'll take my leave of you.

Bel. Oh! by no means; I can have no business which I desire to keep from you, though you are the arrantest miser of your confidence upon earth, and would rather trust your life in anybody's hands than even a paltry amour with the apprentice of a milliner.

Enter CONNOLLY.

Con. Gentlemin, your most obadient; pray, which of you is Mr. Belville?

Bel. My name is Belville, at your service, sir.

Con. I have a little bit of a letter for you, sir.

Bel. (Reads.) "Sir,—The people where Miss Leeson lately lodged, asserting positively, that you have taken her away in a fictitious character, the brother of that unhappy girl thinks himself obliged to demand satisfaction, for the injury which you have done his family. Though a stranger to your person, he is sufficiently acquainted with your reputation for spirit, and shall, therefore, make no doubt of seeing you with a case of pistols, near the Ring in Hyde Park, at eight o'clock this evening, to answer the claims of"

"To Craggs Belville, Esq." GEORGE LEESON.

Capt. S. Eight o'clock in the evening! 'tis a strange time!

Con. Why so, honey? A fine evening is as good a time for a bad action as a fine morning; and if a man of sense can be such a fool as to fight a duel, he should never sleep upon the matter, for the more he thinks of it, the more he must feel himself ashamed of his resolution.

Bel. A pretty letter!

Con. Oh! yes, an invitation to a brace of bullets is a very pretty thing. [written.

Bel. For a challenge, however, 'tis very civilly

Con. 'Faith! if it was written to me, I shouldn't be very fond of such civility; I wonder he doesn't sign himself your most obedient servant.

Capt. S. I told you Leeson's character, and what would become of this d—d business; but your affairs, are they settled, Belville?

Bel. Oh! they are always settled; for as this is a country where people occasionally die, I take constant care to be prepared for contingencies.

Con. Occasionally die! I'll be very much obliged to you, sir, if you tell me the country where people do not die; for I'll immediately go and end

Bel. Ha, ha, ha! [my days there.

Con. 'Faith! you may laugh, gentlemin, but though I am a foolish Irishman and come about a foolish piece of business, I'd prefer a snug birth in this world, bad as it is, to the finest coffin in all Christendom.

Bel. I am surprised, sir, that thinking in this manner, you would be the bearer of a challenge.

Con. And well you may, sir; but we must often take a pleasure in serving our friends, by doing things that are very disagreeable to us.

Capt. S. Then you think Mr. Leeson much to blame, perhaps, for hazarding his life where he can by no means repair the honour of his sister.

Con. Indeed and I do; but I shall think this gentleman, begging his pardon, much more to blame for meeting him. [disappoint your friend?

Bel. And why so, sir? You wouldn't have me

Con. 'Faith! and that I would; he, poor lad, may have some reason, at present, to be tired of the world, but you have a fine estate, a fine wife, a fine parcel of children. In short, honey, you have everything to make you fond of living, and the devil burn me, were I in your case, if I'd stake my own happiness against the misery of any man.

Bel. I am very much obliged to your advice, sir, though on the present occasion I cannot adopt it. Be so good as to present my compliments to your friend, and tell him I shall certainly do myself the honour of attending his appointment.

Con. Why, then, upon my soul, I am very sorry for it.

Capt. S. 'Tis not very customary, sir, with gentlemen of Ireland to oppose an affair of honour.

Con. They are like the gentlemin of England, sir, they are brave to a fault; yet I hope to see the day that it will be infamous to draw the swords of either, against anybody but the enemies of their country. [Exit.

Bel. I am quite charmed with this honest Hibernian, and would almost fight a duel for the pleasure of his acquaintance.

Capt. S. Come, step with me a little, and let us consider whether there may not be some method of accomodating this cursed business.

Bel. Poh! don't be uneasy upon my account; my character, with regard to affairs of this nature, is, unhappily, too well established, and you may be sure that I sha'n't fight with Leeson.

Capt. S. No! you have injured him greatly.

Bel. The very reason, of all others, why I should not cut his throat. [Exeunt.

Enter SPRUCE.

Spruce. What, the devil, this master of mine has got a duel upon his hands! Zounds! I am sorry for that; he is a prince of a fellow, and a good subject must always love his prince, though he may now and then be a little out of humour with his actions.

Enter GENERAL SAYAGE.

Gen. S. Your hall-door standing open, Spruce, and none of your sentinels being on guard, I have surprised your camp thus far without resistance. Where is your master?

Spruce. Just gone out with Captain Savage, sir.

Gen. S. Is your lady at home?

Spruce. No, sir, but Miss Walsingham is at home; shall I inform her of your visit?

Gen. S. There is no occasion to inform her of it, for here she is, Spruce. [Exit Spruce.

Enter MISS WALSHINGHAM.

Miss W. General Savage, your most humble servant.

Gen. S. My dear Miss Walsingham, it is rather cruel that you should be left at home by yourself, and yet I am greatly rejoiced to find you at present without company.

Miss W. I can't but think myself in the best company, when I have the honour of your conversation, General.

Gen. S. You flatter me too much, madam; yet I am come to talk to you on a serious affair, Miss Walsingham; an affair of importance to me and to yourself. Have you leisure to favour me with a short audience, if I beat a parley?

Miss W. Anything of importance to you, sir, is always sufficient to command my leisure. 'Tis as the Captain suspected. (Aside.)

Gen. S. You tremble, my lovely girl, but don't be alarmed; for though my business is of an important nature, I hope it won't be of a disagreeable one.

Miss W. And yet I am greatly agitated. (Aside.)

Gen. S. Soldiers, Miss Walsingham, are said to be generally favoured by the kind partiality of the ladies.

Miss W. The ladies are not without gratitude, sir, to those who devote their lives peculiarly to the service of their country.

Gen. S. Generously said, madam; then give me leave, without any masked battery, to ask, if the heart of an honest soldier is a prize at all worth your acceptance.

Miss W. Upon my word, sir, there's no masked battery in this question.

Gen. S. I am as fond of a coup de main, madam, in love, as in war, I hate the tedious method of sapping a town, when there is a possibility of entering sword in hand.

Gen. W. Why, really, sir, a woman may as well know her own mind, when she is first summoned by the trumpet of a lover, as when she undergoes all the tiresome formality of a siege. You see, I have caught your own mode of conversing, General.

Gen. S. And a very great compliment I consider it, madam; but now that you have candidly confessed an acquaintance with your own mind, answer me with that frankness for which everybody admires you so much. Have you any objection to change the name of Walsingham?

Miss W. Why, then, frankly, General Savage, I say, no. [declaration.]

Gen. S. Ten thousand thanks to you for this kind

Miss W. I hope you won't think it a forward one.

Gen. S. I'd sooner see my son run away in the day of battle; I'd sooner think Lord Russell was bribed by Louis the XIVth, and sooner vilify the memory of Algernon Sidney.

Miss W. How unjust it was ever to suppose the General a tyrannical father! (Aside.)

Gen. S. You have told me condescendingly, Miss Walsingham, that you have no objection to change your name; I have but one question more

Miss W. Pray propose it. [to ask.]

Gen. S. Would the name of Savage be disagreeable to you? Speak frankly again, my dear girl!

Miss W. Why, then, again, I frankly say, no.

Gen. S. You make me too happy; and though I shall readily own, that a proposal of this nature would come with more propriety from my son—

Miss W. I am much better pleased that you make the proposal yourself, sir.

Gen. S. You are too good to me. Torrington thought that I should meet with a repulse. (Aside.)

Miss W. Have you communicated this business to the Captain, sir?

Gen. S. No, my dear madam, I did not think that at all necessary. I have always been attentive to the Captain's happiness, and I propose that he shall be married in a few days.

Miss W. What, whether I will or no?

Gen. S. Oh! you can have no objection.

Miss W. I must be consulted, however, about the day, General; but nothing in my power shall be wanting to make him happy.

Gen. S. Obliging loveliness!

Miss W. You may imagine that if I were not previously impressed in favour of your proposal, it would not have met my concurrence so readily.

Gen. S. Then you own that I had a previous friend in the garrison?

Miss W. I don't blush to acknowledge it, when I consider the accomplishments of the object, sir.

Gen. S. Oh! this is too much, madam; the principal merit of the object is his passion for Miss Walsingham.

Miss W. Don't say that, General, I beg of you; for I don't think there are many women in the kingdom who could behold him with indifference.

Gen. S. Ah! you flattering, flattering angel! and yet, by the memory of Marlborough, my lovely girl, it was the idea of a prepossession on your part, which encouraged me to hope for a favourable reception.

Miss W. Then I must have been very indiscreet, for I laboured to conceal that prepossession as much as possible.

Gen. S. You couldn't conceal it from me; you couldn't conceal it from me. The female heart is a field which I am thoroughly acquainted with, and which has, more than once, been a witness to my victories, madam.

Miss W. I don't at all doubt your success with the ladies, General; but as we now understand one another so perfectly, you will give me leave to retire.

Gen. S. One word, my dear creature, and no more; I shall wait upon you sometime to-day, with Mr. Torrington, about the necessary settlements.

Miss W. You must do as you please, General; you are invincible in everything.

Gen. S. And if you please, we'll keep everything a profound secret till the articles are all settled, and the definitive treaty ready for execution.

Miss W. You may be sure that delicacy will not suffer me to be communicative on the subject, sir.

Gen. S. Then you leave everything to my management.

Miss W. I can't trust a more noble negociator.

[Exit.]

Gen. S. The day's my own. (Sings.) "Britons, strike home! strike home! Revenge," &c. [Exit.]

ACT III.—SCENE I.—Miss Leeson's Lodgings.

Enter LADY RACHEL MILDEW, MRS. BELVILLE, and MISS LEESON.

Lady R. Well, Mrs. Belville, I am extremely glad you agree with me in opinion of this young lady's qualifications for the stage. Don't you think she'd play Miss Headstrong admirably in my comedy?

Mrs. B. Yes, indeed, I think she possesses a natural fund of spirit, very much adapted to the character. 'Tis impossible, surely, that this hoyden can have a moment's attraction for Mr. Belville. (Aside.)

Miss L. You are very obliging, ladies; but I have no turn for comedy, my forte is tragedy entirely. "Alphonso! Oh! Alphonso, to thee I call."

Lady R. But, my dear, are there none of our comedies to your taste?

Miss L. Oh! yes; some of the sentimental ones are very pretty; there's such little difference between them and tragedies.

Lady R. And pray, my dear, how long have you been engaged to Mr. Frankly?

Miss L. I only came away last night, and have not seen Mr. Frankly since, though I expect him every moment. [tioned. (Aside.)]

Mrs. B. Last night! Just as Mrs. Tempest men-

Lady R. You had the concurrence of your friends?

Miss L. Not I, madam. Mr. Frankly said I had too much genius to mind my friends, and as I should want nothing from them, there was no occasion to consult them in the affair. [perhaps?]

Lady R. Then Osbaldiston is not your real name,

Miss L. Oh! no; nor do I tell my real name: I chose Osbaldiston because it was a long one, and would make a striking appearance in the bills.

Mrs. B. I wish we could see Mr. Frankly.

Miss L. Perhaps you may, madam; for he designs to give me a lesson every day, till we are ready to set off for Ireland.

Lady R. Suppose, then, my dear, you would oblige us with a scene in Juliet, by way of shewing your proficiency to Mrs. Belville.

Miss L. Will you stand up for Romeo?

Lady R. With all my heart, and I'll give you some instructions.

Miss L. I beg pardon, ma'am; I'll learn to act under nobody but Mr. Frankly. This room is without a carpet; if you will step into the next, ladies, I'll endeavour to oblige you. "Shall I not be environed, distraught"—This way, ladies.

Lady R. Pray, madam, shew us the way.

[Exit with Miss Lee.]

Mrs. B. I'll prolong this mummery as much as possible, in hopes the manager may come. Lie still, poor, fluttering heart, it cannot be the lord of all your wishes; it cannot, surely, be your adored Belville! [Exit.]

Re-enter MISS LEESON.

Miss Lee. Haven't I left my Romeo and Juliet here? Oh! yes, there it is.

Enter BELVILLE.

Bel. "Oh! were those eyes in heav'n,
They'd thro' the starry regions stream so bright,
That birds would sing, and think it was the morn."

Miss L. Ah! my dear Mr. Frankly, I am so glad you are come! I was dying to see you.

Bel. Kiss me, my dear: why didn't you send me word of your intention to come away last night?

Miss L. I hadn't time; but as I knew where the lodgings were, I thought I should be able to find you by a note to the coffee-house I always directed to.

Bel. Kiss me again, my little sparkler.

Miss L. Nay, I won't be kissed in this manner; for though I am going on the stage, I intend to have some regard for my character. But—ha, ha!—I am glad you are come now: I have company above stairs.

Bel. Company! that's unlucky at this time, for I wanted to make you entirely easy about your character. (Aside.) And pray, my dear, who is your company? You know we must be very cautious for fear of your relations.

Miss L. Oh! they are only ladies. But one of them is the most beautiful creature in the world.

Bel. The devil she is! [heaven's light.]

Miss L. "An earth-treading star, that makes dim

Bel. Zounds! I'll take a peep at the star, who knows but I may have an opportunity of making another actress? (Aside.)

Miss L. Come, charmer, charmer!

Bel. "Wert thou as far
As that vast shore, wash'd by the farthest sea,
I would adventure for such merchandize." Now let's see what fortune has sent us above stairs.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Dining-room at Miss Leeson's.

MRS. BELVILLE and LADY RACHEL discovered.

Mrs. B. This is a most ignorant young creature, Lady Rachel.

Lady R. Why, I think she is: did you observe how she slighted my offer of instructing her?

Enter MISS LEESON.

Miss L. Ladies, ladies! here he is; here is Mr. Frankly.—[Enter BELVILLE, bowing very low.]

Bel. Ladies, your most obedient.

Mrs. B. Let me, if possible, recollect myself. Sir, your most obedient, humble servant.

Bel. Zounds! let me out of the house.

Lady R. What do I see?

Miss L. You seem, ladies, to know this gentleman.

Mrs. B. (Detaining him.) You sha'n't go, renegade. You laughed at my credulity this morning, and I must now laugh at your embarrassment.

Bel. What a kind thing it would be in anybody to blow out my stupid brains? [my comedy.]

Lady R. I'll mark this down for an incident in Miss L. What do you hang your head for, Mr. Frankly?

Bel. Be so good as to ask that lady, my dear. The devil has been long in my debt, and now he pays me home with a witness.

Mrs. B. What a cruel thing it is to let Mrs. Tempest out, my love, without somebody to take care of her! [madam?]

Miss L. What, do you know Mrs. Tempest,

Mrs. B. Yes, my dear; and I am pretty well acquainted with this gentleman.

Miss L. What, isn't this gentleman the manager of a play-house in Ireland?

Bel. The curtain is almost dropped, my dear; the farce is nearly over, and you'll be speedily acquainted with the catastrophe.—[Enter MRS. TEMPEST.]

Mrs. T. Yes, sir, the curtain is almost dropped; I have had spies to watch your haunts, and the catastrophe ends in your detection. Come, you abandoned slut—

[brought upon the stage?]

Miss L. And have I eloped, after all, without being

Mrs. T. I don't know that you would be brought upon the stage, but I am sure you were near being brought upon the town. I hope, madam, for the future, you'll set me down a mad woman. (To Mrs. B.)

Mrs. B. Mr. Belville, you'll make my apologies to this lady, and acknowledge that I think her perfectly in her senses.

Bel. I wish that I had entirely lost mine.

Lady R. (Writing.) "I wish that I had entirely lost mine." A very natural wish, in such a situation.

Mrs. T. Come, you audacious minx, come away. You shall be sent into Yorkshire this very evening; and see what your poor mother will say to you, hussey.

Miss L. I will go on the stage if I die for't; and 'tis some comfort there's a play-house at York.

[Exit with Mrs. T.]

Bel. Nancy, I am so ashamed, so humbled, and so penitent, that if you knew what passes here, I am sure you would forgive me.

Mrs. B. My love, though I cannot say I rejoice in your infidelity, yet, believe me, I pity your distress: let us, therefore, think no more of this.

Lady R. (Writing.) "And think no more of this." This conduct is new in a wife, and very dramatic.

Bel. Where, my angel, have you acquired so many requisites to charm with?

Mrs. B. In your society, my dear; and, believe me, that a wife may be as true a friend as any bottle companion upon earth, though she can neither get merry with you overnight, nor blow out your brains about some foolish quarrel in the morning.

Bel. If wives knew the omnipotence of virtue, where she wears a smile upon her face, they'd all follow your bewitching example, and make a faithless husband quite an incredible character.

Lady R. (Writing.) "Quite an incredible character." Let me set down that. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—General Savage's House.

Enter GENERAL SAVAGE and CAPTAIN SAVAGE.

Gen. S. Yes, Horace, I have been just visiting at Belville's. [Walsingham?]

Capt. S. You found nobody at home but Miss

Gen. S. No; but I'd a long conversation with her, and upon a very interesting subject.

Capt. S. 'Tis as I guessed. (Aside.)

Gen. S. She is a most amiable creature, Horace.

Capt. S. So she is, sir, and will make any man happy that marries her.

Gen. S. I am glad you think so.

Capt. S. He's glad I think so! 'tis plain; but I must leave everything to himself, and seem wholly passive in this affair. (Aside.)

Gen. S. A married life, after all, Horace, I am now convinced is the most happy, as well as the

Capt. S. It is, indeed, sir. [most reputable.]

Gen. S. Then, perhaps, you would have no objection to be married, if I offered you as agreeable a young woman as Miss Walsingham.

Capt. S. 'Twould be my first pride on every occasion, sir, to pay an implicit obedience to your commands.

Gen. S. That's sensibly said, Horace, and obligingly said; prepare yourself, therefore, for an introduction to the lady in the morning.

Capt. S. Is the lady prepared to receive me, sir?

Gen. S. Oh! yes; and you can't think how highly delighted Miss Walsingham appeared, when I acquainted her with my resolution on the subject.

Capt. S. She's all goodness.

Gen. S. The more I know her, the more I am charmed with her. I must not be explicit with him yet, for fear my secret should get wind, and reach the ears of the enemy. (Aside.) I propose, Horace, that you should be married immediately.

Capt. S. The sooner the better, sir, I have no will but your's.

Gen. S. (Shaking hands with him.) By the memory of Marlborough, you are a most excellent boy. But what do you think? Miss Walsingham insists upon naming the day. [make it a distant one.]

Capt. S. And welcome, sir, I am sure she won't

Gen. S. Oh! she said that nothing in her power should be wanting to make you happy.

Capt. S. I am sure of that, sir. (A loud knocking.)

Gen. S. Zounds! Horace, here's the disgrace and punishment of my life; let's avoid her as we would a fever in the camp.

Capt. S. Come to the library, and I'll tell you how whimsically she was treated this morning at Belville's.

Gen. S. Death and the devil! make haste. Oh! I must laugh at marriage, and be cursed to me! But I am providing, Horace, against your falling into my error.

Capt. S. I am eternally indebted to you, sir.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.

Enter MRS. BELVILLE and LADY RACAEI MILDEW.

Lady R. Nay, Mrs. Belville, I have no patience, you act quite unnaturally. [serable?]

Mrs. B. What, because I am unwilling to be mi-

Lady R. This new instance of Mr. Belville's infidelity—this attempt to seduce Miss Walsingham, which your woman overheard, is unpardonable.

Mrs. B. I don't say but that I am strongly wounded by his irregularities. Yet, if Mr. Belville is unhappily a rover, I would much rather that he should have twenty mistresses than one.

Lady R. You astonish me.

Mrs. B. Why, don't you know, my dear madam, that while he is divided amidst a variety of objects, 'tis impossible for him to have a serious attachment?

Lady R. Lord! Mrs. Belville, how can you speak with so much composure! a virtuous woman should be always outrageous upon such an occasion as this.

Mrs. B. What, and weary the innocent sun and moon from the firmament, like a despairing princess in a tragedy? No, no, Lady Rachel; 'tis bad enough to be indifferent to the man I love, without studying to excite his aversion.

Lady R. How glad I am that Miss Walsingham made him so heartily ashamed of himself! Lord! these young men are so full of levity! Give me a husband of Mr. Torrington's age, say I.

Mrs. B. And give me a husband of Mr. Belville's, say I, with all his follies. However, Lady Rachel, I am pretty well satisfied that my conduct at Miss Leeson's will have a proper effect upon Mr. Belville's generosity, and put an entire end to his galantries for the future.

Lady R. Don't deceive yourself, my dear. The gods in the shilling gallery would sooner give up Roast Beef, or go without an epilogue on the first night of a new piece. [as Mr. Belville?]

Mrs. B. Why should you think so of such a man

Lady R. Because Mr. Belville is a man. However, if you dare run the risk, we will try the sincerity of his reformation. [my soul upon his honour.]

Mrs. B. If I dare run the risk! I would stake

Lady R. Then your poor soul would be in a very terrible situation.

Mrs. B. By what test can we prove his sincerity?

Lady R. By a very simple one. You know I write so like Miss Walsingham, that our hands are scarcely

Mrs. B. Well— [known asunder.]

Lady R. Why, then, let me write to him as from her. [doubt of his honour.]

Mrs. B. If I did not think it would look like a Lady R. Poh! Dare you proceed upon my plan?

Mrs. B. Most confidently. Come to my dressing-room, where you'll find everything ready for writing, and then you may explain your scheme more particularly.

Lady R. I'll attend you; but I am really sorry, my dear, for the love of propriety, to see you so calm under the perfidy of your husband; you should be quite wretched, indeed you should. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—The Temple.

Enter LEESON.

Lee. The hell-hounds are after me.—[Enter CONNOLLY.—Fly, open the chambers this moment, the bailiffs are in sight.]

Con. 'Faith, and that I will; but it will be of no use to fly a step if I haven't the key.

Lee. Zounds! did not you lock the door?

Con. Yes; but I believe I left the key on the inside. However, I see no more than three people, and I think we could beat them to their hearts' content in three minutes.

Lee. What, and fly in the face of the law?

Con. To be sure you have a great regard for the law, when you are going to fight a duel.

Lee. 'Sdeath! is this a time to talk? Stay here, and throw every possible impediment in the way of these execrable rascals. (Going.)

Con. Holloa! honey, come back. These execrable rascals are very worthy people, I fancy, for they are quietly turning down the next court. [sure.]

Lee. Their appearance alarmed me beyond mea-

Con. Oh! you shouldn't judge by outside shew, my dear; for there is no being a complete rogue, without the appearance of an honest man.

Lee. Circumstanced as I am at present, everything terrifies me; for should I be arrested, the consequence would possibly be fatal, both to my honour and my love. Belville would proclaim me publicly a coward; and Emily set me down as a base, a mercenary adventurer, who was solely attracted by her fortune.

Con. Why, 'faith! honey, like yourself, they might be apt to judge by appearances.

Lee. Oh! Connolly, a man of spirit should learn prudence from his very pride, and consider every unnecessary debt he contracts as a wanton diminution of his character: the moment he makes another his creditor, he makes himself a slave. He runs the hazard of insults which he never can resent, and of disgraces which are seldom to be mitigated. He incurs the danger of being dragged, like the vilest felon to the felon's prison; and, such is the depravity of the world, that guilt is even more likely to meet with advocates, than misfortune. [Exit.]

Con. Musha! long life to you, ould Shillala! I wish I had anything besides my carcase to venture for you, for that's nothing; yet you are as welcome to it as the flowers in May. Poor lad! I don't wonder that he is so much afraid of a prison, for, to be sure, it is a blessed place to live in; and a blessed law it must be which coops a man up from every chance of getting money, by way of making him pay his debts. But now let my thick skull consider, if there is any method of preventing this infernal duel. Suppose I have him bound over to the peace. No, that will never do; it would be a shameful thing for a gentleman to keep the peace! besides, I must appear in the business; and people may think, from my connexion with him, that he has not honour enough to throw away his life. Suppose I go another way to work, and send an anonymous letter about the affair to Mrs. Belville: they say, though she is a woman of fashion, that no creter upon earth can be fonder of her husband. Surely, the good genius of Ireland put this scheme into my head. I'll about it this minute; and if there's only one of them kept from the field, I don't think that the other can be much hurt when there will be nobody to fight with him. [Exit.]

SCENE V.—Captain Savage's Lodgings.

Enter CAPTAIN SAVAGE and BELVILLE.

Capt. S. Why, 'faith! Belville, your detection, and so speedily, too, after all the pretended sanctity of the morning, must have thrown you into a most humiliating situation.

Bel. Into the most distressing one you can imagine: had my wife raved at my falsehood, in the customary manner, I could have brazened it out pretty tolerably; but the angel-like sweetness with which she bore the mortifying discovery, planted daggers in my bosom, and made me, at that time, wish her the veriest vixen in the whole creation.

Capt. S. Yet, the suffering forbearance of a wife, is a quality for which she is seldom allowed her merit; we think it her duty to put up with our falsehood, and imagine ourselves exceedingly generous in the main, if we practise no other method of breaking her heart.

Bel. Monstrous, monstrous! from this moment I bid an everlasting adieu to my vices; the generosity of my dear girl—[Enter a Servant.]

Serv. (To Bel.) Here's a letter, sir, which Mr. Spruce has brought you.

Bel. Give me leave, Savage. Zounds! what an industrious devil the father of darkness is, when the moment a man determines upon a good action, he sends such a thing as this to stagger his resolution.

Capt. S. What have you got there?

Bel. You shall know presently. Will you let Spruce come in? [mony?

Capt. S. Where have you acquired all this cere-

Bel. Bid Spruce come in.

Serv. Yes, sir. [Exit.

Capt. S. Is that another challenge?

Bel. 'Tis, upon my soul, but it came from a beautiful enemy, and dares me to give a meeting to Miss Capt. S. How! [Walsingham.

Enter SPRUCE.

Bel. Pray, Spruce, who gave you this letter?

Spruce. Wiss Walsingham's woman, sir: she said it was about very particular business, and therefore I wouldn't trust it by any of the footmen.

Capt. S. Oh! d— your diligence! (Aside.)

Bel. You may go home, Spruce.

Spruce. Is there no answer necessary, sir?

Bel. I shall call at home myself, and give the necessary answer.

Spruce. What can be the matter with him all of a sudden, that he is so cold upon the scent of wickedness? [Aside, and exit.

Capt. S. And what answer do you propose making to it, Belville?

Bel. Read the letter, and then tell me what I should do. You know Miss Walsingham's hand.

Capt. S. Oh! perfectly. This is not—yes, it is her hand. I have too many cursed occasions to know it. (Aside.) [the letter.

Bel. What are you a muttering about? Read

Capt. S. (Reads.) "If you are not entirely discouraged, by our last conversation, from renewing the subject which then gave offence"—

Bel. Which then gave offence! You see, Savage, that it is not offensive any longer.

Capt. S. 'Sdeath! you put me out. (Reads.) "You may, at the masquerade, this evening"—

Bel. You remember how earnest she was for the masquerade party.

Capt. S. Yes, yes, I remember it well. And I remember, also, how hurt she was this morning about the affair of Miss Leeson. (Aside.—Reads.) "Have an opportunity of entertaining me." Oh! the strumpet! (Aside.)

Bel. But mind the cunning with which she signs the note, for fear it should by any accident fall into improper hands.

Capt. S. (Aside.) Ay, and you put it into very proper hands. (Reads.) "I shall be in the blue domino." The signature is—"YOU KNOW WHO."

Bel. Yes; you know who! [this to try you.

Capt. S. May be, however, she has only written

Bel. To try me! for what purpose? But if you read a certain postscript there, I fancy you'll be of a different opinion.

Capt. S. (Reads.) "If Mr. Belville has any house of character to retire to, it would be most agreeable, as there could be no fear of interruption."

Bel. What do you say now? Can you recommend me to any house of character, where we shall be free from interruption.

Capt. S. Oh! curse her house of character! (Aside.) But, surely, Belville, after your late determined resolution to reform—

Bel. Zounds! I forgot that.

Capt. S. After the unexampled sweetness of your wife's behaviour—

Bel. Don't go on, Savage. There is something here (putting his hand upon his bosom) which feels already not a little awkwardly.

Capt. S. And can you still persist?

Bel. I am afraid to answer your question.

Capt. S. Where the plague are you flying?

Bel. From the justice of your censure, Horace; my own is sufficiently severe; yet I see that I shall be a rascal again, in spite of my teeth; and good advice is only thrown away upon so incorrigible a libertine. [Exit.

Capt. S. So, then, this diamond of mine proves a counterfeit after all, and I am really the veriest wretch existing, at the moment in which I conceived myself the peculiar favourite of fortune. Oh! the cursed, cursed sex! I'll see her once more to upbraid her with her falsehood, then acquaint my father with her perfidy, to justify my breaking off the marriage, and tear her from my thoughts for ever.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Sir, sir, sir— [ter with the booby?

Capt. S. Sir, sir, sir! What the devil's the mat-

Serv. Miss Walsingham, sir—

Capt. S. Ah! what of her?

Serv. Was this moment overturned at Mr. Belville's door, and, John tells me, carried in a fit into the house.

Capt. S. Ha! let me fly to her assistance. [Exit.

Serv. Ha! let me fly to her assistance! Oh! are you thereabouts? [Exit.

SCENE VI.—Mr. Belville's.

Enter MRS. BELVILLE, MISS WALSHINGHAM, and LADY RACHEL MILDEW.

Mrs. B. But are you, indeed, recovered, my dear?

Miss W. Perfectly, my dear; I wasn't in the least hurt, though greatly terrified, when the two fools of coachmen contended for the honour of being first, and drove the carriages together with a violence incredible.

Lady R. I sincerely rejoice at your escape; and now, Mrs. Belville, as you promised to choose a dress for me if I went in your party to the masquerade this evening, can you spare a quarter of an hour to Tavistock-street?

Mrs. B. I am loth to leave Miss Walsingham alone, Lady Rachel, so soon after her fright.

Miss W. Nay, I insist that you don't stay at home upon my account; and Lady Rachel's company to the masquerade is a pleasure I have such an interest in, that I beg you won't delay a moment to oblige her.

Mrs. B. Well, then, I attend your ladyship.

Lady R. You are very good; and so is Miss Walsingham. [Exit with Mrs. B.

Miss W. I wonder Captain Savage stays away so long! where can he be all this time? I die with impatience to tell him of my happy interview with the General. [Enter a Servant.]

Serv. Captain Savage, madam.

Miss W. Shew him in. [Exit Serv.] How he must rejoice to find his conjectures so fortunately realized!—[Enter CAPTAIN SAVAGE.]

Capt. S. So, madam, you have just escaped a sad accident.

Miss W. And by that agreeable tone and countenance, one would almost imagine you were very sorry for my escape.

Capt. S. People, madam, who doubt the kindness of others, are generally conscious of some defect in themselves.

Miss W. Don't madam me, with this accent of indifference. What has put you out of humour?

Capt. S. Nothing.

Miss W. Are you indisposed?

Capt. S. The crocodile, the crocodile! (Aside.)

Miss W. Do you go to the masquerade to-night?

Capt. S. No, but you do.

Miss W. Why not? Come, don't be ill-natured; I'm not your wife yet.

Capt. S. Nor ever will be, I promise you.

Miss W. What is the meaning of this very whimsical behaviour?

Capt. S. The settled composure of her impudence is intolerable. (Aside.) Madam, madam, how have I deserved this usage? [you go to that?

Miss W. Nay, sir, sir, how have I deserved it, if Capt. S. The letter, madam; the letter.

Miss W. What letter?

Capt. S. Your letter, inviting a gallant from the masquerade to a house of character, madam. What, you appear surprised.

Miss W. Well I may, at so shameless an aspersion.

Capt. S. Madam, madam, I have seen your letter. Your new lover could not keep your secret a moment. But I have nothing to do with you, and only come to declare my reasons for renouncing you everlastingly.—[Enter a Servant.]

Serv. General Savage, madam.

Miss W. Shew him up. [Exit Serv.] I am glad he is come, sir; inform him of your resolution to break off the match, and let there be an end of everything between us.—[Enter GENERAL SAVAGE.]

Gen. S. The news of your accident reached me but this moment, madam, or I should have posted much sooner to reconnoitre your situation. My aid-de-camp, however, has not been inattentive, I see, and I dare say his diligence will not be the least lessened, when he knows his obligations to you.

Capt. S. Oh! sir, I am perfectly sensible of my obligations; and the consciousness of them was one motive of my coming here.

Gen. S. Then you have made your acknowledgement to Miss Walsingham, I hope.

Miss W. He has, indeed, General, said a great deal more than was necessary.

Gen. S. That opinion proceeds from the liberality of your temper; for 'tis impossible he can ever say enough of your goodness.

Capt. S. So it is; if you knew but all, sir.

Gen. S. Why, who can know more of the matter than myself?

Miss W. This gentleman, it seems, has something, General Savage, very necessary for your information.

Gen. S. How's this?

Capt. S. Nay, sir, I only say, that for some particular reasons, which I shall communicate to you at a more proper time; I must beg leave to decline the lady whose hand you kindly intended for me this morning.

Gen. S. Oh! you must! Why, then, I hope you decline, at the same time, all pretensions to every shilling of my fortune. It is not in my power to make you fight, you poltroon, but I can punish you for cowardice.

Miss W. Nay, but General, let me interpose here. If he can maintain any charge against the lady's reputation, 'twould be very hard that he should be disinherited, for a necessary attention to his honour.

Capt. S. And if I don't make the charge good, I submit to be disinherited without murmuring.

Gen. S. 'Tis false as hell! the lady is infinitely too good for you, in every respect; and I undervalued her worth when I thought of her for your wife.

Miss W. I am sure the lady is much obliged to your favourable opinion, sir.

Gen. S. Not in the least, madam; I only do her common justice.

Capt. S. I cannot bear that you should be displeased a moment, sir; suffer me, therefore, to render the conversation less equivocal, and a few words will explain everything.

Gen. S. Sirrah, I'll hear no explanation; aren't my orders that you should marry?

Miss W. For my sake hear him, General Savage.

Capt. S. Madam, I disdain every favour that is to be procured by your interposition. [Exit.]

Miss W. This matter must not be suffered to proceed farther, though provokingly cruelly as the Captain has behaved. (Aside.)

Gen. S. What's that you say, my bewitching girl?

Miss W. I say that you must make it up with the Captain, and the best way will be to hear his charge patiently.

Gen. S. I am shocked at the brutality of the dog; he has no more principle than a suttler, and no more steadiness than a young recruit upon drill. But you shall have ample satisfaction: this very day I'll cut him off from a possibility of succeeding to a shilling of my fortune. He shall be as miserable as—

Miss W. Dear General, do you think that this would give me any satisfaction?

Gen. S. How he became acquainted with my design I know not, but I see plainly that his mutiny proceeds from his aversion to my marrying again.

Miss W. To your marrying again, sir! why should he object to that? [dren, to be sure.

Gen. S. Why, for fear I should have other chil-

Miss W. Indeed, sir, it was not from that motive; and, if I can overlook his folly, you may be prevailed upon to forgive it.

Gen. S. After what you have seen, justice should make you a little more attentive to your own interest, my lovely girl.

Miss W. What, at the expence of his?

Gen. S. In the approaching change of your situation, there may be a family of your own.

Miss W. Suppose there should, sir; won't there be a family of his, too?

Gen. S. I care not what becomes of his family.

Miss W. But, pray, let me think a little about it, General.

Gen. S. 'Tis hard, indeed, when I was so desirous of promoting his happiness that he should throw anything in the way of mine. [confined to me.

Miss W. Recollect, sir, his offence was wholly

Gen. S. Well, my love, and isn't it throwing an obstacle in the way of my happiness, when he abuses you so grossly for your readiness to marry me?

Miss W. Sir?

Gen. S. I see, with all your good-nature, that this is a question you cannot rally against.

Miss W. It is, indeed, sir. What will become of me? (Aside.)

Gen. S. You seem suddenly disordered, my love?

Miss W. Why, really, sir, this affair affects me strongly.

Gen. S. Well, it is possible that, for your sake, I may not punish him with as much severity as I intended. In about an hour I shall beg leave to beat up your quarters again, with Mr. Torrington; for 'tis necessary I should shew you some proof of my gratitude, since you have been so kindly pleased to honour me with a proof of your affection.

Miss W. (Aside.) So, now, indeed, we're in a hopeful situation! [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.—SCENE I.—An Apartment at Belville's.

Enter MRS. BELVILLE and CAPTAIN SAVAGE.

Mrs. B. Don't argue with me, Captain Savage; but consider that I am a wife, and pity my distraction.

Capt. S. Dear madam, there is no occasion to be so much alarmed; Mr. Belville has very properly determined not to fight; he told me so himself; and should have been effectually prevented, if I hadn't known his resolution.

Mrs. B. There is no knowing to what extremities he may be provoked, if he meets Mr. Leeson; I have sent for you, therefore, to beg that you will save him from the possibility, either of exposing himself to any danger, or of doing an injury to his adversary.

Capt. S. What would you have me do, madam?

Mrs. B. Fly to Hyde-park, and prevent, if yet possible, his meeting with Mr. Leeson. Do it, I conjure you, if you'd save me from desperation.

Capt. S. Though you have no reason whatever to be apprehensive for his safety, madam, yet, since you are so very much affected, I'll immediately execute your commands. [Exit.]

Mrs. B. Merciful heaven! where is the generosity, where is the sense, where is the shame of men, to find a pleasure in pursuits which they cannot remember without the deepest horror; which they cannot follow without the meanest fraud; and which they cannot effect without consequences the most dreadful? The single word, pleasure, in a masculine sense, comprehends everything that is cruel; everything that is base; and everything that is desperate. Yet, men, in other respects the noblest of their species, make it the principal business of their lives, and do not hesitate to break in upon the peace of the happiest families, though their own must be necessarily exposed to destruction. Oh! Belville, Belville! my life, my love! The greatest triumph which a libertine can ever experience is too despicable to be envied; 'tis, at best, nothing but a victory over his own humanity; and if he be a husband, he must be dead indeed, if he is not doubly tortured upon the wheel of recollection.

Enter MISS WALSHINGHAM and LADY RACHEL MILDEW.

Miss W. My dear Mrs. Belville, I am extremely unhappy to see you so distressed.

Lady R. Now I am extremely glad to see her so; for if she weren't greatly distressed, it would be monstrously unnatural.

Mrs. B. Oh, Matilda! my husband, my husband! my children, my children!

Miss W. Don't weep, my dear, don't weep; pray, be comforted; all may end happily. Lady Rachel, beg of her not to cry so.

Lady R. Why, you are crying yourself, Miss Walsingham; and though I think it out of character to encourage her tears, I can't help keeping you company.

Mrs. B. Oh! why is not some effectual method contrived to prevent this horrid practice of duelling?

Lady R. I'll expose it on the stage, since the law, now-a-days, kindly leaves the whole cognizance of it to the theatre.

Miss W. And yet, if the laws against it were as well enforced as the laws against destroying the game, perhaps it would be equally for the benefit of the kingdom.

Mrs. B. No law will ever be effectual till the custom is rendered infamous. Wives must shriek, mothers must agonize, orphans must multiply, unless some blessed hand strips the fascinating glare from honourable murder, and bravely exposes the idol who is worshipped thus in blood. While it is disreputable to obey the laws, we cannot look for reformation: but if the duellist is once banished from the presence of his sovereign; if he is for life excluded the confidence of his country; if a mark of indelible disgrace be stamped upon him, the sword of public justice will be the sole chastiser of wrongs; trifles will not be punished with death, and offences really meriting such a punishment will be reserved for the only proper avenger, the common executioner.

Lady R. I couldn't have expressed myself better on the subject, my dear; but till such a hand as you talk of is found, the best will fall into the error of the times.

Miss W. Yes, and butcher each other like madmen, for fear their courage should be suspected by fools.

Mrs. B. No news yet from Captain Savage?

Lady R. He can't have reached Hyde-park yet, my dear.

Miss W. Let us lead you to your chamber, you'll be better there.

Mrs. B. Matilda, I must be wretched anywhere; but I'll attend you.

Lady R. Thank heaven, I have no husband to plunge me into such a situation.

Miss W. And if I thought I could keep my resolution, I'd determine this moment on living single all the days of my life. Pray, don't spare my arm, my dear. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Hyde Park.

Enter BELVILLE.

Bel. I fancy I am rather before the time of appointment; engagements of this kind are the only ones in which, now-a-days, people pretend to any punctuality: a man is allowed half-an-hour's law to dinner, but a thrust through the body must be given within a second of the clock.

Enter LEESON.

Lee. Your servant, sir. Your name, I suppose, is Belville?

Bel. Your supposition is very right, sir; and I fancy I am not much in the wrong, when I suppose your name to be Leeson.

Lee. It is, sir; I am sorry I should keep you here a moment. [here at all.]

Bel. I am very sorry, sir, you should bring me

Lee. I regret the occasion, be assured, sir; but 'tis not now a time for talking, we must proceed to action.

Bel. And yet, talking is all the action I shall proceed to, depend upon it. [pistols?]

Lee. What do you mean, sir? Where are your

Bel. Where I intend they shall remain till my next journey into the country, very quietly over the chimney in my dressing-room.

Lee. You treat this matter with too much levity, Mr. Belville; take your choice of mine, sir.

Bel. I'd rather take them both, if you please; for then no mischief shall be done with either of them.

Lee. Sir, this trifling is adding insult to injury, and shall be resented accordingly. Didn't you come here to give me satisfaction?

Bel. Yes, every satisfaction in my power.

Lee. Take one of these pistols, then.

Bel. Come, Mr. Leeson, your bravery will not at all be lessened by the exercise of a little understanding. If nothing less than my life can atone for the injury I have unconsciously done you, fire at me instantly, but don't be offended because I decline to do you an additional wrong.

Lee. 'Sdeath! sir, do you think I come here with an intention to murder?

Bel. You come to arm the guilty against the innocent, sir; and that, in my opinion, is the most atrocious intention of murder.

Lee. How's this?

Bel. Lookye, Mr. Leeson, there's your pistol. (Throws it on the ground.) I have already acted very wrongly with respect to your sister; but, sir, I have some character (though, perhaps, little enough) to maintain, and I will not do a still worse action, in raising my hand against your life.

Lee. This hypocritical cant of cowardice, sir, is too palpable to disarm my resentment; though I held you to be a man of profligate principles, I nevertheless considered you as a man of courage; but if you hesitate a moment longer, by heaven, I'll chastise you on the spot. (Draws.)

Bel. I must defend my life; though, if it did not look like timidity, I would inform you—(They fight, Leeson is disarmed.) Mr. Leeson, there is your sword again.

Lee. Strike it through my bosom, sir; I don't desire to outlive this instant.

Bel. I hope, my dear sir, that you will long live happy, as your sister, though to my shame I can claim no merit on that account, is recovered unpolluted, by her family; but let me beg that you will now see the folly of decisions by the sword, when success is not fortunately chained to the side of justice. Before I leave you, receive my sincerest apologies for the injuries I have done you; and, be assured, no occurrence will ever give me greater pleasure, than an opportunity of serving you, if, after what is past, you shall at any time condescend to use me as a friend. [Exit.]

Lee. Very well, very well, very well.—[Enter CONNOLLY.]—What, you have been within hear-

Con. You may say that. [ing, I suppose?

Lee. And isn't this very fine?

Con. Why, I can't say much as to the finery of it, sir, but it is certainly very foolish.

Lee. And so, this is my satisfaction after all!

Con. Yes, and pretty satisfaction it is. When Mr. Belville did you but one injury, he was the greatest villain in the world; but now that he has done you two, in drawing his sword upon you, I suppose he is a very worthy gentleman.

Lee. To be foiled, baffled, disappointed in my revenge! What though my sister is, by accident, unstained, his intentions are as criminal as if her ruin were actually perpetrated; there is no possibility of enduring the reflection! I wish not for the blood of my enemy, but I would at least have the credit of giving him life.

Con. Arrah! my dear, if you had any regard for the life of your enemy, you shouldn't put him in the way of death.

Lee. No more of these reflections, my dear Connolly; my own feelings are painful enough. Will you be so good as to take these d—d pistols, and come with me to the coach?

Con. Troth, and that I will; but don't make yourself uneasy; consider that you have done everything which honour required at your hands.

Lee. I hope so.

Con. Why, you know so. You have broken the laws of heaven and earth as nobly as the first lord in the land; and you have convinced the world that where anybody has done your family one injury, you have courage enough to do it another yourself, by hazarding your life.

Lee. Those, Connolly, who would live reputably in any country, must regulate their conduct, in many cases, by its very prejudices. Custom, with respect to duelling, is a tyrant, whose despotism nobody ventures to attack, though everybody detests its cruelty.

Con. I didn't imagine that a tyrant of any kind would be tolerated in England. But where do you think of going now? for chambers, you know, are, at present, most delightfully dangerous.

Lee. I shall go to Mrs. Crayon's.

Con. What, the gentlewoman that paints all manner of colours in red chalk? [Emily.]

Lee. Yes, where I first became acquainted with

Con. And where the sweet creature has met you two or three times under pretence of sitting for her picture.

Lee. Mrs. Crayon's will, I dare say, oblige me in this exigency with an apartment for a few days; but come, Connolly, we have no time to lose, though if you had any prudence, you would abandon me in my present situation.

Con. Ah! sir, is this your opinion of my friendship? Do you think that anything can ever give me half so much pleasure in serving you, as seeing you surrounded by misfortunes? [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—An Apartment at Belville's.

Enter GENERAL SAVAGE, TORRINGTON, and SPRUCE.

Spruce. Miss Walsingham will wait on you immediately, gentlemen.

Gen. S. Very well.

Spruce. What can old Holifernes want so continually with Miss Walsingham? [Aside and exit.]

Gen. S. When I bring this sweet, mild creature home I shall be able to break her spirit to my own wishes. I'll inure her to proper discipline from the first moment, and make her tremble at the very thought of mutiny.

Tor. Ah! General, you are wonderfully brave, when you know the meekness of your adversary.

Gen. S. Envy, Torrington; stark, staring envy: few fellows, on the borders of fifty, have so much reason as myself, to boast of a blooming young woman's partiality. [confines of threescore.]

Tor. On the borders of fifty, man! beyond the

Gen. S. The more reason I have to boast of my victory, then; but don't grumble at my triumph, you shall have a kiss of the bride, let that content you, Torrington.—[Enter MISS WALSHINGHAM.]

Miss W. Gentlemen, your most obedient. General, I intended writing to you about a trifling mistake; but poor Mrs. Belville has been so very ill that I couldn't find an opportunity.

Gen. S. I am sorry for Mrs. Belville's illness, but I am happy, madam, to be personally in the way of receiving your commands, and I wait upon you, with Mr. Torrington, to talk about a marriage settlement.

Miss W. Heavens! how shall I undeceive him? (Aside.)

Tor. 'Tis rather an awkward business, Miss Walsingham, to trouble you upon; but as the General wishes that the affair may be as private as possible, he thought it better to speak to yourself, than to treat with any other person.

Gen. S. Yes, my lovely girl; and to convince you that I intend to carry on an honourable war, not to pillage like a free-booter, Mr. Torrington will be a trustee.

Miss W. I am infinitely obliged to your intention, but there's no necessity to talk about any settlement, for—

Gen. S. Pardon me, madam, pardon me, there is—besides, I have determined that there shall be one, and what I once determine is absolute. A tolerable hint for her own behaviour, when I have married her, Torrington. (Apart to Tor.)

Miss W. I must not shock him before Mr. Torrington. (Aside.) General Savage, will you give me leave to speak a few words in private to you.

Gen. S. There is no occasion for sounding a retreat, madam; Mr. Torrington is acquainted with the whole business, and I am determined, for your sake, that nothing shall be done without him.

Tor. I can have no objection to your hearing the lady ex parte, General. [particular nature.]

Miss W. What I have to say, sir, is of a very

Tor. (Rising.) I'll leave the room, then.

Gen. S. (Opposing him.) You sha'n't leave the room, Torrington. Miss Walsingham shall have a specimen of my command even before marriage; and you shall see, that every woman is not to bully me out of my determination. (Apart to Tor.)

Miss W. Well, General, you must have your own way.

Gen. S. (To Tor.) Don't you see that it's only fighting the battle stoutly at first, with one of these

Tor. Ah! General. [gentle creatures?

Gen. S. I own, madam, your situation is a distressing one; let us sit down, let us sit down.

Miss W. It is unspeakably distressing, indeed, sir.

Tor. Distressing, however, as it may be, we must proceed to issue, madam; the General proposes your jointure to be one thousand pounds a year.

Miss W. General Savage—

Gen. S. You think this too little, perhaps?

Miss W. I can't think of any jointure, sir.

Tor. Why, to be sure, a jointure is, at best, but a melancholy possession, for it must be purchased by the loss of the husband you love.

Miss W. Pray, don't name it, Mr. Torrington.

Gen. S. (Kissing her hand.) A thousand thanks to you, my lovely girl.

Miss W. For heaven's sake, let go my hand.

Gen. S. I shall be mad till it gives me legal possession of the town. [I beg you'll hear me.]

Miss W. Gentlemen—General—Mr. Torrington,

Gen. S. By all means, my adorable creature; I can never have too many proofs of your disinterested affection.

Miss W. There is a capital mistake in this whole affair. I am sinking under a load of distress.

Gen. S. Your confusion makes you look charmingly though.

Miss W. There is no occasion to talk of jointures or marriages to me; I am not going to be married.

Tor. What's this?

Miss W. Nor have I an idea in nature, however enviable I think the honour, of being your wife, sir.

Gen. S. Madam!

Tor. Why, here's a demur.

Miss W. I am afraid, sir, that in our conversation this morning, my confusion, arising from the particularity of the subject, has led you into a most material misconception. [mistake my ground.]

Gen. S. I am thunderstruck, madam. I couldn't

Tor. As clear a not. pros. as ever was issued by an attorney-general.

Gen. S. Surely, you can't forget, that at the first word you hung out a flag of truce, told me even that I had a previous friend in the fort, and didn't so much as hint at a single article of capitulation.

Tor. Now for the rejoinder to this replication.

Miss W. All this is unquestionably true, General, and perhaps a good deal more; but, in reality, my confusion before you on this subject to-day, was such, that I scarcely knew what I said; I was dying with distress, and at this moment I am very little better. Permit me to retire, General Savage, and only suffer me to add, that though I think myself highly flattered by your addresses, it is impossible for me ever to receive them. Lord, lord! I am glad it is over in any manner. [Exit.]

Tor. Why, we are a little out in this matter, General; the judge has decided against us, when we imagined ourselves sure of the cause.

Gen. The gates shut in my teeth, just as I expected the keys from the governor.

Tor. I am disappointed myself, man; I sha'n't have a kiss of the bride.

Gen. S. At my time of life, too! [her.]

Tor. I said from the first you were too old for

Gen. S. Zounds! to fancy myself sure of her, and to triumph upon a certainty of victory.

Tor. Ay, and to kiss her hand in a rapturous return for her tenderness to you: let me advise you never to kiss before folks, as long as you live again.

Gen. S. Don't distract me, Torrington; a joke, where a friend has the misfortune to lose the battle, is a downright inhumanity.

Tor. You told me that your son had accused her of something that you would not hear. Suppose we call at his lodgings, he may, perhaps, be able to give us a little information.

Gen. S. Thank you for the thought; but keep your finger more than ever upon your lips. You know how I dread the danger of ridicule; and it would be too much, not only to be thrashed out of the field, but to be laughed at into the bargain.

Tor. I thought when you made a presentment of your sweet person to Miss Walsingham, that the bill would be returned ignoramus. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Belville's.

MRS. BELVILLE and LADY RACHEL MILDEW, discovered.

Lady R. You heard what Captain Savage said?

Mrs. B. I would flatter myself, but my heart will not suffer it. The Park might be too full for the horrid purpose; and, perhaps, they are gone to decide the quarrel in some other place.

Lady R. The Captain inquir'd of numbers in the Park, without hearing a syllable of them; and is, therefore, positive that they have parted without doing any mischief.

Mrs. B. I am, nevertheless, torn by a thousand apprehensions; and my fancy, with a gloomy kind of fondness, fastens on the most deadly. This very morning, I exultingly numbered myself in the catalogue of the happiest wives. Perhaps I am a wife no longer; perhaps, my little innocents! your unhappy father is at this moment breathing his last sigh, and wishing, (oh, how vainly!) that he had not preferred a guilty pleasure to his own life, to my eternal peace of mind, and your felicity!

Enter SPRUCE.

Spruce. Madam, madam, my master, my master!

Mrs. B. Is he safe?—[Enter BELVILLE.]

Bel. My love!

Mrs. B. Oh, Mr. Belville! (Faints.)

Bel. Assistance, quick!

Lady R. There, she revives. [heart!]

Bel. The angel-softness! how this rends my

Mrs. B. Oh! Mr. Belville, if you could conceive the agonies I have endured, you would avoid the possibility of another quarrel as long as you lived, out of common humanity.

Bel. My dearest creature, spare these tender reproaches; you know not how sufficiently I am punished to see you thus miserable.

Lady R. That's pleasant, indeed, when you have yourself deliberately loaded her with affliction.

Bel. Pray, Lady Rachel, have a little mercy! Your poor humble servant has been a very naughty boy; but if you only forgive him this single time, he will never more deserve the rod of correction.

Mrs. B. Since you are returned safe, I am happy. Excuse these foolish tears, they gush in spite of me.

Bel. How contemptible they render me, my love!

Lady R. Come, my dear, you must turn your mind from this gloomy subject. Suppose we step up stairs, and communicate our pleasure to Miss Walsingham?

Mrs. B. With all my heart. Adieu, recreant!

[Exit with Lady R.]

Bel. I don't deserve such a woman! yet, I believe I am the first husband that ever found fault with a wife for having too much goodness.—[Enter SPRUCE.]—What's the matter?

Spruce. Your sister—

Bel. What of my sister?

Spruce. Sir, she has eloped.

Bel. My sister!

Spruce. There is a letter left, sir, in which she says, that her motive was a dislike to a match with Captain Savage, as she has placed her affections unalterably on another gentleman.

Bel. Death and d—!

Spruce. Mrs. Moreland, your mother, is in the greatest distress, sir; and begs you will immediately go with the servant that brought the message; for he observing the young lady's maid carrying some bundles out a little suspiciously, thought there must be some scheme going on, and dogged a hackney-coach, in which Miss Morland went off, to the very house where it set her down.

Bel. Bring me to the servant instantly; but don't let a syllable of this matter reach my wife's ears, her spirits are already too much agitated. [Exit.]

Spruce. Zounds! we shall be paid home for the tricks we have played in other families. [Exit.]

SCENE V.—Captain Savage's Lodgings.

Enter CAPTAIN SAVAGE.

Capt. S. The vehemence of my resentment against this abandon'd woman has certainly led me too far. I shouldn't have acquainted her with my discovery of her baseness; no, if I had acted properly, I should have concealed all knowledge of the transaction till the very moment of her guilt, and then burst upon her when she was solacing with her paramour, in all the fulness of security. Now, if she should either alter her mind, with respect to going to the masquerade, or go in a different habit to elude my observation, I not only lose the opportunity of exposing her, but give her time to plan some plausible excuse for her infamous letter to Belville.

Enter a Servant.

Ser. General Savage and Mr. Torrington, sir.

Capt. S. You blockhead! why did you let them wait a moment? What can be the meaning of this visit?

[Exit Servant.]

Enter GENERAL SAVAGE and TORRINGTON.

Gen. S. I come, Horace, to talk to you about Miss Walsingham.

Capt. S. She's the most worthless woman existing, sir: I can convince you of it. [her.]

Gen. S. I have already changed my opinion of Capt. S. What you have found her out, sir?

Tor. Yes, he has made a trifling discovery.

Gen. S. 'Sdeath! don't make me contemptible to my son. (Aside to Torrington.)

Capt. S. But, sir, what instance of her precious behaviour has come to your knowledge? for an hour has scarcely elapsed since you thought her a miracle of goodness.

Tor. Ay, he has thought her a miracle of goodness within this quarter of an hour.

Gen. S. Why she has a manner that would impose upon all the world.

Capt. S. Yes, but she has a manner also to deceive the world thoroughly.

Tor. That we have found pretty recently. However, in this land of liberty, none are to be pronounced guilty till they are positively convicted; I can't, therefore, find against Miss Walsingham, upon the bare strength of presumptive evidence.

Capt. S. Presumptive evidence! Haven't I promised you ocular demonstration?

Tor. Ay, but till we receive this demonstration, my good friend, we cannot give judgment.

Capt. S. Then I'll tell you at once who is the object of her honourable affections.

Gen. S. Who, who?

Capt. S. What would you think if they were placed on Belville?

Gen. S. Upon Belville! Has she deserted to him from the corps of virtue?

Capt. S. Yes, she wrote to him, desiring to be taken from the masquerade to some convenient scene of privacy; and though I have seen the letter, she has the impudence to deny her own hand.

Gen. S. What a fiend, then, there is disguised under the uniform of an angel! [confusion!]

Tor. The delicate creature that was dying with

Capt. S. Only come with me to the masquerade, and you shall see Belville carry her off. 'Twas about the scandalous appointment with him, I was speaking, when you conceiv'd I treated her rudely.

Gen. S. And you were only anxious to shew her in her real character to me, when I was so exceedingly offended with you.

Capt. S. Nothing else in the world, sir. I knew you would despise and detest her, the moment you were acquainted with her baseness.

Gen. S. How she brazened it out before my face, and what a regard she affected for your interest! I was a madman not to listen to your explanation.

Tor. Though you both talk this point well, I still see nothing but strong presumption against Miss Walsingham. Mistakes have already happened, mistakes may happen again; and I will not give up a lady's honour, upon an evidence that would not cast a common pick-pocket at the Old Bailey.

Capt. S. Come to the masquerade and be satisfied.

Gen. S. Let us detach a party for dresses immediately. Yet remember, Torrington, that the punctuality of evidence which is necessary in a court of law, is by no means requisite in a court of honour.

Tor. Perhaps it would be more to the honour of your honourable courts if it were. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—An Apartment at Mrs. Crayon's.

Bel. (Behind.) My dear, you must excuse me.

Serv. Indeed, sir, you must not go up stairs.

Bel. Indeed but I will. The man is positive to the house, and I'll search every room in it, if I don't find the lady. James, don't stir from the street-door.

Enter BELVILLE, followed by a female Servant.

Serv. Sir, you are the strangest gentleman I ever met with in all my born days. I wish my mistress was at home.

Bel. I am a strange fellow, my dear; but if your mistress was at home, I should take the liberty of peeping into the apartments.

Serv. Sir, there's company in that room, you can't go in there.

Bel. Good manners, by your leave a little.—(Forcing the door.) Whoever my gentleman is, I'll call him to a severe reckoning; I have been just called to one myself, for making free with another man's sister.

Enter LEESON, followed by CONNOLLY.

Lee. Who is it that dares commit an outrage upon this apartment?

Con. An Englishman's very lodging—ay, and an Irishman's too, I hope, is his castle! An Irishman is an Englishman all the world over.

Bel. Mr. Leeson!

Serv. Oh! we shall have murder.

Con. Run into that room, my dear, and stay with the young lady. [Exit Serv.]

Lee. Connolly, let nobody else into that room.

Con. Let me alone for that, honey, if this gentleman have fifty people.

Lee. Whence is it, Mr. Belville, that you thus persecute me with injuries?

Bel. I am filled with astonishment!

Con. 'Faith, to speak the truth, you do look a little surprised. [this new violence?]

Lee. Answer me, sir: what is the foundation of

Bel. I am come, Mr. Leeson, upon an affair—

Con. The devil burn me, if he was half so much confounded, a while ago, when there was a naked sword at his breast.

Bel. I am come, Mr. Leeson, upon an affair, sir, that—How the devil shall I open it to him, since the tables are so fairly turned upon me? (Aside.)

Lee. Despatch, sir; for I have company in the

Bel. A lady, I suppose? [next room.]

Lee. Suppose it is, sir? [sir?]

Bel. And the lady's name is Moreland, isn't it,

Lee. I can't see what business you have with her name, sir. You took away my sister, and I hope you have no designs upon the lady in the next room.

Bel. Indeed but I have.

Lee. The devil you have!

Con. Well, this is the most unaccountable man I ever heard of; he'll have all the women in the town, I believe.

Lee. And pray, sir, what pretensions have you to the lady in the next room, even supposing her to be Miss Moreland!

Bel. No other pretensions than what a brother should have to the defence of his sister's honour: you thought yourself authorized to cut my throat, awhile ago, in a similar business.

Lee. And is Miss Moreland your sister?

Bel. Sir, there is insolence in that question: you know she is.

Lee. By heaven! I did not know it till this moment; but I rejoice at the discovery.—This is blow for blow! [a swop of it.]

Con. Devil burn me, but they have fairly made

Bel. And you really didn't know that Miss Moreland was my mister?

Lee. I don't conceive myself under much necessity of apologizing to you, sir; but I am incapable of a dishonourable design upon any woman; and though Miss Moreland, in our short acquaintance, repeatedly mentioned her brother, she never once told me that his name was Belville.

Con. And he has had such few opportunities of being in her company, unless by letters, honey! that he knew nothing more of her connections, than her being a sweet, pretty creature, and having thirty thousand pounds.

Bel. The fortune, I dare say, no way lessened the force of her attractions. [not.]

Lee. I am above dissimulation, it really did

Bel. Well, Mr. Leeson, our families have shewn such a very strong inclination to come together, that it would really be a pity to disappoint them.

Con. Upon my soul, and so it would; though the dread of being forced to have a husband, the young lady tells us, quickened her resolution to marry this gentleman.

Bel. Oh! she had no violence of that kind to apprehend from her family; therefore, Mr. Leeson, since you seem as necessary for the girl's happiness, as she seems for your's, you shall marry her here in town, with the consent of her friends, and save yourself the trouble of a journey to Scotland.

Lee. Can I believe you serious?

Bel. Zounds! Leeson, that air of surprise is a sad reproach! I didn't surprise you when I did a bad action, but I raise your astonishment when I do a good one.

Con. And by my soul, Mr. Belville, if you knew how a good action becomes a man, you'd never do a bad one as long as you liv'd.

Lee. You have given me life and happiness in one day, Mr. Belville! However, it is now time you should see your sister: I know you'll be gentle with her, though you have so much reason to condemn her choice; and, generously remember, that her elopement proceeded from the great improbability there was of a beggar's ever meeting with the approbation of her family.

Bel. Don't apologize for your circumstances, Leeson; a princess could do no more than make you happy; and, if you make her so, you meet her upon terms of the most perfect equality.

Lee. This is a new way of thinking, Mr. Belville.

Bel. 'Tis only an honest way of thinking; and I consider my sister a gainer upon the question; for a man of your merit is more difficult to be found than a woman of her fortune. [Exeunt,

ACT V.—SCENE I.—A Drawing-room.

Enter BELVILLE.

Bel. Well, happiness is once more mine; and the women are all going in tip-top spirits to the masquerade. Now, Mr. Belville, let me have a few words with you: Miss Walsingham, the ripe, the luxurious Miss Walsingham, expects to find you there, burning with impatience. But, my dear friend, after the occurrences of the day, can you be weak enough to plunge into fresh crimes? Can you be base enough to abuse the goodness of that angel, your wife; and wicked enough, not only to destroy the innocence which is sheltered beneath your own roof, but to expose your family, perhaps, again to the danger of losing a son, a brother, a father, and a husband? The possession of the three Graces is surely too poor a recompense for the folly you must commit, for the shame you must feel, and the consequences you must hazard. Upon my soul, if I struggle a little longer, I shall rise in my own opinion, and be less a rascal than I think myself: ay, but the object is bewitching; the matter will be an eternal secret; and if it be known that I sneak in this pitiful manner from a fine woman, when the whole elysium of her person solicits me,—Well, and am I afraid the world should know that I have shrunk from an infamous action? A thousand blessings on you, dear conscience, for that one argument; I shall be an honest man after all. Suppose, however, that I give her the meeting? That's dangerous: and I am so little accustomed to do what is right, that I shall certainly do what is wrong, the moment I am in the way of temptation. Come, Belville, your resolution is not so very slender a dependence, and you owe Miss Walsingham reparation for the injury which you have done her principles. I'll give her the meeting; I'll take her to the house I intended—Zounds! what a fool I have been all this time, to look for precarious satisfaction in vice, when there is such exquisite pleasure to be found at a certainty in virtue! [Exit.

Enter LADY RACHEL and MRS. BELVILLE.

Lady R. For mirth's sake, don't let him see us. There has been a warm debate between his passion and his conscience. [for it!

Mrs. B. And the latter is the conqueror, my life

Lady R. Dear Mrs. Belville, you are the best of women, and ought to have the best of husbands.

Mrs. B. I have the best of husbands.

Lady R. I have not time to dispute the matter with you now; but I shall put you into my comedy, to teach wives, that the best receipt for matrimonial happiness, is to be deaf, dumb, and blind.

Mrs. B. Poh, poh! you are a satirist, Lady Rachel—But we are losing time. Shouldn't we put on our dresses, and prepare for the grand scene?

Lady R. Don't you tremble at the trial?

Mrs. B. Not in the least; I am sure my heart has no occasion. [little plot?

Lady R. Have you let Miss Walsingham into our

Mrs. B. You know she could not be insensible of Mr. Belville's design upon herself; and it is no farther than that design, we have anything to carry into execution.

Lady R. Well, she may serve to facilitate the matter; and, therefore, I am not sorry that you have trusted her.

Mrs. B. We shall be too late, and then what signifies all your fine plotting?

Lady R. Is it not a little pang of jealousy that would fain now quicken our motions?

Mrs. B. No, Lady Rachel, it is a certainty of my husband's love and generosity, that makes me wish to come to the trial. I would not exchange my confidence in his affections for all the mines of Peru; so nothing you can say will make me miserable.

Lady R. You are a most unaccountable woman; so away with you. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—The same.

Enter SPRUCE and GHASTLY.

Spruce. Why, Ghastly, the old General, your master, is a greater fool than I ever thought he was. He want to marry Miss Walsingham?

Ghast. Mrs. Tempest suspected that there was something going forward, by all his hugger-mugger consulting with Mr. Torrington, and so set me on to listen.

Spruce. She's a good friend of your's; and that thing she made the General give you the other day, in the hospital, is, I suppose, a snug hundred a year.

Ghast. Better than two; I wash for nearly four thousand people. There was a major of horse who put in for it, and pleaded a large family—

Spruce. With long services, I suppose.

Ghast. Yes; but Mrs. Tempest insisted upon my long services: so the major was set aside. However, to keep the thing from the newspapers, I fancy he will succeed the barber who died last night, poor woman, of a lying-in fever, after being brought to bed of three children. Places in public institutions—

Spruce. Are often sweetly disposed of. I think of asking Belville for something, one of these days.

Ghast. He has great interest.

Spruce. I might be a justice of peace, if I pleased, and in a shabby neighbourhood, where the mere swearing would bring in something tolerable; but there are so many strange people let into the commission now-a-days, that I shouldn't like to have my name in the list.

Ghast. You are right.

Spruce. No, no; I leave that to paltry tradesmen, and shall think of some little sinecure, or a small pension on the Irish establishment.

Ghast. Well, success attend you. I must hobble home as fast as I can, to know if Mrs. Tempest has any orders. Oh! there's a rare storm brewing for our old goat of a General.

Spruce. When shall we crack a bottle together?

Ghast. Oh! I sha'n't touch a glass of claret these three weeks; for last night I gave nature a little fillip with a drunken bout according to the doctor's directions; I have entirely left off bread, and I am in great hopes that I shall get rid of my gout by these means, especially if I can learn to eat my meat quite raw, like a cannibal.

Spruce. Ha, ha, ha!

Ghast. Look at me, Spruce, I was once as likely a young fellow as any under ground in the whole parish of St. James's; but waiting on the General so many years—

Spruce. Ay, and following his example, Ghastly.

Ghast. 'Tis too true,—has reduced me to what you see. These miserable spindles would do very well for a lord or a duke, Spruce; but they are a sad disgrace to a poor valet-de-chambre. [Exit.

Spruce. Well, I don't believe there's a gentleman's gentleman within the weekly bills, who joins a prudent solicitude for the main-chance; to a strict care of his constitution, better than myself. I have a little girl who stands me in about three guineas a week; I never bet more than a pound upon a rubber of whist; I always sleep with my head very warm; and swallow a new laid egg every morning with my chocolate. [Exit.

SCENE III.—A Street.

Two sedan-chairs cross the stage, and set down BELVILLE and a Lady at the door of a house.

Bel. This way, my dear creature. [Exeunt.

Enter GENERAL SAVAGE, CAPTAIN SAVAGE, and TORRINGTON.

Capt. S. There, there they go in. You see the place is quite convenient, not twenty yards from the masquerade.

Gen. S. How closely the fellow sticks to her!

Tor. Like the great seal to the peerage patent of a chancellor. But, gentlemen, we have still no more than proof presumptive: where is the ocular demonstration which we were to have?

Capt. S. I'll swear to the blue domino; 'tis a very remarkable one, and so is Belville's.

Tor. You would have rare custom among the Newgate solicitors if you'd venture an oath upon the identity of the party under it.

Gen. S. 'Tis the very size and shape of Miss Walsingham. [is a trifling alibi in this case.

Tor. And yet I have a strange notion that there

Gen. S. It would be a d—d affair if we should be countermined.

Capt. S. Oh! follow me; here's the door left luckily open, and I'll soon clear up the matter beyond a question. [Exit into the house.

Tor. Why, your son is mad, General. This must produce a deadly breach with Belville. For heaven's sake, let's go in and prevent any excesses of his rashness.

Gen. S. By all means, or the poor fellow's generous anxiety on my account may be productive of very fatal consequences. [Exeunt.

SCENE IV.—An Apartment.

BELVILLE discovered, unmasked, and a Lady in a blue domino, masked.

Bel. My dear Miss Walsingham, we are now perfectly safe, yet I will by no means entreat you to unmask, because I am convinced, from the propriety with which you repulsed my addresses this morning, that you intend the present interview should make me still more deeply sensible of my presumption. I never lied so awkwardly in all my life; if it were to make her comply I should be at no loss for language. (Aside.) The situation in which I must appear before you, madam, is certainly a very humiliating one; but I am persuaded that your generosity will be gratified to hear that I have bid an everlasting adieu to my profligacy, and am now only alive to the virtues of Mrs. Belville. She won't speak: I don't wonder at it, for brazen as I am myself, if I met with so mortifying a rejection, I should be cursedly out of countenance. (Aside.)

Capt. S. (Within.) I will go in.

Gen. S. (Within.) I command you to desist.

Tor. (Within.) This will be an affair for the Old Bailey.

Bel. Why, what the devil is all this? Don't be alarmed, Miss Walsingham; be assured I'll protect you at the hazard of my life; step into this closet, you sha'n't be discovered, depend upon it. (She goes in.) And now to discover the cause of this confusion. (Unlocks the door.)

Enter GENERAL SAVAGE, CAPTAIN SAVAGE, and TORRINGTON.

Bel. Savage! what is the meaning of this strange behaviour?

Capt. S. Where is Miss Walsingham?

Bel. So, then, sir, this is a premeditated scheme, for which I am obliged to your friendship.

Capt. S. Where's Miss Walsingham, sir?

Gen. S. Dear Belville, he is out of his senses; this storm was entirely against my orders.

Tor. If he proceeds much longer in these vagaries, we must amuse him with a commission of lunacy.

Bel. This is neither a time nor a place for argument, Mr. Torrington; but as you and the General seem to be in the possession of your senses, I shall be glad if you'll take this very friendly gentleman away; and depend upon it, I sha'n't die in his debt for the present obligation.

Capt. S. And depend upon it, sir, pay the obligation when you will, I sha'n't stir till I see Miss Walsingham. Lookye, Belville, there are secret reasons for my behaving in this manner; reasons, which you yourself will approve, when you know them; my father here—

Gen. S. Disavows your conduct in every particular, and would rejoice to see you at the halberds.

Tor. And, for my part, I told him previously 'twas a downright burglary.

Bel. Well, gentlemen, let your different motives for breaking in upon me in this agreeable manner be what they may, I don't see that I am less annoyed by my friends than my enemy. I must, therefore, again request that you will all walk down stairs.

Capt. S. I will first walk into this room.

Bel. Really, I think you will not.

Gen. S. What frenzy possesses the fellow to urge this matter further?

Capt. S. While there's a single doubt, she triumphs over justice. (Drawing.) I will go into that room.

Bel. Then you must make your way through me.

Enter MRS. BELVILLE from the room.

Mrs. B. Ah!

Capt. S. There, I knew she was in the room; there's the blue domino.

Gen. S. Put up your sword, if you don't desire to be cashiered from my favour for ever.

Bel. Why would you come out, madam? But you have nothing to apprehend.

Capt. S. Pray, madam, will you have the goodness to unmask?

Bel. She sha'n't unmask.

Capt. S. I say she shall.

Bel. I say she shall not.

Mrs. B. Pray, let me oblige the gentleman. (Unmasks.) [covery!

Capt. S. Death and destruction! here's a dis-

Gen. S. and Tor. Mrs. Belville!

Mrs. B. Yes, Mrs. Belville, gentlemen. Is conjugal fidelity so very terrible a thing now-a-days, that a man is to suffer death for being found in company with his own wife?

Bel. My love, this is a surprise, indeed: but it is a most agreeable one; since you find me really ashamed of my former follies, and cannot now doubt the sincerity of my reformation.

Mrs. B. I am too happy! this single moment would overpay a whole life of anxiety.

Bel. Where shall I attend you? Will you return to the masquerade?

Mrs. B. Oh! no. Lady Rachel and Miss Walsingham are, by this time, at our house, with Mr. Leeson and the Irish gentleman whom you pressed into our party, impatiently expecting the result of this adventure.

Bel. Give me leave to conduct you home, then, from this scene of confusion. To-morrow, Captain Savage, I shall beg the favour of your explanation. (Aside to Capt. S.) Kind gentlemen, your most humble servant.

Mrs. B. And when you next disturb a tête-à-tête, for pity to a poor wife don't let it be so very uncustomary a party, as the matrimonial one.

[Exit with Bel.]

Gen. S. (To Capt. S.) So, sir, you have led us upon a blessed expedition here.

Tor. Now, don't you think that if your courts of honour, like our courts of law, searched a little minutely into evidence, it would be equally to the credit of their understandings?

Capt. S. Though I am covered with confusion at my mistake, (for, you see, Belville was mistaken as well as myself,) I am overjoyed at this discovery of Miss Walsingham's innocence.

Gen. S. I should exult in it, too, with a feu de joie, if it didn't now shew the impossibility of her ever being Mrs. Savage.

Capt. S. Dear sir, why should you think that an impossibility? Though some mistakes have occurred in consequence, I suppose, of Mrs. Belville's little plot upon her husband, I dare say Miss Walsingham may yet be prevailed upon to come into our family.

Tor. Take care of a new error in your proceedings, young gentleman.

Gen. S. Ay, another defeat would make us completely despicable.

Capt. S. Sir, I'll forfeit my life if she does not consent to the marriage this very night.

Gen. S. Only bring this matter to bear, and I'll forgive you everything.

Tor. The Captain should be informed, I think, General, that she declined it peremptorily this evening.

Gen. S. Ay, do you hear that, Horace?

Capt. S. I am not at all surprised at it, considering the general misconception we laboured under. But I'll immediately to Belville's, explain the whole mystery, and conclude everything to your satisfaction. [Exit.]

Gen. S. So, Torrington, we shall be able to take the field again, you see.

Tor. But how, in the name of wonder, has your son found out your intention of marrying Miss Walsingham? I looked upon myself as the only person acquainted with the secret.

Gen. S. That thought has marched itself two or three times to my own recollection. For though I gave him some distant hints of the affair, I took particular care to keep behind the works of a proper circumspection.

Tor. Oh! if you gave him any hints at all, I am not surprised at his discovering everything.

Gen. S. I shall be all impatience till I hear of his interview with Miss Walsingham. Suppose, my dear friend, we went to Belville's, 'tis but in the next street, and we shall be there in the lighting of a match.

Tor. Really, this is a pretty business for a man of my age and profession; trot here, trot there. But, as I have been weak enough to make myself a kind of party in the cause, I own that I have curiosity enough to be anxious about the determination.

Gen. S. Come along, my old boy; and remember the song, "Servile spirits," &c. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Belville's.

Enter CAPTAIN SAVAGE and MISS WALSHINGHAM.

Capt. S. Nay, but, my dearest Miss Walsingham, the extenuation of my own conduct to Belville made it absolutely necessary for me to discover my engagements with you; and, as happiness is now so fortunately in our reach, I flatter myself you will be prevailed upon to forgive an error which proceeded only from an extravagance of love.

Miss W. To think me capable of such an action, Captain Savage! I am terrified at the idea of a union with you, and it is better for a woman at any time, to sacrifice an insolent lover, than to accept of a suspicious husband.

Capt. S. In the happiest unions, my dearest creature, there must be always something to overlook on both sides.

Miss W. Very civil, truly.

Capt. S. Pardon me, my life, for this frankness; and recollect, that if the lover has, through misconception, been unhappily guilty, he brings a husband altogether reformed to your hands.

Miss W. Well, I see I must forgive you at last, so I may as well make a merit of necessity, you provoking creature. [Of this hand?]

Capt. S. And may I hope, indeed, for the blessing

Miss W. Why, you wretch, would you have me force it upon you? I think, after what I have said, a soldier might have ventured to take it without farther ceremony. [lawful prize.]

Capt. S. Angelic creature! thus I seize it as my

Miss W. Well, but now you have obtained this inestimable prize, Captain, give me again leave to ask if you have had a certain explanation with the

Capt. S. How can you doubt it? [General?]

Miss W. And he is is really impatient for our marriage?

Capt. S. 'Tis incredible how earnest he is.

Miss W. What, did he tell you of his interview with me this evening, when he brought Mr. Tor-

Capt. S. He did. [rington?]

Miss W. Oh! then, I can have no doubt.

Capt. S. If a shadow of doubt remains, here he comes to remove it. Joy, my dear sir! joy, a thousand times!

Enter GENERAL SAVAGE and TORRINGTON.

Gen. S. What, my dear boy, have you carried the day?

Miss W. I have been weak enough to indulge him with a victory, indeed, General.

Gen. S. (Sings.) "None but the brave, none but the brave, &c." [General.]

Tor. I congratulate you heartily on this decree,

Gen. S. This had nearly proved a day of disappointment, but the stars have fortunately turned it in my favour, and now I reap the rich reward of my victory. (Salutes her.)

Capt. S. And here I take her from you, as the greatest good which heaven can send me.

Miss W. Oh, Captain!

Gen. S. You take her as the greatest good which heaven can send you, sirrah? I take her as the greatest good which heaven can send me; and now what have you to say to her?

Miss W. General Savage!

Tor. Here will be a fresh injunction to stop proceedings. [takes?]

Miss W. Are we never to have done with mis-

Gen. S. What mistakes can have happened now, my sweetest? You delivered up your dear hand to me this moment.

Miss W. True, sir; but I thought you were going to bestow my dear hand upon this dear gentleman.

Gen. S. How! that dear gentleman!

Capt. S. I am thunderstruck! [&c.]

Tor. General—(Sings.)—"None but the brave,

Gen. S. So the covert way is cleared at last; and you have imagined that I was all along negotiating for this fellow, when I was gravely soliciting for myself?

Miss W. No other idea, sir, ever once entered my imagination.

Tor. General—(Sings.)—"Noble minds should [ne'er despair, &c.]"

Gen. S. Zounds! here's all the company pouring upon us in full gallop, and I shall be the laughing-stock of the whole town.

Enter MR. and MRS. BELVILLE, LADY RACHEL, LEESON, and CONNOLLY.

Bel. Well, General, we have left you a long time together. Shall I give you joy?

Gen. S. No; wish me demolished in the fortifications of Dunkirk.

Mrs. B. What's the matter?

Lady R. The General appears disconcerted.

Lee. The gentleman looks as if he had fought a hard battle.

Con. Ay, and gained nothing but a defeat, my

Tor. I'll shew cause for his behaviour.

Gen. S. Death and d—n! not for the world. I am taken by surprize here; let me consider a moment how to cut my way through the enemy.

Miss W. How could you be deceived in this manner. (To Capt. S.)

Lady R. Oh! Mr. Torrington, we are much obliged to you; you have been in town ever since last night, and only see us now by accident.

Tor. I have been very busy, madam; but you look sadly, very sadly, indeed; your old disorder, the jaundice, I suppose, has been very troublesome to you?

Lady R. Sir, you have a very extraordinary mode of complimenting your acquaintance.

Con. I don't believe, for all that, that there's a word of a lie in the truth he speaks. (Aside.)

Mrs. B. Miss Walsingham, Captain Savage, has been telling Mr. Belville and me of a very extraordinary mistake.

Miss W. 'Tis very strange, indeed, mistake on

Bel. 'Tis no way strange to find everybody properly struck with the merit of Miss Walsingham.

Miss W. A compliment from you, now, Mr. Belville, is really worth accepting.

Gen. S. If I thought the affair could be kept a secret, by making the town over to my son, since I am utterly shut out myself.

Capt. S. He seems exceedingly embarrassed.

Gen. S. If I thought that; why, mortified as I must be in giving it up, I think I could resolve upon the manœuvre, to save myself from universal ridicule; but it can't be, it can't be; and I only double my own disappointment in rewarding the disobedience of the rascal who has supplanted me. There! there! they are all talking of it, all laughing at me, and I shall run mad!

Mrs. T. (Without.) I say, you feather-headed puppy! he is in this house; my own servant saw him come in, and I will not stir till I find him.

Gen. S. She here! then deliberation is over, and I am entirely blown up.

Lady R. I'll take notes of this affair.

Enter MRS. TEMPEST.

Mrs. T. Mighty well, sir. So you are in love, it seems; and you want to be married, it seems?

Lee. My blessed aunt! Oh! how proud I am of the relation.

Gen. S. Dear Bab, give me quarter before all this

Mrs. T. You are in love, you old fool, are you? and you want to marry Miss Walsingham, indeed!

Con. I never heard a pleasanter spoken gentleman. Oh! honey, if I had the taming of her, she should never be abusive, without keeping a civil tongue in her head.

Mrs. T. Well, sir, and when is the happy day

Bel. What the devil, is this true, General?

Gen. S. True; can you believe such an absurdity?

Mrs. T. Why, will you deny, you miserable old mummy, that you made proposal of marriage to her?

Gen. S. Yes I do—no I don't—proposals of marriage!

Miss W. In favour of your son. I'll help him out a little. (Aside.)

Gen. S. Yes, in favour of my son. What the devil shall I do? (Aside.)

Mrs. B. Shall I take a lesson from this lady, Mr. Belville? Perhaps, if the women of virtue were to pluck up a little spirit, they might be soon as well treated as kept mistresses.

Mrs. T. Harkye, General Savage, I believe you assert a falsehood; but if you speak the truth, give your son this moment to Miss Walsingham, and let me be fairly rid of my rival.

Gen. S. My son, Miss Walsingham! Miss Walsingham, my son!

Bel. It will do, Horace, it will do.

Mrs. T. No prevarications, General Savage; do what I bid you instantly, or by all the wrongs of an enraged woman, I'll so expose you.

Con. What a fine fellow this is, to have the command of an army!

Gen. S. If Miss Walsingham can be prevailed

Tor. Oh! she'll oblige you readily. But you must settle a good fortune upon your son.

Mrs. T. That he shall do.

Mrs. B. Miss Walsingham, my dear—

Miss W. I can refuse nothing, either to your request, or to the request of the General.

Gen. S. Oblige me with your hand, then, madam. Come here, you—come here, Captain. There, there is Miss Walsingham's hand for you.

Con. And as pretty a little fist it is, as any in the three kingdoms.

Gen. S. Torrington shall settle the fortune.

Lee. I give you joy most heartily, madam.

Bel. We all give her joy.

Capt. S. Mine is beyond the power of expression.

Miss W. (Aside to the company.) And so is the General's, I believe.

Con. Oh! 'faith! that may be easily seen by the sweetness of his countenance.

Tor. Well, the cause being now at last determined, I think we may retire from the court.

Gen. S. And without any great credit, I fear, to the General.

Con. By my soul, you may say that.

Mrs. T. Do you murmur, sir? Come this moment home with me.

Gen. S. I'll go anywhere to hide this miserable head of mine. What a d—d campaign have I made of it!

[Exeunt Gen. S. and Mrs. T.]

Con. Upon my soul, if I was in the General's place, I'd divide the house with this devil; I'd keep within doors myself, and make her take the outside.

Bel. The day has been a busy one, thanks to the communicative disposition of the Captain.

Mrs. B. And the evening should be cheerful.

Bel. I sha'n't, therefore, part with one of you, 'till we have had a hearty laugh at our adventures.

Miss W. They have been very whimsical, indeed; yet, if represented on the stage, I hope they would be found not only entertaining, but instructive.

Lady R. Instructive! why the modern critics say, that the only business of Comedy is to make people laugh.

Bel. That is degrading the dignity of letters exceedingly, as well as lessening the utility of the stage. A good comedy is a capital effort of genius, and should, therefore, be directed to the noblest purposes.

Miss W. Very true; and unless we learn something while we chuckle, the carpenter who nails a pantomime together will be entitled to more applause, than the best comic poet in the kingdom.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Seraglio.

Enter ZARA and SELIMA.

Sel. It moves my wonder, young and beauteous Zara,

Whence these new sentiments inspire your heart!
Your peace of mind increases with your charms;
Tears now no longer shade your eyes' soft lustre:
You meditate no more those happy climes,
To which Nerestan will return to guide you.

Zara. Since after two long years he not returns,
'Tis plain his promise stretch'd beyond his power.

I own
I once admired the unprofitable zeal,
But now it charms no longer.

Sel. What if yet,
He, faithful, should return, and hold his vow;
Would you not, then—

Zara. No matter: time is past,
And everything is changed.

Sel. But whence comes this?

Zara. Go: 'twere too much to tell thee Zara's fate:

The sultan's secrets, all, are sacred here:

But my fond heart delights to mix with thine.
Some three months past, when thou, and other slaves,

Were forc'd to quit fair Jordan's flow'ry bank,
Heav'n, to cut short the anguish of my days,
Rais'd me to comfort by a powerful hand:

This mighty Osman—

Sel. What of him?

Zara. This sultan,
This conqueror of the Christians, loves—

Sel. Whom?

Zara. Zara.

Thou blushest, and, I guess, thy thoughts accuse me;

But know me better: 'twas unjust suspicion.

All emperor as he is, I cannot stoop
To honours that bring shame and baseness with them:

He offers marriage; and its rites now wait
To crown me empress of this eastern world.

Sel. Your virtue and your charms deserve it all:

My heart is not surprised, but struck to hear it.
If to be empress can complete your happiness,
I rank myself, with joy, among your slaves.

Zara. Be still my equal, and enjoy my blessings;

For, thou partaking, they will bless me more.

Sel. Alas! but heaven, will it permit this marriage?

Will not this grandeur, falsely call'd a bliss,
Plant bitterness, and root it in your heart?
Have you forgot you are of Christian blood?

Zara. Ah me! What hast thou said? Why wouldst thou thus
Recal my wav'ring thoughts? How know I,
what,
Or whence I am? Heaven kept it hid in dark-
ness,

Conceal'd me from myself, and from my blood.

Sel. Nerestan, who was born a Christian, here,
Asserts that you, like him, had Christian parents;
Besides, that cross, which, from your infant
years,

Has been preserved, was found upon your bosom,
As if design'd by heaven a pledge of faith
Due to the God you purpose to forsake.

Zara. This cross, as often as it meets my eye,
Strikes through my heart a kind of awful fear.
I honour, from my soul, the Christian laws;
Those laws, which, softening nature by humanity,
Melt nations into brotherhood: no doubt,
Christians are happy; and 'tis just to love them.

Sel. Why have you, then, declared yourself their foe?

Why will you join your hand with this proud
Osman's,

Who owes his triumph to the Christians' ruin?

Zara. Ah! Who could slight the offer of his heart?

Nay, for I mean to tell thee all my weakness,
Perhaps I had ere now professed thy faith,
But Osman lov'd me, and I've lost it all:
I think on none but Osman: my pleased heart,
Fill'd with the blessing to be loved by him,
Wants room for other happiness. Place thou
Before thy eyes his merit and his fame,
His youth, yet blooming but in manhood's dawn;
How many conquer'd kings have swell'd his
pow'r!

Think, too, how lovely! how his brow becomes
This wreath of early glories! Oh! my friend,
I talk not of a sceptre, which he gives me:
No; to be charm'd with that were thanks too
humble;

Offensive tribute, and too poor for love!
'Twas Osman won my heart, not Osman's crown:
I love not in him aught besides himself.
Thou think'st, perhaps, that these are starts of
passion;

But had the will of heav'n, less bent to bless him,
Doom'd Osman to my chains, and me to fill
The throne that Osman sits on, ruin and wretched-
ness

Catch and consume my wishes! but I would,
To raise me to myself, descend to him.

Sel. Hark! the wish'd music sounds. 'Tis he!
he comes! [Exit.]

*Enter OSMAN, reading a paper, which he delivers to

Osm. Wait my return; or should there be a cause
That may require my presence, do not fear
To enter; ever mindful, that my own

[Exit Orasman with Attendants.]
Follows my people's happiness. At length,
Cares have releas'd my heart to love and Zara.

Zara. 'Twas not in cruel absence to deprive
me
Of your imperial image; everywhere
You reign triumphant: memory supplies
Reflection with your power; and you, like heaven,

Are always present, and are always gracious.

Osm. The sultans, and my great ancestors, be-queath'd

Their empire to me, but their taste they gave
not;

Their laws, their lives, their loves, delight not
me:

I know our prophet smiles on am'rous wishes,
And opens a wide field to vast desire;
I know, that at my will I might possess;
That, wasting tenderness in wild profusion,
I might look down to my surrounded feet,
And bless contending beauties. I might speak,
Serenely slothful, from within my palace,
And bid my pleasure be my people's law.
But, sweet as softness is, its end is cruel;
I can look round and count a hundred kings,
Unconquer'd by themselves, and slaves to others:

Hence was Jerusalem to Christians lost;
Hence from the distant Euxine to the Nile,
The trumpet's voice has waked the world to war;

Yet, amidst arms and death thy power has reach'd
me;

For thou disdain'st, like me, a languid love;
Glory and Zara join and charm together.

Zara. I hear at once with blushes and with joy,

This passion, so unlike your country's customs.

Osm. Passion like mine disdains my country's customs;

I know to love you, Zara, with esteem;
To trust your virtue, and to court your soul.
Nobly confiding, I unveil my heart,
And dare inform you that 'tis all your own.
My joys must all be your's; only my cares
Shall lie conceal'd within, and reach not Zara.

Zara. How low, how wretched was the lot of Zara!

Too poor, with aught but thanks to pay such blessings!

Osm. Not so; I love, and would be loved
again;

Let me confess it, I possess a soul,
That what it wishes, wishes ardently.
I should believe you hated, had you power
To love with moderation: 'tis my aim,
In everything to reach supreme perfection.
If with an equal flame I touch your heart,
Marriage attends your smile. But know, 'twill make

Me wretched, if it make not Zara happy.

Zara. Ah! sir, if such a heart as gen'rous
Osman's

Can, from my will, submit to take its bliss,
What mortal ever was decreed so happy?
Pardon the pride with which I own my joy;
Thus wholly to possess the man I love;
To know and to confess his will my fate;
To be the happy work of his dear hands;
To be—

Enter ORASMIN.

Osm. Already interrupted! What?
Who? Whence?

Oras. This moment, sir, there is arrived
That Christian slave, who, licens'd on his faith,
Went hence to France; and now returned, prays audience.

Osm. Admit him.—What? Why comes he not?

Oras. He waits without. No Christian dares approach

This place, long sacred to the sultan's privacies.

Osm. Go, bring him with thee; monarchs, like the sun,

Shine but in vain, unwarming, if unseen;
With forms and rev'rence let the great approach
us,

Not the unhappy; every place alike

Gives the distress'd a privilege to enter.

[Exit Orasmin.]

I think with horror on these dreadful maxims,
Which harden kings, insensibly, to tyrants.

Enter ORASMIN with NERESTAN.

Ner. Imperial sultan! honour'd even by foes!
See me return'd, regardful of my vow,
And punctual to discharge a Christian's duty.
I bring the ransom of the captive Zara,
Fair Selima, the partner of her fortune,
And of ten Christian captives, pris'ners here.
You promised, sultan, if I should return,
To grant their rated liberty: behold,
I am return'd, and they are your's no more.
I would have stretch'd my purpose to myself,
But fortune has deny'd it; my poor all
Suffic'd no further, and a noble poverty
Is now my sole possession. I redeem
The promis'd Christians, for I taught them hope;
But, for myself, I come again your slave,
To wait the fuller hand of future charity.

Osm. Christian, I must confess thy courage charms me;
But let thy pride be taught it treads too high
When it presumes to climb above my mercy.
Go, ransomless, thyself, and carry back
Their unaccepted ransoms, join'd with gifts,
Fit to reward thy purpose; instead of ten,
Demand a hundred Christians; they are thine:
Take them, and bid them teach their haughty country

They left some virtue among Saracens:
Be Lusignan excepted. He,
Who boasts the blood of kings, and dares lay claim

To my Jerusalem—that claim, his guilt!
Such is the law of states; had I been vanquish'd,
Thus had he said of me. I mourn his lot,
Who must in fetters, lost to daylight, pine
And sigh away old age in grief and pain.
For Zara, but to name her as a captive,
Were to dishonour language; she's a prize
Above thy purchase: all the Christian realms,
With all their kings to guide them, would unite
In vain to force her from me. Go, retire.

Ner. For Zara's ransom, with her own consent,

I had your royal word. For Lusignan—
Unhappy, poor, old man—

Osm. Was I not heard?
Have I not told thee, Christian, all my will?
What, if I prais'd thee! This presumptuous
virtue,

Compelling my esteem, provokes my pride:
Begone; and, when to-morrow's sun shall rise
On my dominions, be not found too near me.

[Exit Nerestan.]

Zara, retire a moment.

Assume, throughout my palace, sovereign empire,

While I give orders to prepare the pomp
That waits to crown thee mistress of my throne.

[Leads her out, and returns.]

Orasmin, didst thou mark th' imperious slave?
What could he mean? He sigh'd, and as he went,

Turn'd and look'd back at Zara. Didst thou mark
it?

Oras. Alas! my sovereign master, let not jealousy

Strike high enough to reach your noble heart.

Osm. Jealousy, saidst thou? I disdain it: no!
Distrust is poor, and a misplaced suspicion
Invites and justifies the falsehood fear'd.
Yet, as I love with warmth, so I could hate.
But Zara is above disguise and art:
My love is stronger, nobler, than my power.

Jealous! I was not jealous: if I were,
I am not—no—my heart—but let us drown
Remembrance of the word:
My heart is fill'd with a diviner flame.
Go, and prepare for the approaching nuptials;
Zara to careful empire joins delight;
I must allot one hour to thoughts of state,
Then, all the smiling day is love and Zara's.

[Exit Orasmin.]

Monarchs, by forms of pompous misery press'd,
In proud, unsocial misery unblest'd,
Would, but for love's soft influence, curse their throne,
And, among crowded millions, live alone. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Another Apartment.

Enter NERESTAN and CHATILLON.

Chat. Matchless Nerestan! generous and great!
You, who have broke the chains of hopeless
slaves!

You, Christian saviour, by a Saviour sent;
Appear, be known, enjoy your due delight.
The grateful weepers wait to clasp your knees,
They throng to kiss the happy hand that sav'd
them:

Indulge the kind impatience of their eyes,
And, at their head, command their hearts for ever.

Ner. Illustrious Chatillon! this praise o'erwhelms
me;

What have I done beyond a Christian's duty?
Beyond what you would, in my place, have done?

Chat. True, it is every honest Christian's
duty;

Nay, 'tis the blessings of such minds as ours,
For others' good to sacrifice our own;
Yet, happy they, to whom heav'n grants the power

To execute, like you, that duty's call.
For us, the relics of abandon'd war,
Forgot in France, and, in Jerusalem,
Left to grow old in fetters,—Osman's father
Consign'd us to the gloom of a damp dungeon,
Where, but for you, we must have groan'd out life,

And native France have bless'd our eyes no
more.

Ner. The will of gracious heav'n, that soften'd
Osman,

Inspir'd me for your sakes. But with our joy
Flows mix'd a bitter sadness. I had hoped
To save from their perversion a young beauty,
Who, in her infant innocence, with me,
Was made a slave by cruel Noradin;
When, sprinkling Syria with the blood of Christians,

Cæsarea's walls saw Lusignan surpris'd,
And the proud crescent rise in bloody triumph.
From this seraglio, having young escap'd,
Fate, three years since, restor'd me to my chains;

Then, sent to Paris on my plighted faith,
I flatter'd my fond hope with vain resolves,
To guide the lovely Zara to that court;
But Osman will detain her—yet, not Osman,
Zara herself forgets she is a Christian,
And loves the tyrant sultan. Let that pass:
I mourn a disappointment still more cruel;
The prop of all our Christian hope is lost.

Chat. Dispose me at your will; I am your own.

Ner. Oh! sir, great Lusignan, so long their captive,
That last of an heroic race of kings;
That warrior, whose past fame has fill'd the world,
Osman refuses to my sighs for ever.

Chat. Nay, then, we have been all redeem'd in vain;
Perish that soldier who would quit his chains
And leave his noble chief behind in fetters.
Alas! you know him not as I have known him;
Thank heav'n, that plac'd your birth so far remov'd

From those detested days of blood and woe.
But I, less happy, was condemn'd to see
Thy walls, Jerusalem, beat down,
And our last king, oppress'd with age and arms,
Murder'd, and bleeding o'er his murder'd sons.
Then, Lusignan, sole remnant of his race,
Rallying our fated few amidst the flames,
Fearless, beneath the crush of falling towers,
The conquerors and the conquer'd, groans and death;

Dreadful!—and waving in his hand a sword,
Red with the blood of infidels, cried out,
“This way, ye faithful Christians, follow me.”

Ner. How full of glory was that brave retreat!

Chat. 'Twas heav'n, no doubt, that sav'd and led him on;
Pointed his path, and march'd our guardian guide:

We reach'd Cæsarea; there the general voice
Chose Lusignan thenceforth to give us laws;
Alas! 'twas vain: Cæsarea could not stand,
When Sion's self was fallen! we were betray'd,
And Lusignan condemn'd to length of life,
In chains, in damps, and darkness, and despair:
Yet, great amidst his miseries, he look'd
As if he could not feel his fate himself,
But as it reach'd his followers. And shall we,
For whom our generous leader suffer'd this,
Be vilely safe, and dare be bless'd without him?

Ner. Oh! I should hate the liberty he shar'd not.

I know too well the miseries you describe,
For I was born amidst them. Chains and death,
Cæsarea lost, and Saracens triumphant,
Were the first objects which my eyes e'er look'd on.

Hurried, an infant, among other infants,
Snatch'd from the bosoms of their bleeding mothers,

A temple sav'd us, till the slaughter ceased;
Then were we sent to this ill-fated city,
Here, in the palace of our former kings,
To learn from Saracens their hated faith,
And be completely wretched. Zara, too,
Shar'd this captivity; we both grew up,
So near each other, that a tender friendship
Endear'd her to my wishes. My fond heart
(Pardon its weakness) bleeds to see her lost;
And, for a barb'rous tyrant, quit her God.

Chat. Such is the Saracens' too fatal policy!
Watchful seducers still of infant weakness:
Happy that you so young escap'd their hands!
But let us think—May not this Zara's int'rest,
Loving the sultan, and by him belov'd,
For Lusignan procure some softer sentence?
The wise and just, with innocence, may draw
Their own advantage from the guilt of others.

Ner. What prospect of success from an apostate?

On whom I cannot look without disdain;
And who will read her shame upon my brow.
The hardest trial of a generous mind
Is to court favours from a hand it scorns.

Chat. Think it is Lusignan we seek to serve.

Ner. Well, it shall be attempted. Hark! who's this?

Are my eyes false, or is it really she?

Enter ZARA.

Zara. Start not, my worthy friend, I come to seek you;

The sultan has permitted it;
It pleas'd your pity, shall I say, your friendship?

Or rather, shall I call it generous charity?
To form that noble purpose, to redeem
Distressful Zara; you procur'd my ransom,
And with a greatness that out-soar'd a crown,
Return'd, yourself a slave, to give me freedom;
But heav'n has cast our fate for different climes:
Here, in Jerusalem, I fix for ever;
Yet, among all the shine that marks my fortune,
I shall with frequent tears remember your's;
Your goodness will for ever soothe my heart,
And keep your image still a dweller there:
Warm'd by your great example to protect
That faith that lifts humanity so high,
I'll be a mother to distressful Christians.

Ner. How! You protect the Christians! You, who can

Abjure their saving truth, and coldly see
Great Lusignan, their chief, die slow in chains!

Zara. To bring him freedom you behold me here;

You will this moment meet his eyes in joy.

Chat. Shall I, then, live to bless that happy hour?

Zara. See where they bring the good old chief, grown dim

With age, by pain and sorrows hasten'd on.

Enter LUSIGNAN, led in by two Guards.

Lus. Where am I? From the dungeon's depth,
what voice

Has call'd me to revisit long-lost day?
Am I with Christians? I am weak—forgive me,
And guide my trembling steps. I'm full of years;

My miseries have worn me more than age.

Am I, in truth, at liberty? (Seating himself.)

Chat. You are;
And every Christian's grief takes end with your's.

Lus. Oh, light! Oh! dearer far than light, that voice!

Chatillon, is it you? my fellow martyr!
And shall our wretchedness, indeed, have end?
In what place are we now? my feeble eyes,
Disus'd to daylight, long in vain to find you.

Chat. This was the palace of your royal fathers:

'Tis now the son of Noradin's seraglio.

Zara. The master of this place, the mighty Osman,
Distinguishes and loves to cherish virtue.
This generous Frenchman, yet a stranger to you,
Drawn from his native soil, from peace and rest,
Brought the vow'd ransoms of ten Christian slaves,

Himself contented to remain a captive:
But Osman, charm'd by greatness like his own,
To equal what he lov'd, has giv'n him you.

Lus. So gen'rous France inspires her social sons!

They have been ever dear and useful to me.

Would I were nearer to him! Noble sir,

(Nerestan approaches.)

How have I merited that you for me
Should pass such distant seas to bring me blessings,

And hazard your own safety for my sake?

Ner. My name, sir, is Nerestan; born in Syria,

I wore the chains of slavery from my birth;
Till quitting the proud crescent for the court
Where warlike Lewis reigns, beneath his eye
I learnt the trade of arms;
Your sight, unhappy prince, would charm his
eye;
That best and greatest monarch will behold
With grief and joy these venerable wounds,
And print embraces where your fetters bound
you.

All Paris will revere the cross's martyr.

Lus. Alas! in times long past, I've seen its glory:

When Philip the victorious liv'd, I fought
Abreast with Montmorency and Melun,
D'Estaing, De Neile, and the far-famous
Courcy;
Names which were then the praise and dread of
war;

But what have I to do at Paris now?

I stand upon the brink of the cold grave;
That way my journey lies; to find, I hope,
The King of kings; and ask the recompense
For all my woes, long suffer'd for his sake.
You generous witnesses of my last hour,
While yet I live, assist my humble prayers,
And join the resignation of my soul.
Nerestan! Chatillon! and you, fair mourner,
Whose tears do honour to an old man's sorrows,
Pity a father, the unhappiest, sure,
That ever felt the hand of angry heaven!
My eyes, though dying, still can furnish tears;
Half my long life they flow'd, and still will flow:

A daughter and three sons, my heart's proud hopes,

Were all torn from me in their tend'rest years;
My friend Chatillon knows, and can remember—

Chat. Would I were able to forget your woe!

Lus. Thou wert a prisoner with me in Cæsarea,
And there beheldst my wife and two dear sons
Perish in the flames.

Chat. A captive, and in fetters,
I could not help them.

Lus. I know thou couldst not.

Oh! 'twas a dreadful scene! these eyes beheld
it—

Husband and father, helpless I beheld it—
Denied the mournful privilege to die.

Oh! my poor children! whom I now deplore,

If ye be saints in heav'n, as sure ye are,
Look with an eye of pity on that brother,
That sister whom you left! If I have yet
Or son or daughter: for, in early chains,
Far from their lost and unassisting father,
I heard that they were sent, with numbers more,
To this seraglio; hence to be dispers'd
In nameless remnants o'er the east, and spread
Our Christian miseries round a faithless world.

Chat. 'Twas true; for, in the horrors of that day,

I snatch'd your infant daughter from her cradle;
When, from my bleeding arms, fierce Saracens
Forc'd the lost innocent, who smiling lay,
And pointed, playful, at the swarthy spoilers.
With her, your youngest, then your only son,
Whose little life had reach'd the fourth sad year,
And just giv'n sense to feel his own misfortunes,
Was order'd to this city.

Ner. I, too, hither,
Just at that fatal age, from lost Cæsarea,
Came in that cloud of undistinguish'd Christians.

Lus. You! came you thence? Alas! who knows but you

Might heretofore have seen my two poor children.

(Looking up.)

Ha! madam, that small ornament you wear,

Its form a stranger to this country's fashion,
How long has it been your's?

Zara. From my first birth, sir.

Ah! what! you seem surpris'd! why should this move you?

Lus. Would you confide it to my trembling
hands?

Zara. To what new wonders am I now re-serv'd?

Oh! sir, what mean you?

Lus. Providence and heaven!

Oh! failing eyes, deceive ye not my hope!

Can this be possible? Yes, yes, 'tis she;

This little cross—I know it by sure marks.

Oh! take me, heav'n, while I can die with joy—

Zara. Oh! do not, sir, distract me: rising
thoughts,

And hopes and fears, o'erwhelm me!

Lus. Tell me yet,

Has it remain'd for ever in your hands?

What, both brought captives from Cæsarea
hither?

Zara. Both, both.

Lus. Their voice, their looks,

The living images of their dear mother!

Oh! God, who see'st my tears, and know'st my thoughts,

Do not forsake me at this dawn of hope;

Strengthen my heart, too feeble for this joy.

Madam—Nerestan—Help me, Chatillon;

(Rising.)

Nerestan, hast thou on thy breast a scar,

Which, ere Cæsarea fell, from a fierce hand,

Surprising us by night, my child receiv'd?

Ner. Bless'd hand! I bear it, sir; the mark is there.

Lus. Merciful heaven!

Zara. (Kneeling.) My father! Oh!

Lus. Oh! my children!

My son, my daughter! lost in embracing you,

I would now die, lest this should prove a dream.

Chat. How touch'd is my glad heart to see their joy! (Aside.)

Lus. Again I find you; dear in wretched-
ness:

Oh! my brave son, and thou, my nameless daughter;

Now dissipate all doubt, remove all dread.

Has heaven, that gives me back my children, giv'n
them

Such as I lost them? Come they Christians to
me?

One weeps, and one declines a conscious eye:

Your silence speaks—too well I understand it.

Zara. I cannot, sir, deceive you: Osman's laws

Were mine, and Osman is not Christian.

Lus. Her words are thunder bursting on my head;

Wer't not for thee, my son, I now should die.

Full sixty years I fought the Christian's cause,
Saw their doom'd temple fall, their power destroy'd;

Twenty, a captive, in a dungeon's depth,

Yet never for myself my tears sought heaven;

All for my children rose my fruitless prayers.

Yet what avails a father's wretched joy?

I have a daughter gain'd, and heav'n an enemy!

Oh! my misguided daughter, lose not thy faith;

Reclaim thy birthright; think upon the blood

Of twenty Christian kings that fills thy veins;

What would thy mother feel to see thee thus!

She and thy murder'd brothers! think they call
thee!

Think that thou seest them stretch their bloody arms,

And weep, to win thee from their murd'rer's bosom.

Ev'n in the place where thou betray'st thy God,
He died, my child, to save thee. Turn thy eyes
And see; for thou art near his sacred sepulchre;
Thou canst not move a step but where he trod!
Thou tremblest—Oh! admit me to thy soul;
Kill not thy aged, thy afflicted father;
Take not, thus soon, again, the life thou gav'st
him;

Shame not thy mother, nor renounce thy God.
'Tis past. Repentance dawns in thy sweet eyes;
I see bright truth descending to thy heart,
And now, my long-lost child is found for ever.

Zara. Oh! my father,
Dear author of my life, inform me, teach me,
What should my duty do?

Lus. By one short word,
To dry up all my tears, and make life welcome,
Say, thou art a Christian.

Zara. Sir, I am a Christian.

Lus. Receive her, gracious heaven! and bless her for it!

Enter ORASMIN.

Oras. Madam, the sultan order'd me to tell
you,
That he expects you instant quit this place,
And bid your last farewell to these vile Christians.

You, captive Frenchmen, follow me; for you,
It is my task to answer.

Chat. Still new miseries!
How cautious man should be to say, "I'm happy!"

Lus. These are the times, my friends, to try our firmness,
Our Christian firmness.

Zara. Alas! sir—Oh!

Lus. Oh! you—I dare not name you:
Farewell! but come what may, be sure remember
You keep the fatal secret; for the rest,
Leave all to heaven: be faithful, and be bless'd.
[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Seraglio.

Enter OSMAN and ORASMIN.

Osm. Orasmin, this alarm was false and ground-
less;
Lewis no longer turns his arm on me:
The French, grown weary by a length of woes,
Wish not at once to quit their fruitful plains,
And famish on Arabia's desert sands:
Their ships, 'tis true, have spread the Syrian seas;
And Lewis, hovering o'er the coast of Cyprus,
Alarms the fears of Asia. But I've learnt,
That, steering wide from our unmenac'd ports,
He points his thunder at th' Egyptian shore.
There let him war and waste my enemies;
Their mutual conflict will but fix my throne.
Release those Christians: I restore their freedom;
'Twill please their master, nor can weaken me:
Transport them at my cost, to find their king;
I wish to have him know me: carry thither
This Lusignan, whom, tell him, I restore,
Because I cannot fear his fame in arms;
But love him for his virtue and his blood.
Tell him, my father, having conquer'd twice,
Condemn'd him to perpetual chains; but I
Have set him free, that I may triumph more.

Oras. The Christians gain an army in his name.

Osm. I cannot fear a sound.

Oras. But, sir, should Lewis—

Osm. Tell Lewis and the world—It shall be so:

Zara propos'd it, and my heart approves:
Thy statesman's reason is too dull for love.
But I talk on, and waste the smiling moments.
For one long hour I yet defer my nuptials;
But 'tis not lost, that hour; 'twill be all her's;
She would employ it in a conference
With that Nerestan, whom thou know'st—that Christian.

Oras. And have you, sir, indulg'd that strange desire?

Osm. What mean'st thou? They were infant slaves together;
Friends should part kind, who are to meet no
more.

When Zara asks, I will refuse her nothing:
Restraint was never made for those we love.
Down with those rigours of the proud seraglio!
I hate its laws: where blind austerity
Sinks virtue to necessity. My blood
Disclaims your Asian jealousy. I hold
The fierce, free plainness of my Scythian ancestors,

Their open confidence, their honest hate,
Their love unfearing, and their anger told.
Go; the good Christian waits; conduct him to
her;

Zara expects thee; what she wills, obey. [Exit.]

Oras. Ho! Christian, enter. Wait a moment
here.

Enter NERESTAN.

Zara will soon approach: I go to find her. [Exit.]

Ner. In what a state, in what a place I leave
her!
She's here.

Enter ZARA.

Thank heaven, it is not, then, unlawful
To see you yet once more, my lovely sister!
For Lusignan,
His last sad hour's at hand.
Oh! let not doubt
Disturb his parting moments with distrust;
Let me, when I return to close his eyes,
Tell him
You are confirm'd a Christian.

Zara. What, am I not your sister? and shall
you

Refuse me credit? You suppose me light;
You, who would judge my honour by your own,
Shall you distrust a truth I dar'd avow,
And stamp apostate on a sister's heart?

Ner. Ah! do not misconceive me. If I err'd,
Affection, not distrust, misled my fear;
Your will may be a Christian, yet not you;
Swear, swear by all the woes we all have borne,
By all the martyr'd saints who call you daughter,

That you consent, this day, to seal our faith,
By that mysterious rite which waits your call.

Zara. I swear by heaven, and all its holy host,

Its saints, its martyrs, its attesting angels,
And the dread presence of its living Author,
To have no faith but yours:—to die a Christian!
But, tell me—nor be tender on this point,
What punishment your Christian laws decree,
For an unhappy wretch, who, to herself
Unknown, and all abandon'd to the world,
Lost and enslav'd, has, in her sov'reign master,
Found a protector, generous as great,
Has touch'd his heart, and given him all her
own?

Ner. The punishment of such a slave should be
Death in this world, and pain in that to come.

Zara. I am that slave—

Ner. Destruction to my hopes! Can it be you?

Zara. It is: adored by Osman, I adore him:
This hour the nuptial rites will make us one.

Ner. What, marry Osman! Let the world grow dark,
That the extinguish'd sun may hide thy shame!
Could it be thus, it were no crime to kill thee.

Zara. Strike, strike! I love him; yes, by heav'n,
I love him.

Ner. Death is thy due; but not thy due from me.

Yes, I will dare acquaint our father with it:
Departing Lusignan may live so long,
As just to hear thy shame, and die to 'scape it.

Zrra. Stay, my too angry brother, stay; perhaps,

Zara has resolution great as thine:

'Tis cruel, and unkind! Thy words are crimes;
My weakness but misfortune! Dost thou suffer?
I suffer more. Oh! would to heaven this blood
Of twenty boasted kings would stop at once,
And stagnate in my heart! it then no more
Would rush in boiling fevers through my veins,
And ev'ry trembling drop be fill'd with Osman.
How has he lov'd me, how has he oblig'd me!
I owe thee to him:

For me, he softens the severe decrees
Of his own faith; and is it just that mine
Should bid me hate him, but because he loves me?

No; I will be a Christian; but preserve
My gratitude as sacred as my faith.

Ner. Here, then, begin performance of thy vow;

Here, in the trembling horrors of thy soul,
Promise thy king, thy father, and thy God,
Not to accomplish these detested nuptials,
Till first the rev'rend priest has clear'd your eyes,

Taught you to know, and giv'n you claim to heav'n.

Promise me this—

Zara. So bless me, heaven, I do!
Go, hasten the good priest, I will expect him;
But first return,—cheer my expiring father,
Tell him I am, and will be, all he wishes me:
Tell him, to give him life, 'twere joy to die.

Ner. I go. Farewell, farewell, unhappy sister! [Exit.]

Zara. I am alone; and now be just, my heart!
And tell me, wilt thou dare betray thy God?
What am I? What am I about to be?
Daughter of Lusignan, or wife to Osman?
Help me, heaven!
To thy hard laws I render up my soul;
But, oh! demand it back, for now 'tis Osman's.

Enter OSMAN.

Osm. Shine out, appear, be found, my lovely Zara!

Impatient eyes attend, the rites expect thee;
And my devoted heart no longer brooks
This distance from its soft'ner!
Come, my slow love! the ceremonies wait thee;
Come, and begin from this dear hour my triumph.

Zara. Oh! what a wretch am I! Oh, grief! oh, love!

Osm. Nay, Zara, give me thy hand, and come—

Zara. My lord, my sov'reign!
Heav'n knows this marriage would have been a bliss

Above my humble hopes: yet, witness, love!
Not from the grandeur of your throne that bliss,
But from the pride of calling Osman mine.

But, as it is,—these Christians—

Osm. Christians! What!

How start two images into thy thoughts,
So distant—as the Christians and my love!

Zara. That good old Christian, rev'rend Lusignan,
Now dying, ends his life and woes together.

Osm. Well, let him die! What has thy heart to feel,

Thus pressing, and thus tender, from the death
Of an old wretched Christian? Thank our prophet,

Thou art no Christian! Educated here,
Thy happy youth was taught our better faith:
Sweet as thy pity shines, 'tis now mis-tim'd.

What, though an aged suff'rer die unhappy,
Why should his foreign fate disturb our joys?

Zara. Sir, if you love me, and would have me think

That I am truly dear—

Osm. Heaven, if I love!—

Zara. Permit me—

Osm. What?

Zara. To desire—

Osm. Speak out.

Zara. The nuptial rites

May be deferr'd till—

Osm. What!—Is that the voice
Of Zara?

Zara. Oh! I cannot bear his frown! (Aside.)

Osm. Of Zara?

Zara. It is dreadful to my heart—

Pardon my grief—Alas! I cannot bear it;

There is a painful terror in your eye

That pierces to my soul: hid from your sight,

I go to make a moment's truce with tears,

And gather force to speak of my despair.

[Exit, disordered.]

Osm. I stand immoveable, like senseless marble:

Horror had frozen my suspended tongue,

And an astonish'd silence robb'd my will

Of power to tell her that she shock'd my soul!

Spoke she to me? Sure, I misunderstood her!

Could it be me she left?—What have I seen!

Enter ORASMIN.

Orasmin, what a change is here! She's gone,
And I permitted it, I know not how.

Oras. Perhaps you but accuse the charming fault

Of innocence, too modest oft in love.

Osm. But why, and whence those tears? those looks, that flight,

That grief, so strongly stamp'd on every feature?

If it has been that Frenchman!—What a thought!

How low, how horrid a suspicion that!

The dreadful flash at once gives light and kills me.—

But tell me, didst thou mark them at their parting?

Didst thou observe the language of their eyes?

Hide nothing from me—Is my love betray'd?

Tell me my whole disgrace: nay, if thou tremblest,

I hear thy pity speak, though thou art silent.

Oras. I did, 'tis true, observe some parting tears;

But they were tears of charity and grief:

I cannot think there was a cause deserving

This agony of passion—

Osm. Why no—I thank thee—

Orasmin, thou art wise. It could not be,

That I should stand expos'd to such an insult.

Thou know'st, had Zara meant me the offence,

She wants not wisdom to have hid it better.

How rightly didst thou judge! Zara shall know it,

And thank thy honest service.—After all,

Might she not have some cause for tears, which I
Claim no concern in, but the grief it gives her?
What an unlikely fear—from a poor slave,
Who goes to-morrow, and, no doubt, who wishes,
Nay, who resolves, to see these climes no more.

Oras. Why did you, sir, against our country's custom,

Indulge him with a second leave to come?

He said he should return once more to see her.

Osm. Return! The traitor! he return! Dares he

Presume to press a second interview?

Would he be seen again? He shall be seen,

But dead. I'll punish the audacious slave,

To teach the faithless fair to feel my anger.

Be still, my transports; violence is blind:

I know my heart at once is fierce and weak.

Rather than fall

Beneath myself, I must, how dear soe'er

It costs me, rise—till I look down on Zara!

Away—but mark me: these seraglio doors

Against all Christians be they henceforth shut,

Close as the dark retreats of silent death.

[Exit Orasmin.]

What have I done, just heav'n! thy rage to move,

That thou shouldst sink me down so low—to love?

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Seraglio.

ZARA and SELIMA discovered.

Sel. Ah! madam, how at once I grieve your fate,

And how admire your virtue! Heaven permits,
And heaven will give you strength, to bear misfortune;

To break these chains, so strong and yet so dear.

Zara. Oh! that I could support the fatal struggle!

Sel. To-night the priest,
In private introduc'd, attends you here:
You promis'd him admission.

Zara. Would I had not!
I promis'd, too, to keep this fatal secret:
Compell'd to silence, Osman is enrag'd;
Suspicion follows, and I lose his love.

Enter OSMAN.

Osm. Madam, there was a time when my charm'd
heart

Made it a virtue to be lost in love;

When, without blushing, I indulg'd my flame,

And ev'ry day still made you dearer to me.

You taught me, madam, to believe my love

Rewarded and return'd; nor was that hope,

Methinks, too bold for reason. Emperors,

Who choose to sigh devoted at the feet

Of beauties, whom the world conceive their slaves,

Have fortune's claim, at least, to sure success:

But 'twere prophane to think of power in love.

Dear as my passion makes you, I decline

Possession of her charms, whose heart's another's.

You will not find me a weak, jealous lover,

By coarse reproaches, giving pain to you,

And shaming my own greatness: wounded deeply,

Yet shunning and disdaining low complaint,

I come—to tell you—

Osman, in every trial, shall remember

That he is emperor. Whate'er I suffer,

'Tis due to honour that I give up you,
And to my injur'd bosom take despair,
Rather than shamefully possess you sighing;
Convinc'd those sighs were never meant for me.
Go, madam; you are free from Osman's pow'r;
Expect no wrongs, but see his face no more.

Zara. At last, tis come; the fear'd, the mur-d'ring moment

Is come; and I am curs'd by earth and heaven!

(Kneels.)

If it be true that I am lov'd no more;

If you—

Osm. It is too true, my fame requires it;

It is too true, that I unwilling leave you;

That I at once renounce you and adore—

Zara, you weep!

Zara. If I am doom'd to lose you;—

If I must wander o'er an empty world,

Unloving and unlov'd;—oh! yet, do justice

To the afflicted; do not wrong me doubly:

Punish me, if't be needful to your peace;

But say not, I deserv'd it.

May heav'n, that punishes, for ever hate me,

If I regret the loss of aught but you.

Osm. What! is it love to force yourself to wound

The heart you wish to gladden?

Lovers least know themselves; for I believ'd,

That I had taken back the power I gave you;

Yet, see! you did but weep, and have resum'd
me!

Proud as I am, I must confess, one wish

Evades my power—the blessing to forget you.

Zara, thy tears were form'd to teach disdain,

That softness can disarm it. 'Tis decreed,

I must for ever love! but from what cause,

(If thy consenting heart partake my fires,)

Art thou reluctant to a blessing meant me?

Speak! Is it artifice?

Oh! spare the needless pains. Art was not made

For Zara: art, however innocent,

Looks like deceiving; I abhorr'd it ever.

Zara. Alas! I have no art; not even enough

To hide this love, and this distress you give me.

Osm. New riddles! Speak with plainness to my soul:

What canst thou mean?

Zara. I have no power to speak it.

Osm. Is it some secret dangerous to my state?

Is it some Christian plot grown ripe against me?

Zara. Lives there a wretch so vile as to betray
you?

Osman is bless'd beyond the reach of fear:

Fears and misfortunes threaten only Zara.

Osm. Why threaten Zara?

Zara. Permit me, at your feet,

Thus trembling, to beseech a favour from you.

Osm. A favour! Oh! you guide the will of Osman.

Zara. But this day;

But this one sad, unhappy day, permit me,

Alone, and far divided from your eye,

To cover my distress, lest you, too tender,

Should see and share it with me: from to-mor-
row,

I will not have a thought conceal'd from you.

Osm. If it must be, it must. Be pleased, my will

Takes purpose from your wishes; and consent

Depends not on my choice, but your decree.

Go; but remember how he loves, who thus

Finds a delight in pain, because you give it.

Zara. It gives me more than pain to make you feel it.

Osm. And can you, Zara, leave me?

Zara. Alas, my lord!

Osm. It should be yet, methinks, too soon to fly me!

[Exit.]

Too soon, as yet, to wrong my easy faith.
 The more I think, the less I can conceive
 What hidden cause should raise such strange despair!
 Now, when her hopes have wings, and every wish
 Is courted to be lively! when love,
 And joy, and empire, press her to their bosom!
 Yet, was I blameless? No; I was too rash:
 I have felt jealousy, and spoke it to her;
 I have distrusted her, and still she loves:
 Generous atonement that!
 I remark'd,
 Ev'n while she wept, her soul, a thousand times,
 Sprung to her lips, and long'd to leap to mine,
 With honest, ardent utterance of her love.
 Who can possess a heart so low, so base,
 To look such tenderness, and yet have none?

Enter MELIDOR and ORASMIN.

Mel. This letter, great disposer of the world!
 Address'd to Zara, and in private brought,
 Your faithful guards this moment intercepted,
 And humbly offer to your sov'reign eye.

Osm. Come nearer; give it me.—To Zara!—
 Rise!
 Bring it with speed—Shame on your flattering distance!—

(Advancing, and snatching the letter.)
 Be honest; and approach me like a subject,
 Who serves the prince, yet not forgets the man.

Mel. One of the Christian slaves, whom late your bounty
 Releas'd from bondage, sought, with heedful
 guile,
 Unnotic'd, to deliver it. Discover'd,
 He waits, in chains, his doom from your decree.

Osm. Leave me.—[Exit Melidor.]—I tremble, as if something fatal
 Were meant me from this letter—Should I read
 it?

Oras. Who knows but it contains some happy
 truth,
 That may remove all doubts, and calm your heart?

Osm. Be it as 'twill, it shall be read.
 'Tis done: and now, (Opens the letter.)
 Fate, be thy call obey'd.—Orasmin, mark:—
(Reads.)

*“There is a secret passage tow'rd the mosque;
 That way you might escape; and, unperceiv'd,
 Fly your observers, and fulfil our hope:
 Despise the danger, and depend on me,
 Who wait you, but to die, if you deceive.”*

Hell! tortures! death! and woman!—What, Orasmin!

Are we awake? Heard'st thou? Can this be
 Zara?

Oras. 'Would I had lost all sense; for what I heard

Has cover'd my afflicted heart with horror!

Osm. Thou see'st how I am treated!

Oras. Monstrous treason!

To an affront like this you cannot, must not,
 Remain insensible. You, who but now,
 From the most slight suspicion, felt such pain,
 Must, in the horror of so black a guilt,
 Find an effectual cure, and banish love.

Osm. Seek her this instant! go, Orasmin, fly!
 Shew her this letter; bid her read, and tremble;
 Then, in the rising horrors of her guilt,
 Stab her unfaithful breast, and let her die.
 Say, while thou strik'st—Stay, stay; return, and pity me;

I will first think a moment: let that Christian
 Be straight confronted with her—Stay; I will,
 I will—I know not what!—'Would I were dead!

'Would I had died, unconscious of this shame!

Oras. Never did prince receive so bold a wrong!

Osm. See here detected this infernal secret!
 This fountain of her tears, which my weak heart
 Mistook for marks of tenderness and pain!
 Why, what a reach has woman to deceive!
 Under how fine a veil of grief and fear
 Did she propose retirement till to-morrow!
 And I, blind dotard! gave the fool's consent,
 Sooth'd her, and suffer'd her to go. She parted,
 Dissolv'd in tears; and parted to betray me!

Oras. Could you, my gracious lord, forgive my zeal,

You would—

Osm. I know it—thou art right—I'll see her—
 I'll tax her in thy presence—I'll upbraid her—
 I'll let her learn—Go; find, and bring her to me.

Oras. Believe me, sir, your threat'nings, your complaints,

What will they all produce, but Zara's tears,
 To quench this fancied anger? Your lost heart,
 Seduc'd against itself, will search but reasons
 To justify the guilt, which gives it pain.
 Rather conceal from Zara this discovery;
 And let some trusty slave convey the letter,
 Reclos'd, to her own hand; then shall you learn,
 Spite of her frauds, disguise, and artifice,
 The firmness or abasement of her soul.

Osm. Thy counsel charms me!
 Here, take this fatal letter; choose a slave,
 Whom yet she never saw, and who retains
 His tried fidelity. Despatch—begone!

[Exit Orasmin.]

Now, whither shall I turn my eyes and steps,
 The surest way to shun her, and give time
 For this discovering trial?—Heav'n! she's here.

Enter ZARA.

So, madam! fortune will befriend my cause,
 And free me from your fetters. You are met
 Most aptly, to dispel a new-ris'n doubt,
 That claims the finest of your arts to gloss it.
 Unhappy each by other, it is time
 To end our mutual pain, that both may rest.
 You want not generosity, but love;
 My pride forgotten, my obtruded throne,
 My favours, cares, respect, and tenderness,
 Touching your gratitude, provok'd regard;
 Till, by a length of benefits besieg'd,
 Your heart submitted, and you thought 'twas
 love:

But you deceiv'd yourself, and injur'd me.
 There is, I'm told, an object more deserving
 Your love than Osman: I would know his name.
 Be just, nor trifle with my anger: tell me,
 Now, while expiring pity struggles faint;
 While I have yet, perhaps, the power to pardon,
 Give up the bold invader of my claim,
 And let him die to save thee. Thou art known:
 Think and resolve. While I yet speak, renounce
 him;

While yet the thunder rolls suspended, stay it:
 Let thy voice charm me, and recall my soul,
 That turns averse, and dwells no more on Zara.

Zara. Can it be Osman speaks, and speaks to Zara?

If my heart
 Deserve reproach, 'tis for, but not from, Osman.

Osm. What, does she yet presume to swear sincerity?

Oh! boldness of unblushing perjury!
 Had I not seen, had I not read such proof

Of her light falsehood as extinguish'd doubt,
I could not be a man, and not believe her.

Zara. Alas! my lord, what cruel fears have seiz'd you?

What harsh, mysterious words were those I heard?

Osm. What fears should Osman feel, since Zara loves him?

Zara. I cannot live and answer to your voice
In that reproachful tone; your angry eye
Trembles with fury while you talk of love.

Osm. Since Zara loves him!

Zara. Is it possible
Osman should disbelieve it?

Can it be kind, can it be just to doubt me?

Osm. No; I can doubt no longer. You may retire.
[Exit Zara.]

Enter ORASMIN.

Orasmin, she's perfidious, even beyond
Her sex's undiscover'd power of seeming;
She's at the topmost point of shameless artifice;
An empress at deceiving!

Say, hast thou chos'n a slave? Is he intrusted?
Haste to detect her vileness and my wrongs.

Oras. Punctual I have obey'd your whole command:

But have you arm'd, my lord, your injur'd heart
With coldness and indifference? Can you hear,
All painless and unmov'd, the false one's shame?

Osm. Orasmin, I adore her more than ever.

Oras. My lord! my emperor! forbid it, heaven!

Osm. I have discern'd a gleam of distant hope;
This hateful Christian, the light growth of France,
Proud, young, vain, amorous, conceited, rash,
Has misconceiv'd some charitable glance,
And judg'd it love in Zara: he alone,
Then, has offended me. Is it her fault,
If those she charms are indiscreet and daring?
Zara, perhaps, expected not this letter;
And I, with rashness groundless as its writer's,
Took fire at my own fancy, and have wrong'd her.

Now, hear me with attention. Soon as night
Has thrown her welcome shadows o'er the palace;

When this Nerestan, this ungrateful Christian,
Shall lurk in expectation near our walls,
Be watchful that our guards surprise and seize him;

Then, bound in fetters, and o'erwhelm'd with shame,

Conduct the daring traitor to my presence:
But, above all, be sure you hurt not Zara;

Mindful to what supreme excess I love.

[Exit Orasmin.]

On this last trial all my hopes depend;
Prophet, for once thy kind assistance lend,
Dispel the doubts that rack my anxious breast;
If Zara's innocent, thy Osman's bless'd.

[Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Seraglio.

ZARA and SELIMA discovered.

Zara. Soothe me no longer with this vain desire;
To a recluse, like me, who dares henceforth
Presume admission? the seraglio's shut;
Barr'd and impassable—as death to time.
My brother ne'er must hope to see me more.

How now! what unknown slave accosts us here?

Enter MELIDOR.

Mel. This letter, trusted to my hands, receive,
In secret witness I am wholly your's.

(Zara reads the letter.)

Sel. Thou everlasting Ruler of the world,

(Aside.)

Shed thy wish'd mercy on our hopeless tears;
Redeem us from the hand of hated infidels,
And save my princess from the breast of Osman!

Zara. I wish, my friend, the comfort of your counsel.

Sel. Retire; you shall be call'd: wait near. Go, leave us.
[Exit Melidor.]

Zara. Read this, and tell me what I ought to answer:

For I would gladly hear my brother's voice.

Sel. Say, rather, you would hear the voice of heav'n:

'Tis not your brother calls you, but your God.

Zara. I know it, nor resist his awful will;
Thou know'st that I have bound my soul by oath;

But can I—ought I to engage myself,
My brother, and the Christians, in this danger?

Sel. 'Tis not their danger that alarms your fears;

Your love speaks loudest to your shrinking soul;
This tiger, savage in his tenderness,
Courts with contempt, and threatens amidst softness;

Yet, cannot your neglected heart efface

His fated, fix'd impression.

But talk no more of this unhappy passion:

What resolution will your virtue take?

Zara. All things combine to sink me to despair:

From the seraglio death alone will free me.

I'll send my brother word he may expect me.

Call in the faithful slave. God of my fathers!

[Exit Selima.]

Let thy hand save me, and thy will direct!

Enter SELIMA and MELIDOR.

Go, tell the Christian, who entrusted thee,
That Zara's heart is fix'd, nor shrinks at danger;
And that my faithful friend will, at the hour,
Expect, and introduce him to his wish.

Away!
[Exit with Selima.]

Enter OSMAN and ORASMIN.

Osm. Swifter, ye hours, move on; my fury glows

Impatient, and would push the wheels of time.

How now! What message dost thou bring? Speak boldly:

What answer gave she to the letter sent her?

Mel. She blush'd and trembled, and grew pale, and paus'd;

Then blush'd, and read it, and again grew pale;
And wept, and smil'd, and doubted, and resolv'd:

For after all this race of vary'd passions,
When she had sent me out, and call'd me back,
"Tell him," she cried, "who has intrusted thee,

That Zara's heart is fix'd, nor shrinks at danger;
And that my faithful friend will, at the hour,
Expect and introduce him to his wish."

Osm. Enough—begone—I have no ear for more.

[Exit Melidor.]

Leave me, thou, too, Orasmin. Leave me, life;
For ev'ry mortal aspect moves my hate:
Leave me to my distraction. I grow mad,
And cannot bear the visage of a friend.
Leave me to rage, despair, and shame and wrongs;
Leave me to seek myself, and shun mankind.

[Exit Orasmin.]

Who am I? Heav'n! Who am I? What resolve
I?

Zara! Nerestan! sounds the words like names
Decreed to join? Why pause I? Perish Zara!
Would I could tear her image from my heart!
'Twere happier not to live at all, than live
Her scorn.

Enter ORASMIN.

Orasmin! Friend, return; I cannot bear
This absence from thy reason. 'Twas unkind,
'Twas cruel to obey me, thus distress'd,
And wanting power to think, when I had lost
thee.

How goes the hour? has he appear'd, this rival?
Perish the shameful sound! This villain Christian!

Has he appear'd below?

Oras. Silent and dark,
Th' unbreathing world is hush'd, as if it heard,
And listen'd to your sorrows.

Osm. Oh! treacherous night!
Thou lend'st thy ready veil to ev'ry treason,
And teeming mischiefs thrive beneath thy shade.
Heardst thou nothing?

Oras. My lord!

Osm. A voice, like dying groans?

Oras. I listen, but can hear nothing.

Osm. Again! look out—he comes!

Oras. Nor tread of mortal foot, nor voice I hear;

The still seraglio lies profoundly plung'd
In death-like silence; nothing stirs. The air
Is soft as infant sleep, no breathing wind
Steals through the shadows to awaken night.

Osm. Horrors a thousand times more dark than these

Benight my suffering soul. Thou dost not know
To what excess of tenderness I lov'd her:
I knew no happiness but what she gave me;
Nor could have felt a misery but for her.
Pity this weakness: mine are tears, Orasmin,
That fall not oft, nor lightly.

Oras. Tears! Oh, heaven!

Osm. The first which ever yet unmann'd my eyes.

Oh! pity Zara—pity me, Orasmin.

These but forerun the tears of destin'd blood.

Oras. Oh! my unhappy lord! I tremble for
you.

Osm. Do, tremble at my sufferings, at my love;

At my revenge, too, tremble; for 'tis due,
And will not be deluded.

Oras. Hark! I hear

The steps of men along the neighb'ring wall.

Osm. Fly—seize him—'tis Nerestan! Wait no
chains,

But drag him down to my impatient eye.

[Exit Orasmin.]

Enter ZARA and SELIMA, in the dark.

Zara. Where art thou, Selima? Give me thy hand.

It is so dark, I tremble as I step,
With fears and startings never felt till now.

[Exit with Selima.]

Osm. Damnation! 'tis her voice; the well-known sound,

That has so often charm'd me into baseness!

Oh! the perfidious hypocrite! she goes

To meet th' inviting infidel! now now,

(Drawing a dagger.)

Revenge, stand firm, and intercept his wishes!

Revenge! on whom? No matter: earth and heaven

Would blush, should I forbear. Now, Zara, now!

(Drops the dagger.)

I must not, cannot strike; the starting steel

Unwilling flies my hand, and shuns to wound her.

Enter ZARA and SELIMA.

Zara. This is the private path; come nearer, lead me.

Are we not notic'd, think'st thou?

Sel. Fear not, madam;

It cannot now be long ere we shall meet him.

Osm. That word has given me back my ebbing rage.

(Recovers the dagger.)

Zara. I walk in terror, and my heart forebodes—

Who's there? Nerestan! Is it you? Oh! welcome—

Osm. (Stabbing her.) This to thy heart! 'Tis not the traitor meets thee,

'Tis the betray'd—who writes it in thy blood.

Zara. Oh! gracious heaven! receive my parting
soul,

And take thy trembling servant to thy mercy.

(Dies.)

Osm. "Soul!" then revenge has reach'd thee. I will now

Haste from this fatal place. I cannot leave her!

Whom did I strike? Was this the act of love?

Swallow me, earth! She's silent—Zara's dead!

And should I live to see returning day,

'Twill shew me but her blood! shew me, left joy-
less:

In wide, empty world, with nothing round me

But penitence and pain. And yet, 'twas just;

Hark! Destiny has sent her lover to me,

To fill my vengeance, and restore my joy!

Enter ORASMIN with NERESTAN.

Approach, thou wretch! thou more than curs'd!
come near:

Thou, who, in gratitude for freedom gain'd,

Hast given me miseries beyond thy own!

Thou heart of hero with a traitor's soul!

Go; reap thy due reward; prepare to suffer

Whate'er inventive malice can inflict,

To make thee feel thy death, and perish slow.

Are my commands obey'd?

Oras. All is prepared.

Osm. Thy wanton eyes look round in search of
her,

Whose love descending to a slave like thee,

From my dishonour'd hand receiv'd her doom.

See, where she lies!

Ner. Oh! fatal, rash mistake!

Osm. Dost thou behold her, slave?

Ner. Unhappy sister!

Osm. Sister! Didst thou say, "sister?" If thou didst,

Bless me with deafness, heaven!

Ner. Tyrant, I did.

She was my sister. All that now is left thee

Despatch. From my distracted heart drain next

The remnant of the royal Christian blood:

Old Lusignan, expiring in my arms,

Sent his too wretched son, with his last blessing,

To his now murder'd daughter.

Osm. Thy sister! Lusignan her father! Selima,
Can this be true?

Sel. Thy love was all the cloud, 'twixt her and heav'n.

Osm. Be dumb! for thou art base, to add distraction

To my already more than bleeding heart.

And was thy love sincere? What then remains?

Ner. Why should a tyrant hesitate on murder?

There now remains but mine of all the blood
Which, through thy father's cruel reign and
thine,

Has never ceas'd to stream on Syria's sands!

Restore a wretch to his unhappy race;

Nor hope that torments, after such a scene,

Can force one feeble groan, to feast thy anger.

I waste my fruitless words in empty air;

The tyrant, o'er the bleeding wound he made,

Hangs his unmoving eye, and heeds not me.

Osm. Oh, Zara!

Oras. Alas! my lord, return; whither would grief

Transport your generous heart? This Christian dog—

Osm. Take off his fetters, and observe my
will:

To him and all his friends give instant liberty:

Pour a profusion of the richest gifts

On these unhappy Christians; and when heap'd

With varied benefits, and charg'd with riches,

Give them safe conduct to the nearest port.

Oras. But, sir—

Osm. Reply not, but obey:

Fly; nor dispute thy master's last command;

Thy prince, who orders, and thy friend, who loves
thee.

Unhappy warrior! yet less lost than I,

Haste from our bloody land; and to thy own,

Convey this poor, pale object of my rage.

Thy king, and all his Christians, when they hear

Thy miseries, shall mourn them with their tears;

But, if thou tell'st them mine, and tell'st them
truly,

They, who hate my crime, shall pity me.

Take, too, this poniard with thee, which my hand

Has stain'd with blood far dearer than my own;

Tell them, with this I murder'd her I lov'd;

The noblest and most virtuous among women!

The soul of innocence, and pride of truth!

Tell them, I laid my empire at her feet;

Tell them, I plung'd my dagger in her blood;

Tell them, I so ador'd—and thus reveng'd her.

(Stabs himself.)

HE'S MUCH TO BLAME;

ACT I,

SCENE I.—The Hall of an hotel, with a spacious staircase.

Enter the Master and JENKINS meeting.

Master. Why, where are all the fellows, Jenkins? Don't you hear the bell No. 9?

Jenk. Tom is gone up to answer it, sir.

Master. Who occupies that apartment?

Jenk. The handsome youth and girl, that arrived late last night.

Master. Just as I was going to bed?

Jenk. Yes, sir.

Master. He is quite a boy.

Jenk. Razor has never robbed him of a hair.

Master. Some stripling, perhaps, that has run away with his mother's maid.

Jenk. They ordered separate beds.

Master. Well, see what they want.

Jenk. Yes, sir.

Master. And, harkye! be attentive the moment you hear Lord and Lady Vibrate, or their daughter, stirring. People of quality must never be neglected.

Jenk. Oh! no, sir. Here is Doctor Gosterman. [Exit.]

Enter DOCTOR GOSTERMAN.

Master. Good morrow, Doctor.

Doctor. Coot morgen, my tear friend. Is de Fiprate family fisible to see?

Master. Not yet.

Doctor. My lordtship and my latyship vas sharge me to mit dem betime.

Master. You are a great favourite there, Doctor.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Dat I am eferywhere.

Master. You act in a double capacity: physician, and privy-counsellor.

Doctor. Und I am as better in de von as in de oder.

Master. Why, ay, Doctor, you have a smooth pleasant manner.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Dat is my vay. I mix de syrup mit all my prescription.

Master. Ay, ay, you are a useful person.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Dat is my vay. I leave Yarmany, und I com at Englandt mit little money, und great cunning in de art und de science. I shall af de essence, und de cream, und de balsam, und de syrup, und de electric, und de magnetic, und de mineral, und de vegetable, und de air, und de earse, und de sea, and all dat vas subject under my command. So I make de nation benefit, und myself rish. Dat is my vay.

Master. Yes; you can tickle the guineas into your pocket.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Dat is my vay.

Master. You have had many patients.

Doctor. Ya, sair. I af cure tousand und tousand. Dat is my vay.

Master. And how many have you killed, Doctor?

Doctor. Der teufel, sair! Kill! Ven my patient vas die, dat vas nature dat vas kill. Ven dey vas cure, dat vas Doctor Von Gostermans. Dat is my vay. No sair; Doctor Von Gostermans vas kill himself, dat oder people may live.

Master. How do you mean kill yourself, Doctor?

Doctor. Der teufel, sair! Vas I not be call here? Vas I not be call dere? Vas I not be call eferywhere? I af hundert and tousand patient dat die efery day till I vas com. So I vas drive to de city; und dere I vas meet my besten friend; de gout, de apoplexy, und de asthmatica: und den I vas drive to de inn of court, und de lawyer; und dere I vas find more of my besten friend; de hydropica, de rheumatica, und de paralytica.

Master. What, Doctor, the lawyers and inns of court paralytic?

Doctor. Ya, sair.

Master. I wish they were, with all my soul!

Doctor. Und den I vas drive and make my reverence mit de lordt, und mit de duke, und mit de grandee; und dere I vas meet mosh oder of my besten friend; de hypochondrica, de spasmodica, de hysterica, de marasma, de morbid affection, de tremor, und de mist before de eye.

Master. Morbid affections, tremors, and mists before the eyes, the diseases of the great?

Doctor. Ya, sair. Und dey vas grow vorse und vorse eferyday.

Master. Well, well, they have chosen a skilful doctor.

Doctor. Ya, sair. I shall do all deir business, efery von. Dat is my vay. I shall af de essence, und de cream, und de balsam, und de syrup, und de electric, und de magnetic, und de mineral, und de vegetable, und de air, und de earse, und de sea, und all dat vas subject under my command. Dat is my vay. Bote dat is as noting at all. Ah! sair, my liebste; you vas my besten friend. You make me acquaint myself mit all de patient dat vas come to your house; and so I vas your besten friend, und I vas gif de physic for yourself, und de physic for your shile, und de physic for your vife.

Master. For which my wife will never more thank you, Doctor.

Doctor. No; your vife vas die, und you vas tank me yourself. So now you tell me: af you any new customer dat vas com?

Master. Yes; a youth, and a girl that looks like a waiting-maid, arrived late last night.

Doctor. Which it vas a person of grandeur?

Master. Oh! no; wholly unattended.

Doctor. Ah, ha! Which it vas a lofing couple, den?

Master. It seems not.

Doctor. A poy and a vaiting-vomans! Dere shall be someting mystery in dat.

Master. So I think. Here comes the girl.

Doctor. Ah, ha! Let me do. I shall talk to her. I shall begin by make acquaintance mit her.

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. Pray, sir, desire the waiter to make haste with breakfast.

Master. Here, Jenkins! Breakfast to No. 9. Be quick.

Jenk. (Without.) Yes, sir.

Master. Tea or coffee, madam?

Lucy. Tea.

Doctor. How do you do, my tear? You vas pretty young frau; fery pretty girl, my tear. Perhaps you vas stranger, my tear?

Lucy. Perhaps I am.

Doctor. Ah! Vat is your name, my tear?

Lucy. That which my godmother gave me.

Doctor. Your maistair af made de long journey, my tear.

Lucy. Has he?

Doctor. From vat country you com, my tear?

Lucy. Hem!

Doctor. I ask, from vat country you com, my tear.

Lucy. Ask again.

Doctor. From de town of—eh!

Lucy. Ay. How do you call it?

Doctor. Dat is vat I vant you shall tell.

Lucy. I see you do.

Doctor. Your mastair is fery young, my tear.

Lucy. Thank you, sir.

Doctor. For vat you tank me?

Lucy. For your news.

Doctor. Ah, ha! You are fery vitty und pretty, my tear.

Lucy. More news. Thank you again.

Doctor. Vat vas you call de young gentelman's name?

Lucy. I will ask, and send you word.

Doctor. How long shall he be stay in town?

Lucy. Till he goes into the country.

Doctor. Vat is your capacity, my tear?

Lucy. Like your's, little enough.

Doctor. You not understandt me, my tear. Vat is your post, your office?

Lucy. To answer rude questions.

Doctor. Your mastair is a man of family?

Lucy. Yes. He had a father and mother, and uncles and aunts.

Doctor. Und tey vas tead?

Lucy. I am not a tombstone.

Doctor. Com, com, my tear, let you make me answer.

Lucy. Anan!

Enter Waiter.

Waiter. Here is the breakfast, madam.

Lucy. Take it up stairs. [Exit with Waiter.]

Doctor. Der teufel! A cunning yipsey! She has make me raise my curiosity. My tear! My tear! Com pack, my tear!—[LUCY returns.]—Do my compliment to your mastair, und I shall make me mosh happy if I shall af de honneur to make me acquaintance mit him. My name is call Docteur Von Gostermans. I shall af de essence, und de cream, und de balsam, und de syrup, und de electric, und de magnetic, und de mineral, und de vegetable, und de air, und de earse, und de sea, und all dat vas subject under my command. I shall af de best recommendation for de honest docteur dat vas possible. My Lordt und my Laty Fiprate vas my besten friend. I vas practice mit all de piggest family in de uniferse. Docteur Von Gostermans vas know eferypody; und eferypody vas know Docteur Von Gostermans. You tell him dat, my tear.

Lucy. Tell him that! I cannot remember half of it. Are you, sir, acquainted with Lord Vibrate's family?

Doctor. Ya, my tear. I vas make friendship mit dem more as many year.

Lucy. And do you know where they are?

Master. To be sure he does. They are in this—

Doctor. Hush! Silence your tongue! Dere is something mystery. (Aside to Master.) If you shall make me introduce to your mastair, my tear, I shall tell him eferyting und more as dat, my tear. Vill you, my tear?

Lucy. I will go and enquire.

Doctor. Tank you, my tear. You are fery pretty girl, my tear; fery vitty, pretty—Ah! you are so sly, cunning, little yipsey, my tear. Ah, ha!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

MARIA discovered, in man's clothes, with a letter in her hand, and walking with anxiety. The Waiter enters and leaves breakfast.

Maria. (Reading the letter.) "Dear sister,—The letter I now write is almost needless, for I shall leave Italy and follow it immediately; having at last obtained intelligence of your faithless lover. I am sorry to inform you that, in addition to your unpardonable wrongs, I have my own to vindicate. But I have threatened too long. You have heard of the Earl of Vibrate. He and his family are by this arrived in England; your betrayer accompanies them, and I am in close pursuit. PAUL DELAVAL." In what will this end? Must they meet? Must they fight? Must one or both of them fall? Oh, horror! Shall I be the cause of murder? And whose blood is to be spilled? That of the most generous of brothers, or of the man on whom my first and last affections have been fixed. Is there no safety; no means?

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. Why, look here now, madam, you are letting the breakfast grow cold. You have been reading that letter again. I do believe I shall never get you to eat any more. Come now, pray, do take some of this French roll; and I'll pour out the tea. Do, pray, do; pray, do.

Maria. I cannot eat, Lucy; I am eaten. Terror and despair are devouring me.

Lucy. Dear, dear! What will all this come to? Did not you promise me that as soon as you had got safe to London in your disguise, you would be better?

Maria. Can it be? My kind, my gentle, my true-hearted George!

Lucy. True-hearted! No, no, madam, he was never true-hearted; or he could not so soon have changed, because his ill fortune changed to good. Everybody knows true love never changes.

Maria. What have I done? How have I offended? His caresses, his protestations, his tender endearments! Is, then, the man in whom my soul was wrapt, a vil—Oh!

Lucy. I declare, madam, if you take on this way, you will break my heart as well as your own. Beside, you forget all the while what you put on this dress and came up to London for.

Maria. Oh! no. It was, if possible to prevent mischief—murder! They have never met; they do not know each other. But how shall I discover Sir George? Of whom shall I inquire?

Lucy. If you would but eat your breakfast, I do think I could put you in the way.

Maria. You?

Lucy. Yes.

Maria. By what means?

Lucy. Will you eat your breakfast, then?

Maria. I cannot eat. Speak.

Lucy. Why, I have just been talking to an outlandish comical Doctor, that says he is acquainted with Lord Vibrate.

Maria. Indeed! Where is this Doctor?

Lucy. He is waiting without; for I knew you would wish to speak to him.

Maria. Shew him in immediately.

Lucy. I'll tell him you are not well; which is but too true; though you must remember, madam, you are a man. So, dry your eyes, forget your misfortunes, and, there, cock your hat o' that fashion, and try to swagger a little, or you will be found out. You stand so like a statue, and look so pitiful! Lord! that's not the way. If you are timorous, and silent, and bashful, nobody on earth will take you for a youth of fortune and fashion. [Exit.]

Maria. If they should meet—Heavens! They must not.

Re-enter LUCY with DOCTOR GOSTERMAN.

Lucy. My master is not very well: he eats neither breakfast, dinner, nor supper; and gets no sleep.

Doctor. He noder eat, noder drink, noder sleep! Dat is pad; fery pad. But dat is as noting at all, my tear. Let me do. You shall see presently, py and py, vat is my vay.

Maria. Your servant, sir.

Doctor. Sair, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple sairfant, sair. My name is call Docteur Von Gostermans. I shall af de best recommendation for de honest Docteur dat vas possible. I vas practice mit all de piggest family in de uniferse. Docteur Von Gostermans is know eferypody; und eferypody is know Docteur Von Gostermans. De pretty coquine young frau tell me dat you not fery fell. You not eat, you not drink, you not sleep. Dat is pad; fery pad. Bote dat is as noting at all. You tell me de diagnostic und de prognostic of all vat you vill ail; und I shall make you prescripe for de anodyne, oder de epipastic, oder de balsamic, oder de narcotic, oder de diaphoretic, oder de expectoratic, oder de restoratif, oder de emulsif, oder de incisif; which is eferyting so shveet und so delectable as all vat is possible.

Maria. Your pardon, sir, but I wish to see you on business of another nature.

Doctor. Ah, ha! Someting of de prifate affair? Dat is coot. I shall be as better for dat as for de oder. I vas know de vorl. I vas know eferypody, und eferypody vas know me. Dat is my vay.

Maria. Perhaps, then, you happen to know Sir George Versatile?

Doctor. Oh! der teufel, sair! Ya, ya. Sair Shorge is my besten friend. Which it vas six month dat he vas succeed to his title und estate; und den I vas make acquaintance mit him. Dat is my vay.

Maria. But he has been abroad since.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Ven he vas poor, he vas fall in lofe mit fery pretty young frau. Bote so soon as he vas pecome rish paronet, dat vas anoder ting. So, his relation und his friend vas sent him to make de gran tour.

Maria. And he was easily persuaded.

Doctor. Ya, sair. He vas vat you call fery coot nature; he vas alvay comply.

Mar. Compliance with him is more than a weakness; I fear it is a vice.

Doctor. So, he vas make acquaintance mit Lordt and mit Laty Fiprate; und den he vas tink no more of de pretty young frau, pecause he vas fall in lofe mit anoder.

Maria. Sir! Another! What other?

Doctor. Vat you shall ail, sair? You shange couleur.

Maria. With whom has he fallen in love?

Doctor. Mit te taughter of Lordt Fiprate.

Maria. With Lady Jane?

Doctor. Ya, sair; mit Laty Shane. My Cot! sair, vat you shall ail? You not make fall in lofe yourself mit Laty Shane?

Maria. No, no. They are, no doubt, to be married.

Doctor. My Cot! sair, you so pale as deaths My Cot! you shall faint.

Lucy. Faint, indeed! Bear up, madam. (Aside.) My master is too much of a man to faint. I'll run for a glass of water. [Exit.]

Maria. The charming Lady Jane! Where is she?

Doctor. My Lordt und my Laty Fiprate und my Laty Shane vas all in de house here.

Maria. In this house?

Doctor. Ya, sair.

Maria. And is Sir George here, too?

Doctor. He is com und go alvay sometime efery tay.

Maria. Are they to be married?

Doctor. My Cot! sair, you af de ague fit.

Maria. Are they to be married?

Doctor. My Laty Fiprate vas mosh incline to Sair Shorge; und my lordt vas sometime mosh incline too; und den he vas sometime not mosh incline; und den he vas doubt; und den he vas do me de honneur to consult mit me.

Maria. And what is your advice?

Doctor. My Lordt Fiprate vas my besten friends, und I vas adfice dat he shall do all as vat he please; und Sair Shorge vas my besten friends, too, und I vas adfice dat he shall do all as vat he please; und my Laty Fiprate vas petter as my besten friends, und den I vas more adfice dat she shall do all as vat she please.

Maria. But Lady Jane had another lover.

Doctor. Ya, sair. Mr. Delafal vas make lofe mit her. He vas com from de East Indie, und he vas lofe her fery mosh; und she vas go mit de family to Italy, und my Laty Fiprate vas make acquaint-ance mit Sair Shorge, pecause he vas so mosh pleasant und coot humeur, und he say all as vat she say: vlich vas de vay to alvay make agréable.

Maria. Could you do me the favour to introduce me to Lady Jane?

Doctor. Ya, sair, I shall do all as vat shall make agréable. Dat is my vay.

Re-enter LUCY hastily.

Lucy. (Aside to her mistress.) Oh! madam, don't be terrified, but I declare I have spilled almost all the water.

Maria. What is the matter?

Lucy. He is come.

Maria. Who? Sir George?

Lucy. No; don't be frightened: Mr. Delaval, from abroad.

Maria. My brother! Heavens! Did he see you?

Lucy. No. I had a glimpse of him, and whisked away just as he stepped out of the post-chaise.

Maria. Should he meet me in this disguise, what will he say?

Lucy. Send away the Doctor, and let us lock ourselves up.

Maria. (To the Doctor.) I must beg you will excuse me, sir; but it is necessary, at present, I should be alone. With your permission I will see you again in the afternoon; and, in the meantime—(Gives him money.)

Doctor. Oh! sair, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple sairfant, sair. I shall make you mosh more fisit; und den you shall tell me de diagnostic und de prognostic of all vat you vill ail.

Lucy. Yes, yes; another time.

Doctor. Und I shall af de essence, und de cream, und de balsam, und de syrup, und de electric, und de magnetic, und de mineral, und de vegetable, und de air, und de earse, und de sea, und all dat vas subject under my command.

Lucy. You have told us all that before.

Doctor. Und I shall make you prescripe for de anodyne, oder de epipastic, oder de balsamic, oder de soporific, oder de narcotic, oder de diaphoretic, oder de expectoratic, oder de restoratif, oder de emulsif, oder de incisif, vlich is eferyting so shveet und delectable as all vat is possible.

Lucy. Was ever anything so provoking? (Aside.) Pray, sir, make haste.

Doctor. You shall make remembrance of Docteur Von Gostermans. I am practice mit all de piggest family in de uniferse. Sair, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple sairfant, sir. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The Hall of the hotel.

Enter DELAVAL, WILLIAMS, Master, and JENKINS.

Del. Is the portmanteau safe?

Wil. Yes, sir.

Del. And the trunks?

Wil. All right.

Del. Have you paid the postillions?

Wil. Yes, sir.

Master. (To Del.) This way, if you please, sir. Jenkins!

Jenk. Coming, sir.

Master. Shew the damask room. What will you please to have for breakfast, sir?

Del. Nothing.

Master. Sir?

Del. Anything.

Master. Bring tea, coffee, and new laid eggs.

Jenk. In a minute, sir.

Del. (To Wil.) Observe the directions I gave you. Inquire immediately, and find if the Vibrate family be in town.

Wil. I will be careful, sir. Eh! Sir, sir!

Del. Well?

Wil. Look! Here comes Lord Vibrate's secretary.

Enter THOMPSON.

Del. Mr. Thompson!

Thom. Ah! Mr. Delaval, I am heartily glad to see you in England.

Del. Thank you, my good friend. But how is this? Where is the family? Where is Lady Jane?

Thom. I thought that would be your question. They are all in this house.

Del. Indeed!

Thom. I knew, when Lady Jane left Italy, your stay there would be short.

Del. Ay, ay; the follies and frenzies of the madman are visible to all eyes except his own.

Thom. I see you are dissatisfied.

Del. Tortured, till my thoughts and temper are so changed that I am almost as odious to myself as the world is become hateful to me.

Thom. I own you have some cause.

Del. Would my injuries were all! But there are other and still deeper stabs. It is not yet ten months since I returned from India; my heart how light, my eye how cheerful, and my hand prompt at any commendable act. I could then be moved to joy, and sorrow, and every sympathising passion. Smiles and mock courtesy passed current on me; the word of man and woman was taken on trust, and I lived in the sunshine of an open, unsuspecting soul. But I am now otherwise taught. I am changed. My better part is brutalized; and the wrongs that lie rankling here have stripped me of human affections, and made me almost savage.

Thom. What can be said? Patience is the—

Del. Talk not of patience: I must act. I may then, perhaps, inquire whether I have acted rightly. But I must first see Lady Jane, and Lord Vibrate.

Thom. Shall I inform his lordship of your arrival?

Del. By no means. Having injured, he may wish not to see me; and I would not afford him time to invent excuses, and avoid giving me a hearing. Though my wrongs must be endured, they shall be told.

Thom. I own they are great.

Del. Those that you know are heavy; yet, severe as the struggle would be, 'tis possible they might be hushed to rest; but there are others which blood only can obliterate; which can only sleep in death. Such is the road I must travel. Not long since nature was jocund, the azure heavens were bright, and pleasure was in every path; but now darkness, fathomless gulphs, guilty terrors, and all the dreadful phantoms of meditated desolation, lie before me. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

LORD VIBRATE discovered at a table, reading a book.

Lord V. The ancient sceptics doubted of everything, affirmed nothing, and kept the judgment always in suspense. All things, said they, are equally indifferent, uncertain, and indeterminate. The mind is never to assent to anything; that it may never be astonished, or disturbed, but enjoy a perfect calm. (Rises, with important wisdom in his looks.) Such were the maxims of Pyrrho, and his disciples; those renowned sages of antiquity! Well! And such, too, have been my maxims, practically. All my life have I been wavering, uncertain, and indeterminate. A sagacious sceptic without knowing it; and, as it were, by instinct. It was but lately I discovered what a wise man I am. And yet, it seems to me as if I were scarcely half wise enough, for I am told that I am to doubt of everything which I find rather difficult. For example: that my wife Lady Vibrate is an extravagant, ractipole woman of fashion; can I doubt that? No. That she squanders my money, disturbs my peace, and contradicts for contradiction's sake; can I doubt that? No. Then, have I not a daughter to marry, a law-suit to begin, and a thousand perplexing affairs, so that I do not know which way to turn? Why, all this appears true to me; but the sceptics teach that appearances deceive, and that nothing is certain. I may be Lord Vibrate, or I may be the Grand Turk. These doctrines are prodigiously deep. (Considers.) But I must think of something else just now. I have a thousand things to do, and know as little where to begin as where they will end. Ay; all is uncertainty. (Rings.) Harry, Edward!

Enter JENKINS.

Jenk. Did your lordship call?

Lord V. Where are my servants? I want some of my plagues.

Jenk. They are ready at hand, my lord. Here is your lordship's secretary. [Exit.]

Enter MR. THOMPSON.

Lord V. What is the reason, Mr. Thompson, that nobody waits? Here am I, fretting myself to a mummy for the good of my family, while everybody about me is as drowsy as the court of common-council after dinner. Have they taken laudanum? Are they in a lethargy? Are they all dead?

Thom. If they were, your lordship would have the goodness to raise them.

Lord V. Don't you know how many people I have to see, and places I have to go to?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. Why, did not I tell you?

Thom. Yes, my lord.

Lord V. Then how can you say you don't know?

Thom. Because I venture to presume, my lord, you do not know yourself.

Lord V. I am distracted with doubts. Harry!

Enter HARRY.

Harry. Did your lordship call?

Lord V. Where are you all? What are you about? I think you have lived long enough with me to know my way.

Harry. Yes, my lord; we know it very well.

Lord V. If you are not more attentive, I'll discharge you every one.

Harry. Oh! no; you will not do that. (Aside.)

Lord V. What are you muttering, sirrah?

Harry. Only, my lord, that we know your way.

Lord V. Order the coachman at eleven.

Harry. Yes, my lord.

Lord V. No. Order it at one.

Harry. Yes, my lord.

Lord V. Come back. Order it in ten minutes, and remember I am not at home. Come back. Don't order it at all.

Harry. Must visitors be admitted?

Lord V. Yes—No—I cannot tell. I will consider. Be within call. Thompson! [Exit Harry.]

Thom. My lord?

Lord V. Step to that picture-dealer. I will have the Guido. Yet, 'tis a great sum. No—It is a master-piece. I must have it. Why don't you go?

Thom. The picture is sold, my lord.

Lord V. Sold! Gone! Have I lost it? This is always the way. I am for ever disappointed. Harry!

Re-enter HARRY.

Harry. My lord.

Lord V. Did you go with the message to the stable-keeper, last night?

Harry. Yes, my lord.

Lord V. Let me know when he comes.

Harry. He will come no more, my lord.

Lord V. Come no more?

Harry. No, my lord.

Lord V. Why so?

Harry. He says you never know your own mind, my lord.

Lord V. Insolent fellow!

Harry. Doctor Gosterman is below.

Lord V. Admit him.—Stay.—I cannot see him yet. In half-an-hour. In ten minutes. By-and-by. [Exit Harry.] I must not waste my time in these trifles. I must attend to this law business. I wish I could determine. What am I to do, Thompson?

Thom. In what, my lord?

Lord V. The affair of the ejectment. If I once embroil myself in law, there will be no end; and if I do not, the consequences are still worse.

Thom. Then they are bad, indeed, my lord.

Lord V. 'Tis strange that I can come to no resolution on this subject.

Thom. (Aside.) Nor on any other.

Lord V. I must decide this very day, or the time will be elapsed.

Thom. A lawyer, I should suppose, my lord, would give you the best advice.

Lord V. How? Are you mad, Thompson? A lawyer give good advice!

Thom. The present possessor has held the estate twenty years.

Lord V. Not till to-morrow. I have time still to make my claim. How shall I act? Shall I never leave this hotel? Has the builder been here?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. I can get nothing done. My whole life long I have been distracted with the multiplicity of my affairs.

Thom. And so, I am afraid, my lord, you always will be.

Lord V. Why so, sir?

Thom. Because your lordship undertakes so much, and does so little.

Lord V. So, he has not been here?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. Nor the lawyers?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. Nor my steward?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. Nor Sir George?

Thom. No, my lord.

Lord V. Where is Lady Vibrate? Where is Lady Jane? Are they all in their graves? Have none of them shewn signs of life yet?

Thom. Not one. Your lordship is the only person in the family who begin your miseries so soon in a morning.

Lord V. The crosses and cares that prey upon me are enough to make any man on earth miserable.

Thom. Pardon me, my lord, but if you would care less, both yourself and your servants would sleep the more. My lady cares for nothing; and she can sleep when she is in bed; and sing, and dance, and laugh at your lordship's cares and fears when she is up.

Lord V. She will drive me mad.

Thom. Ah! here she is, as it were, for the purpose.

Lord V. Tell Harry to admit the Doctor—No; not just yet. Yes. In five minutes. I don't know when. [Exit Thompson.]

Enter LADY VIBRATE.

Lady V. Upon my honour, my lord, you are the most insupportable person imaginable. You vociferate worse than the man who calls when my carriage stops the way. Is anybody dying? Is the house on fire? Is the world at an end?

Lord V. By the life your ladyship leads, I should suppose it is pretty near.

Lady V. You always give me such shocking head-aches of a morning.

Lord V. You always give me such shocking heart-aches of an evening.

Lady V. Did not I send to you last night, to request your lordship would not disturb me?

Lord V. It has been your ladyship's amusement to disturb me all your life.

Lady V. Your lordship knows I love amusement.

Lord V. I have not slept a wink since.

Lady V. You had slept quite enough before. Pray, how long are we to remain in this hotel? Your lordship should remember, it is degrading for a man of rank to doze away life in the style of a colonel reduced to half-pay.

Lord V. Your ladyship should remember, it is degrading for a woman of rank to riot away life, and reduce her creditors to live without pay.

Lady V. Psha! That is the old story.

Lord V. But it is a very true story. It is a great misfortune that persons so opposite should pair.

Lady V. A terrible one, indeed. I am all gaiety and good humour; you are all turmoil and lamentation. I sing, laugh, and welcome pleasure wherever I find it; you take your lantern to look for misery, which the sun itself cannot discover.

Lord V. I am overwhelmed by crosses and vexations; and you participate in none of them.

Lady V. No. Heaven be praised!

Lord V. Will you attend to me, my lady, for half-an-hour?

Lady V. Mercy! Attend to you for half-an-hour! You, my lord, may think proper to be as miserable as Job; but I am not Job's wife.

Lord V. I insist, Lady Vibrate, on a serious answer. How ought I to act? What should I do, in this law affair?

Lady V. I cannot tell what you ought to do; but I know what you will do.

Lord V. Do you? What?

Lady V. Nothing.

Lord V. The recovery of this property would enable me to give my daughter a portion suitable to her rank. If it be lost, she will be almost destitute of fortune.

Lady V. You should have thought of that before, my lord.

Lord V. Before! Why, I have thought of nothing else for years. I have asked everybody's advice.

Lady V. And followed nobody's.

Lord V. It shall be so. The ejectment shall be served: proceedings shall commence.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha!

Lord V. I say they shall. I am determined.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! I know you, my lord.

Lord V. You know! I say they shall, if it be only to prove that you know nothing of the matter.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! A pleasant motive! But even that will not be strong enough.

Lord V. But it will, my lady.

Lady V. But it won't, my lord.

Enter DOCTOR GOSTERMAN,

Lord V. I say it will, my lady.

Lady V. I say it won't, my lord.

Doctor. Coot morgen, to my coot lordt und my coot laty.

Lord V. For heaven's sake, Doctor, stop my lady's tongue.

Lady V. For heaven's sake, Doctor, give my lord a quieting draught.

Doctor. I shall do eferyting as vat you desire, my coot lordt und my coot laty.

Lord V. Can nothing silence you, Lady Vibrate? Shall I never have a quiet hearing? I wanted to talk with you and the Doctor on a thousand things.

Lady V. Yes; you wish to have all the talk to yourself.

Lord V. On the marriage of our daughter.

Lady V. Oh! with all my heart. A marriage, at least, begins with music, feasting, and dancing. So say on.

Lord V. I am not yet determined in favour of Sir George.

Lady V. But I am. (While they speak, the Doctor gesticulates in favour of each.)

Lord V. Mr. Delaval is an unobjectionable gentleman; and he was the first suitor.

Lady V. Sir George can sing; Sir George can dance; Sir George has air, grace, fashion, and fortune.

Lord V. Psha! His best qualities are prudence, and attention to his own concerns. Ask the Doctor.

Doctor. He has fery mosh prudence, my coot lordt.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! I vow, Sir George is the most airy, thoughtless, pleasant person living, except myself.

Doctor. Ya, Sir Shorge is fery mosh pleasant; und my latyship is fery mosh more pleasant.

Lord V. Absurd. His humour is calm, cold, and serious.

Doctor. Fery serious, inteed.

Lady V. Whimsical, animated, delightful.

Doctor. Fery animate, fery telightful, upon my vordt.

Lord V. I never met a more discreet, sensible man in my life.

Lady V. True: for he thinks of nothing but his pleasures.

Lord V. His affairs, you mean.

Lady V. I tell you, my lord, he is exactly what I wish: the very soul of levity, whim, and laughter.

Lord V. I tell you, my lady, he is exactly like myself; prudent, and full of sage hesitation. He considers before he acts. Does he not, Doctor?

Doctor. Dat vas all yust as vat you say, my coot lordt.

Lady V. He never considers at all. Does he, Doctor?

Doctor. Dat vas all yust as vat you say, my coot laty.

Lord V. How so? We cannot both be right.

Doctor. You shall please to make me parton, my coot lordt. Sair Shorge vas all as vat you say; und all as vat my coot laty say. Mit my laty, he vas merry; mit my lordt he was sad. Mit my laty he vas laugh, und vas sing, und vas tance; und he vas make melancholy, und misery, und vas do all dat shall make agréable mit my lordt.

Lord V. Is he so variable?

Doctor. Ya, he vas fery mosh comply; fery mosh coot humeur. He vas alvay make agréable. Bote vas my lordtship und my latyship know dat Mr. Delafal vas com from Italy?

Lady V. Come where? To England?

Doctor. He vas in de house below. I vas see und speak mit his falet.

Lord V. In this hotel?

Doctor. He vas yust arrife, und vas demandt dat he shall see my lordtship; oder my latyship.

Lady V. I am very sorry he is here. He is a dun of the most disagreeable kind, and shall not see me; and, I hope, my lord, you will no longer permit his addresses to Lady Jane. My word is given to Sir George. Come with me, Doctor.

[Exit with the Doctor.]

Enter MR. DELAVAL.

Del. Pardon me, my lord, if I intrnde with too little ceremony. Something, I hope, will be allowed to a mind much disturbed, and a heart deeply wounded and impatient to ease its pangs.

Lord V. Which way deeply wounded, Mr. Delaval?

Del. Can your lordship ask? Was it not with your permission I paid my addresses to Lady Jane? And was the ardour of my affection or the extent of my hopes unknown?

Lord V. Why, I did permit, and I did not. I had my doubts.

Del. My visits were daily, their purpose was declared, and I should imagine I spoke more respectfully to say, that you permitted, than that you connived at them.

Lord V. True: but still I had my doubts.

Dol. Those doubts have stung me to the soul; and I could wish you had expressed them more decidedly.

Lord V. Impossible! Doubts here, doubts there, doubts everywhere. No rational man can be decided on any point whatever. My doubts are my continual plagues; my whole life is consumed by them.

Del. It appears, my lord, you have conquered them on one subject.

Lord V. Ay, indeed. I wish to heaven I had! What subject is that?

Del. You have affianced your daughter to Sir George Versatile.

Lord V. Humph! Yes, and no. I have and I have not. I cannot determine. Sir George is a prudent man, his estate is large, and the Versatiles are an ancient race. But your family is ancient, you are prudent, and the wealth left by your uncle is at least equal. What can I say? What can I do? I don't know which to take nor which to refuse. I am everlastingly in these difficulties. I am harassed night and day by them; they are the nightmare, they sit upon my bosom, oppress me, suffocate me. I cannot act. I cannot move.

Del. This, my lord, may be an apology to yourself, but the consequence to me is misery. Your daughter lived in my heart; with her I had promised myself ages of happiness; and had cherished a passion, impatient, perhaps, but ardent and pure as her own thoughts. This passion your conduct authorized. My fortune, my life, my soul, were devoted to her. Mine was no light or wanton dalliance; nor did I expect a light and wanton conduct from the noble family of which your lordship is the head.

Lord V. What do you mean, Mr. Delaval? I told you I was undecided; and so I am still. My lady, you know, was never much your friend. Sir George is her favourite.

Del. And is Lady Jane equally changeable?

Lord V. I don't know. She is my daughter; and, judging by myself, I should suppose she is perplexed and doubtful. She never, I believe, declared in your favour.

Del. Not expressly, my lord. She referred me to time and you. 'Tis true, I flattered myself her affections were wholly mine. Should she prefer Sir George, or any other man, be my feelings what they will, I am then silenced. My heart could not be satisfied with cold compliance; oh! no; 'tis of a different stamp. I am told she is not at home. I hope, however, she will not have the cruelty to deny me a last interview: till when I take my leave. Only suffer me to remark that, had you discovered in me any secret vice, any defects dangerous to the happiness of the woman I adore, you then were justified in your present conduct. But, if you have no such accusation to prefer, I must do my feelings the violence to declare I cannot but think it highly unworthy of a man of honour. [Exit.]

Lord V. Mr. Delaval! Insolent! Highly unworthy of a man of honour! I will challenge him. He shall find whether I am a man of honour, or no. I will challenge him. Harry!

Enter HARRY.

Harry. My lord.

Lord V. Run, tell that Mr. Delaval—Hold—Yes, fly; tell him—Stay; get me pen, ink, and paper: I will teach him to insult—No; I will not do him the honour to write. Order him back.

Harry. Order who, my lord?

Lord V. He shall give me satisfaction. In that, at least, I am determined. He shall give—And yet, what is satisfaction? Is it to be run through the body? shot through the head? A man may then, indeed, be said to be satisfied. I had forgotten my doubts on duelling. Tell my lady I wish to speak to her. No—

Harry. She is here, my lord.

[Exit.]

Enter LADY VIBRATE and DOCTOR GOSTERMAN.

Lady V. What is the matter, my lord? You seem to be even in a worse humour than usual.

Lord V. Mr. Delaval has treated me disrespectfully.

Lady V. Have not I a thousand times told you he is a disagreeable impertinent person?

Lord V. Why, God forgive me, but I really find myself of your ladyship's opinion. 'Tis a thing, I believe, that never happened before.

Lady V. And a thing, I believe, that will never happen again. I hope, my lord, you are now determined in favour of Sir George.

Lord V. Positively. Finally. I pledge my honour.

Lady V. You hear, Doctor?

Doctor. Ya, my coot laty; I vas hear.

Lord V. I say, I pledge my honour. I authorise you, my lady, to deliver that message to the baronet; and, that I may not have time to begin to doubt, I will instantly begone. [Exit.]

Lady V. This is fortunate.

Doctor. Oh! fery mosh fortunate; fery mosh.

Lady V. Had Mr. Delaval married my daughter, we should have had a continual sermon on reason, common sense, and good order. And these and such like antediluvian notions must have been introduced to our family.

Doctor. Ah! dat shall be pad; fery pad, inteet, my coot laty.

Lady V. Now that Sir George is the man, the danger is over.

Doctor. Dat is creat plessing.

Lady V. But what, think you, are my daughter's thoughts? I fear she has a kind of esteem for Delaval. He was her first lover.

Doctor. Ya; she vas fery mosh esteem Mr. Delaval, my coot laty.

Lady V. But I observe she listens with great pleasure to the gay prattle of Sir George.

Doctor. Oh! fery creat, inteet, my coot laty.

Lady V. We must second the rising passion; for we must get rid of that solemn sir.

Doctor. Dat vas all yust as vat you say, my coot laty.

Lady V. Go to her, Doctor; convince her how intolerable it will be to have a husband whom she cannot quarrel with nor reproach. Paint, in the most lively colours, the stupid life she must lead with so reasonable a man.

Doctor. I shall do eferytng as vat shall make agréable, my coot laty. Dat is my vay. My laty, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple sairfant, my laty. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Hall of the hotel.

LUCY discovered, speaking to the Master of the hotel.

Enter WILLIAMS and HARRY.

Wil. All you say is very true, Mr. Harry. Our masters suppose we have neither sense nor feeling; yet exact everything that requires the five senses in perfection. They expect we should know their meaning before they open their lips, yet won't allow we have common understanding.

Harry. More shame for them. I warrant, for all that, we can game, run in debt, get in drink, and be as proud and domineering as they are for their lives.

Wil. Yes, yes: let them but change places, and they would soon find out we could rise to their vices, and they could sink to ours, with all the ease imaginable.

Harry. They have no such notion though, Mr. Williams.

Wil. That is their vanity, Mr. Harry. I have lived with Mr. Delaval ever since he returned from India; and, though he is a good—(sees Lucy)—Eh! surely, it must be her. Do you know that young woman, Mr. Harry?

Harry. No; but I have heard a strange story about her.

Wil. Ay, it is.—What—I am sure it is Lucy.—What strange story have you heard?

Harry. Why, that she came here late last night with a young gentleman, now above, pretending to be his waiting-maid.

Wil. With a gentleman! (Aside.) Oh! the jilt! Waiting-maid to a man? I never heard of such a thing.

Harry. Nor anybody else.

Wil. (Aside.) The deceitful hussey!

Harry. (Bell rings.) That's my lord's bell: I told you he is never easy. I must go.

Wil. (Aside.) I am glad of it. By all means, Mr. Harry. Good day! [Exit Harry.] Run away with a gentleman! Oh!

Lucy. (Coming forward.) I declare, there is Mr. Williams.

Wil. (Aside.) What a fool was I to believe she loved me!

Lucy. (Aside.) How my heart beats! Dear, dear! I could wish to speak to him; but then, if any harm should come of it!

Wil. (Aside.) She shall not escape me.

Lucy. (Aside.) I should like to ask him how he does. But I must not betray my dear lady. (Going.)

Wil. (Placing himself in her way.) I beg pardon, madam.

Lucy. (Aside.) Does not he know me?

Wil. I thought I had seen you before; but I find I am mistaken.

Lucy. (Aside.) What does he mean?

Wil. You are very like a young woman I once knew.

Lucy. (Aside.) How angry he looks!

Wil. But she was a modest, pretty behaved person; and not an arrant jilt.

Lucy. Who is a jilt, Mr. Williams?

Wil. One Lucy Langford, that I courted and promised to marry; but I know better now.

Lucy. You do, Mr. Williams?

Wil. I do, madam.

Lucy. It is very well, Mr. Williams; it is very well. Pray, let me go about my business.

Wil. Oh! to be sure. I have no right to stop you.

Lucy. You have no right to speak to me as you do, Mr. Williams.

Wil. No, no. Ha, ha, ha! I dare say, I have not.

Lucy. No, you have not; and so I beg you will let me pass. My mistress—I mean—

Wil. Ay, ay; you mean your master.

Lucy. Do I, sir? Well, since you please to think so, so be it.

Wil. All the servants know it is a man. Would you deny it?

Lucy. I deny nothing, Mr. Williams; and, if you are minded to make this an excuse for being as treacherous as the rest of your sex, you are very welcome, Mr. Williams. I shall neither die nor cry at parting.

Wil. I dare say not. The young gentleman above stairs will comfort you.

Lucy. (Bursts into tears.) It is a base, false story. I have no young gentleman above stairs, nor below stairs neither, to comfort me; and you ought to know me better.

Wil. Did you or did you not come here last night?

Lucy. What of that?

Wil. With a young gentleman?

Lucy. No—Yes. Don't ask me such questions.

Wil. No. You are ashamed to answer them.

MARIA appears above.

Maria. Lucy!

Lucy. Ma'am—Sir? Coming, sir.

Wil. There, there! I will see what sort of a spark it is, however.

Lucy. (Struggling.) Be quiet, then. Keep away. You sha'n't.

Maria. (Descending.) What is the matter? Who is molesting you?

Lucy. (To Maria.) Go back, sir; go back.

Wil. I will see, I am determined.

DELAVAL appears at a room-door.

Del. Williams!

Wil. I tell you, I will. (Looking at Maria.) Eh! Bless me!

Maria. Why, Lucy—Mr. Williams!

Wil. My young lady, as I live!

Del. Why do not you answer, Williams?

Wil. Coming, sir.

Maria. Mercy! It is my brother's voice: what shall I do?

Lucy. Hide your face with your handkerchief, madam. Pull down your hat.

Maria. Pray, do not betray me, Mr. Williams.

Lucy. If you do, I will never speak to you as long as I have breath to draw.

Wil. How betray?

Lucy. Don't say you know us. Mind! Not for the world. [Exit with Maria.]

Del. What is it you are about, Williams?

Wil. Nothing, sir.

Del. What do you mean by nothing? Whom were you wrangling with?

Wil. Me, sir? Wrangling, sir?

Del. Why are you so confused?

Wil. Why, sir, I—I committed a small mistake. I was asking—asking after a gentleman that—that proved not to be a gentleman—that is, not—not the gentleman that I supposed.

Del. Why did you not come back with your message? Have you learnt the address of Sir George?

Wil. Yes, sir; he lives in Upper Grosvenor-street; his name on the door.

Del. Well, be in the way. The day shall not pass before I see him. My own wrongs I could forgive. He, it seems, is preferred; and, perhaps, I have no right to complain: but for his injuries to my sister he shall render me a dear account. [Exit.

Wil. What can be the reason of Miss Delaval's disguise?

Lucy. (Above.) Hist, hist! Mr. Williams!

Wil. Is it you? Oh! now I shall know.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

LADY VIBRATE and LADY JANE discovered.

Lady V. Really, daughter, I cannot understand you.

Lady J. No wonder, madam; for I do not half understand myself.

Lady V. Is it possible you can hesitate? The good-humour and complaisance of Sir George might captivate any woman.

Lady J. They are very engaging, but they are dangerous.

Lady V. Which way?

Lady J. His character is too pliant. If others are merry, so is he; if they are sad, he is the same. Their joys and sorrows play upon his countenance; but, though they may slightly graze, they do not penetrate his heart. Even while he relieves, he scarcely feels them.

Lady V. Psha! He is a delightful man.

Lady J. I grant he does his utmost. But it is a folly to be the slave even of an endeavour to please.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! Upon my honour, you are a whimsical young lady. Afraid of marrying a man because of his assiduous endeavours to please! As if that were a husband's failing! You can prefer no such accusation against Mr. Delaval.

Lady J. I own he is of a very different character. Firm and inflexible, he imagines he makes virtue his rule and reason his guide.

Lady V. Firm, indeed! No, no: ferocious, obstinate, perverse. Sir George tries to be agreeable, and is successful; Mr. Delaval has no fear of offending, and does not miss his aim.

Lady J. Heaven help us! We all have faults and follies enough.

Lady V. Mr. Delaval never was approved by me; and this morning he has insulted your father.

Lady J. Insulted! How do you mean, madam? Mr. Delaval is abroad. Has he written?

Lady V. No. He is here.

Lady J. Here! And has he not thought proper to let me know of his arrival?

Lady V. No, no. The haughty gentleman has only thought proper to reproach Lord Vibrate for admitting the pretensions of Sir George. He is too proud to endure a competitor.

Lady J. Indeed! Such pride is the very way to insure his competitor success. Insulted my father!

Lady V. I will leave you to judge how deeply, when I tell you that, fluctuating and undecided as Lord Vibrate always is, he was so offended that he pledged his honour in favour of Sir George.

Lady V. Insult my father, and not deign to let me know of his arrival.

Lady V. I hope, when Sir George comes, you will admit him.

Lady J. Certainly, madam; certainly.

Lady V. And that Mr. Delaval will be denied.

Lady J. It seems I need give myself no concern about that; the gentleman will not even take the trouble to send up his name.

Lady V. I am glad you feel it properly.

Lady J. Pardon me, madam, I will not condescend to feel it in the least. It shall not affect me; no, not for a moment. I had, indeed, conceived a very different opinion of Mr. Delaval. I am glad I have discovered my error before it is too late. I could not have believed it possible. But it shall not disturb me. It shall give me no uneasiness. I will keep myself perfectly cool and unconcerned, and—ungenerous, unfeeling man! [Exit.]

Lady V. She is delightfully piqued, and Sir George will succeed.

Sir G. (Without.) Are the ladies above?

Foot. (Without.) Yes, sir.

Lady V. I hear him. The very sound of his voice inspires mirth.

Enter SIR GEORGE VERSATILE.

Sir G. Ah! my dear lady.

Lady V. I am infinitely glad to see you, Sir George; you are come at a lucky moment.

Sir G. Is, then, my fate decided?

Lady V. It is, it is.

Sir G. Happy tidings!

Lady V. But first tell me—

Sir G. Anything—everything. Speak.

Lady V. Are you not of my opinion?

Sir G. To be sure I am. What is it?

Lady V. That pleasure is the business of life.

Sir G. Oh! beyond all doubt.

Lady V. That inspecting accounts—

Sir G. Is vulgar drudgery.

Lady V. And looking after our affairs—

Sir G. A vile loss of time.

Lady V. That care in the face denotes—

Sir G. The owner a fool.

Lady V. And that sorrow is a very ridiculous thing.

Sir G. Fit only to excite laughter.

Lady V. Why, then, Sir George, I am your friend.

Sir G. Ten thousand thousand thanks! But, what says my lord?

Lady V. Would you believe it? He consents, has pledged his honour, and sent the message by me.

Sir G. Rapture, enchantment!

Lady V. Yes. The reign of pleasure is about to begin.

Sir G. Light, free, and fantastic; dancing an eternal round.

Lady V. No domestic troubles—

Sir G. No grave looks.

Lady V. No serious thoughts—

Sir G. We will never think at all.

Lady V. No cares, no frowns.

Sir G. None, none, by heavens, none! It shall be spring and sunshine all the year.

Lady V. Then our appearance in public!

Sir G. Splendid, dazzling! Driving to the opera!

Lady V. Dressing for Ranelagh.

Sir G. A phaëton to-day.

Lady V. A curricule to-morrow.

Sir G. Dash over the downs of Piccadilly, descend the heights of St. James's, make the tour of Pall-Mall, coast Whitehall—

Lady V. Back again to Bond-street—

Sir G. Scour the squares, thunder at the doors.

Lady V. How do you do? How do you do? How do you do?

Sir G. And away we rattle, till stone walls are but gliding shadows, and the whole world a galanty shew.

Lady V. You are a charming man, Sir George; and Lady Jane is your's.

Sir G. My dear lady, your words inspire me: I am all air, spirit, soul! I tread the milky way, and step upon the stars.

Lady V. But you must not, before the marriage, talk thus to Lord Vibrate. Silly man! He and you will never agree.

Sir G. Oh! yes, but we shall. I—I—I like his humour.

Lady V. Do you?

Sir G. Prodigiously. Whenever I am in his company, I am as grave as Good Friday.

Lady V. Indeed!

Sir G. He is full of sage reflection: so am I. Doubtful of everything: so am I. Anxious for the present, provident for the future: so am I. Overflowing with prudential maxims; sententious, sentimental, and solemn: so am I.

Lady V. You sentimental!

Sir G. As grace before meat in the mouth of an alderman.

Lady V. You solemn!

Sir G. As the black patch on a judge's wig.

Lady V. I must tell you, Sir George, I hate sentiment.

Sir G. Oh! so do I.

Lady V. Solemnity is all a farce.

Sir G. And those that act it buffoons. I know it.

Lady V. I love mirth, pleasantry—

Sir G. Humour, whim, wit, feasting, revelry, shout, song, dance, and joke. So do I, so do I, so do I!

Lady V. The very mention of duties and cares makes me splenetic.

Sir G. Curse catch duties! I hate them. Give me life, the wide world, the fair sun, and the free air.

Lady V. I say, give me midnight, the rattling of chariot-wheels, and the lighted flambeau.

Sir G. Ay, a rout! A crash of coaches—a lane of footmen—a blazing stair-case—a squeeze through the antichamber—card-tables—wax-lights—patent lamps—Bath stoves and suffocation! Oh, lord! oh, lord!

Lady V. Exquisite! You are a delightful man.

Sir G. Am I?

Lady V. You enter perfectly into all my ideas.

Sir G. Do I?

Lady V. And describe them even better than I myself can.

Sir G. Oh! my dear lady.

Lady V. Yes, you do.

Sir G. No, no.

Lady V. But, then—Ha, ha, ha!—That you should be able to fall in with my lord's absurdities so readily!

Sir G. Nothing more easy: I have one infallible rule to please all tempers. I learnt it of our friend the Doctor.

Lady V. Sure! What is that?

Sir G. I prove that everybody is always in the right.

Lady V. Prove my husband to be in the right. Do, if you can.

Sir G. My lord loves to be restless, and doubtful, and distressed; he delights in teasing and tormenting himself; and why should I interrupt his pleasures?

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! Very true.

Sir G. I fall in with his humour. I shew him how rational it is; afford him new arguments of discontent, and encourage him to be miserable.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! Oh! you malicious devil!

Sir G. My dear lady, you mistake: I do it from pure compassion. It makes him happy. Every child delights in the squeaking of its own trumpet; and shall I have the cruelty to break the toy? A well-bred person is cautious never to contradict.

It is become a very essential requisite to say ay and no in the most complying manner possible.

Lady V. Ah! Sir George, you are one of the dear inimitable few.

Sir G. Only a copy of your charming self.

Lady V. You and I must totally reform our stupid family. Amusement shall be our perpetual occupation.

Sir G. Day and night.

Lady V. We will commence with your marriage. It shall be a splendid one.

Sir G. A fête, a concert, a ball! The whole town shall ring with it.

Lady V. I hate a private wedding. A small select party is my aversion.

Sir G. Oh! nothing is so insipid! Pleasure cannot be calm.

Lady V. I wish to be seen, and heard—

Sir G. And talked of, and paragraphed, and praised, and blamed, and admired, and envied, and laughed at, and imitated!

Lady V. I live but in a crowd.

Sir G. Give me hurry, noise, embarrassment—

Lady V. Confusion, disorder—

Sir G. Tumult, tempest, uproar, elbowing, squeezing, pressing, pushing, squeaking, squalling, fainting!

Lady V. Exquisite! transporting!

Sir G. You remember I receive masks this evening.

Lady V. Can I forget?

Sir G. You will be there?

Lady V. There! Ay; though I should come in my coffin.

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha! An excellent idea! I never yet saw a mask in the character of a memento mori.

Lady V. Ah! Turn about, and you will see a memento mori without a mask!

Sir G. What, my lord?

Lord V. (Without.) I cannot tell. I will consider, and send an answer.

Lady V. Here he comes, to interrupt our delightful dreams: a very antidote to mirth and pleasure. He will give you a full dose of the dismal. But you must stay and speak to him. Remember, his honour is pledged: insist upon that. I pity, but cannot relieve you. [Exit.]

Enter LORD VIBRATE.

Lord V. I have been too sudden. I ought not to have pledged my honour. This is the consequence of hasty determination; of not doubting before we decide. Shall I never correct myself of that fault? (Sees Sir George. They look full at each other, till Sir George catches the same dismal kind of countenance.) Ah! Sir George, here am I, brimful of anxiety and turmoil!

Sir G. Alas! man was born to trouble.

Lord V. Perplexed on every side; thwarted in every plan: no domestic comfort, no friend to grieve with me, no creature to share my miseries.

Sir G. Melancholy case!

Lord V. One crossing me, another blaming me, and my wife driving me mad!

Sir G. Distressing situation!

Lord V. My cares laughed at, my vigilance mocked, my sufferings insulted! And why? Because I am cautious! because I doubt! because I am provident! What is man without money?

Sir G. A fountain without water.

Lord V. A clock without a dial.

Sir G. What is it that buys respect, and honour, and power, and privilege, and houses, and lands, and wit, and beauty, and learning, and lords, and commons, and—

Lord V. Why money!—Then the manners of this dissipated age—

Sir G. They are truly shocking! They—they—they are absurd, ridiculous, odious, abominable.

Lord V. And to what do they lead?

Sir G. To everything that is horrid! To loss of peace, loss of property, loss of principle, loss of respect; bankruptcy, ruin, contempt, disease, and death!

Lord V. (Aside.) Yes, yes: he's the man! I do not think I repent. Heaven be praised! Sir George, you are a man of understanding; an economist. You will regulate your family and affairs to my heart's content.

Sir G. Oh! it shall be my study; my daily practice, my duty, my delight!

Lord V. You make me happy. And yet I cannot but wonder, being so rational a man, how you and my lady should agree so well.

Sir G. Dear, my lord, why so? Women are the most manageable good creatures upon earth.

Lord V. Women good?

Sir G. Indubitably; when they are pleased.

Lord V. So they say is the devil.

Sir G. The sweet angels deserve to be humoured. Their smiles are so enchanting! And, should they frown, who can be angry when we know the dear wayward sirens will only look the more bewitching, as soon as they are out of their pouts? It is so delightful to see the sun breaking from behind a cloud.

Lord V. Psha! When a woman begins to grow old—

Sir G. Hush! The sun—the sun never grows old. I grant you that, formerly, there used to be old women; but there are none now!

Lord V. Then you think me a fool for being wretched at my wife's thoughtlessness, caprice, and impertinence?

Sir G. No, I don't. Every body tells us that wives were born to be the plague of their husbands.

Lord V. And mine is the greatest of plagues!

Sir G. What is a wife's duty? To obey her lord and master. 'Tis her marriage promise, and the law binds her to it. She is the minister of his pleasures, the handmaid of his wants, his goods, his chattels, his vendible property.

Lord V. Ay; we find the husband may take the wife to market in a halter.

Sir G. In which I should hope he would afterward hang himself!

Lord V. My lady thinks of nothing but revelling, and racketing, and turning the world upside down!

Sir G. 'Tis a great pity.

Lord V. Her tongue is my torment.

Sir G. The perpetual motion! It never ceases.

Lord V. Then how can you like her company?

Sir G. She is not my wife.

Lord V. No, or you would not be such good friends. Did she say anything concerning the marriage?

Sir G. Oh! yes. She delivered your lordship's kind message.

Lord V. What, that I had pledged my honour?

Sir G. Irrevocably.

Lord V. I was very rash. Hasty resolutions bring long repentance. She insists that the nuptials shall be public.

Sir G. Does she, indeed!

Lord V. For my part, I hate any display of vanity.

Sir G. It is extremely ridiculous! What would our ostentation, pomp, and magnificence be, but advertising ourselves to the world as fools and coxcombs?

Lord V. Is that a rational use of money?

Sir G. Should it not be applied to relieve the aged, comfort the poor, succour the distressed—

Lord V. What?

Sir G. Reward merit, encourage industry, and promote the public good?

Lord V. Promote a farce!

Sir G. Very true; the public good is a farce!

Lord V. The true use of money is to defend our rights—

Sir G. Revenge our wrongs, purchase for the present, provide for the future, secure power, buy friends, bid defiance to enemies, and lead the world in a string!

Lord V. Ay; now you talk sense. So, if I should consent, the wedding shall be private.

Sir G. Calm; tranquil!

Lord V. No feasting.

Sir G. No dancing, no music, no pantomime pleasures; but all silent, serene, pure, and undisturbed.

Lord V. We will just invite a select party.

Sir G. A chosen few.

Lord V. None but our real and sincere friends.

Sir G. And then we shall be sure the house will hold them.

Enter HARRY.

Harry. My lord, the builder desires to know if you will see him?

Lord V. I am coming. I will be with him in five minutes.

Harry. He says he can stay no longer.

Lord V. Then let him go. I will be with him presently.

Harry. The lawyers have sent word they are waiting for your lordship, at Counsellor Demur's chambers.

Lord V. Very well. There let them wait. The law is slow, and every man ought to be slow who is going to law. Come with me, Sir George; I have some papers to consult you upon.

Harry. The tradespeople, too, are below.

Lord V. Thus it is: I am eternally besieged; I never have a moment to myself.

Harry. This is the tenth time they have been here, by your lordship's own appointment.

Lord V. What of that?

Harry. They are become quite surly. They all abuse me: and some of them don't spare your lordship.

Lord V. Do you hear, Sir George?

Sir G. Oh, shocking! Your tradespeople are a sad, unreasonable set. You cannot convince them that, if we were to keep our own appointments, be punctual in our payments, and know what we do want, and what we do not, we should no longer be persons of fashion.

Enter THOMPSON.

Thom. I am just come from the lawyers, my lord. The courts are sitting, their clients waiting; and if your lordship do not go immediately, they will be gone.

Lord V. Very true; and this last opportunity of serving an ejectment will be lost. I have a thousand things to attend to. Would you be kind enough, Sir George, to go and—Hold! no; I don't know what to do! The estate is valuable: but law is damnable. I may lose the cause: it may cost even more than it is worth. Writs of error!—Brought into Chancery!—Carried up to the Lords!

Sir G. Then the stupidity of juries; the fictions of law; the chicanery of lawyers, their tricking, twisting, turning, lying, wrangling, browbeating, cajoling!

Lord V. Their frauds, collusions, perjuries, robberies—

Sir G. Ay! Detinue, replevin, plea, imparlance, replication, rejoinder, rebutter, surrejoinder, sur-rebutter, demurrer—

Lord V. Take breath! We ought both to demur: for it is the devil's dance, and both plaintiff and defendant are obliged to pay the piper. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Apartments of Lord Vibrate.

LADY JANE, her Woman, DOCTOR GOSTERMAN, and a Footman, discovered.

Lady J. (To Footman.) Tell the young gentleman I wait his pleasure. [Exit Footman.] It is very singular! men, I believe, do not often travel attended by waiting-maids!

Doctor. Dat is de mystery, my Laty Shane.

Lady J. What can he want to say to me?

Doctor. Dat is de more mystery, my Laty Shane. He vas fery mosh young, und fery mosh handsome, und he has fery mosh make fall in love mit you, my Laty Shane.

Lady J. Nonsense!

Doctor. My Laty Shane was so full of de beauty, dat you vas make sharm efery pody, my Laty Shane! Und as your name vas make mention, my Laty Shane, he vas all so pale as deaths!

Lady J. (Aside to her Woman.) You are sure, you say, Mr. Delaval made inquiries, and sent up his name?

Woman. (Apart to Lady J.) La! my lady, could you think he would not? I saw him before ten o'clock; just as you sent me where I was kept so long. And, goodness! had you beheld what a taking he was in! I warrant you, my lady, he asked a hundred and a hundred questions in a breath, and all about you!

Lady J. Well, go now where I desired you.

Woman. Yes, my lady. [Exit.]

Enter a Footman, who introduces MARIA, and exit.

Maria. (Aside.) Why do I tremble thus?

Lady J. (To Doctor.) What a charming countenance!

Doctor. Oh! fery mosh sharming!

Lady J. How prepossessing his appearance!

Doctor. Ya; he vas fery mosh possess.

Re-enter Footman.

Foot. Sir George has sent this domino and mask to know if they meet your ladyship's approbation.

Lady J. Ha, ha, ha! Italian refinement, copied after some Venetian cicisbeo. Put them down.

Maria. (Aside. Regarding the domino and mask.) Here his presents, and here his affections are now directed! How shall I support the scene?

Lady J. You wish, sir, to speak to me.

Maria. (Faltering.) Embarrassed by the liberty I have taken—

Lady J. Let me request you to waive all apology, and tell me which way I can oblige or serve you.

Maria. You are acquainted with Sir George—I— you—Pray pardon me. I am overcome. My spirits are so agitated—

Lady J. (Reaching a chair.) Sit down, sir. You are unwell. Bless me! Doctor—

Doctor. (To Lady J.) I vas tell my Laty Shane vat it vas.—Here, sair, you shmell mit dat elixir; und I shall make your neck-bandt tie loose und— (Going to loosen her neckcloth.)

Maria. (Alarmed.) Pray, forbear!

Doctor. (Aside. Imitates a woman.) Ah, ha! Der teufel! he vas a vomans!

Lady J. Are you better?

Maria. A moment's air. (Goes to the window.)

Doctor. (Aside.) Dat vas de someting mystery!

Maria. (To Lady J.) If you would indulge me a few minutes in private—

Lady J. By all means. Doctor—(Whispers.)

Doctor. Ya, ya; my Laty Shane, I vas understandt: und I vas do efery ting as vat shall make agréable. Dat is my vay.—Sair, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple sairfant, sair. I vas understandt. My Laty Shane, I vas your mosh oblishe fery omple sairfant, my Laty Shane.—(Aside.) Ha, ha! [Exit.]

Lady J. Take courage, sir.

Maria. I am unequal to the task. This disguise sits ill upon me.

Lady J. What disguise?

Maria. I am not what I seem. I—

Lady J. Speak!

Maria. I am a woman.

Lady J. Heavens!

Maria. Distressed—

Lady J. By poverty?

MSria. Oh! no; I come to claim your counsel.

Lady J. In what way?

Maria. To prevent mischief—the shedding of blood.

Lady J. The shedding of blood?

Sir G. (Without.) I will be with you again presently, my lady.

Maria. Mercy! it is Sir George! What shall I do? He must not see me! This way—(Puts on the domino and mask.) Aid me, dear lady, to conceal myself; and excuse conduct which I cannot now explain. (Retires.)

Lady J. Depend upon me, madam.—(Aside.) This is as unaccountable as it is alarming!

Enter SIR GEORGE VERSATILE.

Sir G. I come, my charming Lady Jane, flying, and full of business, to consult you on a thousand important affairs!

Lady J. Surely! What are they?

Sir G. Upon my soul, I don't know!

Lady J. Heyday!

Sir G. They have every one slipped my memory.

Lady J. Miraculous!

Sir G. Whenever I have the inexpressible pleasure of enjoying your smiles, I can think of nothing else.

Maria. (Aside.) Perjured man!

Lady J. My smiles! Ha, ha, ha! What if I should happen to frown?

Sir G. Impossible! No lowering clouds of discontent dare ever shade the heavenly brightness of your brow.

Maria. (Aside.) Oh!

Lady J. Very prettily said, upon my word. Where did you learn it?

Sir G. From you: 'tis pure inspiration, and you are my muse.

Lady J. No; 'tis a flight beyond me. I love plain prose.

Sir G. So do I. A mere common-place, matter-of-fact man, I! The weather; the time of the day; the history of where I dined last; the names and titles of the company; the dishes brought to table; the health, sickness, death, birth, and marriage, of my acquaintance; and such like toothpick topics for me! I am as literal in my narratives as any town-crier, and repeat them as often.

Lady J. Yet I should wish to talk a little common sense.

Sir G. Oh! so should I, I assure you: I am for pros and cons, and whys and wherefores. Your Aristotles, and Platos, and Senecas, and Catos, are my delight; I honour their precepts, venerate their cogitations, and adore the length of their beards!—which luckily reminds me of the masquerade. Is my domino to your taste?

Lady J. Ha, ha, ha! Antient sages, dominos, and taste!

Sir G. Did you not notice the colour?

Lady J. Oh! the taste of a domino is in its colour?

Sir G. Why, no; but there may be meaning.

Lady J. Explain.

Sir G. Mine is saffron.

Lady J. What of that?

Sir G. Cruel question!—Hymen and his robe.

Lady J. Oh! oh!

Maria. (Aside.) She is pleased with his perfidy.

Lady J. A very significant riddle, truly!

Maria. (Advances.) Are you so soon to be married, sir?

Sir G. Bless me! Lady Jane, what frolicsome gentleman is this? In masquerade so early, and my domino!

Maria. Permit me once more to ask, if you are soon to be married?

Sir G. Your question, sir, is improperly addressed. Put it, if you please, to that lady.

Maria. (Aside to Sir G.) Is that the lady to whom the question ought to be put?

Sir G. (Aside.) What does he mean? Will you indulge me, sir, by taking off that mask?

Maria. No, sir.

Sir G. 'Tis mine; and I am induced to claim it, from the great curiosity I have to see your face.

Maria. Do you not adore this lady?

Sir G. (Aside.) An odd question!—More than language can express.

Maria. (Aside.) Oh, falsehood!—Then I put myself under her protection.

Sir G. You know guardian angels when you see them. Pray, however, let us become acquainted.

Maria. For what reason?

Sir G. 'Twould gratify me. I should like you.

Maria. Oh! no.

Sir G. I certainly should. There is something of pathos and music in your voice, which—which—I never heard but one to equal it.

Maria. And whose voice was that?

Sir G. Oh! that—that was a voice so ingenuous, so affectionate, so fascinating—

Maria. But whose voice was it?

Lady J. (Aside.) What does this mean?

Maria. Tell me, and you shall see my face.

Lady J. (Aside.) Astonishing!

Sir G. I must not, I dare not—I shall never hear it more!

Maria. (Aside.) My feelings so overpower me, I shall betray myself.—(To Lady J.) Permit me to retire.

Lady J. You have alarmed and strangely moved me! I hope you will return?

Maria. Oh! yes; and most happy to have your permission.

Sir G. Why do they whisper?—(To Maria, going.) Will you not let me know who you are?

Maria. No.

Sir G. Why?

Maria. Because—I am one you do not love.

Sir G. One I do not love!

Lady J. (Aside.) This is incomprehensible!

Re-enter MARIA, hastily.

Maria. (Apart to Lady J.) Oh, madam!

Lady J. What more is the matter?

Maria. For your life, do not mention the names of either of these gentlemen to the other!

Lady J. What gentlemen?

Maria. He is coming! They do not personally know each other: if they should, there would be murder! I dare not stay. For the love of God, beware!

[Exit.

Enter DELAVAL.

Sir G. (Calling.) Harkye! sir, come back! My domino! I shall want it in an hour or so.—Who have we here?

Del. (Agitated.) Your ladyship's very humble servant.

Lady J. Oh! How do you do? How do you do?

(Aside.) Who can that lady be? She knows them both, it seems; and knows their rivalry! Her terror is contagious! Is their hatred so deadly? I shall certainly betray them to each other.

Del. (Aside.) What a strange behaviour she puts on! Does she affect to overlook me? (Seeing Sir George.) Who is this?

Lady J. Are you just arrived?

Del. This very morning: sooner, I fear, than—than was desired.

Lady J. Do you think so? (To Sir G.) Why don't you go to Lady Vibrate? She is waiting.

Sir G. 'Tis the fate of forty.

Lady J. What?

Sir G. To wait.—(Looking at Delaval.—Aside.) Who can this spark be, that she wants me gone?—Pray, what is the name of the youth that has made so free with my domino and mask?

Lady J. I really don't know.

Sir G. Don't know!

Lady J. I can't answer questions at present. I am flurried; out of humour—

Del. I fear, at my intrusion.

Lady J. I wish you had come at another time.

Del. I expected my visit would be unwelcome: let me request, however, to say a few words.

Lady J. Well, well; another time, I tell you: when I am alone.

Sir G. (Aside.) Oh! ho!

Del. They were meant for your private ear.

Sir G. (Aside.) Were they so?

Del. (Aside.) By her confusion and his manner, I suspect this to be the base betrayer of my sister's peace: the man, whose bare image makes my heart sicken, and my blood recoil.

Lady J. (Aside.) Will neither of them go?—Why do you loiter here, Sir Ge—(Coughs.)

Sir G. I must stay till the gentleman brings back my domino and mask, you know.—(Aside.) I'll not leave them.

Del. (Aside.) I am persuaded it is he.—Excuse me, sir; would you indulge me with the favour of your name?

Sir G. My name, sir! My name is—

Lady J. (Aside to Sir G.) Hush! don't tell it.

Sir G. (To Lady J.) Why not?

Lady J. I insist upon it!

Sir G. Nay, then—My name, sir, is a very pretty name. Pray, what is yours?

Del. (Aside.) Yes, yes; it must be he.—Have you any reason to be ashamed of it?

Sir G. Sir! Did you please to speak? Upon my honour, you are a very polite, pleasant person.

Del. (Aside.) If I should be mistaken.—I acknowledge, sir, there is but one man, whose name I do, but whose person I do not know, to whom that question would not have been rude in the extreme. Should you not be the man, I ask your pardon.

Sir G. Should I not! Sir, that I may be sure I am not, allow me to ask his name.

Del. His name is—

Lady J. (Screams.) Oh!

Del. Good heavens!

Sir G. What has happened?

Del. Are you ill?

Sir G. Is it cramp, or spasm?

Del. Surely, you have broken a blood-vessel?

Sir G. Shall I run for a physician?

Lady J. Instantly.

Sir G. I fly! Yet I must not leave you.

Lady J. No delay, if you value my life.

Del. Your life! I will go.

Lady J. (Detaining him.) No, no.

Sir G. I fly! I fly!

[Exit.

Enter Lady Jane's Woman.

Woman. Dear, my lady, what is the matter?

Lady J. Lead me directly to my own room.

Del. Shall I carry you?

Lady J. No; only give me your arm, and come with me. I want to talk to you. I wish to hear what you have to say.—(Aside to her Woman.) When Sir George comes back, tell him I am partly recovered, but must not be disturbed. It is my positive order.

Del. (Aside.) What does she whisper?

Lady J. Stay! The doctor may come in; but not Sir George. Mind, on your life! not Sir George.—Come, sir.

Del. (Aside.) This sudden change is mysterious.

Lady J. Come, come. [Exit with Delaval.]

Woman. I purtest, it has put me in such a fluster, that I am quite all of a twitter!

Enter SIR GEORGE VERSATILE, followed by DOCTOR GOSTERMAN.

Sir G. Come along, Doctor! Make haste!—Where is Lady Jane?

Woman. In her own room.

Sir G. Is she worse?

Woman. No, sir; much better. But she must not be disturbed.

Sir G. Nay, nay; I must see her.

Woman. Indeed, sir, I can let nobody in but the Doctor.

Sir G. Why so? Is not the gentleman I left here now with her?

Woman. I suppose so, sir.

Sir G. And I not admitted?

Woman. On no account whatever.

Sir G. He allowed, and I excluded! Indeed, I shall attend the Doctor.

Woman. Upon my honour, sir, you must not.

Sir G. Upon my honour, I will! My rival shall not escape me!

Doctor. Ha, ha! De rifal! Ha, ha, ha! Dat is coot! De young fer dat vas mit Laty Shane vas make you shealousy? Ha, ha, ha! Dat is coot! Bote dat is as noting at all. I shall tell you de someting mystery. He vas no yentlemans. Ha, ha! He vas a vomans!

Sir G. A woman!

Doctor. Ya, sair. He vas make acquaintance mit me, und I vas make acquaintance mit him; und he vas make faint, und I vas tie loose de neck-bandt, und den, ha, ha! I was discober de mans vas a vomans!

Sir G. You astonish me!

Doctor. Ya, sair; I vas make astonish myself.

Woman. Won't you go to my lady, Doctor?

Doctor. Ya, my tear. Let me do. Laty Shane is fery pad; und I shall af de essence, und de cream, und de balsam, und de syrup, und de electric, und de magnetic, und de mineral, und de vegetable, und de air, und de earse, und de sea, und all, &c. [Exit, talking.]

Sir G. I should never have suspected a woman! A stout, tall, robust figure! And for what purpose disguise herself? That may be worth inquiry. I will wait; and, if possible, have another look at the lady.

Enter LORD VIBRATE and MR. THOMPSON.

Lord V. Two hundred and forty pounds! 'Tis a very large sum, Mr. Thompson.

Thom. So large, my lord, that I have no means of paying it. I must languish out my life in a prison.

Lord V. No, Mr. Thompson, no; you shall not do that. I will—And yet, two hundred—A prison—I don't know what to say. If I pay this money for you, I shall but encourage all around me to run in debt.

Thom. It is a favour too great for me to hope.

Lord V. You are a worthy man, and a prison is a bad place. I—you—Pray, what is your opinion, Sir George? Is it not dangerous for a man to have the character of being charitable?

Sir G. No doubt, my lord. It is the very certain way for his house to be besieged by beggars.

Lord V. The master who pays the debts of one domestic, makes himself the debtor of all the rest.

Sir G. He changes a set of servants into a set of duns. He first encourages them to be extravagant, and then makes it incumbent upon himself to pay for their follies and vices: he not only bribes them to be idle and insolent, but to waste his property as well as their own.

Lord V. It is, as you say, a very serious case.—I—I am sorry for your misfortune, Mr. Thompson, very sorry; but really—

Sir G. Misfortune! What misfortune?

Lord V. He has foolishly been bound for his sister's husband, and must go to prison for the debt.

Sir G. To prison!

Lord V. You have shewn me how dangerous it would be for me to interfere.

Sir G. Very true, very true. He has lived with your lordship several years?

Lord V. He has; and I esteem him highly.

Sir G. A worthy man, whom it would be no disgrace to call your friend?

Lord V. None. Still, however, consequences must be weighed. I must take time to consider: 'tis folly to act in a hurry.

Sir G. Very true. Caution, caution. Is it a large sum?

Lord V. No less than two hundred and forty pounds!

Sir G. Caution is a very excellent thing—Two hundred and forty—A fine virtue—Two—I would advise your lordship to it by all means—hundred and forty—(Looks round.) Will you permit me just to write a short memorandum; a bit of a note? (Goes to a table.) I must send to a certain place. (Writes.) Excuse me a moment.

Lord V. What can be done in this affair, Mr. Thompson?

Thom. Nothing, my lord. I am resigned. When I assisted my brother, I did no more than my duty. Those who lock me up in a prison, may, for aught I know, do theirs; yet, though they are at liberty, and I shall be confined, I would neither change duties nor hearts with them. (Going.)

Sir G. Harkye! harkye! Mr. Thompson, will you just desire this to be taken as it is directed? (Apart.) Don't say a word; 'tis a draft on my banker. Discharge your debt, and be silent.—You are very right, my lord; we cannot be too considerate, lest, by mistaken benevolence, we should encourage vice.

Thom. Sir George—My lord—

Sir G. Why now will you not oblige me, Mr. Thompson? Pray, let that be delivered as it is directed. You, surely, will not deny me such a favour.—For you know, my lord, if we give—

Thom. Indeed, I—

Sir G. Will you begone? Will you begone? (Pushes him kindly off.)—If we give without—without—

Lord V. Poor fellow! I suppose he is afraid of being taken.

Sir G. Oh! Is that it?—If we give, I say, with too—Psha! I have lost the thread of my argument.

Lord V. I must own, this is a dubious case. Perhaps I ought to pay the money. (Calls.) Mr. Thompson!—I don't think I ought to let him go to prison. What shall I do, Sir George?

Sir G. Whatever your lordship thinks best.

Lord V. But there is the difficulty.—Mr. Thompson! He is gone! How foolish this is now! (As he is going off.) Harry! Run after Mr. Thompson, and call him back. One would think a man going to prison, would, like me, be wise enough to doubt, and take time to consider of it. [Exit.]

Enter LADY VIBRATE.

Lady V. I assure you, Sir George, I am very angry. I have been waiting an age, expecting you would come and give your opinion on my masquerade dress.

Sir G. Why did not your ladyship put it on?

Lady V. On, indeed! It has been on and off twenty times. I have sent it to have some alteration. Besides, it is growing late; masks will be calling in on you, in their way to the Opera-house, and you not at home to receive them!

Sir G. I ask ten thousand pounds; but you know I am the most thoughtless creature on earth.

Lady V. So I would have you. Were you like the sober, punctual Mr. Delaval, I should hate you: but then—

Re-enter DELAVAL.

Lady V. (Aside.) Here the wretch comes!

Sir G. (Aside.) So, so! Now I shall interrogate the lady. She has a very masculine air! (Delaval bows to Lady V.) A tolerable bow that for a woman!

Lady V. (Aside.) He wishes, I suppose, to sermonize me; but I shall not give him an opportunity.—Are you coming, Sir George?

Del. (Aside.) Ha!

Sir G. I will follow your ladyship in a minute.

Del. (Aside.) I was right! it is he!

Sir G. (Aside.) She eyes me very ferociously!

Lady V. I shall just call in upon you; or, if not, we shall meet afterwards. I expect you to be very whimsical and satiric upon all my friends; so, pray, put on your best humour. Grave airs, you know, are my aversion. [Exit.]

Del. (Aside.) That was intended for me. Now for my gentleman.

Sir G. (Aside.) She really has a very fierce look! a kind of threatening physiognomy, and would make no bad grenadier!

Del. I understand your name is Sir George Versatile?

Sir G. (Aside.) A bass voice, too!—At your service, sir, or madam; I really cannot tell which.

Del. Cannot!

Sir G. No, I cannot, upon my soul!—(Aside.) A devilish black chin!

Del. I have an account to settle with you, sir.

Sir G. Have you?—(Aside.) What the plague can she mean?

Del. When can I find you at leisure, and alone?

Sir G. Alone?

Del. Yes, sir; alone.

Sir G. Must this account, then, be privately settled, madam?

Del. Madam!

Sir G. I beg your pardon; sir, since you prefer it.

Del. If you know me, sir, your insolence is but a confirmation of the baseness of your character!

Sir G. I beg a million of pardons; I really do not know you.

Del. Then, sir, when you do, you will find cause to be a little more serious.

Sir G. (Aside.) What a Joan of Arc it is! There is danger she should knock me down.

Del. Be pleased to name your time.

Sir G. (Aside.) Zounds! She insists upon a tête-à-tête!—I hope you will be kind enough to excuse me; but I am just now so pressed for time, that I have not a moment to spare. Company is waiting. I must begone to the masquerade. You, I presume, are for the same place, and are ready dressed. I am your most obedient—

Del. (Seizing him.) Sir, I insist upon your naming an hour, to-morrow; and an early one.

Sir G. Why, what the plague! Here must be some mistake! Permit me to ask, do you know Dr. Gosterman?

Del. Yes, sir.

Sir G. Was you not just now in danger of fainting?

Del. Faint! I faint!

Sir G. It would, I think, be a very extraordinary thing! But, so he told me; with other particulars.

Del. Absurd! Doctor Gosterman has not seen me for several months.

Sir G. He said, sir, you were a woman; and, perhaps, from that error, I may have, unconsciously, provoked you to behaviour, which would else have been rather strange. Have I given you any other offence?

Del. Yes, sir; a mortal one.

Sir G. Mortal!

Del. And mortal must be the atonement.

Sir G. If so, the sooner the better. Let it be immediately.

Del. No: I have serious concerns to settle, so have you. 'Tis time you should think of things very different from masquerading. Name your hour to-morrow morning; then, take an enemy's advice, retire to your closet, and make your will.

Sir G. To whom am I indebted for this high menace, and this haughty warning? Your name, sir?

Del. That you shall know when next we meet; not before.

Sir G. What age are you, sir?

Del. Age!

Sir G. Such peremptory heroes are not usually long-lived.

Del. You are right, sir; my life is probably doomed to be short. But this is trifling: name your hour.

Sir G. At ten to-morrow morning.

Del. The very time I could wish. I will be with you at your own house; inform you who I am; and, then—

Sir G. So be it.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The House of Sir George Versatile.—A suite of Apartments richly decorated.

SIR GEORGE VERSATILE, LADY VIBRATE, and numerous Masks, discovered.

Lady V. What is the matter with you, Sir George? You are suddenly become as dull, and almost as intolerable, as my lord himself.

Sir G. I own, I had something on my spirits; but it is gone. Your ladyship's vivacity is an antidote to splenetic fits.

Lady V. Oh! if you are subject to fits of the spleen, I renounce you.

Sir G. No, no! Heigho! Ha, ha, ha! Let me go merrily down the dance of life!

Lady V. Ay; or I will not be your partner.

Sir G. As for recollections, retrospective anxieties, and painful thoughts, I—I—I hate them. They shall not trouble me. For, if a man, you know, were to be sprung on a mine to-morrow,—ha, ha, ha!—it were folly to let that trouble him to-day.

Lady V. Sprung on a mine! You talk wildly.

Sir G. True. I am a wild, unaccountable non-descript. I am anything, everything, and soon may be—

Lady V. What?

Sir G. Nothing. Strange events are possible; and possible events are strange.

Lady V. Come, come; cast off this disagreeable humour, and join the masks.

Sir G. With all my heart. A mask is an excellent utensil, and may be worn with a naked face.

Lady V. (Retiring.) Why don't you come? you used to be all compliance.

Sir G. So I fear I shall always be. 'Tis my worst virtue. Call it a vice, if you please; and perhaps it is even then my worst.

Lady V. I really do not comprehend you.

Sir G. No wonder. Man is an incomprehensible animal! But no matter for that; we will be merry still, say I—at least, till to-morrow.

Lady V. (Joins the masks.) Yonder is Lady Jane.

Sir G. Nay, then, I am on the wing!

Maria. (Advancing.) Whither?

Sir G. Ah! Have I found you again! So much the better. I have been thinking of you this half hour.

Maria. Ay? That must have been a prodigious effort!

Sir G. What?

Maria. To think of one person for so great a length of time.

Sir G. True. Were you my bitterest enemy, you could not have uttered a more galling truth. I am glad I have met with you, however.

Maria. So am I. 'Tis my errand here.

Sir G. You now, I hope, will let me see your face?

Maria. I might, perhaps, were it but possible to see your heart.

Sir G. No, no; that cannot be: I have no heart.

Maria. I am sorry for it.

Sir G. So am I. But come, I wish to be better acquainted with you.

Maria. And I wish you to be better acquainted with yourself: you know not half your own good qualities.

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha! My good qualities! Heigho!

Maria. Your fame is gone abroad. Your gallantry, your free humour, your frolics in England and Italy, your—Apropos: I am told, Lady Jane is captivated by the ardour and delicacy of your passion! Is it true?

Sir G. Are you an inquisitor?

Maria. Are you afraid of inquisitors?

Sir G. Yes.

Maria. I believe you.

Sir G. You may. Keep me no longer in this suspense. Let me know who you are?

Maria. An old acquaintance.

Sir G. Of mine?

Maria. Of one who was formerly your friend.

Sir G. Whom do you mean?

Maria. You must have been a man of uncommon worth; for I have heard him bestow such praises upon you, that my heart has palpitated if your name was but mentioned.

Sir G. Of whom are you talking?

Maria. Lord! that you should be so forgetful! That can only have happened since you became a person of fashion; for no man once remembered his friends better. It is true, they were then useful to you.

Sir G. Sir, I—Be warned! Pursue this no farther.

Maria. You little suspected, at that time, you were on the eve of being a wealthy baronet. Oh, no! And to see how kind and grateful you were to those who loved you! No one would have believed you could so soon have become a perfect man of the mode; and, with so polite and easy an indifference, so entirely have forgotten all your old acquaintance! I dare say you scarcely remember the late Colonel Delaval.

Sir G. Sir!

Maria. His daughter, too, has utterly slipped your memory?

Sir G. I insist on knowing who you are!

Maria. How different it was when, your merit neglected, your spirits depressed, and your poverty despised, you groaned under the oppression of an unjust and selfish world! How did your drooping spirits revive by the fostering smiles of the man who first noticed you, took you to his house and heart, and adopted you as his son!—Poor Maria! Silly girl, to love as she did! Where is she?

Sir G. This is not to be endured!

Maria. What was her offence? You became a baronet! Ay; true, that was her crime. Yet, when your fortunes were low, it was not imputed to you as guilt.—

Sir G. (Aside.) D—n!

Maria. Are your new friends more affectionate than your old? Fortune smiles, and so do they. Poor Maria! Has Lady Jane ever heard her name? Will you invite her to your wedding? (Her voice continually faltering.) Do. She should have been your bride; then let her be your bride-maid. She is greatly altered—she will be less beautiful, now, than her fair rival. Her birth is not quite so high; but if a heart—a heart—a heart—(Struggling with her feelings, sinks into Sir George's arms, and her mask falls off.)

Sir G. Heaven and earth!—'Tis she!—Help!—'Tis Maria!—Who waits?

Enter LADY JANE.

Lady J. What is the matter?

Sir G. Help, help!—Salts, hartshorn, water!—Help!

Lady J. Bless me! this lady again.

Sir G. Is she, then, known to you?

Lady J. No. Who is she?

Sir G. Quick, quick!

Lady J. Nay, but tell me?

Sir G. I cannot, must not!

Lady G. Must not!

Sir G. Dare not!—She revives; and, to my confusion, will soon tell you herself. Maria! Are you better, Maria?

Maria. I am very faint.

Lady J. My carriage is at the door. Will you trust yourself to me?

Maria. Oh! yes. I am weak; very weak, and very foolish! But I shall not long disturb your happiness; I hope soon to be past that.

Sir G. Past! Oh! Maria, I have no utterance. Lady Jane, you will presently know of me what to know of myself is—Oh!—No matter. Not, then, for my sake, but for pity, for the love of suffering virtue, be careful of this lady; whom, when you know, as soon you must, you will despise and abhor the lunatic, the wretch, that could—Maria—I—I—

[Exit.]

Enter DELAVAL.

Del. What is the matter? Any accident? Was not that Sir George?—Good God! my sister!

Lady J. Your sister!

Del. How comes this? Why this dress? And with that apostate! that wretch! Speak, Maria!

Maria. I cannot.

Lady J. Mr. Delaval, be more temperate. Your sister's spirits and health ought not to be trifled with by your violence. I do not know, though I think I guess, her story. I hope you have a brother's tenderness for her?

Del. That shall be shortly seen. A few hours will shew how dear she is to my heart.

Lady J. I fear you cherish bad passions; such as I never can love, and never will share.

Del. Well, well, Lady Jane, that is not to be argued now. I am a man, and subject to the mistakes of man. There are feelings which can, and feelings which cannot be subdued. I must run my course, and take all consequences.

Maria. Oh, God! in what will they end?

Lady J. No more of this, Mr. Delaval. Come with me: lead your sister to my carriage. She shall be under my care. She can inspire those sympathies, which your too stubborn temper seems to despise.

Del. Indeed, indeed, you wrong me! [Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—MARIA in her own dress, LADY JANE, and LUCY, discovered at breakfast. Footmen waiting.

Lady J. Remove those things. We have done. [Exeunt Footmen.

Maria. What is it o'clock?

Lucy. Just struck ten, ma'am.

Lady J. Lady Vibrate is a sad rake! She did not leave the masquerade till five this morning.

Maria. And Sir George not there?

Lady J. After the discovery of last night, could you suppose he would be seen revelling at such a place?

Maria. I dread another and more horrible cause! My brother!

Lady J. Mr. Delaval, you know, slept in this house.

Maria. But he has been out these two hours.

Lucy. What then, ma'am? Is not Mr. Williams on the watch? You know, ma'am, you may trust Mr. Williams with your life.

Maria. If all were safe, he would be back.

Lady J. Pray, calm your spirits.

Mar. Nay, nay—But Mr. Williams must have been here before this, if something fatal had not happened.

Lucy. I am sure, ma'am, you frighten me to death!

Lady J. (Aside.) Her terrors are but too well founded!

Maria. (Footsteps without.) What noise is that?

Lucy. Bless me!

Lady J. See who it is.

Lucy. (After opening the door.) La! ma'am, I declare it is Mr. Williams.

Enter WILLIAMS.

Lucy. Well, Mr. Williams; everything is right; is not it? All is as it should be?

Wil. That is more than I know.

Maria. Why, then, the worst is past.

Wil. No, ma'am; I can't say that, either.

Lady J. Nay—But what news do you bring? Speak.

Wil. Why, you know, my master, last night, made inquiries how to find the chambers of Counsellor Demur; so, when he went out this morning, I observed your directions, and followed him. He went to the counsellor's in Lincoln's Inn, and there I left him, and hurried away to Sir George's, to inquire and hear all I could; though it was rather unlucky that I was not acquainted in the family.

Lady J. Did not you make use of my name?

Wil. Oh! yes, my lady. Besides, servants, your ladyship knows, are not so suspicious as their masters; they soon become friendly together; so, in five minutes, Sir George's valet and I were on as intimate a footing as we could wish.

Maria. And what did he say? Tell me.

Wil. Why, ma'am, he said, that Sir George did not leave his own house last night, after the fainting of the young gentleman.

Lucy. That was you, you know, ma'am.

Wil. And, what is more, that he did not go to bed; but walked up and down the room till daylight in the morning; and then called, I don't know how often, to warn the servants that he should not be at home to anybody whatever, except to a strange gentleman.

Maria. My brother!

Wil. Why, yes, ma'am; according to the description, it could be nobody else.

Lady J. And at what hour was Mr. Delaval to be there?

Wil. (Aside.) Zooks! I forgot to ask.—That—that, my lady, I did not learn. So, this being all the servants told me, I ran post haste to make my report to you.

Maria. The worst I foreboded will happen!

Lady J. What can be done?

Wil. Perhaps it will be best for me to go back to Sir George's; wait for the arrival of my master; and, if he should come, hasten away as fast as I can to inform you of it.

Lucy. That is a good thought, Mr. Williams. Is not it, madam? A very good thought, indeed! Don't you think it is, my lady?

Lady J. I know not what we can do better.

Maria. Nay, but while Williams is bringing us the intelligence, everything we most dread may happen.

Lucy. Dear! so it may.

Wil. Suppose, then, madam, I should stay at my post, and despatch Sir George's valet to you with the news?

Lucy. Well, that is the best thought of all! I am sure you will own it is, madam.

Maria. I know not what to think.

Lady J. We must resolve; or, while we are deliberating—

Maria. Merciful God! Run, Williams! Fly! Save my brother! Save Sir George!

Lady J. Succeed but in this, and command all we have to give.

Wil. I will do my best.

Lucy. That I am sure he will. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—An Apartment in the house of Sir George Versatile.

SIR GEORGE VERSATILE discovered walking, and greatly agitated.

Sir G. (Looking at his watch.) He will soon be here. Five minutes, but five minutes, and then—(Walks again; throws himself on a sofa; takes up a book, throws it away, and then rises.) What is man's first duty? To be happy. Short-sighted fool! The happiness of this hour is the misery of the next! (Walks again, and looks at his watch.) What is life? A tissue of follies! inconsistencies! Joys that make reason weep, and sorrows at which wisdom smiles. Psha! There is not between ape and oyster so ridiculous or so wretched a creature as man! (Walks.) Oh, Maria!—(Looking at his watch.) I want but a few seconds: my watch, perhaps, is too fast. (Rings.)

Enter a Footman.

Sir G. Has nobody yet been here?

Foot. No, sir.

Sir G. 'Tis the time to a minute. (Loud knocking.) Fly! If it be the person I have described, admit him. [Exit Footman.

Sir G. Now let the thunder strike!

Enter DELAVAL.

Sir G. Good morning, sir!

Del. You recollect me?

Sir G. Perfectly.

Del. 'Tis well.

Sir G. I have been anxious for your coming. Your menace lives in my memory; and I shall be glad to know the name of him who has threatened such mortal enmity.

Del. A little patience will be necessary. I must preface my proceedings with a short story.

Sir G. I shall be all attention. Please to be seated. Waive ceremony, and to the subject.—(They sit.) Now, sir.

Del. About six years ago, a certain youth came up from college, poor, and unprotected. He was a scholar, pleasing in manners, warm and generous of temper, of a respectable family, and seemed to possess the germ of every virtue.

Sir G. Well, sir?

Del. Hear me on. My praises will not be tedious. Chance made him known to a man who desired to cherish his good qualities; and the purse, the experience, and the power of his benefactor, such as they were, he profited by to the utmost. Received as a son, he soon became dear to the family; but most dear to the daughter of his friend, whose tender age, and glowing affections, made her apt to admire the virtues she heard her father so ardently praise and encourage. You are uneasy?

Sir G. Be pleased to continue.

Del. The assiduities of the youth to gain her heart were unabating; and his pretensions, poor and unknown as he then was, were not rejected. The noble nature of his friend scorned to make his poverty his crime. Why do you bite your lip? Was it not generous?

Sir G. Sir!

Del. Was it not?

Sir G. Certainly! Nothing could—equal the—generosity.

Del. The health of his benefactor was declining fast; and the only thing required of the youth was that he should qualify himself for the cares of life, by some profession; he, therefore, entered a student in the Temple; and the means were furnished by his protector, till the end was obtained. Was not this friendship?

Sir G. It was.

Del. The lady, almost a child when first he knew her, increased in grace and beauty faster than in years. Sweetness and smiles played upon her countenance. She was the delight of her friends, the admiration of the world, and the coveted of every eye. Lovers of fortune and fashion contended for her hand; but she had bestowed her heart; had bestowed it on a—Sit still, sir; I shall soon have done. I am coming to the point. Five years elapsed, during which the youth received every kindness friendship could afford, and every proof chaste affection had to give. These he returned with promises and protestations that seemed too vast for his heart, I would say for his tongue—Are you unwell, sir?

Sir G. Go on with your tale.

Del. His benefactor, feeling the hand of death steal on, was anxious to see the two persons dearest to his heart, happy before he expired; and the marriage was determined upon, the day fixed, and the friends of the family invited. The intended bridegroom appeared half frantic with his approaching bliss. Now, sir, mark his proceeding. In this short interval, by sudden and unexpected deaths, he becomes the heir to a title and large estate. Well! Does he not fly to the arms of his languishing friend? Does he not pour his new treasures and his transports into the lap of love? Coward and monster!—

Sir G. (Both starting up.) Sir!

Del. Viler than words can paint! Having robbed a family of honour, a friend of peace, and an angel of every human solace, he fled, like a thief, and concealed himself from immediate contempt and vengeance in a foreign country. But contempt and vengeance have at length overtaken him: they beset him: they face him at this instant. The friend he wronged is dead: but the son of that friend lives, and I am he.

Sir G. 'Tis as I thought! (Aside.)

Del. You are—I will not defile my lips by telling you what you are.

Sir G. I own that what I have done—

Del. Forbear to interrupt me, sir. You have nothing to plead, and much to hear. First say, did my sister, by any improper conduct, levity of behaviour, or fault or vice whatever, give you just cause to abandon her?

Sir G. None! none! Her purity is only exceeded by her love.

Del. Then how, barbarian, how had you the heart to disgrace the family and endanger the life of a woman, whose sanctified affection would have embraced you in poverty, pestilence, or death; and who, had she possessed empires, would have bestowed them with an imperial affection?

Sir G. Sir, if you ask, have I committed errors? call them crimes if you will—yes. If you demand, will you justify them?—no. If you require me to atone for them, here is my heart: you have wrongs to revenge, strike: and, if you can, inflict a pang greater than any it yet has known.

Del. Justice is not to be disarmed by being braved. To the question. It can be no part of your intention, and certainly not of mine, that you should marry my sister. Something very different must be done.

Sir G. What? Name it.

Del. You must give me an acknowledgment, written and signed by yourself, that you have basely and most dishonourably injured, insulted, and betrayed Maria Delaval: and this paper, immediately as I leave your house, I shall publish in every possible way, till my sister shall be so appeased, and horror so satiated, that vengeance itself shall cry, hold!

Sir G. Written by me! Published! No. I will sign no such paper.

Del. So I supposed; and the alternative follows. Here I am: nor will I quit you, go where you will, till you consent to retire with me to some place from which one of us shall never return. Should I be the victor, flight, banishment from my native country, and the bitterest recollections of the villanies of man, must be the fate of me and my sister. If I fall, you then may triumph, and she languish and die unrevenged. This, or the written acknowledgment. Consider, and choose.

Sir G. What can I answer? The paper you shall not have. My life you are welcome to: take it.

Del. Have you not brought disgrace enough on my family? Would you make me an assassin? My sister and my father loved you. Let me, if possible, feel some little return of respect for you.

Sir G. Having wronged your sister, would you have me murder the brother? Already the most guilty of men, would you make me worst of fiends? Though an enemy, be a generous one.

Del. Plausible sophist! The paper, sir: or man to man, and arm to arm, close the scene of my dishonour, or your own. The written acknowledgment. Determine. (Walks away and views the pictures.)

Sir G. (Apart.) Why, ay! 'Tis come home! I have sought it, deserved it, 'tis fallen, and the rock must crush the reptile! Then welcome ruin. The sword must decide. (Goes to take his sword, but stops.) The sword? What! Betray the sister and assassinate the brother? Oh, God! And such a brother! Stern, but noble-minded: indignant of injury, peerless in affection, and proud of a sister whom the world might worship; but whom I, worthless wretch, in levity and pride of heart, have abandoned. (Aloud.) Mr. Delaval!

Del. Have you resolved to sign?

Sir G. Hear me.

Del. The written acknowledgment!

Sir G. My behaviour to your sister is—what I cannot endure to name—'Tis hateful! 'Tis—infamous! My obligations to your most excellent father, the respect you have inspired me with, and my love for Maria—

Del. Insolent! Insufferable meanness! The paper, sir!

Sir G. Angry though you are, Mr. Delaval, you must hear me. I say, my love, my adoration of Maria has but increased my guilt. It has made me dread her contempt. I durst not face the angel whom I had so deeply injured.

Del. Artifice! Evasion! Cowardice!—Your signature!

Sir G. (Snatching up his sword from the table.) You shall have it. Follow me.

Del. Fear me not.

Sir G. (Stopping short.) Hold, Mr. Delaval. Justice is on your side. If your firmness be not a savage spirit of revenge, if you do not thirst for blood, you will feel my only resource will be to fall on your sword. I cannot lift my arm against you.

Del. Then sign the acknowledgment.

Sir G. Can you, in the spirit even of an enemy, ask it? Do you not already despise me enough? Think for a moment: am I the only man that ever erred? Is it so wonderful, that a giddy youth, whose habitual failing was compliance, by sudden accident elevated to the pinnacle of fortune, surrounded by proud and selfish relations, of whose approbation I was vain; is it so strange, that I should be overpowered by their dictates, and yield to their entreaties? Your friendship or my death is now the only alternative. Suppose the latter: will it honour you among men? At the man of blood the heart of man revolts! Will it endear you to Maria? Kind, forgiving angel, and hateful to myself as her affection makes me, I last night found that affection still as strong, still as pure, as in the first hour of our infant loves. Lady Jane—

Del. Forbear to name her! 'Tis profanation from your lips! No more casuistry! No subterfuge! The paper!

Sir G. Can no motives—

Del. None!

Sir G. My future life—my soul, shall be devoted to Maria.

Del. The paper!

Sir G. Obdurate man! (Reflects a moment.) You shall have it. (Goes to the table to write, during which Delaval remains in deep thought, and much agitated.) Here, sir! since you will not be generous, let me be just. 'Tis proper I remove every taint of suspicion from the deeply wronged Maria. (Gives the paper.)

Del. (Reads with a faltering voice.) "I, George Versatile, once poor and dependent, since vain, fickle, and faithless, do, under my hand, acknowledge I have perfidiously—broken my pledged promise—to the most deserving, lovely, and—" (Begins in much agitation to tear the paper.)

Sir G. Mr. Delaval!

Del. Damn it—I can't—I can't speak. Here! Here! (Striking his bosom.)

Sir G. Mr. Delaval?

Del. My brother!

Sir G. (Falls on his neck.) Can it be? My

Del. This stubborn temper—always in extremes! The tiger or the child.

Sir G. Oh, no! 'Twas not to be forgiven! Best of men!

Del. Well, well; we are friends.

Sir G. Everlastingly! brothers!

Del. Yes; brothers.

Enter WILLIAMS, hastily.

Wil. Sir!—

Del. How now?

Wil. I beg your pardon, but Lady Jane and your sister are below. They insist on coming up, and the servants are afraid to—

Sir G. Maria! Let us fly.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The Apartments of Lord Vibrate.

LADY VIBRATE and DOCTOR GOSTERMAN discovered.

Doctor. Ya, my coot laty; dat vas efery vordt so true as vat I say. I vas discober it vas a vomans; und Sair Shorge, und my Laty Shane, und de vaiting-vomans vas discober to me all as vat I say more.

Lady V. Ay, ay; that was the reason Sir George was not at the masquerade.

Doctor. Ya, my coot laty.

Lady V. I observed he was in a strange moody humour.

Doctor. My Lordt Fiprate vas fery mosh amazement, ven I vas make him discober all as vat I vas make discober mit my coot laty.

Lady V. Sir George has behaved very improperly.

Enter LORD VIBRATE.

Lord V. So, so, so! All I foreboded has come to pass: the day has slipped away, a new one is here, and every possibility of recovering the estate is gone.

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha!

Lord V. Do you laugh?

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! I do, indeed.

Lord V. Is your daughter's loss the subject of your mirth?

Lady V. Ha, ha, ha! No, no; not her loss, but your positive determination to prove I did not know you. Ha, ha, ha! When I told you that even that motive would not be strong enough, how you stormed! "But it will, my lady. But it won't, my lord. I say it will, my lady. I say it won't, my lord." Ha, ha, ha! Will you believe that I know you now?

Lord V. What shall I do? Advise me, Doctor.

Doctor. I vas adfice, my coot lordt, dat you shall do eferyting as vat you please.

Lady V. Ay, think; ask advice. Ha, ha, ha! Now that you can do nothing, the inquiry will be very amusing.

Enter THOMPSON.

Lord V. Well, Thompson, what says Counsellor Demur? Has the time absolutely elapsed?

Thom. Absolutely, my lord.

Lady V. How wisely your lordship doubts before you decide! Eh! Doctor?

Thom. I have good news, nevertheless.

Lord V. Good news! Speak: of what kind?

Thom. The honesty of the opposite party.

Lord V. What, the holder of the land?

Thom. Yes, my lord.

Lord V. Which way? Explain.

Thom. He has engaged to Mr. Demur, I being present, that, if your lordship will only shew the legality of your late title, he will resign the estate.

Lord V. Is it possible?

Lady V. It cannot be: the last purchaser is in India.

Thom. The last purchaser is dead; and it has descended to one whom you, my lord and lady, little suspect to be its possessor.

Lord V. Who?

Lady V. Who?

Thom. Mr. Delaval.

Lady V. Mr. Delaval!

Lord V. Mr. Delaval resign it on exhibiting the legality of my title?

Thom. He will, my lord.

Lord V. Did he make no conditions?

Thom. None.

Lord V. What, did he not mention Lady Jane?

Thom. Her name did escape his lips; but rising passion, and, if I rightly read his heart, emotions of the most delicate sensibility, immediately closed them; as if he would not endure the love he bore her to be profaned by any the slightest semblance of barter and sale.

Lord V. What do you say to that, Lady Vibrate? What do you say to that?

Lady V. The proceeding is honourable, I own.

Lord V. Did I not always tell you, Mr. Delaval was a man of honour?

Lady V. You tell me, my lord? Why, you were going to challenge him yesterday morning.

Lord V. He is no such weathercock as your favourite, Sir George.

Lady V. You mistake: Sir George is no favourite of mine. Is he, Doctor?

Doctor. Dat vas all yust as vat you say, my coot laty.

Lord V. What, he did not come to make a buffoon of himself, for your diversion, at the masquerade last night? Eh! Doctor?

Doctor. Dat vas all yust as vat you say, my coot lordt.

Lady V. His perfidious treatment of Miss Delaval is unpardonable.

Doctor. Dat vas pad; fery pad, inteet.

Lord V. Ay, ay; he has plenty of words, but he has no heart.

Doctor. Dat is pad; fery pad, inteet.

Thom. Pardon me, my lord; Sir George may have committed mistakes, but to the goodness of his heart I am a witness.

Lady V. You?

Lord V. How so?

Thom. By his benevolence I was yesterday relieved from the disgrace and the horrors of a prison.

Lord V. Indeed!

Lady V. Which way?

Thom. He paid a debt, which, had I been confined, I never could have discharged; and, for this unexpected act of humanity, he would not suffer so much as my thanks.

Lord V. Did Sir George pay the two hundred and forty pounds, Mr. Thompson?

Thom. The note, which he pretended to write and send by me, was a draft on his banker for three hundred.

Lord V. Why, he confirmed all my arguments against it; and added twice as many of his own.

Doctor. Sair Shorge vas alvay make agréable. Dat vas his vay.

Lady V. I own, however, I am still more surprised at the unexampled generosity of Mr. Delaval.

Enter WILLIAMS.

Lady V. Where is your master, Mr. Williams?

Wil. They are all coming, my lady.

Lady V. Who is coming?

Wil. Mr. Delaval, Lady Jane, Miss Delaval, and Sir George. There has been sad work; but it is all over, and they are now so happy! Here they are.

Enter MR. DELAVAL leading LADY JANE, and SIR GEORGE VERSATILE with MARIA, followed by LUCY.

Lord V. Mr. Delaval, I have great obligations to you. Thompson has been telling me of your disinterested equity.

Del. The obligation, my lord, was mine. Your lordship well knows that the first of obligations is to be just.

Lord V. Well, well; but the estate you are so willing to resign will still, I hope, be your's.

Del. Nay, my lord.

Lord V. Dubious as all things are, that is a subject on which I protest I do not believe I shall ever have any doubts. What say you, Lady Jane? But now I have my doubts again.

Lady J. What doubts, my lord?

Lord V. I doubt whether you understand me?

Lady J. Would your lordship teach me to dissemble?

Lord V. Hum! I doubt whether that would be much for your good.

Del. I hope Lady Vibrate will not oppose our union?

Lady V. No, Mr. Delaval. Your last generous action has charmed me; and Sir George—

Sir G. Has declined in your good opinion. But you cannot think so ill of me as I do of myself; and if ever again I should recover my own self-respect, I shall be indebted for it to this best of men, and to this most incomparable and affectionate of women.

Maria. My present joys are inexpressible—

Del. Which my impetuous indignation threatened for ever to destroy. How dangerous are extremes! Sometimes we doubt, and indecision is our bane; at others, hurried away by the sudden impulse of passion, our course is marked with misery. One man is too compliant; another too intractable. Yet happiness is the aim of all. Since, then, all are so liable to be misled, let gentle forbearance, indulgent thoughts, and a mild forgiving spirit, be ever held as the sacred duties of man to man. ACT I

SCENE I.—The Village of Servia, with the Danube; on one side, the Turkish camp; on the other, the Austrian, which appears at a distance.

Enter several Turkish Soldiers, who range themselves on each side the stage; then enter Turkish Peasants of both sexes, who dance; after the dance,

CHORUS.—TURKISH SOLDIERS.

*Wave our prophet's fam'd standard of glory on high,
Till the envious moon die away in the sky;
And, like the pale Christians, leave Danube's fair stream,*

To reflect our victorious crescent's bright beam.

Enter USEPH.

Useph. Be silent, you soldiers: his highness the Seraskier is coming; he has just arrived with the Turkish army under his command to relieve Belgrade. I have been conversing with him; I told him of your loyalty to the sublime Porte. "Sir—your highness—my dear highness," says I; for we talked it very familiarly: "I am the chief magistrate of this village; I know the Ottoman Porte has not more loyal subjects in all the province of Servia; and as for your highness—always talking of your highness—your highness's name is never out of our mouths." By-the-by, remember his name is Mohamed Aboubeker Ben Abdallah Ben Ali; I dare say you never heard it before. So, says the Seraskier to me, "My dear Useph Ben Yacomb Ben Mustapha"—at the same time graciously laughing at me with great condescension—(Flourish.) Oh! here he comes: now you shall see how his highness is pleased to honour me; I shall certainly be created a pacha of three tails.

Enter SERASKIER, ISMAEL, and Attendants.

Seras. Useph, come hither.

Useph. Yes, your highness. (Apart to the Peasants.) Now he is going to consult me on some great military operation.

Seras. Are there many pretty girls in this neighbourhood?

Useph. Ha, ha, ha! That's a good joke. Ah! your highness will conquer every way, I see. Ha, ha, ha! Your highness is pleased to make me laugh. Ha, ha, ha!

Seras. You are too familiar.

Useph. My lord?

Seras. Begone. [Exeunt Useph and Peasants.]

Enter LILLA, who kneels to the Seraskier.

AIR.—LILLA.

*Lost, distress'd, thus driven from home,
Whither shall poor Lilla go?
Wheresoe'r my steps may roam,
Tyrant power will prove my foe.*

Seras. Who is this beautiful girl? Rise, lovely fair one.

Lilla. I humbly beg your highness' pardon for my boldness; I am not used to talk to great folks.

Seras. Speak, charming angel! bless me with the voice of nature; who are you?

TRIO.—SERASKIER, LILLA, and ISMAEL.

Seras. Speak, I command thee; tell thy grief.

Say, can my power afford relief;

For my trembling heart must yield belief. (Aside.)

Lilla. *Ah! may I dare to tell my grief,
And, humbly, thus, implore relief;
To my falt'ring tongue, oh! yield belief.*

Ismael. *Beauty may boldly tell her grief;
Such fine eyes command relief;
And his trembling heart must yield belief.*

Lilla. I am but a poor country girl, sir; my name is Lilla; but I love Leopold, and Leopold loves me; yet my cross, ill-natured brother wants me to refuse Leopold, to marry that ugly old miser, Useph, a justice of peace in our village.

Seras. Useph! Oh! the old poacher! (Aside.) does your brother object to Leopold?

Lilla. He says, and please your highness, that Leopold is too passionate to make a good husband; now, I own he is rather violent, but I don't like him a bit the worse for that.

Seras. Where is Leopold?

Lilla. Ah! my lord, my mind misgives me that some mischief has happened to him; but they locked me up to prevent my going in search of him.

Seras. Then how came you here?

Lilla. Please your highness, I jumped out of the window.

Seras. What a pleasing sample of rustic simplicity! how handsome she is! (To Ismael.)

Ismael. What, my lord, do you forget your Austrian captive?

Seras. Forget her! no; but why should I confine myself to a single rose, when I can form a bouquet of them. Well, charming Lilla, within this half-hour I promise you redress. Conduct her to my tent, and attend her well.

Lilla. A thousand thanks, your highness. [Exit.]

Seras. Is she not beautiful, Ismael?

Ismael. I own, my lord, she is beautiful; but—

Seras. But what?

Ismael. I beg your highness' pardon; but while I see the black eagle soar upon the walls of Belgrade, I cannot forget that I am a soldier.

Seras. Nor I, Ismael; but I have room in my heart for love and valour at the same time; I never fight better than when I am in love; Mars never smiles so propitiously upon me as when I am paying my adoration to Venus; so, if you wish me to conquer the Austrians, you must get me this girl. [Exit Ismael.] She is a charming creature, and shall be mine.

AIR.—SERASKIER.

The rose and the lily their beauties combining,

Delight in adorning a form so divine;

Such charms to a peasant consigning,

Ah! must I resign?

Forbid it, ye powers! to love 'tis a treason;

Yet, ambition, assuming the semblance of reason,

Commands me, with scorn, the mean thought to decline.

Wealth and power, what are your worth,

To pleasure if you give not birth?

Rich in ambition's gilded toys,

I barter them for real joys.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—Inside of Peter's house.

Enter PETER and GHITA.

DUETT.

Ghita. How the deuce I came to like you,

I am sure I cannot tell;

Had my face ne'er chanc'd to strike you,

I'd been pleas'd, sir, just as well.

Peter. Faith! as you say, I, too, wonder

Why to like you I'm inclin'd:

Though in love we're apt to blunder;

Love, you know, they say, is blind.

Ghita. You're ogling all the lasses.

Peter. You're simp'ring at each lad.

Ghita. Each hour in falsehood passes.

Peter. You flirt it quite as bad.

Both. You had better not provoke me;

Though you think as you've bespoke me,

I shall let you break my heart,

But I'm ready now to part.

Peter. Then, suppose I take my leave?

Ghita. Do; I'm sure I shall not grieve.

Will you stay, or will you go?

Peter. Shall I stay, or shall I go?

Both. As you please, say yes or no.

Enter USEPH.

Useph. What, the deuce! quarrelling before marriage! Oh, fie! that is very irregular; wait till the ceremony is over, and then you will quarrel of course.

Peter. Indeed, sir!

Ghita. Hear me, sir.

Useph. No, I'll not hear you: am I to be talked to by you? I, who have conversed with his highness the Seraskier?—besides, I hate to hear both sides of the question; it perplexes me so, that I never know how to make a decision.

Peter. Why, then, sir, how can you decide?

Useph. Why, I decide that you are both in the wrong. I fancy that decision will hold good in most quarrels; my friend, his highness the Seraskier, could not make a better decision. But where is your sister? where is my dear Lilla? (To Peter.)

Ghita. Why, Peter has locked her up, to keep her from your rival, Leopold.

Useph. Ah! that's a desperate dog: he is always in a desperate passion, and always pretending to keep his temper; he is the very torch of sedition, and always in a blaze. (Leopold singing without.) Eh! why, that's his voice. I—I—I don't much wish for meeting—Here he comes.

Enter LEOPOLD.

Leop. How are you? how do you do? Harkye! you, sir, where's your sister?

Peter. Why, as to that, Leopold—

Leop. Oh! I know what you are going to say; you mean to say that I am in a passion.—Ah! Ghita, how do you do? Very fine, pleasant, disagreeable, temperate weather, I think.

Useph. Rather cloudy.

Leop. What?

Useph. It was rather cloudy when I was talking to his highness the Seraskier just now. But I believe I can answer your inquiries: in the first place—

Leop. What do you mean by that? I'd have you know that I won't take an insult from any man living.

Useph. Why, there is no talking to you; I can't reason with you.

Leop. It's false; you—I say, you are mistaken. I insist upon your reasoning with me; d—e! you shall reason with me; ay, and coolly, too, though I know you are my rival.

Useph. But give me leave—

Leop. Well, I know what you are going to say, that people needn't quarrel because they are rivals.

Useph. Granted; and besides—

Leop. Well, I know, I know; and you mean to observe, that warmth and anger betray a weakness on these occasions, which, I trust, I am free from. Harkye! you rascal, (to Peter) I know your sister is locked up; if you don't give me the key, d—e! I'll break your head; I will, by—

Useph. Sir, do you remember who I am? a magistrate and a courtier: do you respect my authority? (Marching up to Leopold, who draws back.)

Leop. (Marching up to Useph, who draws back.) No, I do not: that for your authority. (Snaps his fingers.) A magistrate, indeed! Ha, ha, ha! Look at the magistrate. What have you to say now, magistrate?

Useph. Nothing: if you don't respect authority, there's an end of the matter.

Leop. (To Peter.) Give me the key.

Peter. Why, to say the truth, Leopold, I have lost it.

Leop. Lost it! Oh! very well. But it's no matter: I believe this right shoulder of mine will force any lock. I'll break open the door; and I'll do it without any violence, only to shew how I can keep my temper; now I defy any of you to say that I put myself in a passion. D—e! stand out of the way, or I'll knock you down, you old goat.

[Pushes violently against Useph and exit.]

Ghita. What do you think now, sir?

Useph. 'Faith! I don't know; my thoughts are rather confused; I—I—I—(Noise without.) There, there, he has broke the door all to smash. Good morning to you: perhaps his highness waits for me. (Going.)

Peter. Consider, sir, you had better not leave us.

Useph. Indeed, I beg your pardon; our good humoured friend may come back and knock out my brains very coolly; only to shew what he can do without being in a passion. [Exit with Peter.]

Ghita. Poor Lilla! I hope Leopold will carry her off. I am sure she loves him, and that he loves her; the whole village will rejoice at their wedding.

AIR.—GHITA.

*All will hail the joyous day,
When love his triumph shall display;
The dance shall mingle old and young.
The rustic pipe assist the song;
The sprightly bells with welcome sound,
Shall spread the happy news around,
And give a hint to maidens coy,
That youth they should not misemploy.
Useph will, with sullen pride,
Envy joys to wealth denied;
And as we trip with merry glee,
Wish himself as poor as we.
The sprightly bells, &c.*

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—Outside of Peter's house; a garden wall round it.

LEOPOLD discovered at the window, out of which is a veil hanging.

Leop. Poor Lilla! nowhere to be found: she's gone; and, by her veil hanging here out of the window, in a fit of despair. I'll after her. (Jumps out, and comes out of the door of the garden wall with the veil.) This relic of my beloved Lilla's shall serve to keep my resentment alive. But where's that cruel villain, Peter? d—e! I'll maul him.

[Retires into the garden.]

Enter PETER.

Peter. Ha! the window open! nay, then, madam's off: but where's that mad-brained Leopold?

Enter LEOPOLD.

Leop. Have I caught you, sirrah? Now, what have you to say for yourself? (Seizes him by the throat.)

Peter. Why, nothing, to be sure, if you stop my breath.

Leop. Harkye! rascal, if you don't tell me where Lilla is—

Peter. Why, you are in such a passion, Leopold.

Leop. It's false; I'm not in a passion. If you say I'm in a passion, I'll kick you, you scurvy knave.

Enter USEPH and Officers.

Useph. Seize that fellow directly.

TRIO AND CHORUS.

Useph. Seize him, seize him, I say.

Peter. Seize him, seize him! Why, pray?

Leop. Let me come at him, pray.

Chorus. Haste, let us bear him away.

Useph. Don't fear, I'll protect you.

Leop. You're a rogue; I suspect you.

Useph. Knock him down, I command it.

Chorus. Knock him down, he commands it.

Peter. How can justice demand it?

Hear me.

Chorus.

Hear me.

Leop.

No, hear me.

Useph. We are none of us safe—

Chorus. While that fellow is free.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Inside of Anselm's Cottage.

Enter ANSELM.

Anselm. The hour is almost come. I wonder if Colonel Cohenberg be yet arrived; perhaps he may be the chosen instrument of heaven to destroy this Turkish tyranny, that like a baneful weed, chokes up our every seed of freedom.

AIR.—ANSELM.

*The sapling oak lost in the dell,
Where tangled brakes its beauties spoil,
And every infant shoot repel,
Droops hopeless o'er the exhausted soil.
At length, the woodman clears around
Where'er the noxious thickets spread;
And high reviving from the ground,
The forest monarch lifts his head.*

Enter COLONEL COHENBERG.

Anselm. Colonel Cohenberg!

Colonel. My friend Anselm!

Anselm. What could induce you, Colonel, to trust yourself so far within the enemy's camp?

Colonel. Two powerful motives, my Anselm, love and glory. Our general means to attack this post to-night, and I am honoured with the command of the detachment. Will the villagers assist us, think ye?

Anselm. Assist ye! ay, Colonel, to the last drop of our blood, every man of us. We have groaned under Turkish oppression too long. But you mentioned the word love, Colonel: may I venture to inquire after the fair Catherine, whom I saw at Vienna last year?

Colonel. Adorable girl! she had just consented to be mine, when I was suddenly ordered to the siege of Belgrade.

Anselm. That was unlucky. How did she bear the news?

Colonel. Like a heroine; when I attempted a faltering adieu, "What," says she, "will you now refuse the hand you have so often solicited? Should the bitter hour of misfortune overtake you, my Cohenberg, you will need the consolation of friendship; and have you a dearer friend than your Catherine? I will go with you, and shall find my happiness in fulfilling the duties of a wife."

Anselm. You married her, then?

Colonel. Ay, but was immediately obliged to join my regiment. How shall I speak the remainder of our melancholy story? She attempted to follow me, but was taken prisoner by a straggling party of the Turkish army, just arrived to the relief of Belgrade.

Anselm. Then, I fear she is taken to the Seraskier's seraglio.

Colonel. That's what I dread. In what part of the camp is his seraglio?

Anselm. You may have observed, about two miles from hence, a convent almost in ruins, which he has converted into his seraglio.

Colonel. I am not personally known to the Seraskier. By pretending business to him I may easily gain admittance to his presence. I have prepared two letters, one to the Seraskier, in my own name, another to my Catherine, informing her of my design.

Anselm. And if you find her there, what then?

Colonel. What then! why, then I'll storm the Seraskier's tent, and carry her off this night.

Anselm. Heaven prosper you! 'tis a hazardous enterprise.

Colonel. Hazardous, my Anselm! I scorn the thought. I have picked the gallant fellows whom

I command; my brave hussars, the flower of the Austrian army; we have fought, we have bled, we have conquered together; and that leader hazards little, who has thought it his first duty to treat his soldiers as his friends.

Anselm. But you know, Colonel, friends in all situations will sometimes desert.

Colonel. I am not speaking of the weathercock friendship that only shews which way the wind of caprice points. We have tried each other in adversity and prosperity, and have cemented our friendship with our blood on the field of battle. But come, lead me to the Seraskier; be diligent, confident, and secret;

*Then trust our cause to Providence above,
The never-failing hope of faithful love.* [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—The Seraskier's Tent.

Enter LILLA.

AIR.

*Blithe as the hours of May,
Were those I now deplore,
When first I own'd love's gentle sway;
They will return no more.
Every fond hope is lost;
No comfort can they bring;
Winter's untimely chilling frost
Destroy'd the infant spring.
Blithe as the hours, &c.*

Enter GHITA.

Ghita. Ah! my dear Lilla, I am glad I have found you. Do you know, the surly guard denied me admittance at first. Well, how did you come here? tell me all about it?

Lilla. Hush! some other time; here comes his highness; now, pray, don't leave me alone with him.

Enter SERASKIER.

Seras. Ha! a companion with her! that obstacle must be removed. (Aside.) Well, Lilla, you shall find me a man of my word; I promised you redress, and you shall have it, but I must first talk with Useph on the business, and this pretty maiden shall be my messenger, to say that I desire his immediate attendance on me.

Ghita. Yes, your highness. Come, Lilla.

Seras. Lilla, you may remain with me.

Ghita. (Aside.) Oh! yes, she's like to remain, indeed, whilst his highness is so violently in love with justice; yes, yes, I understand it very well; ay, ay. [Exit.]

Seras. Lilla, why are you so much alarmed? you have nothing to apprehend: do you know, Lilla, it is in your power to make me very happy?

Lilla. Is your highness unhappy?

Seras. I am. Tell me, Lilla, are you sensible of love?

Lilla. Ah! that I am, indeed, sir.

Seras. Suppose I were to love you.

Lilla. I should be sorry for that, my lord.

Seras. Why so?

Lilla. Because, my lord, I couldn't love you in return: pray, my lord, don't be angry.

Seras. I am not angry: but come, Lilla, I must inspire you with an ambition for grandeur.

Lilla. Will grandeur make me happy, sir?

Seras. Certainly.

Lilla. Then how can your highness be unhappy?

Seras. Oh! that is—that is—I cannot explain that to your comprehension—but say, Lilla, when you behold from your cottage-window the magnificent buildings and gardens of Belgrade, do you not—

Lilla. Oh! my lord, I own I admire them; but my favourite is an humble flower, which, I fear, I should not find in your highness's garden.

Seras. What's that?

Lilla. Heart's-ease, sir.

Seras. Come, come, you shall misunderstand me no longer—(Takes hold of her.)

Enter GHITA, hastily.

Ghita. Oh! my lord, my lord.

Seras. You are soon returned.

Ghita. Oh! yes, my lord; ill news, you know, flies apace. Some officers have seized poor Leopold, and are hurrying him to prison, for affronting that wicked old justice Useph.

Lilla. Ah! my lord, pray, have compassion on an unfortunate lover.

Seras. You must first set me an example: the law must have its course.

TRIO.—SERASKIER, LILLA, and GHITA.

Seras. When justice claims the victim due,
Her dictates I obey.

Lilla & Ghita. } Yet should distress for pity sue,
You'll own the gentle sway.

Seras. Law must prevail.

Lilla. And so it may,
Except when love is in the way.

Seras. Your arts forbear,
No more I'll hear.

Lilla. When justice she attended,
Let her not find a foe.

Ghita. When justice I attended,
Let me not find a foe.

Lilla. In what has she offended?
Alas! I do not know.

Ghita. In what have I offended?
Alas! I do not know.

Seras. In what you have offended,
Dissembler, well you know.

Lilla & Ghita. } On what will he resolve?

All. My troubled bosom vexing,
In varied forms perplexing,
A thousand doubts revolve.

Lilla & Ghita. } Compassion thus entreating,
In vain shall we implore?

Seras. In vain shall they implore.

Lilla & Ghita. } May pity, sorrow greeting,
Our happiness restore.

All. In what have I offended, &c.

Enter ISMAEL, USEPH, PETER, LEOPOLD, and Officers.

Useph. Please your highness, here's a most unruly, obstreperous country fellow, who has broken open a door, and attempted to knock down a magistrate; and all, forsooth, because he's under the influence of the tender passion; he is the most violent, unmannerly—

Leop. It's false, I am not violent.

Ismael. (Aside to Seras.) This poor fellow has an honest heart; the magistrate is a villain; the villagers are already disaffected to us; be careful how you act in this affair, my lord. Subdue them by your justice—your clemency.

Seras. (To Ismael.) I will take your advice for the present, but I must have the girl, sooner or later. Hear me.

Ismael. Silence; attend to his highness.

Seras. You all know my affection for the good people of this village—

Leop. (Half aside.) The women, I believe, know it very well.

Useph. Silence, sirrah!

Seras. I consider you all as my children—

Leop. (Aside.) If he were to stay amongst us much longer the whole village would be his children in another generation.

Useph. How dare you mutter, you reprobate?

Seras. (Whispers Ismael, who goes off.) I would willingly content you all, but that's impossible; let my sentence be publicly known. (The curtain at the back of the tent is drawn up; the Turkish camp is seen; Soldiers, Peasants, &c. enter through the tent, and place themselves on each side of the stage.)

Ghita. (Aside.) Now for some terrible sentence.

Seras. Leopold, you are in love with Lilla?

Leop. Yes, my lord.

Seras. And loved by her in return?

Leop. Yes, your highness.

Seras. Then marry her.

Leop. Thanks to your highness.

Seras. You are in love with Lilla, Useph?

Useph. Yes, my lord.

Seras. And not beloved by her?

Useph. I fear not, my lord.

Seras. Leopold has offered you an affront?

Useph. He has, my lord.

Seras. You are a man of authority, and should set an example of moderation; you must forgive him.

Leop. How do you like that, old one? (Aside to Useph.)

Seras. (To the Officers.) Take off his chains.

Enter LILLA and ISMAEL.

Lilla. That be my task; it is my duty and happiness. (Takes off his chains.)

FINALE.

Lilla. So kindly condescending,
To our complaints attending,
Your highness us befriending,
No more shall wrongs assail.

Chorus. So kindly, &c.

Leop. Your highness, please to hear me—

Lilla. Be silent, I beseech.

Leop. Zounds! I'll be cool, don't fear me.

Peter. Oh! let us hear his speech.

Ghita. We're bound to you for ever. (To Seras.)

Seras. No silly compliments, I pray.

Lilla. To thank you I'd endeavour—

Seras. You soon, methinks, might learn the way.
(To Lilla.)

Chorus. So kindly, &c.

Seras. Seemingly condescending,
To their complaints attending,
Though love my bosom's rending,
Yet shall my scheme prevail.

Chorus. May fate our prayers befriending,
No disappointment sending;
Let love and truth prevail.
Securely, bliss enjoying,
All fear of power annoying,
Your clemency destroying,
Now justice shall prevail.

[During the finale, the Seraskier takes hold of Lilla's hand and kisses it; Leopold observes this, and takes Lilla's place; the Seraskier takes Leopold's hand, supposing it to be Lilla's, but finding his mistake, appears confused. Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Convent.

Enter CATHERINE.

AIR.

My plaint in no one pity moves,
Save echo, who in plaints replies:
Like me, depriv'd of him she loves,
With sympathy she counts my sighs.
Pleas'd with the strain, the hapless maid
Repeats the unavailing moan;
And, while she lends her soothing aid,
Laments my sorrows and her own.

Unhappy as I am, it is some consolation to me that Cohenberg knows my heart, and will not wrong me so far as to doubt my constancy. But see, the Seraskier—he treats me with respect, though he is still ignorant who I am.

Enter SERASKIER.

Seras. Alas! madam, shall I never have the happiness of seeing you wear those smiles which nature, prodigal in adorning you, meant as her last gift to perfect your charms.

Cath. I am your prisoner, sir; my indignant heart swells whilst I avow it.

Seras. I am your prisoner; does not my every sigh—

Cath. You are a soldier, sir; do not disgrace that character by insulting a defenceless woman.

Enter ISMAEL.

Ismael. My lord, a deserter of no vulgar rank, from the Austrian camp, desires to be admitted to your presence.

Seras. Conduct him hither. [Exit Ismael.] I presume, madam, you would wish to retire?

Cath. If I stay, I may hear some news of my friends. (Aside.) I request, sir, you will permit me to remain here.

Seras. I thank you, madam, for the request, since it, at last, gives me an opportunity of obliging you.

Re-enter ISMAEL with COLONEL COHENBERG.

Cath. (Aside.) Oh, heavens! my Cohenberg!

Colonel. (Aside.) My Catherine!

Seras. What are you?

Colonel. An Austrian.

Seras. What have you to communicate?

Colonel. Colonel Cohenberg is not unknown to your highness.

Cath. (Aside.) What can he mean?

Seras. His character is not unknown to me: what then?

Colonel. Your highness once wrote to him as to an exchange of prisoners; consequently, know his hand.

Seras. Perfectly well.

Cath. (Aside.) I perceive some artifice; but what a hazard does he run!

Colonel. (Giving a letter.) Here, sir, is my commission.

Seras. 'Tis his seal, his writing. (Reads.) "The bearer is in my confidence; if you wish for my aid, tell him on what terms you are willing to acquire my friendship and assistance,—COHENBERG." Is it possible that I shall be the happy means of gaining Cohenberg to the Ottoman cause? Tell the gallant Christian I deem his friendship invaluable; and in the name of my most illustrious sovereign, promise, as a debt of gratitude, whatever he shall ask. Do you know this Colonel Cohenberg, madam?

Cath. Yes, my lord, so well, that I have him now before me. (Looking at the Colonel.) He married a lady who was dear to me as myself; they were separated by the chance of war, and Cohenberg now lives to see her he loves in slavery and sorrow.

Colonel. Take comfort, madam; he loves her more tenderly than ever, and vows to relieve her, or perish in the attempt.

Seras. Say, Christian, if I write, when may I expect an answer?

Colonel. Within these few hours you may depend on seeing me again.

Cath. (Aside.) Indeed!

Seras. Heavens! madam, how you are altered! To what am I to attribute this blissful change?

Cath. To the blessed tidings I have just now heard. I am charmed to hear of Cohenberg's inviolable constancy, and transported with the hope of his Catherine being, one day, restored to freedom, by the arms of the hero she adores.

Seras. You take so warm an interest in his favour that, were he here, I should almost suspect myself reduced into his rival.

Cath. There would be no fear of that, for well he knows his Catherine will not suffer him to have a rival.

Seras. I hardly comprehend you. But I must send my answer to Cohenberg's letter. (Sits down to write.) 'Tis done. Now, madam, if you have any kind things to say in behalf of your friend, I'll be your secretary; continue those smiles, and you shall find a Mussulman can be as complaisant a lover as any Christendom can boast. What shall I tell him?

Cath. Tell him—

DUETT.—SERASKIER and CATHERINE.

*Of plighted faith so truly kept,
Of all love's dictates tell:
Of restless thoughts, that never slept,
Since when she bade farewell.
The rising sigh, the frequent tear,
The flush of hope, the chilling fear:
So may the sympathetic soul,
Direct kind fancy's wing,
Where future hours in transport roll,
And love's reward shall bring.*

(During this scene the Colonel and Catherine shew their joy at seeing each other, unobserved by the Seraskier, who is between them. In the course of the duett, the Colonel makes an unsuccessful effort to give her a letter.)

Seras. (Gives the Colonel a letter.) There is my answer; and by our holy prophet do I swear faithfully to perform each article. (The Colonel gives a letter to Catherine, unperceived by the Seraskier. A Slave enters, snatches it from her, and presents it to the Seraskier on his knee.) What's this? (Reads.) "I have ventured into the Turkish camp in hopes of seeing you, my beloved Catherine." Ha! Catherine! "This night I mean to storm the Seraskier's fort, and give you liberty. Your true COHENBERG." What ho! a guard!

Enter ISMAEL and Guard.

Seize him.

Cath. Hear me, my lord.

Seras. No more, dissembler! Bear her away.

Cath. My Cohenberg, I have undone thee.

Seras. Away with her. [Exit Guards with Cath.] Slaves, on your lives I charge you, guard well this hypocrite, this liar. (The Colonel, in great agitation, feels for his sword which the Guards have taken from him, and missing it, clasps his hands in agony.) Deep in the darkest dungeon of the fort let him be chained; there shall he stay till his associates in perfidy shall come to burst his bonds, and storm the post I guard.

Colonel. Alike I scorn thy menaces and taunts. I glory, though I failed, in the attempt. Heap cruelty on cruelty on me, I can bear it; my darkness is the loss of Catherine's eyes, my chains the despair of seeing her; and death were transport to the pangs I feel in knowing her a slave to thee, barbarian! [Exit, guarded.]

Seras. Ismael!

Ismael. My lord?

Seras. Wilt thou not despise me when I tell thee neither Cohenberg's plot, nor Catherine's charms, can drive this rustic Lilla from my heart. I'll carry her off this night. Have you prepared the disguises as I commanded?

Ismael. I have, my lord.

Seras. Give orders that my tent be pitched in yonder wood, and my seraglio instantly removed thither.

Ismael. Why so, my lord?

Seras. To elude the search that will be made after Lilla: besides, Cohenberg's designs have taught me that I lie too near the frontiers of the Austrians. Away! and see my orders are obeyed.

[Exit Ismael.]

AIR.—SERASKIER.

*Confusion! thus defeated!
With bitter scorn thus treated!
Whatever thought pursuing,
Where'er I turn my eyes,
Surrounding mists of ruin
In dark'ning circles rise:*

*In frost, on fire, by turns,
My bosom freezes—burns—
'Tis fix'd—my rival finds a grave.
Yet honour bids me save
From death the captive brave.
Confusion! thus defeated!
With bitter scorn thus treated!
Whatever thought pursuing,
Where'er I turn my eyes,
Surrounding mists of ruin
In dark'ning circles rise.*

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Wood.

Enter ANSELM and Peasants.

Anselm. It is as I suspected. I am sure 'twas Colonel Cohenberg I saw hurried to the fort. I fear the worst.

1 Peas. Is there no help, Anselm?

Anselm. None but this: some of you must swim the river, and inform the Austrian out-posts of Cohenberg's danger; and, perhaps, their succour may arrive in time to free him. I will remain on this side, that, should they arrive, I may conduct them by short and secret paths to the Seraskier's tent.

2 Peas. I'll go.

1 Peas. And I, if I drown for it; let's all go.

Anselm. Hear me, hear me, friends. You two shall undertake this message to the Austrians, the others stay with me to excite the villagers to revolt. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Another part of the Village.

Enter LILLA and GHITA.

DUETT.

*Haste, gentle zephyrs, o'er the glade,
If there my love discerning,
Kindly with fluttering pinions aid
His weary steps returning.
So may thy wings (their wanton play
No scorching sun oppressing)
Still gladly fan the sultry day,
And prove the summer's blessing.*

Ghita. Love they call a gentle passion,
Boast its power to calm the breast;
I prefer the jealous fashion;
Sweets when dash'd with sour are best.
While the ever-cooing doves,
In fond nonsense tell their loves;
Scarce existing, nought desiring;
Cloy'd with bliss, as well they may;
They, with langour half expiring,
Doze their stupid lives away.

Lilla. Let me in true pleasure's mirror
Tranquil view love's placid form;
Free from every jealous terror,
Give me the calm, take you the storm.

Lilla. Well, Ghita, now we are married, I hope our husbands will take their leave of jealousy.

Ghita. Psha! Lilla, how often must I tell you jealousy follows love like a shadow.

Lilla. Then love is a pretty thing and an ugly shadow. But I have seen my shadow often in the sun, and it appeared so tall and frightful that I am sure it couldn't be like me. But it begins to grow late, I wish our husbands would come home.

Ghita. There are two men coming this way.

Enter SERASKIER and ISMAEL in long cloaks.

Seras. (To Ismael.) Desire my followers to keep back.

Ghita. (To Lilla.) See, they have wrapped themselves up in long cloaks that we shouldn't know them.

Lilla. Ah! this is another of Leopold's jealous frolics. But I'll not speak first, I am determined.

Seras. Lilla, Lilla!

Lilla. I can't bear to see him uneasy; I must speak to him.

SESTETTO.

Lilla and Ghita. } Night thus from me concealing
 Ghita. } The form of him I love;
 Oh! let his voice, revealing
 His truth, my fears remove.

Seras. & Ismael. } Night thus from me concealing
 Ismael. } The form of her I love;
 Oh! let her voice, revealing
 The truth, my fears remove.

Lilla and Ghita. } Oh, heavens! the Seraskier!
 Seras. } A lover's accents hear;
 With sympathetic passion,
 Fond expectation cheer.

Lilla and Ghita. } Ah! should my husband hear us,
 What could poor Ghita do?
 What could poor Lilla do?
 [Enter LEOPOLD and PETER.]

Leop. & Peter. } Hark! I'm sure there's some one near Peter. } us.
 Peter. Ghita!
 Leop. Lilla!

Lilla and Ghita. } Our husbands near us!
 Ghita. } My love, I'm here.

Leop. & Peter. } You're here!
 Peter. } Then, who is this so near?

Lilla and Ghita. } Honest peasants, homeward going
 Ghita. } From their labour, I suppose.

Leop. & Peter. } How, I pray, are you so knowing,
 Peter. } Whether they be friends or foes?
 Jealous fears perplexing,
 Like whelming billows roll,
 And wreck my tortur'd soul.
 Begone; 'tis thy falsehood
 (To Lilla and Ghita.)
 Distracts my tortur'd soul.

Lilla and Ghita. } Ah! can my dear suspect me?
 Ghita. } My truth he cannot fear.

All. } Suspense, in clouds, shuts in the day.
 Hope, cheering star, afford thy ray
 Of silver light; and, to our eyes,
 Oh! bid thy bright creation rise.
 [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Inside of Peter's House.

Enter PETER and LEOPOLD.

Peter. A pretty adventure this.

Leop. Yes, a very pretty adventure, indeed.

Peter. How do you feel, Leopold?

Leop. Oh! I'm composed, quite composed.

Peter. For my part, I own I am in a passion.

Leop. Oh! then you are wrong, my dear friend; you are wrong, Peter.

Peter. My suspicions are not easily roused, but now—

Leop. Oh! for shame, Peter, can't you be calm? Death and d—n! can't you be cool?

Peter. I confess I am angry, and—

Leop. But you sha'n't be angry, I tell you. You must be cool; d—e! you shall.

Peter. Must I?

Leop. Yes.

Peter. Why, then, I will; you know I am naturally very peaceable.

Leop. Peaceable! Here's a fellow, now, that would stand by quietly to have his horns fitted on; by my troth, if I must wear mine, I'll butt with them like a mad bull. [Exit.]

Peter. Poor Leopold, he's angry with me for not putting myself in a passion, desires that I will be cool, then flies in a rage because I follow his advice.

AIR.—PETER.

How few know how to value life,
 And taste its real joys,
 Unmix'd with jealousy and strife,
 With anger, pride, and noise!

Let riches, power, and pomp surpass,
 And scorn me, if they please;
 Let me love, laugh, and take my glass,
 And lead a life of ease.
 Limpid and pure life's current seems,
 Till passion's wild mistake,
 In madness, troubles all the streams
 Of which he must partake.
 Let riches, &c.

Re-enter LEOPOLD.

Leop. I say, Peter, Ghita's coming this way. Now don't you say anything to her, because you won't keep yourself cool; leave me to manage her, I know more about these matters than you do.

Enter GHITA.

Well, Ghita, your husband and I have been laughing over the whimsical affair that happened just now.

Ghita. Yes, it was whimsical, indeed. All's safe, I find. (Aside.)

Leop. Well, and so they were countrymen returning from their day's labour, were they?

Ghita. Yes, countrymen returning from labour.

Leop. Oh! I dare say they were. Curse me, if I believe a word on't. (Aside.) Well, but who were they?

Ghita. I know no more of the matter than Lilla does.

Peter. Oh! here comes Lilla.

Enter LILLA.

Leop. Lilla, my dear, come here, I want to speak with you: now you know that I never put myself into a passion; but a lie provokes me, therefore, have a care; now I expect you to tell me the truth, for Ghita has confessed the whole matter.

Lilla. Has she, indeed?

Leop. She has; therefore, have a care.

Peter. (Aside to Leop.) Now, Leopold, I tell you—

Leop. Be quiet, you fool; keep yourself calm. (Ghita makes signs to Lilla that she has not told.)

Lilla. (Aside.) Oh, oh! very well.

Leop. (To Lilla.) Come, why don't you speak? these countrymen.

Lilla. Ay, these countrymen—Who were they? Why don't you tell me? I am sure you know.

Leop. I know! here's a pretty piece of business.

Lilla. Well, if you won't tell me, Ghita will.

Leop. Harkye! Lilla, I am convinced you are wrong; therefore, I insist on your confession.

Lilla. Oh! you will have me confess?

Leop. Yes, I will; therefore, recollect yourself, I will have it. I say, Peter, this is the way to manage a wife. You see I have carried my point.

AIR.—LILLA.

What can mean that thoughtful frown?
 Why those eyes to earth cast down?
 Tell me what amiss they see;
 Let them kindly look on me.

La ra lal la!

What, then, would my dearest have?
 Come, indeed, I will be grave;
 And, with melancholy face,
 Calmly hear thy piteous case.

La ra lal la!

(During the song she dances slowly between Peter, Leopold, and Ghita.)

Peter. I say, Leopold, this is the way to manage a wife; you see you have carried your point.

Leop. Why, I—I—I don't know how it is, but ecod! she has danced me into a good humour, I think.

Lilla. Now, Leopold, how could you serve me so? Why, Ghita says you have been laughing at her. [humour.]

Leop. Why, yes, I believe I am in a merry

Lilla. I don't think you are merry; you seem grumpy.

Leop. Psha! no such thing; I am not grumpy.

Ghita. Ah! you don't deserve the supper we have prepared for you. But come, Lilla, we must forgive 'em.

Lilla. Well, if we must, we must. (Brings the table with supper forward.)

Leop. (Aside to Peter.) Well, Peter, what do you think of this?

Peter. (Aside to Leop.) Why, for my part, I think it looks like innocence.

Leop. So it does, so it does; but we'll watch them, though; so, mum! Peter. (All sit.) Egad! I never was happier in my life; come, let's have a toast.

Lilla. I'll give you one: may our happiness ever continue!

Leop. Very well; very well, indeed. (All drink.) So good a toast deserves a second bumper. (Drinks again.) Now away with suspicions for ever.

SERASKIER sings without.

SERENADE.

*To mighty love, the trembling strings are pressing;
Sacred to him they praise, their sweet employ.
Ah! the fond heart, whose passion they're expressing,
Vibrates like them to love, but not to joy.*

Leop. What's that?

Peter. It sounds like music.

Ghita. What delightful harmony!

Leop. Curse harmony! I don't like it at all. (Rises.)

Lilla. Sit down, Leopold.

Leop. I won't sit down.

Lilla. Nay, don't be angry; here's a merry-thought for you.

Leop. Eat it yourself, then.

Lilla. You shall sit down. It is only the villagers amusing themselves; and you know, Leopold, that people of fashion often have music at supper. (Seraskier sings without.)

Leop. Oh! choak your singing.

Lilla. (Aside to Ghita.) We are undone! 'tis the Seraskier.

Peter. Ah! Leopold, there's danger in that voice. How melodious!

Leop. Horridly melodious! Harkye! Peter, are you courageous?

Peter. Tolerably so.

Leop. (Takes two swords, and gives one to Peter.) Here, then, take this sword, and follow me. We'll join the concert; and if I don't put these gallants out of tune, I'll be—It's astonishing how I continue to keep my temper. [Exit with Peter.]

Lilla. What will become of us! Let's follow them; I fear there will be mischief. I wonder that Leopold keeps his temper. [Exeunt.]

Enter USEPH at a back door.

Useph. All quiet; then I'm sure Leopold can't be here; and I have such a dread of that d—d fellow, that—(Seeing the supper.) Eh! What have we here? a good supper, and nobody to eat it. I think my appetite returns, as my fright goes off. Egad! I'll pick a bit. There's nothing in the world I like better than a good supper, especially when anybody else pays for it. Ha, ha, ha! Eh! What's this? (Holding a large slice of ham on his fork.) Oh! the Christian dogs! what, eat pork! Oh, horrible! (Eats the ham eagerly.) Oh, fie! oh, fie! What have we here? Wine! worse and worse! Wine, indeed! How can people be so impious to drink—(Drinks a large cupful.)—Though, I believe a Mahometan may take a cup of wine when nobody sees him. Egad! I'll take another. Here's to the founder of the feast. (Drinks.) Now, if I could but meet Lilla—Good cheer puts one in such excellent spirits, and makes one so valiant and so loving, that—(Pistols fire.)—Oh, Lord! (Starts up.) They are firing pistols against the door. Oh, dear! oh, dear! What will become of me? (Goes to the door at the back.) Eh! this door is fast! Mercy on me! (Hides under the table.)

Enter PETER and GHITA.

Ghita. Stay here, my dear Peter, if you love me; all opposition is fruitless. I am sure the Seraskier it amongst them.

Peter. Poor Leopold! he'll be overpowered by numbers. Run up to the house-top, Ghita, and alarm the neighbours.—[Exit Ghita.]—How unlucky that this accident should happen just at supper-time!

Enter LEOPOLD.

Leop. Confusion! they have carried off my Lilla. Plague on my sword for failing me, when I might have rescued her; but I'll raise the neighbourhood, and if I can but find that old scoundrel, Useph—(Turns round, and sees Useph.)—Ha! villain, what brought you here?

Useph. What brought me here? Why, I heard a riot, so I came to—to—

Leop. To what?

Useph. Why, to quell it, and defend your house; and, besides, I came to wish you joy on your marriage, my dear friend.

Leop. And how did you get into the house?

Useph. I came through the garden, and in at the back-door, quietly and peaceably as a magistrate should do, and agreeably to my function.

Peter. Yes, and you seem to have been eating some of our supper: was that agreeably to your function?

Leop. Ah! sirrah, who asked you to supper?

Useph. I only picked a bit.

Leop. Hold your tongue. Harkye, rascal! my Lilla's carried off; and I am almost sure that you are in the plot; so, come along, and if I find my suspicions right, I'll hang you on the next tree. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A Turkish Watch-tower.

Enter the SERASKIER, ISMAEL, and Guards, from the Tower.

Seras. Well, Ismael; so far we have proceeded successfully, and Lilla is safe within my power. The villagers fought manfully.

Ismael. I fear, my lord, we shall experience other proofs of their valour.

Seras. To what am I to attribute these unusual apprehensions, Ismael?

Ismael. My lord, I never before fought in a cause I was ashamed of.

Seras. No more: it's time to think of Cohenberg. Are the executioners prepared?

Ismael. They are, my lord.

Seras. Are the horsemen ready to bear off Catherine?

Ismael. They have their orders, my lord. (Retires back.)

Seras. (To the Guards.) Strike off his chains, and bring your prisoner forth. Do you conduct the lady hither. [To another Guard, who exit.]

The Guards lift up a trap-door, one descends and returns with COLONEL COHENBERG.

Colonel. To what new indignities am I reserved?

Enter Guard with CATHERINE.

Seras. Hear me, Christian: had the chance of battle made you my prisoner, I should have treated you as a soldier; but you have degraded yourself into a spy, and an ignominious death is, by the law of nations, your reward; yet life or death, on one condition, may still be yours.

Colonel. And if that one should be unworthy, learn, though life and liberty are dearer to me than all the treasures of your eastern world, I have a gem within my keeping, more valuable far,—my honour! which I scorn to barter for it. (Muffled drums are heard.)

Seras. Hark! that is thy knell. When thrice those sounds, within a few short moments, shall have passed upon thy obstinacy, that instant is thy last. Attend: this night thy Austrians mean to attack my fort. Let the deceivers be deceived: deliver them to my sword. Renounce your Christian worship: do this; and, in my Sultan's name, I promise you power, wealth, honour, your Catherine, all your wishes can desire.

Colonel. My Catherine! she is a reward so valuable, so truly great, that—

Cath. Hear me, Cohenberg: should an unmanly tenderness for me make thee forget thy faith, thy country, and thy king, though that instant be my last, I'll tear thee, coward, from my bleeding heart, and cast thee off unworthy of my love.

Seras. (Aside.) Death to my hopes! she ruins all my purposes.—Christian, reflect; be quick, or both your lives shall expiate thy fault.

Cath. This is the greatest mercy thou canst shew. He dares to die, and I dare not live to see him dishonoured.

Seras. (Muffled drums.) Appear, ye ministers of death.—[Enter black Slaves.—Now, Christian, this moment is thy last.

Colonel. Oh, heavens!

Seras. Bear her away!

Cath. To torture—death. My Cohenberg, remember me.

Colonel. In life and death, my Catherine.

Colonel. Come, tyrant, give me the fatal bow-string, and end at once this pageant of thy cruelty. Thy threats I boldly despise; thy offers thus I tread beneath my feet; and, though this worthless frame may fall before thee, fixed as the founded rock, my soul shall stand, firm to my God, my king, and my country.

Seras. I'll hear no more.

Colonel. (Kneels.) Preserve my Catherine, heaven! (Muffled drums. The Slaves put the cord round his neck, and prepare to strangle him.)

Seras. Despatch him, slaves!

Colonel. Good angels, guard my Catherine!

Seras. Christian, thy prayers are vain. (A great shout is heard, and the drums beating to arms.)

Seras. Distraction! we are betrayed. [Exit.

Colonel. Off, off! ye slaves.

Enter ANSELM, PETER, LEOPOLD, &c. Anselm gives the Colonel a sword. Slaves go off. Anselm, Peter, and Leopold, go into the tower. SERASKIER re-enters with his sword drawn; the Colonel fights with him, and drives him off. The Turks are driven from the tower; the Turkish flag is taken down, and the Austrian colours hoisted. A party of Austrians enter from the tower, with PETER, LEOPOLD, ANSELM, and Peasants. COLONEL COHENBERG enters. Drums and trumpets.)

Colonel. The villain has escaped me in the throng. But, oh! Catherine is no where to be found.

Peter. A Turkish soldier told me, even now, some horsemen bore her over yonder plain.

Colonel. Ha! over yonder plain! [Exit.

FINALE.

Now victory has, like a mistress kind,

Put an end to all our quarrels;

In a brimming cup our joys we'll find,

From the vine we'll pluck our quarrels.

Let us drink as we fight; with loud huzzas,

We'll charge, and scorn all shrinking;

Till our wine, like the foe, retreats apace,

And we shew our valour in drinking.

[Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Inside of the Seraskier's tent.

Several Ladies discovered.

CHORUS.

On the warlike plains descending,
Night, in pity, casts her veil;
Hostile strife awhile suspending,
Short-lived peace and rest prevail.

Enter FATIMA and LILLA. Lilla in an elegant Turkish habit.

Fatima. Then you are resolved to leave us, Lilla?

Lilla. Yes, your ladyship, that I will as soon as I can.

Fatima. And are you not sorry to part with your fine clothes, and quit the pleasures of the seraglio?

Lilla. Pleasures, madam, what are they?

Fatima. Why, 'tis our pleasure to obey his highness, the Seraskier, who is our lord and husband.

Lilla. And have you no other husband?

Fatima. Why, that's a very odd question.

Lilla. Nay, I beg your ladyship's pardon; but I understand there are five and twenty; if so, what a pity you should only have one husband amongst you.

Fatima. Nay, nay; I ought not to be sorry at your going, or for the beautiful stranger leaving us. I have, hitherto, been the Seraskier's favourite; and you are two dangerous rivals.—Oh! here she comes.

Enter CATHERINE from the tent.

Cath. This intelligence of Cohenberg's safety, gives me new life. Now let fortune do her worst. Well, Fatima, are the sentinels bribed to let us pass?

Fatima. I gave Selim the gold, as you desired; who, doubtless, has obeyed your orders.

Cath. So, Lilla, I find you are to be my guide to the castle. Are you sure you know the way?

Lilla. Yes, my lady; 'tis by the private path, which leads directly to it. I dare say we shall be safe. (Trembling.)

Cath. Why do you tremble, Lilla?

Lilla. No, my lady—yes—yes—yes, I believe I am a little afraid.

Cath. Oh, for shame! You a lover! Consider.

Lilla. No, I won't consider. Now, pray, madam, talk finely to me, as you did a little while ago, and don't let me think of difficulties.

Cath. Difficulties! they are the test of virtue, the spur to courage: the noble mind would lose half its splendour, were it not for the pleasure of surmounting difficulties.

AIR.—CATHERINE.

No more I heave the heartfelt sigh;

No more I drop the briny tear;

Hope's promis'd hour of bliss is near.

Yet dangers surrounding,

My reason confounding,

Ah! whither shall I fly!

Enter a Turkish Soldier.

Sold. The drums are beating to arms; we expect to be attacked every moment. [Exit.

Cath. Come, Lilla. Adieu, kind Fatima! [Exeunt.

Peter. (Without.) The enemy's camp's on fire. Plunder's the word.

Enter PETER, LEOPOLD, ANSELM, Peasants, and Austrian Soldiers, who cut down the Seraskier's Tent, and carry it off in pieces. The Turkish camp is seen on fire, at a distance. Drums and trumpets are heard. Re-enter LEOPOLD and PETER.

Leop. Lilla not to be found! Oh! she is in the plot; I am sure she is; she has done it on purpose. I knew she would run away when I married her: I was certain.

Peter. 'Tis a pity, indeed.

Leop. 'Tis false! 'tis not a pity.

Peter. Well, then, 'tis not a pity. What a plague, mustn't I be sorry for you?

Leop. Rot your sorrow! No.

Peter. Well, I won't be sorry, then.

Leop. But are you really sorry for me, Peter!

Peter. To be sure I am: you know the friendship I have had for you, ever since we were boys together.

Leop. Give me your hand, then. I ask your pardon. But why will you provoke me?

Peter. Why was you provoked, then?

Leop. No, I was not; but I mean that—I say I mean—Zounds! I don't know what I mean.

SONG.—LEOPOLD.

*How provoking your doubts! Do you think I'm a fool?
In the heat of the battle you know I was cool;*

While ourselves and our neighbours

With guns, pistols, sabres,

Were cutting and slashing,

Mahomedans hashing.

*But need I care for that, since time is on the wing;
You see I am merry, you hear how I sing.*

Tol de rol, &c.

You see I am merry, you hear how I sing.

*That jade, madam Lilla, that gipsy, afar,
Is jigging away to the Turkish guitar;*

While great smooth-chinn'd fribbles,

With vile squeaking trebles,

Chant her praises to cheer

That cruel Seraskier!

Till the handkerchief's thrown—But, then, what's that to me?

It can't make me uneasy—I'm happy, you see.

Tol de rol, &c.

It can't make me uneasy—I'm happy, you see.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment at Colonel Cohenberg's.

Enter an Austrian Soldier, and LILLA, veiled.

Sold. Pray, walk this way; our Colonel will be so glad to see you.

Lilla. Indeed, sir, he won't.

Sold. Oh! but I am sure he will, my lady.

Lilla. Sir!

Sold. I beg your ladyship's pardon; but, though bred in the ranks, I know good manners.

Lilla. Ah! that's my misfortune. I wish you did not; for, then, you would quit the room, and let me alone.

[Soldier bows, and exit.]

Useph. (Without.) Come along, Michael.

Lilla. Oh, heavens! that wretch, Useph! What shall I do! Though, perhaps, he won't know me in this dress. (Retires.)

Enter an Austrian Soldier, conducting in USEPH and MICHAEL. Useph dressed as an Austrian officer.

Useph. Pray, 'don't disturb the noble Colonel; but when his honour is quite at leisure, let his honour know that I humbly wait to offer my congratulations. My name is Heoon Joseph Wolfgang Baumbork Blandenkerstoon Schwartzbergen.

[Exit Soldier.]

Mich. Why, heyday! I thought your name had been Ben Yacomb Ben Mustapha.

Useph. Ay, that was my Turkish title; but it won't do now the Austrians are our masters. I think I have got a good name, eh! Michael?

Mich. Yes; and as you never had a good name before, I hope you will keep it, now you have got it.

Useph. Ha, ha! Very well; you are a sharp fellow, Michael; I'll recommend you to the Colonel, when I am appointed to some post of great emolument under him: you shall be my deputy, and do all the business for me,—(aside) and I'll take all the money.

Mich. So I will. I have often wondered where the deuce you could conceal your riches.

Useph. Ay, that's a secret I mean to let you into; for I don't think my hoards are quite safe in this time of warlike combustion. We'll remove them, Michael. (Lilla listens.)

Mich. But where are they?

Useph. Why, you know the burying-place, about a mile off, which the Turks hold so sacred. In the middle of that ground, stands a high and spacious tomb; there I have hid it. But, mum!

Enter an Austrian Soldier.

Sold. (To Lilla.) Our Colonel is not at home, madam; but I shall be happy to attend your ladyship.

Useph. (To the Sold.) Harkye! my lad, pray, who is this pretty piece of camp furniture, eh?

Sold. Hush! 'tis our Colonel's lady. I was the first who saw her here, and expect to be made a corporal for it.

[Exit.]

Useph. (Aside to Michael.) Oh, ho! then I know my cue.—Leave us, Michael.—[Exit Michael.] (Useph bows to Lilla.) How happy are we all to see your ladyship returned! The Colonel is a most amiable creature; he does me the honour to live in my house: it was mine yesterday. Indeed, he forgot to ask my leave; but true politeness overlooks trifles. He must have a number of very pretty things at his disposal. Oh! if ever I should live to be appointed a commissary—and if your ladyship would but stand my friend—Pray, is your ladyship fond of jewels?

Lilla. (Aside.) If I speak to him, he'll know my voice.

Useph. (Aside.) I have some of the most beautiful here, which I should be proud to present to your ladyship. (Offers a casket.)

Lilla. (Aside.) I believe I had best take them, to prevent further questions. (Takes the casket.)

Useph. (Aside.) I can see that she is used to bribery.

Enter a Soldier.

Sold. The Colonel is not returned yet, madam; till he do, we shall be proud to obey the wife of our noble commander.

Lilla. (Throws open her veil.) I am not his wife, sir.

Useph. Why, heyday! Zounds! this is my wife that ought to be.

Lilla. I'll not be the wife of any of you. But, since you say, sir, you will obey my commands, pray, be kind enough to turn that wicked old justice of peace out of the house.

Sold. Oh! that we will directly. [Exit.]

Useph. What, turn me out of the house! that's a d—d good joke. Well, but, Lilla, I'll trouble you for my pearls again, dear.

Lilla. Why, I thought you gave them to me.

Useph. Yes, I gave them you to look at.

Lilla. Well, I have looked at them, and like them very well.

Useph. Come, come; I must have my jewels.

Enter two Soldiers.

Lilla. Turn him out.

Useph. I won't go without my pearls. At your peril, detain them. Lookye! my lads, I'm a magistrate; I see you are well-disposed persons, and so I'll explain to you the nature of justice as to private property. For instance: my pearls—I say, my pearls—(Soldiers push him out.)

Lilla. Ha, ha, ha! I think I shall be even with you, Mr. Justice. I am glad I know where his money is hidden. I wish I had told that gentleman of the fine lady that came away with me: I dare say she is the Colonel's wife. Ah! but, then, perhaps, he would have been angry with me for losing her. Well, thanks to fortune, here I am at present; so, I'll think no more of past dangers.

AIR.—LILLA.

*Domestic peace, my soul's desire,
The dearest bliss fate could bestow,
At length, to thee I may aspire;
Misfortune's storms no longer blow.
Escap'd their ire, now safe on shore,
I listen to the tempest's roar;
And while the billows idly foam,
They but endear my long lost home.* [Exit.

SCENE III.—Outside of Colonel Cohenberg's house.

USEPH discovered being pushed out of the house
by two Soldiers.

Useph. Well, but hear me: I say, that—there! they have turned me out, and won't hear me. Nobody will attend to me. What a miserable dog I am! Never was there so unhappy a magistrate!

Enter LEOPOLD.

Leop. Cruel, cruel, Lilla!

Useph. What?

Leop. She has robbed me of my peace for ever!

Useph. She has robbed me, too; however, I am ready to make the matter up, if you'll pay me for the pearls.

Leop. What does the fellow mean?

Useph. I mean the pearls Lilla had of me.

Leop. What! had of you?

Useph. Hear me patiently, and I'll tell you all.

Leop. Zounds! I am patient.—Well?

Useph. I intended those pearls as a present to a certain person.

Leop. And you gave them to Lilla?

Useph. Yes, in my house—Colonel Cohenberg's, I mean; for there she is.

Leop. What, Lilla there! Oh, ho! (Knocks.)

Sold. (Within.) What, you won't go along!—
(Comes out, and sees Leopold.) Ha! brother soldier, how are you?

Leop. Very well, thankye. Well, and so you are here. And how are you? Isn't there a young woman—I'm glad to see you—I say a young woman—How long have you been here?—Called Lilla, at this house?

Sold. Yes, she's within. Come with me.

[Exeunt Leopold and Soldier. Useph attempts to follow; but is pushed back, and the door shuts.

Useph. What, shut the door in my face! I see there is no chance of getting the pearls; and I shall be ruined if I stay here; so, I'll e'en pack up my remaining treasure, and go over to the Turks. I got all my money by changing sides, and I'll change sides to keep it.

AIR.—USEPH.

*Some time ago, I married a wife,
And she, poor soul! was the plague of my life;
I thought, when I lost her, my troubles were done,
But, i'faith, I found they're just begun.*

Tho' she's gone,Still 'tis all one,My troubles, alas! are just begun.A magistrate I next became,To be impartial was my aim;No distinction I made between great and small;Plaintiffs, defendants, I fleec'd them all:Great and small, fleec'd them all.Turks and Christians, I cheated 'em all.In praise of honesty, I've heard,As policy, 'tis much preferr'd;Then, if 'tis best, in life's repast,The daintiest dish I'll taste the last.Honest at last,Tir'd of the past,Perhaps, as a change, I may try it at last. [Exit.

SCENE IV.—A Room at Colouel Cohenberg's.

Enter LEOPOLD and LILLA.

Lilla. My dear Leopold, how glad I am to see you! Was it not lucky that I heard Useph say where his riches were?

Leop. Yes, very lucky.—(Aside.) Not a word of the pearls yet.—Well, but, Lilla,—I say this fine dress of yours—Zounds! I can't bear to look at it.

Lilla. What, more suspicions, Leopold?

Leop. No, my suspicions are vanished.

Lilla. I am glad of it.

Leop. Yes, I am convinced of your falsehood.—Where are the pearls that Useph gave you? I suppose you can explain that to me.

Lilla. I'll explain nothing, Leopold. Your want of confidence in me vexes me to the heart. I am sure we shall never be happy, if this be the case. (Cries.)

Leop. Oh! very well. I see what—you wish to part—Oh! with all my heart.

Lilla. And with all mine.

DUETT.—LEOPOLD and LILLA.

Lilla. *Though you think by this to vex me,
Love no more can give me pain.*

Leop. *Vainly strive not to perplex me,
You shall dupe me ne'er again.*

Lilla. *Now your falsehood is requited,
I'll enjoy a single life.*

Leop. *Hark! to glory I'm invited,
By the cheerful drum and fife.*

Lilla. *By consent, then, now we sever,—*Leop. *Love's all nonsense, freedom's sweet;*Lilla. *And we take our leave for ever,*Leop. *Never more again to meet.*Lilla. *Never more?*Leop. *Never more.*Lilla. *I don't want, sir, to allure you;I don't wish your stay, not I.*Leop. *I'm quite happy, I assure you;Gladly I pronounce good b'ye!*Lilla. *You will change your mind, believe me—*Leop. *No; I told you so before.*Lilla. *Can you have the heart to leave me?*Leop. *Yes: I'll never see you more.*Lilla. *Never more?*Leop. Never more.

Both. *Never more my love shall leave me;
Never part—no, never more.* [Exeunt.

SCENE V.—A Turkish Burial-ground.

Enter PETER, followed by LEOPOLD with a small cane.

Peter. How fortunate that Lilla should overhear Useph discover where his treasures are hidden. But you say we are to carry this money to Colonel Cohenberg, who will deliver it to the lawful owners.

Leop. Yes; we are to commit a robbery for the public good. So, follow me, Peter. In we go.

Enter MICHAEL with a sack, and USEPH disguised in a long cloak.

Useph. Come along, Michael. But make no noise, that we may make our escape, undiscovered, to Belgrade. This is the spot where I buried my poor, dear wife, two years ago.

Mich. I recollect it.

Useph. Ah! many a time, in the dead of the night, have I visited this place.

Mich. What the plague, did you want to steal your wife?

Useph. No, no; I ran away with her once, when she was alive; and repented it ever afterwards. She was a good soul, but rather turbulent; never quiet, till she arrived here; and, now she is at rest, I should be sorry to disturb her. There, Michael; that tomb is my banking-house; and, perhaps, it is not the first banking-house where a fortune has been buried. However, this is an old-established shop, and all the parties in it quiet, safe people.

Mich. Then we come to remove the treasure?

Useph. Even so, my boy: I shall take away my money, and leave my wife. Many a husband would think that no bad bargain. (Going in, meets PETER and LEOPOLD.) Oh, terrible! What do I see! my riches! Oh! you audacious robbers! Oh! you sacrilegious villains!

Leop. Now, don't make a noise; you must be cool.

Useph. Why, you impudent varlet! Do you plunder me, and preach to me at the same time? Zounds! I'll never be cool again.

Leop. Yes, you will. (Strikes him with a cane.) How do you find yourself, now? (Strikes him again.)

Useph. Oh! good, kind Leopold, I am cool—indeed, I am quiet.

Leop. Now, then, let's hear what you have to say.

Useph. May I, then, without offence, ask what right you have to take my money? I don't ask this in anger; I am quite cool.

Leop. Your money! Why, your name is Heroon Joseph Wolfgang Baumbork Blandenkerstoon Schwertzenbergen.

Peter. And this money belongs to one Ben Yacomb Ben Ali Ben Mustapha.

Leop. An old, roguish magistrate of this village, who used to cheat people of their property. Come, honest Michael, you shall carry this treasure for us to Colonel Cohenberg's.

Useph. To Colonel Cohenberg's! Why, what the devil—

Leop. What, you want the other dose?

Useph. No, no.

Leop. Well, then, assist Peter in loading Michael.

Useph. I tell you I will not assist. That—

Leop. (Strikes him.) Now be cool.

Useph. This is d—d hard to make a man accessory to robbing himself. (They put several bags, which Peter and Leopold brought from the tomb, into the sack, then place it on Michael's back, who carries it off. Useph puts one of the bags into his pocket, unseen by Peter or Leopold.)—Exeunt.

SCENE VI.—Outer Wall of the Burial-ground.—

Several voices are heard crying—"Follow! Follow!"

Enter CATHERINE, LEOPOLD, PETER, MICHAEL, and USEPH.

Cath. Oh, heavens! I am closely pursued!—Which way shall I escape? My friends, will you conduct me to Colonel Cohenberg's.

Leop. Ay, madam, at the hazard of our lives. Lead on, Useph. [Exeunt.]

Enter SERASKIER, ISMAEL, and Guards.

Seras. Confusion! My camp destroyed, and Catherine escaped!

Ismael. Pray, my lord, return. You are near the frontiers of the Austrians.

Seras. Not till I recover Catherine. (Trumpets.) Hark! I am called to arms. Begone, and bear our crescent to the wars. [Exit Ismael.]

AIR.—SERASKIER.

*Love and honour now conspire
To rouse my soul with martial fire.
Holy prophet, hear my prayer,
Give me once more the charming fair.
The Austrian trumpet's bold alarms
Breathe defiance to our arms.
Fir'd with ardour to engage,
Give me to dare the battle's rage,
When groans that shall be heard no more,
Echo to the cannon's roar.*

*Death stalks triumphant o'er the field:
On every side the Christians yield.
Still conquest doubly presses
The lover-soldier's arms,
In prospect he possesses
Complying beauty's charms.* [Exit.]

SCENE VII.—Castle and view of Belgrade.—The siege commences. Guns firing balls of fire, supposed to be thrown to fire the citadel. A party of Turks are repulsed by a party of Austrians. An Austrian Soldier fights some time sword in hand with a Turkish soldier; but, losing his sword, takes a pistol from his belt, and fires at him; the Turk falls, and is thrown into the ditch that surrounds the Castle.—Enter the SERASKIER and COHENBERG fighting. The Seraskier falls.—PETER, LEOPOLD, ANSELM, &c. fight with the Turkish soldiers. USEPH enters, and flourishes his sword on the side of the Turks; but finding they are sure to be conquered, joins the Austrians. Drums and trumpets heard all the time.

Colonel. (To the Seraskier, who is down.) Rise, and learn Christian revenge.

Enter CATHERINE.

FINALE.—In the course of which, enter GHITA and LILLA.

Cho. Loud let the song of triumph rise,
Bless'd triumph o'er oppression's sway;
Valour has gain'd the brightest prize,
For freedom's voice shall join the lay.

Cath. Fortune relenting, from her stores,
Her richest treasures lavish pours;
The bliss for which so long we strove,
The joys of victory and love.

Seras. Vanquish'd, I boast my victor brave;
Light were the chains which valour gave;
More potent fetters now I find,
Kindness subdues his captive's mind.

Cho. Loud let the song of triumph rise,
Bless'd triumph o'er oppression's sway;
Valour has gain'd the brightest prize,
For freedom's voice shall join the lay.

DUETT.—LILLA and GHITA.

*Now while music her strains most inviting,
Shall in sweet gratitude's cause display;
Tho' untutor'd in skill so delighting,
Our heartfelt thanks let us humbly pay.
Strains so artless tho' we proffer,
Hearts o'erflowing zest the offer.*

Cho. Now while music, &c.

Leop. All ill-humour thus vented in fighting,
We are, as usual, good-humour'd and gay;

Lilla. Happy liberty's blessings regaining,
They inspiring our simple lay;

Ghita. Freedom's glorious cause sustaining,
The theme our humble song will raise.

Lilla. Strains so artless,—
Though we proffer,—
Hearts o'erflowing,
Zest the offer.

Cho. Freedom's glorious cause, &c.

Cath. From companions in danger, this greeting
Of friendship, how can we requite?

Trio. A reception so gracious when meeting,
Our duty becomes our delight.

Lilla and Ghi. } Bright the laurel of victory gracing,
The manly brow merit marks it to wear;—

Cho. Doubly dear is that laurel while placing
By the lov'd hand of the favourite fair.
Toils forgetting, pleasure courting,
Beauty beaming, smiles transporting.
Bright the laurel, &c. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A great Hall in the court of Pyrrhus.

Enter ORESTES, PYLADES, and Attendants.

Ores. Oh! Pylades, what's life without a friend?
At sight of thee my gloomy soul cheers up,
My hopes revive, and gladness dawns within me.
After an absence of six tedious moons,
How could I hope to find my Pylades,
My joy, my comfort, on this fatal shore?
My joy, my comfort, on this fatal shore?
Even in the court of Pyrrhus? in these realms,
These hated realms, so cross to all my wishes.
Oh! my brave friend, may no blind stroke of fate
Divide us more, and tear me from myself.

Pyl. Oh, Prince! oh, my Orestes! oh, my friend!
Thus let me speak the welcome of my heart.

(Embraces.)

Since I have gain'd this unexpected meeting,
Bless'd be the powers that barr'd my way to Greece,
And kept me here! e'er since the unhappy day
When warring winds (Epirus full in view)
Sunder'd our barks on the loud stormy main.

Ores. It was, indeed, a morning full of horror!

Pyl. A thousand boding cares have rack'd my soul
In your behalf. Often, with tears, I mourn'd
The fatal ills, to which your life's involv'd;
And grudg'd you dangers which I could not share.
I fear'd to what extremities the black despair
That prey'd upon your mind might have betray'd
And lest the gods, in pity to your woes, [you,
Should hear your pray'rs, and take the life you
loath'd.

But now with joy I see you. The retinue,
And numerous followers that surround you here,
Speak better fortunes, and a mind dispos'd
To relish life.

Ores. Alas! my friend, who knows
The destiny to which I stand reserv'd?
I come in search of an inhuman fair;
And live or die, as she decrees my fate. [cur'd

Pyl. You much surprise me, prince; I thought you

Of your unpity'd, unsuccessful passion.

Why, in Epirus, should you hope to find
Hermione less cruel, than at Sparta?

I thought her pride, and the disdainful manner
In which she treated all your constant sufferings,
Had broke your fetters, and assur'd your freedom:
Asham'd of your repulse, and slighted vows,
You hated her; you talk'd of her no more:
Prince, you deceiv'd me!

Ores. I deceiv'd myself.

Do not upbraid the unhappy man that loves thee.
Thou know'st I never hid my passion from thee;
Thou saw'st it, in its birth, and in its progress;
And when, at last, the hoary king, her father,
Great Menelaus, gave away his daughter,
His lovely daughter, to the happy Pyrrhus,
Th' avenger of his wrongs, thou saw'st my grief,
My torture, my despair; and how I dragg'd,
From sea to sea, a heavy chain of woes.
Oh! Pylades, my heart has bled within me,
To see thee, press'd with sorrows not thy own,
Still wand'ring with me like a banish'd man,
Watchful, and anxious for thy wretched friend,
To temper the wild transports of my mind,
And save me from myself.

Pyl. Why thus unkind?

Why will you envy me the pleasing task
Of generous love, and sympathising friendship?

Ores. Thou miracle of truth! But hear me on.
When in the midst of my disastrous fate,
I thought how the divine Hermione,
Deaf to the vows, regardless of my plaints,
Gave up herself, and all her charms, to Pyrrhus;
Thou may'st remember, I abhorr'd her name,
Strove to forget her, and repay her scorn.
I made my friends, and even myself, believe
My soul was freed. Alas! I did not see,
That all the malice of my heart was love.
Triumphing thus, and yet a captive still,
In Greece I landed; and in Greece I found

The assembled princes all alarm'd with fears,
In which their common safety seem'd concern'd.
I join'd them: for I hop'd that war and glory
Might fill my mind, and take up all my thoughts;
And that my shatter'd soul, impair'd with grief,
Once more would reassume its wonted vigour,
And every idle passion quit my breast.

Pyl. The thought was worthy Agamemnon's son.

Ores. But see the strange perverseness of my stars,
Which throws me on the rock I strove to shun!
The jealous chiefs, and all the states of Greece,
With one united voice, complain of Pyrrhus;
That now, forgetful of the promise giv'n,
And mindless of his godlike father's fate,
Astyanax he nurses in his court;
Astyanax, the young, surviving hope
Of ruin'd Troy; Astyanax, descended
From a long race of kings—great Hector's son.

Pyl. A name still dreadful in the ears of Greece!
But, Prince, you'll cease to wonder why the child
Lives thus protected in the court of Pyrrhus,
When you shall hear the bright Andromache,
His lovely captive, charms him from his purpose:
The mother's beauty guards the helpless son.

Ores. Your tale confirms what I have heard; and
hence

Spring all my hopes. Since my proud rival woos
Another partner to his throne and bed,
Hermione may still be mine. Her father,
The injur'd Menelaus, thinks already
His daughter slighted, and th' intended nuptials
Too long delay'd. I heard his loud complaints
With secret pleasure; and was glad to find
Th' ungrateful maid neglected in her turn,
And all my wrongs aveng'd in her disgrace.

Pyl. Oh! may you keep your just resentments warm! [found

Ores. Resentments! Oh! my friend, too soon I
They grew not out of hatred. I am betray'd:
I practise on myself, and fondly plot
My own undoing. Goaded on by love,
I canvass'd all the suffrages of Greece;
And here I come, their sworn ambassador,
To speak their jealousies, and claim this boy.

Pyl. Pyrrhus will treat your embassy with scorn.
Full of Achilles, his redoubted sire,
Pyrrhus is proud, impetuous, headstrong, fierce;
Made up of passions: will he, then, be sway'd,
And give to death the son of her he loves?

Ores. Oh! would he render up Hermione,
And keep Astyanax, I should be bless'd!
He must; he shall! Hermione is my life,
My soul, my rapture! I'll no longer curb
The strong desire that hurries me to madness:
I'll give a loose to love; I'll bear her hence;
I'll tear her from his arms; I'll—Oh, ye gods!
Give me Hermione, or let me die!
But tell me, Pylades, how stand my hopes?
Is Pyrrhus still enamour'd with her charms?
Or dost thou think he'll yield me up the prize,
The dear, dear prize, which he has ravish'd from me?

Pyl. I dare not flatter your fond hopes so far;
The king, indeed, cold to the Spartan princess,
Turns all his passion to Andromache,
Hector's afflicted widow. But in vain,
With interwoven love and rage, he sues
The charming captive, obstinately cruel.
Oft he alarms her for her child, confin'd
Apart; and when her tears begin to flow,
As soon he stops them, and recalls his threats.
Hermione a thousand times has seen
His ill-requited vows return to her;
And takes his indignation all for love.
What can be gather'd from a man so various?
He may, in the disorder of his soul,
Wed her he hates, and punish her he loves.

Ores. But tell me how the wrong'd Hermione
Brooks her slow nuptials, and dishonour'd charms?

Pyl. Hermione would fain be thought to scorn
Her wavering lover, and disdain his falsehood;

But, spite of all her pride and conscious beauty,
She mourns in secret her neglected charms,
And oft has made me privy to her tears;
Still threatens to be gone, yet still she stays,
And sometimes sighs, and wishes for Orestes.

Ores. Ah! were those wishes from her heart, my friend,

I'd fly in transport— (Flourish within.)

Pyl. Hear! the king approaches
To give you audience. Speak your embassy
Without reserve: urge the demands of Greece;
And, in the name of all her kings, require
That Hector's son be giv'n into your hands.
Pyrrhus, instead of granting what they ask,
To speed his love, and win the Trojan dame,
Will make it merit to preserve her son.
But, see: he comes!

Ores. Meanwhile, my Pylades,
Go, and dispose Hermione to see
Her lover, who is come thus far, to throw
Himself, in all his sorrows, at her feet. [Exit Pyl.]

Enter PYRRHUS, PHOENIX, and Attendants.
Before I speak the message of the Greeks,
Permit me, sir, to glory in the title
Of their ambassador; since I behold
Troy's vanquisher, and great Achilles' son;
Nor does the son rise short of such a father:
If Hector fell by him, Troy fell by you.
But what your father never would have done,
You do. You cherish the remains of Troy;
And, by an ill-tim'd pity, keep alive
The dying embers of a ten years' war.
Have you so soon forgot the mighty Hector?
The Greeks remember his high brandish'd sword,
That fill'd their state with widows and with orphans;

For which they call for vengeance on his son.
Who knows what he may one day prove? Who knows

But he may brave us in our ports, and fill'd
With Hector's fury, set our fleets on blaze?
You may, yourself, live to repent your mercy.
Comply, then, with the Grecians' just demands;
Sate their vengeance, and preserve yourself.

Pyr. The Greeks are for my safety more con-cern'd
Than I desire. I thought your kings were met
On more important counsel. When I heard
The name of their ambassador, I hop'd
Some glorious enterprise was taking birth.
Is Agamemnon's son despatch'd for this?
And do the Grecian chiefs, renown'd in war,
A race of heroes, join in close debate,
To plot an infant's death? What right has Greece
To ask his life? Must I, must I alone,
Of all her scepter'd warriors, be deny'd
To treat my captive as I please? Know, Prince,
When Troy lay smoking on the ground, and each
Proud victor shar'd the harvest of the war,
Andromache, and this her son, were mine;
Were mine by lot. And who shall wrest them from Ulysses bore away old Priam's queen; [me?
Cassandra was your own great father's prize.
Did I concern myself in what they won?
Did I send embassies to claim their captives?

Ores. But, sir, we fear for you and for ourselves.
Troy may again revive, and a new Hector
Rise in Astyanax. Then think betimes—

Pyr. Let dastard souls be timorously wise:
But tell them, Pyrrhus knows not how to form
Far fancied ills, and dangers out of sight. [Troy;

Ores. Sir, call to mind the unrivall'd strength of
Her walls, her bulwarks, and her gates of brass;
Her kings, her heroes, and embattled armies.

Pyr. I call them all to mind; and see them all
Confus'd in dust; all mix'd in one wide ruin!
All but a child, and he in bondage held.
What vengeance can we fear from such a Troy?
If they have sworn to extinguish Hector's race,
Why was their vow for twelve long months deferr'd?

Why was he not in Priam's bosom slain?
He should have fall'n among the slaughter'd heaps,
Whelm'd under Troy. His death had then been just.
My fury then was without bounds; but now,
My wrath appeas'd, must I be cruel still?
And, deaf to all the tender calls of pity,
Like a cool murderer, bathe my hands in blood?
An infant's blood? No, Prince; go bid the Greeks
Mark out some other victim; my revenge
Has had its fill. What has escap'd from Troy
Shall not be sav'd to perish in Epirus.

Ores. I need not tell you, sir, Astyanax
Was doom'd to death in Troy; nor mention how
The crafty mother sav'd her darling son.
The Greeks do now but urge their former sentence:
Nor is't the boy, but Hector they pursue;
The father draws their vengeance on the son:
The father, who so oft in Grecian blood
Has drench'd his sword; the father, whom the Greeks

May seek e'en here. Prevent them, sir, in time.

Pyr. No: let them come; since I was born to wage
Eternal wars. Let them now turn their arms
On him who conquer'd for them. Let them come;
And in Epirus seek another Troy.

'Twas thus they recompens'd my godlike sire;
Thus was Achilles thank'd. But, Prince, remember,
Their black ingratitude then cost them dear.

Ores. Shall Greece, then, find a rebel son in Pyrrhus? [Greece?

Pyr. Have I, then, conquer'd to depend on Ores. Hermione will sway your soul to peace,

And mediate 'twixt her father and yourself.
Her beauty will enforce my embassy.

Pyr. Hermione may have her charms, and I
May love her still, though not her father's slave.
I may, in time, give proofs that I'm a lover;
But never must forget that I'm a king.
Meanwhile, sir, you may see fair Helen's daughter:
I know how near in blood you stand ally'd.
That done, you have my answer, Prince. The Greeks,

No doubt, expect your quick return.

[Exit Orestes and Attendants.

Phœ. Sir, do you send your rival to the Princess?

Pyr. I am told that he has lov'd her long.

Phœ. If so,

Have you not cause to fear the smother'd flame
May kindle at her sight, and blaze anew;
And she be wrought to listen to his passion? [fill:

Pyr. Ay, let them, Phœnix; let them love their
Let them go hence; let them depart together;
Together let them sail for Sparta; all my ports
Are open to them both. From what constraint,
What irksome thoughts, should I then be reliev'd!

Phœ. But, sir—

Pyr. I shall, another time, good Phœnix,
Unbosom to thee all my thoughts: for see,
Andromache appears. [Exit Phœnix.

Enter ANDROMACHE and CEPHISA.

May I, madam,
Flatter my hopes so far as to believe
You come to seek me here?

Andro. This way, sir, leads
To those apartments where you guard my son.
Since you permit me, once a day, to visit
All I have left of Hector and of Troy,
I go to weep a few sad moments with him.
I have not yet to-day embrac'd my child;
I have not held him in my widow'd arms.

Pyr. Ah! madam, should the threats of Greece prevail,
You'll have occasion for your tears, indeed.

Andro. Alas! what threats? What can alarm the
There are no Trojans left. [Greeks?

Pyr. Their hate to Hector
Can never die: the terror of his name [son.
Still shakes their souls, and makes them dread his

Andro. A mighty honour for victorious Greece,
To fear an infant, a poor, friendless child!

Who smiles in bondage, nor yet knows himself
The son of Hector, and the slave of Pyrrhus.

Pyr. Weak as he is, the Greeks demand his life,
And send no less than Agamemnon's son
To fetch him hence.

Andro. And, sir, do you comply
With such demands? This blow is aim'd at me.
How should the child avenge his slaughter'd sire?
But, cruel men! they will not have him live
To cheer my heavy heart, and ease my bonds.
I promis'd to myself in him a son,
In him a friend, a husband, and a father.
But I must suffer sorrow heap'd on sorrow,
And still the fatal stroke must come from you.

Pyr. Dry up those tears; I must not see you weep;
And know, I have rejected their demands.
The Greeks already threaten me with war;
But, should they arm, as once they did for Helen,
And hide the Adriatic with their fleets;
Should they prepare a second ten years' siege,
And lay my towers and palaces in dust;
I am determin'd to defend your son,
And rather die myself than give him up.
But, madam, in the midst of all these dangers,
Will you refuse me a propitious smile?
Hated of Greece, and press'd on every side,
Let me not, madam, while I fight your cause,
Let me not combat with your cruelties,
And count Andromache amongst my foes.

Andro. Consider, sir, how this will sound in Greece!

How can so great a soul betray such weakness?
Let not men say, so generous a design
Was but the transport of a heart in love.

Pyr. Your charms will justify me to the world.

Andro. How can Andromache, a captive queen,
O'erwhelm'd with grief, a burden to herself,
Harbour a thought of love? Alas! what charms
Have these unhappy eyes, by you condemn'd
To weep for ever? Talk of it no more.

To reverence the misfortunes of a foe;
To succour the distress'd; to give the son
To an afflicted mother; to repel

Confederate nations, leagu'd against his life;
Unbrib'd by love, untterrify'd by threats,
To pity, to protect him: these are cares,

These are exploits worthy Achilles' son. [ever?

Pyr. Will your resentments, then, endure for Must Pyrrhus never be forgiven? 'Tis true,
My sword has often reek'd in Phrygian blood,
And carried havoc through your royal kindred;
But you, fair Princess, amply have aveng'd
Old Priam's vanquish'd house; and all the woes
I brought on them, fall short of what I suffer.
We both have suffer'd in our turns; and now
Our common foes shall teach us to unite.

Andro. Where does the captive not behold a foe?

Pyr. Forget the term of hatred, and behold
A friend in Pyrrhus. Give me but to hope,
I'll free your son, I'll be a father to him:
Myself will teach him to avenge the Trojans.
I'll go in person to chastise the Greeks,
Both for your wrongs and mine. Inspir'd by you,
What would I not achieve? Again shall Troy
Rise from its ashes: this right arm shall fix
Her seat of empire, and your son shall reign.

Andro. Such dreams of greatness suit not my condition:

His hopes of empire perish'd with his father.
No; thou imperial city, ancient Troy,
Thou pride of Asia, founded by the gods!
Never, oh! never, must we hope to see
Those bulwarks rise, which Hector could not guard!
Sir, all I wish for is some quiet exile,
Where far from Greece remov'd, and far from you,
I may conceal my son, and mourn my husband.
Your love creates me envy. Oh! return,
Return to your betroth'd Hermione. [cannot.

Pyr. Why do you mock me thus? you know, I
You know my heart is your's; my soul hangs on you;

You take up every wish: my waking thoughts,
And nightly dreams, are all employ'd on you.
'Tis true, Hermione was sent to share
My throne and bed; and would, with transport, hear
The vows which you neglect.

Andro. She has no Troy,
No Hector to lament: she has not lost
A husband by your conquests. Such a husband!
(Tormenting thought!) whose death alone has made
Your sire immortal. Pyrrhus and Achilles
Are both grown great by my calamities.

Pyr. Madam, 'tis well; 'tis very well; I find
Your will must be obey'd; imperious captive,
It shall! Henceforth, I blot you from my mind;
You teach me to forget your charms; to hate you:
For know, inhuman beauty, I have lov'd
Too well to treat you with indifference.

Think well upon it; my disorder'd soul
Wavers between th' extremes of love and rage.
I have been too tame; I will awake to vengeance!
The son shall answer for the mother's scorn.
The Greeks demand him; nor will I endanger
My realms, to pleasure an ungrateful woman.

Andro. Then he must die! alas! my son must die!
He has no friend, no succour left, beside
His mother's tears, and his own innocence.

Pyr. Go, madam, visit this unhappy son;
The sight of him may bend your stubborn heart,
And turn to softness your unjust disdain.
I shall once more expect your answer. Go;
And think, while you embrace the captive boy,
Think, that his life depends on your resolves.

[Exit with Attendants.]

Andro. I'll go, and in the anguish of my heart,
Weep o'er my child; if he must die, my life
Is wrapp'd in his; I shall not long survive.
'Tis for his sake that I have suffer'd life,
Groan'd in captivity, and out-liv'd Hector.
Yes, my Astyanax, we'll go together.
Together to the realms of night we'll go;
There to thy ravish'd eyes thy sire I'll show,
And point him out among the shades below. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.—SCENE I.

Enter HERMIONE and CLEONE.

Her. Well, I'll be rul'd, Cleone; I will see him:
I have told Pylades that he may bring him;
But trust me, were I left to my own thoughts,
I should forbid him yet.

Cle. And why forbid him?
Is he not, madam, still the same Orestes?
Orestes, whose return you oft have wish'd?
The man whose sufferings you so late lamented,
And often prais'd his constancy and love?

Her. That love, that constancy, so ill requited,
Upbraids me to myself. I blush to think
How I have us'd him, and would shun his presence.
What will be my confusion when he sees me,
Neglected and forsaken, like himself?
Will he not say, "Is this the scornful maid,
The proud Hermione, that tyranniz'd
In Sparta's court, and triumph'd in her charms?
Her insolence, at last, is well repaid!"
I cannot bear the thought.

Cle. You wrong yourself
With unbecoming fears. He knows too well
Your beauty and your worth. Your lover comes not
To offer insults, but to repeat his vows,
And breathe his ardent passion at your feet.
But, madam, what's your royal father's will?
What orders do your letters bring from Sparta?

Her. His orders are, if Pyrrhus still delay
The nuptials, and refuse to sacrifice
This Trojan boy, I should with speed embark,
And with their embassy return to Greece. [time]

Cle. What would you more? Orestes comes in
To save your honour. Pyrrhus cools apace:
Prevent his falsehood, and forsake him first.
I know you hate him; you have told me so.

Her. Hate him! My injur'd honour bids me hate
him.

The ungrateful man, to whom I fondly gave
My virgin heart; the man I lov'd so dearly;
The man I doated on! Oh! my Cleone,
How is it possible I should not hate him?

Cle. Then give him over, madam. Quit his court,
And with Orestes—

Her. No: I must have time
To work up all my rage; to meditate
A parting full of horror! My revenge
Will be but too much quicken'd by the traitor.

Cle. Do you, then, wait new insults, new affronts?
To draw you from your father; then to leave you;
In his own court to leave you, for a captive!
If Pyrrhus can provoke you, he has done it.

Her. Why dost thou heighten my distress? I fear
To search out my own thoughts, and sound my heart.
Be blind to what thou seest; believe me cur'd;
Flatter my weakness; tell me I have conquer'd;
Think that my injur'd soul is set against him;
And do thy best to make me think so, too.

Cle. Why would you loiter here, then?

Her. Let us fly!
Let us be gone; I leave him to his captive.
Let him go kneel, and supplicate his slave.
Let us begone! But what if he repent?
What if the perjurd prince again submit,
And sue for pardon? What, if he renew
His former vows? But, oh! the faithless man!
He slights me; drives me to extremities. However,
I'll stay, Cleone, to perplex their loves:
I'll stay, till by an open breach of contract,
I make him hateful to the Greeks. Already
Their vengeance have I drawn upon the son;
The second embassy shall claim the mother;
I will redouble all my griefs upon her.

Cle. Ah! madam, whither does your rage transport you?

Andromache, alas! is innocent.
A woman plung'd in sorrow, dead to love;
And when she thinks on Pyrrhus, 'tis with horror.

Her. Would I had done so, too! he had not then Betray'd my easy faith. But I, alas!
Discover'd all the fondness of my soul;
I made no secret of my passion to him,
Nor thought it dangerous to be sincere.
My eyes, my tongue, my actions spoke my heart.

Cle. Well might you speak without reserve, to one
Engag'd to you by solemn oaths and treaties.

Her. His ardour, too, was an excuse to mine:
With other eyes he saw me then. Cleone,
Thou may'st remember, everything conspir'd
To favour him: my father's wrongs aveng'd;
The Greeks triumphant; fleets of Trojan spoils;
His mighty sire's, his own immortal fame;
His eager love; all, all conspir'd against me.
But I have done; I'll think no more of Pyrrhus:
Orestes wants not merit, and he loves me.
My gratitude, my honour, both plead for him;
And if I've power o'er my own heart, 'tis his.

Cle. Madam, he comes—

Her. Alas! I did not think
He was so near. I wish I might not see him.

Enter ORESTES.

How am I to interpret, sir, this visit?
Is it a compliment of form, or love?

[fate]
Ores. Madam, you know my weakness. 'Tis my
To love unpity'd; to desire to see you;
And still to swear each time shall be the last.
My passion breaks through my repeated oaths,
And every time I visit you I'm perjurd.

Even now I find my wounds all bleed afresh;
I blush to own it, but I know no cure.
I call the gods to witness, I have tried
Whatever man could do (but tried in vain)
To wear you from my mind. Through stormy seas,
And savage climes, in a whole year of absence,
I courted dangers, and I long'd for death. [tale?]

Her. Why will you, Prince, indulge this mournful
It ill becomes the ambassador of Greece
To talk of dying and of love. Remember

The kings you represent: shall their revenge
Be disappointed by your ill-tim'd passion?
Discharge your embassy. 'Tis not Orestes
The Greeks desire should die.

Ores. My embassy
Is at an end; for Pyrrhus has refus'd
To give up Hector's son. Some hidden power
Protects the boy.

Her. Faithless, ungrateful man! (Aside.)

Ores. I now prepare for Greece; but ere I go,
Would hear my final doom pronounced by you.
What do I say? I do already hear it!
My doom is fixed: I read it in your eyes.

Her. Will you then still despair? be still suspicious?

What have I done? wherein have I been cruel?
'Tis true, you find me in the court of Pyrrhus;
But 'twas my royal father sent me hither.
And who can tell but I have shar'd your griefs?
Have I ne'er wept in secret? never wish'd
To see Orestes?

Ores. Wish'd to see Orestes!
O joy! O ecstasy! My soul's entranc'd!
O charming princess! O transcendant maid!
My utmost wish!—Thus, thus let me express
My boundless thanks!—I never was unhappy.
Am I Orestes?

Her. You are Orestes:
The same, unalter'd, generous, faithful lover;
The prince whom I esteem, whom I lament,
And whom I fain would teach my heart to love.

Ores. Ay, there it is!—I have but your esteem,
While Pyrrhus has your heart.

Her. Believe me, prince,
Were you as Pyrrhus, I should hate you.

Ores. No.
I should be blest, I should be lov'd as he is!
Yet all this while I die by your disdain,
While he neglects your charms, and courts another.

Her. And who has told you, Prince, that I'm neglected?

Has Pyrrhus said—(Oh! I shall go distracted!)
Has Pyrrhus told you so? or is it you
Who think thus meanly of me?—Sir, perhaps,
All do not judge like you.

Ores. Madam, go on;
Insult me still; I'm us'd to bear your scorn.

Her. Why am I told how Pyrrhus loves or hates?
Go, Prince, and arm the Greeks against the rebel;
Let them lay waste his country, rase his towns,
Destroy his fleets, his palaces—himself!

Go, Prince, and tell me then how much I love him.

Ores. To hasten his destruction, come yourself;
And work your royal father to his ruin.

Her. Meanwhile he weds Andromache.

Ores. Ah! Princess;
What is't I hear?

Her. What infamy for Greece,
If he should wed a Phrygian, and a captive!

Ores. Is this your hatred, madam?—'Tis in vain
To hide your passion; every thing betrays it:
Your looks, your speech, your anger, nay, your silence;

Your love appears in all; your secret flame
Breaks out the more, the more you would conceal it.

Her. Your jealousy perverts my meaning still,
And wrests each circumstance to your disquiet:
My very hate is construed into fondness.

Ores. Impute my fears, if groundless, to my love.

Her. Then hear me, Prince. Obedience to a father

First brought me hither; and the same obedience
Detains me here, till Pyrrhus drive me hence,
Or my offended father shall recal me.

Tell this proud King, that Menalaus scorns
To match his daughter with a foe of Greece:
Bid him resign Astyanax or me.

If he persists to guard the hostile boy,
Hermione embarks with you for Sparta.

[Exeunt Hermione and Cleone.]

Ores. Then is Orestes blest! My griefs are fled!

Fled like a dream!—Methinks I tread in air?

Pyrrhus, enamour'd of his captive queen,
Will thank me, if I take her rival hence.
He looks not on the Princess with my eyes.
Surprising happiness! unlook'd for joy!
Never let love despair. The prize is mine!
Be smooth, ye seas, and ye propitious winds,
Breathe from Epirus to the Spartan coasts!
I long to view the sails unfurl'd!—But see!
Pyrrhus approaches in a happy hour.

[Enter PYRRHUS and PHOENIX.]

Pyr. I was in pain to find you, Prince. My warm,

Ungovern'd temper would not let me weigh
The importance of your embassy, and hear
You argue for my good. I was to blame.
I since have pois'd your reasons: and I thank
My good allies: their care deserves my thanks.
You have convinc'd me that the weal of Greece,
My father's honour, and my own repose,
Demand that Hector's race should be destroy'd.
I shall deliver up Astyanax,
And you yourself shall bear the victim hence.

Ores. If you approve it, sir, and are content
To spill the blood of a defenceless child,
The offended Greeks, no doubt, will be appeas'd.

Pyr. Closer to strain the knot of our alliance,
I have determined to espouse Hermione.

You come in time to grace our nuptial rights:
In you the Kings of Greece will all be present,
And you have right to personate her father,
As his ambassador and brother's son.

Go, Prince, renew your visit; tell Hermione,
To-morrow I receive her from your hands.

Ores. Oh! change of fortune! Oh! undone
Orestes! [Aside, and exit.]

Pyr. Well, Phoenix, am I still a slave to love?
What think'st thou now? Am I myself again?

Phæ. 'Tis as it should be; this discovers Pyrrhus;

Shows all the hero: now you are yourself—
The son, the rival of the great Achilles!
Greece will applaud you, and the world confess
Pyrrhus has conquer'd Troy a second time!

Pyr. Nay, Phoenix, now I but begin to triumph;
I never was a conqueror till now.

Believe me, a whole host, a war of foes,
May sooner be subdu'd than love. Oh! Phoenix;
What ruin have I shunn'd! The Greeks, enrag'd,
Hung o'er me like a gathering storm, and soon
Had burst in thunder on my head; while I
Abandon'd duty, empire, honour, all,
To please a thankless woman!—One kind look
Had quite undone me!

Phæ. Oh! my royal master!
The gods, in favour to you, made her cruel.

Pyr. Thou saw'st with how much scorn she treated me!

When I permitted her to see her son,
I hop'd it might have work'd her to my wishes;
I went to see the mournful interview,
And found her bath'd in tears, and lost in passion.
Wild with distress, a thousand times she call'd
On Hector's name: and when I spoke in comfort,
And promised my protection to her son,
She kiss'd the boy, and call'd again on Hector.
Does she, then, think that I preserve the boy,
To soothe and keep alive her flame for Hector?

Phæ. No doubt she does, and thinks you favour'd in it;

But let her go, for an ungrateful woman.

Pyr. I know the thoughts of her proud stubborn
heart:

Vain of her charms, and insolent in beauty,

She mocks my rage; and when it threatens loudest,
Expects would soon be humbled into love.
But we shall change our parts, and she shall find
I can be deaf, like her, and steel my heart.
She's Hector's widow; I, Achilles' son!
Pyrrhus is born to hate Andromache.

Phæ. My royal master, talk of her no more;
I do not like this anger. Your Hermione
Should now engross your thoughts. 'Tis time to see her;

'Tis time you should prepare the nuptial rites,
And not rely upon a rival's care:
It may be dangerous.

Pyr. But tell me, Phoenix,
Dost thou not think the proud Andromache
Will be enrag'd, when I shall wed the princess?

Phæ. Why does Andromache still haunt your thoughts?
What is't to you, be she enrag'd or pleas'd?
Let her name perish—think of her no more.

Pyr. No, Phoenix, I have been too gentle with
her;
I have check'd my wrath, and stifled my resentment:

She knows not yet to what degree I hate her.
Thou shalt see, Phoenix, how I'll break her pride.

Phæ. Oh! go not, sir. There's ruin in her eyes!
You do not know your strength. You'll fall before
her,

Adore her beauty, and revive her scorn.

Por. That were, indeed, a most unmanly weakness!

Thou dost not know me, Phoenix.

Phæ. Ah! my prince;
You are still struggling in the toils of love.

Pyr. Canst thou, then, think I love this woman still?

One who repays my passion with disdain!
A stranger, captive, friendless and forlorn;
She, and her darling son, within my power;
Her life a forfeit to the Greeks: yet I
Preserve her son, would take her to my throne,
Would fight her battles, and avenge her wrongs;
And all this while she treats me as her foe!

Phæ. You have it in your power to be reveng'd.

Pyr. Yes, and I'll shew my power! I'll give her cause

To hate me! her Astyanax shall die.
What tears will then be shed! How will she then,
In bitterness of heart, reproach my name!
Then, to complete her woes, will I espouse
Hermione—'twill stab her to the heart!

Phæ. Alas! you threaten like a lover still.

Pyr. Phoenix, excuse this struggle of my soul;
'Tis the last effort of expiring love.

Phæ. Then hasten, sir, to see the Spartan princess,

And turn the bent of your desires on her.

Pyr. Oh! 'tis a heavy task to conquer love,
And wean the soul from her accustom'd fondness.
But come—a long farewell to Hector's widow.

'Tis with a secret pleasure I look back,
And see the many dangers I have pass'd.
The merchant thus, in dreadful tempests tost,
Thrown by the waves on some unlook'd for coast,
Oft turns, and sees, with a delightful eye,
Midst rocks and shelves the broken billows fly!
And while the outrageous winds the deep deform,
Smiles on the tumult, and enjoys the storm.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Enter PYLADES and ORESTES.

Pyl. For heaven's sake, sir, compose your ruff'd mind,

And moderate your rage!

Ores. No, Pylades,

This is no time for counsel. I am deaf.
Talk not of reason. I have been too patient.
Life is not worth my care. My soul grows desperate.

I'll bear her off, or perish in th' attempt.

I'll force her from his arms—by heaven! I will.

Pyl. Well, 'tis agreed, my friend, we'll force her
hence:

But still consider we are in Epirus.

The court, the guards, Hermione herself,

The very air we breathe, belongs to Pyrrhus.

Good gods! what tempted you to seek her here?

Ores. Lost to myself, I knew not what I did;

My purposes were wild. Perhaps I came

To menace Pyrrhus, and upbraid the woman.

Pyl. This violence of temper may prove fatal.

Ores. It must be more than man to bear these shocks,

These outrages of fate, with temper.

He tells me that he weds Hermione.

And will, to-morrow, take her from my hand!

My hand shall sooner tear the tyrant's heart.

Pyl. Your passion blinds you, sir; he's not to blame.

Could you but look into the soul of Pyrrhus,

Perhaps you'd find it tortur'd like your own.

Ores. No, Pylades! 'tis all design. His pride,

To triumph over me, has chang'd his love.

The fair Hermione, before I came,

In all her bloom of beauty, was neglected.

Ah! cruel gods! I thought her all my own!

She was consenting to return to Sparta:

Her heart, divided betwixt rage and love,

Was on the wing to take its leave of Pyrrhus.

She heard my sighs, she pitied my complaints,

She prais'd my constancy. The least indifference

From this proud king, had made Orestes happy!

Pyl. So your fond heart believes.

Think not to force her hence;

But fly yourself from her destructive charms.

Ores. Talk no more!

I cannot bear the thought! She must be mine!

Did Pyrrhus carry thunder in his hand,

I'd stand the bolt, and challenge all his fury,

Ere I resign Hermione! By force

I'll snatch her hence, and bear her to my ships.

Have we forgot her mother Helen's rape?

Pyl. Will, then, Orestes turn a ravisher,

And blot his embassy?

Ores. Oh! Pylades,

My grief weighs heavy on me—'twill distract me!

The gods have set me as their mark, to empty

Their quivers on me. Leave me to myself.

Mine be the danger, mine the enterprise.

All I request of thee, is to return,

And in my place convey Astyanax

(As Pyrrhus has consented) into Greece,

Go, Pylades—

Pyl. Lead on, my friend, lead on!

Let us bear off Hermione! No toil,

No danger can deter a friend. Lead on!

Draw up the Greeks; summon your num'rous train;

The ships are ready, and the wind sets fair:

There eastward lies the sea; the rolling waves

Break on those palace-stairs. I know each pass,

Each avenue, and outlet of the court.

This very night we'll carry her on board.

Ores. Thou art too good! I trespass on thy friendship:

But, oh! excuse a wretch, whom no man pities,

Except thyself: one, just about to lose

The treasure of his soul: whom all mankind

Conspire to hate, and one who hates himself.

When will my friendship be of use to thee?

Pyl. The question is unkind. But now, remember,

To keep your counsels close, and hide your thoughts;

Let not Hermione suspect. No more—
I see her coming, sir.

Ores. Away, my friend;
I am advis'd; my all depends upon it.

[Exit Pylades.]

Enter HERMIONE and CLEONE.

Madam, your orders are obeyed; I have seen
Pyrrhus, my rival; and have gain'd him for you.
The king resolves to wed you.

Her. So I am told;
And, further, I am inform'd, that you, Orestes,
Are to dispose me for the intended marriage.

Ores. And are you, madam, willing to comply?

Her. What can I do? alas! my faith is promis'd;

Can I refuse what is not mine to give?
A princess is not at her choice to love;
All we have left us is a blind obedience:
And yet you see how far I had comply'd,
And made my duty yield to your entreaties.

Ores. Ah! cruel maid! you knew—but I have done.

All have a right to please themselves in love.
I blam'd you not. 'Tis true, I hop'd—but you
Are mistress of your heart, and I'm content.
'Tis fortune is my enemy, not you.

But, madam, I shall spare you further pain
On this uneasy theme, and take my leave. [Exit.]

Her. Cleone, couldst thou think he'd be so calm?

Cle. Madam, his silent grief sits heavy on him.
He is to be pitied. His too eager love
Has made him busy to his own destruction.
His threats have wrought this change of mind in Pyrrhus.

Her. Dost thou think Pyrrhus capable of fear?
Whom should the intrepid Pyrrhus fear? The Greeks?

Did he not lead their harrass'd troops to conquest,
When they despair'd, when they retir'd from Troy,

And sought for shelter in their burning fleets?
Did he not then supply his father's place?

No, my Cleone, he is above constraint;
He acts unforc'd; and where he weds, he loves.

Cle. Oh! that Orestes had remain'd in Greece!
I fear to-morrow will prove fatal to him.

Her. Wilt thou discourse of nothing but Orestes?

Pyrrhus is mine again! Is mine for ever!

Oh! my Cleone, I am wild with joy!

Pyrrhus! the bold, the brave, the godlike Pyrrhus!

Oh! I could tell the numberless exploits,
And tire thee with his battles. Oh! Cleone—

Cle. Madam, conceal your joy; I see Andromache;

She weeps, and comes to speak her sorrows to you.

Her. I would indulge the gladness of my heart:
Let us retire; her grief is out of season.

Enter ANDROMACHE and CEPHISA.

Andro. Ah! madam, whither, whither would you fly?

Where can your eyes behold a sight more pleasing
Than Hector's widow, suppliant, and in tears?

I come not an alarm'd, a jealous foe,
To envy you the heart your charms have won;

The only man I sought to please, is gone;

Kill'd in my sight, by an inhuman hand.

Hector first taught me love; which my fond heart
Shall ever cherish, till we meet in death.

But, oh! I have a son! And you, one day,

Will be no stranger to a mother's fondness:

But heaven forbid that you should ever know
A mother's sorrow for an only son.

Her joy, her bliss, her last surviving comfort!

When every hour she trembles for his life!

Your power o'er Pyrrhus may relieve my fears.

Alas! what danger is there in a child,

Sav'd from the wreck of a whole ruin'd empire?

Let me go hide him in some desert isle:

You may rely upon my tender care

To keep him far from perils of ambition:

All he can learn of me will be to weep!

Her. Madam, 'tis easy to conceive your grief;

But it would ill become me to solicit

In contradiction to my father's will:

'Tis he who urges to destroy your son.

Madam, if Pyrrhus must be wrought to pity,

No woman does it better than yourself.

If you gain him, I shall comply of course.

[Exit with Cleone.]

Andro. Didst thou not mind with what disdain she spoke?

Youth and prosperity have made her vain;

She has not seen the fickle turns of life.

Ceph. Madam, were I as you, I'd take her counsel;

I'd speak my own distress: one look from you

Will vanquish Pyrrhus, and confound the Greeks.

See, where he comes. Lay hold on this occasion.

Enter PYRRHUS and PHOENIX.

Pyr. Where is the Princess? Did you not inform me

Hermione was here? (To Phoenix.)

Phœ. I thought so, sir.

Andro. Thou seest what mighty power my eyes have on him! (To Cephisa.)

Pyr. What says she, Phoenix?

Andro. I have no hope left!

Phœ. Let us be gone; Hermione expects you.

Ceph. For heaven's sake, madam, break this sullen silence.

Andro. My child's already promis'd. (Apart.)

Ceph. But not given. (Apart.)

Andro. No, no: my tears are vain! His doom is fix'd! (Apart.)

Pyr. See if she deigns to cast one look upon us.
Proud woman!

Andro. I provoke him by my presence.

Let us retire.

Pyr. Come, let us satisfy

The Greeks, and give them up this Phrygian boy.

Andro. Ah! sir, recal those words! What have you said?

If you give up my son, oh! give up me.

You, who, so many times, have sworn me friendship:

Oh! heavens, will you not look with pity on me?

Is there no hope? Is there no room for pardon?

Pyr. Phoenix will answer you; my word is pass'd.

Andro. You, who would brave so many dangers for me.

Pyr. I was your lover then, I now am free.

To favour you, I might have spar'd his life;

But you would ne'er vouchsafe to ask it of me.

Now 'tis too late.

Andro. Oh! sir, excuse

The pride of royal blood, that checks my soul,

And knows not how to be importunate.

You know, alas! I was not born to kneel,

To sue for pity, and to own a master.

Pyr. No; in your heart you curse me! you disdain

My gen'rous flame, and scorn to be obliged.

But I shall leave you to your great resentments.

Let us go, Phoenix, and appease the Greeks.

Andro. Then let me die, and let me go to Hector.

Ceph. But, madam—

Andro. What can I do more? The tyrant

Sees my distraction, and insults my tears.

(To Cephisa.)

Behold, how low you have reduc'd a queen!

These eyes have seen my country laid in ashes,

My kindred fall in war, my father slain,

My husband dragg'd in his own blood, my son
 Condemn'd to bondage, and myself a slave ;
 Yet, in the midst of these unheard-of woes,
 'Twas some relief to find myself your captive ;
 And that my son, deriv'd from ancient kings,
 Since he must serve, had Pyrrhus for his master.
 When Priam kneel'd, the great Achilles wept :
 I hop'd I should not find his son less noble.
 I thought the brave were still the more compassionate.

Oh ! do not, sir, divide me from my child !
 If he must die—

Pyr. Phoenix, withdraw awhile. [Exit Phoenix.]
 Rise, madam. Yet you may preserve your son.
 I find, whenever I provoke your tears,
 I furnish you with arms against myself.
 I thought my hatred fix'd before I saw you.
 Oh ! turn your eyes upon me while I speak,
 And see if you discover in my looks
 An angry judge, or an obdurate foe.
 Why will you force me to desert your cause ?
 In your son's name I beg we may be friends !
 Think, oh ! think,
 ('Tis the last time,) you both may yet be happy !
 I know the ties I break, the foes I arm ;
 I wrong Hermione ; I send her hence ;
 And with her diadem I bind your brows.
 Consider well ; for 'tis of moment to you.
 Choose to be wretched, madam, or a queen.
 I leave you to your thoughts. When I return,
 We'll to the temple. There you'll find your son ;
 And there be crown'd, or give him up for ever.

Ceph. I told you, madam, that in spite of Greece,

You would o'errule the malice of your fortune.

Andro. Alas ! Cephisa, what have I obtain'd ?
 Only a poor short respite for my son.

Ceph. You have enough approv'd your faith to Hector ;
 To be reluctant still would be a crime.

He would himself persuade you to comply.

Andro. How ! wouldst thou give me Pyrrhus for a husband ?

Ceph. Think you 'twill please the ghost of your dead husband,
 That you should sacrifice his son ? Consider
 Pyrrhus once more invites you to a throne ;
 Turns all his power against the foes of Troy,
 Remembers not Achilles was his father,
 Retracts his conquests, and forgets his hatred.

Andro. But how can I forget it ? how can I
 Forget my Hector, treated with dishonour,
 Depriv'd of funeral rites, and vilely dragg'd,
 A bloody corse, about the walls of Troy ?
 Can I forget the good old king, his father,
 Slain in my presence ; at the altar slain ;
 Which vainly for protection he embrac'd ?
 Hast thou forgot that dreadful night, Cephisa,
 When a whole people fell ? Methinks I see
 Pyrrhus, enrag'd, and breathing vengeance, enter
 Amidst the glare of burning palaces :
 I see him hew his passage through my brothers,
 And, bath'd in blood, lay all my kindred waste.
 Think, in this scene of horror, what I suffer'd !
 This is the courtship I receiv'd from Pyrrhus ;
 And this the husband thou wouldst give me : No !
 We both will perish first ! I'll ne'er consent.

Ceph. Since you resolve Astyanax shall die,
 Haste to the temple ; bid your son farewell.—
 Why do you tremble, madam ?

Andro. Oh ! Cephisa !
 Thou hast awaken'd all the mother in me.
 How can I bid farewell to the dear child,
 The pledge, the image of my much-lov'd lord !
 But, oh ! while I deliberate, he dies.
 No, no ; thou must not die, while I can save thee :
 Oh ! let me find out Pyrrhus. Oh ! Cephisa,
 Do you go find him.

Ceph. What must I say to him ?

Andro. Tell him I love my son to such excess—
 But dost thou think he means the child shall die ?
 Can love rejected turn to so much rage ?

Ceph. Madam, he'll soon be here. Resolve on something.

Andro. Well, then, assure him—

Ceph. Madam, of your love ?

Andro. Alas ! thou know'st that is not in my power.

Oh ! my dear lord ! Oh ! Priam's royal house !

Oh ! my Astyanax ! at what a price

Thy mother buys thee !—Let us go.

Ceph. But whither ?

And what does your unsettled heart resolve ?

Andro. Come, my Cephisa, let us go together
 To the sad monument which I have rais'd
 To Hector's shade ; where, in their sacred urn,
 The ashes of my hero lie enclos'd,
 The dear remains which I have sav'd from Troy ;
 There let me weep, there summon to my aid,
 With pious rites, my Hector's awful shade ;
 Let him be witness to my doubts, my fears ;
 My agonizing heart, my flowing tears :
 Oh ! may he rise in pity from his tomb,
 And fix his wretched son's uncertain doom.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Enter HERMIONE and CLEONE.

Cle. This unexpected silence, this reserve,
 This outward calm, this settled frame of mind,
 After such wrongs and insults, much surprise me ;
 You, who before could but command your rage,
 When Pyrrhus look'd but kindly on his captive ;
 How can you bear unmov'd, that he should wed
 her,

And seat her on a throne which you should fill ?

'Twere better, madam—

Her. Have you call'd Orestes ?

Cle. Madam, I have ; his love is too impatient
 Not to obey, with speed, the welcome summons.
 His love-sick heart o'erlooks his unkind usage :
 His ardour's still the same.—Madam, he's here.

Enter ORESTES.

Ores. Ah ! madam, is it true ? does then Orestes
 At length attend you by your own commands ?
 What can I do ?

Her. Orestes, do you love me ?

Ores. What means that question, Princess ? Do
 I love you ?

My oaths, my perjuries, my hopes, my fears,
 My farewell, my return—all speak my love.

Her. Avenge my wrongs, and I'll believe them
 all.

Ores. It shall be done. My soul has caught th' alarm.

We'll spirit up the Greeks ; I'll lead them on :
 Your cause shall animate our fleets and armies.
 Let us return ; let us not lose a moment,
 But urge the fate of this devoted land :
 Let us depart.

Her. No, Prince, let us stay here !

I will have vengeance here ; I will not carry
 This load of infamy to Greece, nor trust
 The chance of war to vindicate my wrongs.
 Ere I depart, I'll make Epirus mourn.
 If you avenge me, let it be this instant ;
 My rage brooks no delay ; haste to the temple,
 Haste, Prince, and sacrifice him.

Ores. Whom ?

Her. Why, Pyrrhus.

Ores. Pyrrhus ! Did you say Pyrrhus ?

Her. You demur.

Oh ! fly ! begone ! give me not time to think.
 Talk not of laws—he tramples on all laws.
 Let me not hear him justified—away !

Ores. You cannot think I'll justify my rival.
 Madam, your love has made him criminal.

You shall have vengeance; I'll have vengeance,
too:

But let our hatred be profess'd and open:
Let us alarm all Greece, denounce a war;
Let us attack him in his strength, and hunt him
down

By conquest. Should I turn base assassin,
'Twould sully all the kings I represent.

Her. Have not I been dishonour'd, set at nought,

Expos'd to public scorn?—And will you suffer
The tyrant, who dares use me thus, to live?
Know, prince, I hate him more than once I lov'd
him.

The gods alone can tell how once I lov'd him!
Yes, the false, perjur'd man, I once did love him;
And, spite of all his crimes and broken vows,
If he should live, I may relapse—who knows
But I, to-morrow, may forgive his wrongs?

Ores. First, let me tear him piecemeal. He shall die.

But, madam, give me leisure to contrive
The place, the time, the manner of his death:
Yet I'm a stranger in the court of Pyrrhus;
Scarce have I set my foot within Epirus,
When you enjoin me to destroy the Prince.
It shall be done this very night.

Her. But now,
This very hour, he weds Andromache;
The temple shines with pomp, the golden throne
Is now prepar'd, the joyful rites begin;
My shame is public.—Oh! be speedy, prince;
My wrath's impatient—Pyrrhus lives too long!
Intent on love, and heedless of his person,
He covers, with his guards, the Trojan boy.
Now is the time; assemble all your Greeks;
Mine shall assist them; let their fury loose:
Already they regard him as a foe.

Begone, Orestes! kill the faithless tyrant:
My love shall recompense the glorious deed.

Ores. Consider, madam—

Her. You but mock my rage!

I was contriving how to make you happy.
Think you to merit by your idle sighs,
And not attest your love by one brave action?
Go, with your boasted constancy, and leave
Hermione to execute her own revenge.
I blush to think how my too easy faith
Has twice been baffled in one shameful hour!

Ores. Hear me but speak! You know I'll die to serve you!

Her. I'll go myself; I'll stab him at the altar;
Then drive the poniard, reeking with his blood,
Through my own heart. In death we shall unite.
Better to die with him, than live with you!

Ores. That were to make him bless'd, and me more wretched.

Madam, he dies by me! Have you a foe,
And shall I let him live? My rival, too!
Ere yon meridian sun declines, he dies;
And you shall say that I deserve your love.

Her. Go, prince; strike home! and leave the rest to me.

Let all your ships stand ready for our flight.

[Exit Orestes.]

Cle. Madam, you'll perish in this bold attempt.

Her. Give me my vengeance, I'm content to perish.

I was to blame to trust it with another:
In my own hands it had been more secure.
Orestes hates not Pyrrhus as I hate him.
Oh! would Orestes, when he gives the blow,
Tell him he dies my victim! Haste, Cleone,
Charge him to say, Hermione's resentments,
Not those of Greece, have sentenc'd him to death.
Haste, my Cleone! My revenge is lost,
If Pyrrhus know not that he dies by me!

Cle. I shall obey your orders.—But I see
The king approach. Who could expect him here?

Her. Oh! fly, Cleone, fly! and bid Orestes
Not to proceed a step before I see him.

[Exit Cleone.]

Enter PYRRHUS.

Pyr. Madam, I ought to shun an injur'd princess.
Your distant looks reproach me; and I come
Not to defend, but to avow my guilt.
Pyrrhus will ne'er approve his own injustice,
Nor form excuses while his heart condemns him.
Discharge your anger on this perjur'd man!
For I abhor my crime, and should be pleas'd
To hear you speak your wrongs aloud: no terms,
No bitterness of wrath, nor keen reproach,
Will equal half the upbraidings of my heart.

Her. I find, sir, you can be sincere: you scorn
To act your crimes with fear, like other men.

A hero should be bold, above all laws;
Be bravely false, and laugh at solemn ties.

To be perfidious shews a daring mind!

And you have nobly triumph'd o'er a maid!

To court me—to reject me—to return—

Then to forsake me for a Phrygian slave—

To lay proud Troy in ashes; then to raise

The son of Hector, and renounce the Greeks,

Are actions worthy the great soul of Pyrrhus!

Pyr. Madam, go on! Give your resentment birth,
And pour forth all your indignation on me.

Her. 'Twould please your queen, should I up-
braid your falsehood;

Call you perfidious, traitor, all the names

That injur'd virgins lavish on your sex;

I should o'erflow with tears, and die with grief,

And furnish out a tale to sooth her pride;

But, sir, I would not overcharge her joys.

If you would charm Andromache, recount

Your bloody battles, your exploits, your slaughters,

Your great achievements in her father's palace.

She needs must love the man who fought so bravely,

And in her sight slew half her royal kindred!

Pyr. With horror I look back on my past deeds!

I punish'd Helen's wrongs too far; I shed

Too much of blood: but, madam, Helen's daughter
Should not object those ills the mother caus'd.

However, I'm pleas'd to find you hate me;

I was too forward to accuse myself;

The man who ne'er was lov'd, can ne'er be false.

Obedience to a father brought you hither;

And I stood bound by promise to receive you:

But our desires were different ways inclin'd;

And you, I own, were not oblig'd to love me.

Her. Have I not lov'd you, then? Perfidious
man!

For you I slighted all the Grecian princes;

Forsook my father's house; conceal'd my wrongs,

When most provok'd; would not return to Sparta,

In hopes that time might fix your wavering heart.

I lov'd you when inconstant; and even now,

Inhuman king! that you pronounce my death,

My heart still doubts if I should love or hate you.

But, oh! since you resolve to wed another,

Defer your cruel purpose till to-morrow,

That I may not be here to grace your triumph!

This is the last request I e'er shall make you.

See, if the barbarous prince vouchsafes an answer!

Go, then, to the lov'd Phrygian; hence! begone!

And bear to her those vows that once were mine:

Go, in defiance to the avenging gods!

Begone! the priest expects you at the altar;

But, tyrant, have a care I come not thither! [Exit.]

Enter PHOENIX.

Phœ. Sir, did you mind her threats? your life's in danger:

There is no trifling with a woman's rage.

The Greeks that swarm about the court, all hate
you;

Will treat you as their country's enemy,

And join in her revenge: besides, Orestes

Still loves her to distraction. Sir, I beg—

Pyr. How, Phoenix, should I fear a woman's threats?

A nobler passion takes up all my thoughts:

I must prepare to meet Andromache.

Do thou place all my guards about her son:

If he be safe, Pyrrhus is free from fear. [Exit.]

Phœ. Oh! Pyrrhus, oh! what pity 'tis, the gods,

Who fill'd thy soul with every kingly virtue,
Form'd thee for empire and consummate greatness,
Should leave thee so expos'd to wild desires,
That hurry thee beyond the bounds of reason!

(Flourish.)

But, see, the queen,

Magnificent in royal pride, appears.

I must obey, and guard her son from danger. [Exit.]

Enter ANDROMACHE and CEPHISA.

Ceph. Madam, once more you look and move a queen.

Your sorrows are dispers'd, your charms revive,
And every faded beauty blooms anew.

Andro. Yet all is not as I could wish, Cephisa.

Ceph. You see the king is watchful o'er your son;

Decks him with princely robes, with guards surrounds him.

Astyanax begins to reign already.

Andro. Pyrrhus is nobly minded; and I fain

Would live to thank him for Astyanax:

'Tis a vain thought. However, since my child
Has such a friend, I ought not to repine.

Ceph. These dark unfoldings of your soul perplex me.

For heaven's sake, madam, let me know your griefs!

If you distrust my faith—

Andro. That were to wrong thee.

Oh! my Cephisa, this gay, borrow'd air,
This blaze of jewels, and this bridal dress,
Are but mock trappings to conceal my woe:

My heart still mourns; I still am Hector's widow.

Ceph. Will you, then, break the promise giv'n to Pyrrhus;

Blow up his rage again, and blast your hopes?

Andro. I thought, Cephisa, thou hadst known thy mistress.

Couldst thou believe I would be false to Hector?

Fall off from such a husband? break his rest,

And call him to this hated light again,

To see Andromache in Pyrrhus' arms?

Would Hector, were he living, and I dead,

Forget Andromache, and wed her foe?

Ceph. I cannot guess what drift your thoughts pursue;

But, oh! I fear there's something dreadful in it:

Must, then, Astyanax be doom'd to die,

And you to linger out a life in bondage?

Andro. Know, then, the secret purpose of my soul:

Andromache will not be false to Pyrrhus,

Nor violate her sacred love to Hector.

This hour I'll meet the king; the holy priest

Shall join us, and confirm our mutual vows.

This will secure a father to my child:

That done, I have no further use for life:

This pointed dagger, this determin'd hand,

Shall save my virtue, and conclude my woes.

Cephisa, thou

Wilt lend a hand to close thy mistress' eyes.

Ceph. Oh! never think that I will stay behind you.

Andro. No, my Cephisa, I must have thee live.

I must commit into thy faithful hands

All that is dear and precious to my soul.

Live, and supply my absence to my child;

All that remains of Troy; a future progeny

Of heroes, and a distant line of kings,

In him, is all intrusted to thy care.

Tell him my soul repos'd itself on him,

When I resign'd my son to his protection.

Ceph. Oh! for a spirit to support my grief!

Is there aught more, before you go for ever?

Andro. Oh! my Cephisa, my swoln heart is full!

I have a thousand farewells to my son—

But tears break in; grief interrupts my speech!

My soul o'erflows in fondness! Let him know

I died to save him, and would die again.

Season his mind with early hints of glory;

Make him acquainted with his ancestors;

Trace out their shining story in his thoughts;

Dwell on the exploits of his immortal father;

And sometimes let him hear his mother's name.

He must be taught to stifle his resentments,

And sacrifice his vengeance to his safety.

Should he prove headstrong, rash, or unadvis'd,

He then will frustrate all his mother's virtue,

Provoke his fate, and I shall die in vain.

Ceph. Alas! I fear I never shall outlive you!

Andro. No more; thy tears, Cephisa, will betray me.

Assume a cheerful look. But still remember—

(Flourish within.)

Hark how the trumpet, with its sprightly notes,

Proclaims th' appointed hour, and calls us hence!

Hector, I come once more a queen, to join thee!

Thus the gay victim, with fresh garlands crown'd,

Pleas'd with the sacred life's enlivening sound,

Through gazing crowds, in solemn state proceeds,

And dress'd in fatal pomp, magnificently bleeds.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Enter HERMIONE.

Her. What have I done? Where am I? Where is Pyrrhus?

Ye gods! what mean these horrors? I'm undone!

My soul is on the rack! I cannot bear it!

Why do I wander like some guilty ghost?

What brought me to this place? What keeps me here?

The court of Pyrrhus has no room for me!

Do I still doubt if I should love or hate him?

Hard-hearted man! how unconcern'd he left me!

Did he once sigh? bestow one pitying look?

Once shed a tear? or speak one soft, kind word?

Did he so much as feign one moment's sorrow,

To calm my grief, and mitigate his falsehood?

Why am I still thus anxious for his life?

Why do I start at his impending fate?

Shall he, then, live? Shall the base traitor live

To laugh at my distress? No, let him perish!

Be quick, Orestes! Execute my orders!

Alas! my orders! Oh! preposterous guilt!

Can I decree the death of him I love?

Was it for this my soul delighted in him?

Was it for this I left my father's court?

Have I, then, cross'd so many realms and seas

To murder Pyrrhus?

Enter CLEONE.

Oh! Cleone, help me!

What have I done? Is Pyrrhus yet alive?

What say'st thou? Answer me. Where is the king?

Cle. Madam, I saw the cruel prince set forward,
Triumphant in his looks, and full of joy.

Still as he walk'd, his ravish'd eyes were fix'd

On the fair captive, while through shouting crowds

She pass'd along with a dejected air,

And seem'd to mourn her Hector to the last.

Her. Insulting tyrant! I shall burst with rage!

But say, Cleone, didst thou mark him well?

Was his brow smooth? Say, did there not appear

Some shade of grief? some little cloud of sorrow?

Did he not stop? Did he not once look back?

Didst thou approach him? Was he not confounded?

Did he not—Oh! be quick, and tell me all!

Cle. Madam, the tumult of his joy admits

No thought but love. Unguarded, he march'd on,
'Midst a promiscuous throng of friends and foes;
His cares all turn upon Astyanax,
Whom he has lodg'd within the citadel,
Defended by the strength of all his guards.

Her. Enough! he dies! the traitor! Where's Orestes?

Cle. He's in the temple, with his whole retinue.

Her. Is he still resolute? Is he still determin'd?

Cle. Madam, I fear—

Her. How? Is Orestes false?

Does he betray me, too?

Cle. A thousand doubts

Perplex his soul, and wound him with remorse;

His virtue and his love prevail by turns.

He told me Pyrrhus should not fall ignobly;

Pyrrhus, the warlike son of great Achilles.

He dreads the censure of the Grecian states,

Of all mankind, and fears to stain his honour.

Her. Poor tim'rous wretch! 'tis false! he basely fears

To cope with dangers, and encounter death!

'Tis that he fears. Am I bright Helen's daughter?

To vindicate her wrongs all Greece conspir'd;

For her confederate nations fought, and kings were slain;

Troy was o'erthrown, and a whole empire fell.

My eyes want force to raise a lover's arm

Against a tyrant that has dar'd to wrong me!

Cle. Madam, like Helen, trust your cause to Greece.

Her. No; I'll avenge myself; I'll to the temple;

I'll overturn the altar, stab the priest;

I'll hurl destruction, like a whirlwind, round me!

They must not wed! they must not live! they shall not!

Let me begone; I have no time to lose!

Stand off! hold me not! I am all distraction!

Oh, Pyrrhus! tyrant! traitor! thou shalt bleed.

Enter ORESTES.

Ores. Madam, 'tis done; your orders are obey'd;
The tyrant lies expiring at the altar.

Her. Is Pyrrhus slain?

Ores. Even now he gasps in death.

Our Greeks, all undistinguish'd in the crowd,

Flock'd to the temple, and dispers'd themselves

On every side the altar. I was there:

Pyrrhus observ'd me with a haughty eye,

And, proud to triumph over Greece in me,

From his own brows he took the diadem,

And bound it on the temples of his captive.

"Receive," said he, "my crown; receive my faith;

Mine and my people's sovereign reign for ever.

From this bless'd hour, a father to your son;

I'll scourge his foes. Henceforward, be he styl'd

The Trojan king: I swear it at the altar,

And call the gods to ratify my vows."

His subjects with loud acclamations shook

The spacious dome; our Greeks, enrag'd, cried out,

"Revenge! revenge!" broke through the thronging press,

And rush'd, tumultuous, on the unguarded king.

Pyrrhus, awhile, oppos'd their clashing swords,

And dealt his fatal blows on every side

With manly fierceness; till oppress'd by numbers,

Streaming with blood, all over gash'd with wounds,

He reel'd, he groan'd, and at the altar fell.

Haste, madam; let us fly! haste to our ships!

They lie unmoor'd; our friends attend us there.

Her. What have they done?

Ores. Madam, forgive their rage.

I own your vengeance had been more complete

Had Pyrrhus fall'n by me; and had he known

Hermione chastis'd him by my arm.

Her. Peace, monster, peace! Go tell thy horrid tale

To savages, and howl it out in deserts.

Wouldst thou impute to me thy barbarous guilt?

Me wouldst thou make th' accomplice of thy crimes?

Hence to thy Greeks, and boast thy foul exploits!

My soul abhors them! I disclaim the deed.

Begone! I know thee not, thou fell barbarian!

What had he done? What could provoke thy madness

To assassinate so great, so brave a man?

Who set thee on?

Ores. Oh! grant me patience, heaven!

With your own lips did you not curse the tyrant,

Pronounce his death, and urge me to destroy him?

Her. What if transported by my boundless passion,

I could not bear to see him wed another,

Were you t' obey a jealous woman's frenzy?

You should have div'd into my inmost thoughts:

My heart, though full of rage, was free from malice;

And all my anger was excess of love.

Why did you take me at my word? You saw

The struggles of my soul; you heard me rave;

You should have question'd me a thousand times,

Yet still have doubted, and have question'd on,

Before you ventur'd on a life so precious.

Ores. Hear me but speak. Heaven knows, against my will—

Her. Why did you not return? Why not consult me

A second time? and, undetermin'd still,

Again return, and still find new delays?

What had your rash, officious Greeks, dire bloodhounds!

To do with my revenge? What drew you hither?

To bring on me the vengeful foes that haunt you?

Are these the fruits of your detested love?

Your fatal embassy, your hateful presence,

Drove Pyrrhus to my rival, and destroys

Both him and me. He might have lov'd me still,

Had you ne'er interpos'd. Avaunt! begone!

And leave me in Epirus. I renounce

My friends, my country, Greece, and all mankind;

But chiefly I renounce thee, monster, thee!

[Exit.]

Ores. Am I awake? where am I? Soft, my soul;

Be not too rash. Was that Hermione?

Why should her anger thunder against me?

Was not this blood shed all by her command?

I am, indeed, a most outrageous monster!

A ruffian, murderer, a base assassin!

And all to please a false, ungrateful woman.

Henceforward, let the laws of nature cease;

And let the pale that severs right and wrong,

Things sacred and profane, be broken down:

Gods in their temples, kings upon their thrones,

Are not in safety while Orestes lives.

Oh! never more shall my torn mind be heal'd,

Nor taste the gentle comforts of repose!

A dreadful band of gloomy cares surround me,

And lays strong siege to my distracted soul.

Enter PYLADES, attended by Greeks.

Pyl. Haste, prince; let us be gone: 'tis death to stay.

Andromache reigns queen: she gives the alarm,

And vows revenge upon the foes of Pyrrhus.

The people arm, and muster in the streets.

Our Greeks will not be able long to guard

The palace gates, and to secure our flight.

We must be speedy, sir.

Ores. You may depart,

My friends: Hermione and I remain.

Her cruelty has quite undone me. Go!

Pyl. Alas! unhappy princess! she's no more.

Ores. Hermione no more! Oh! all ye powers!

Pyl. Full of disorder, wildness in her looks,

With hands expanded, and dishevell'd hair,
Breathless and pale with shrieks, she sought the temple;

In the midway, she met the corpse of Pyrrhus:
She startled at the sight; then, stiff with horror,
Gaz'd frightful! Waken'd from the dire amaze,
She rais'd her eyes to heaven with such a look
As spoke her sorrows, and reproach'd the gods;
Then plung'd a poniard deep within her breast,
And fell on Pyrrhus, grasping him in death.

Ores. I thank you, gods! I never could expect
To be so wretched! You have been industrious
To finish your decrees; to make Orestes
A dreadful instance of your power to punish.
I'm singled out to bear the wrath of heaven.

Pyl. You hazard your retreat by these delays.
The guards will soon beset us. Your complaints
Are vain, and may be fatal.

Ores. True, my friend;
And, therefore, 'twas I thank'd the bounteous
gods.

My fate's accomplish'd; I shall die content.
Oh! bear me hence. Blow winds!

Pyl. Let us be gone.

Ores. The murder'd lovers wait me. Hark! they call.

Nay, if your blood still reek, I'll mingle mine:
One tomb will hold us all.

Pyl. Alas! I fear
His raving will return with his misfortunes.

Ores. I am dizzy! Clouds! Quite lost in utter darkness!

Guide me, some friendly pilot, through the storm!
I shiver! oh! I freeze! So—light returns;
'Tis the grey dawn. See, Pylades! behold
I am encompass'd with a sea of blood!

The crimson billows! Oh! my brain's on fire!

Pyl. How is it, sir? Repose yourself on me.

Ores. Pyrrhus, what wouldst thou? How he glares!

What envious hand has clos'd thy wounds? Have at thee!

It is Hermione that strikes. Confusion!
She catches Pyrrhus in her arms. Oh! save
me!

How terrible she looks! She knits her brow!
She frowns me dead! she frights me into madness!

Where am I? Who are you?

Pyl. Alas! poor prince!

Help to support him! How he pants for breath!

Ores. This is most kind, my Palades. Oh!
why,

Why was I born to give thee endless trouble?

Pyl. All will go well: he settles into reason.

Ores. Who talks of reason? Better to have none,

Than not enough. Run, some one, tell my Greeks
I will not have them touch the king. Now, now!
I blaze again! See there—look where they come—
A shoal of furies! How they swarm about me?
My terror—hide me—Oh! their snaky locks—
Hark, how they hiss—see, see their flaming brands!

Now they let drive at me! How they grin,
And shake their iron whips! My ears—what yelling—

And see Hermione she sets them on.

Thrust not your scorpions thus into my bosom!

Oh! I am stung to death! Despatch me soon!

There—take my heart, Hermione! tear it out!

Disjoint me! kill me! Oh! my tortur'd soul!

Pyl. Kind heaven, restore him to his wonted calm!

Oft have I seen him rave, but never thus.

Quite spent! Assist me, friends, to bear him off.

Our time is short. Should his strong rage return,

'Twould be beyond our power to force him hence.

Away, my friends! I hear the portal open.

[Exeunt.]

Enter PHOENIX, attended by Guards.

Phœ. All, all are fled! Orestes is not here!
Triumphant villains! The base, giddy rabble,
Whose hands should all have been employ'd with fire,

To waste the fleet, flock'd round the dying princess:

And, while they stand agaze, the Greeks embark.

Oh! 'tis too plain; this sacrileg'ous murder

Was authoriz'd. The ambassador's escape

Declares his guilt. Most bloody embassy!

Most unexampled deeds! Where, where, ye gods!

Is majesty secure, if in your temples

You give it no protection?—See, the queen.

A flourish of trumpets. Enter ANDROMACHE and CEPHISA, with Attendants.

Andro. Yes, ye inhuman Greeks! the time will come

When you shall dearly pay your bloody deeds!

How should the Trojans hope for mercy from you,

When thus you turn your impious rage on Pyrrhus?

Pyrrhus, the bravest man in all your league;

The man, whose single valour made you triumph.

(A dead march behind.)

Is my child there?

Ceph. It is the corpse of Pyrrhus;

The weeping soldiers bear him on their shields.

Andro. Ill-fated prince! too negligent of life,

And too unwary of the faithless Greeks!

Cut off in the fresh rip'ning prime of manhood,

E'en in the prime of life! thy triumphs new,

And all thy glories in full blossom round thee!

The very Trojans would bewail thy fate.

Ceph. Alas! then will your sorrows never end?

Andro. Oh! never, never! While I live, my tears

Will never cease; for I was born to grieve.

Give present orders for the funeral pomp.

(To Phoenix.)

Let him be rob'd in all his regal state;

Place round him every shining mark of honour:

And let the pile that consecrates his ashes,

Rise like his fame, and blaze above the clouds.

[Exit Phoenix. A flourish of trumpets.]

Ceph. The sound proclaims th' arrival of the Prince:

The guards conduct him from the citadel.

Andro. With open arms I'll meet him! Oh! Ce-phisa,

A springing joy, mix'd with a soft concern,

A pleasure which no language can express,

An ecstasy that only mothers feel,

Plays round my heart, and brightens up my sorrow,

Like gleams of sunshine in a low'ring sky.

Though plung'd in ills, and exercis'd in care,

Yet never let the noble mind despair.

When press'd by dangers, and beset with foes,

The gods their timely succour interpose;

And when our virtue sinks, o'erwhelm'd with
grief,

By unforeseen expedients bring relief. [Exeunt.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The outside of the gate of Bruges. Public-house on one side, with the sign of the "Right heir."

HIGGIN, PRIG, FERRET, and other Beggars discovered as having been drinking at a table.

GLEE AND CHORUS.

*Well, brothers, our merry old king is dead;
What matters? we'll soon have another instead:
He would not have cried
Had you or I died.*

*Then mourn him no longer, but merrily sing,
Rest, rest to the bones of our merry old king.*

Drain the can, brother;

Fill up another;

Drink till our eyes with tears shall swell;

Tears of brandy alone;

And the monarch that's gone

Shall be wept in the liquor he lov'd so well.

Hig. Well said, my masters, peace be to his rags! His was a gold and silver reign; he, tyrant-like, Did never force away your hens and bacon When ye had ventur'd for't.

Prig. And in return

We've lent him Christial burial; in good sooth, That's more than follows on your soldier's end.

Fer. The chance was his.

Hig. Ay, marry, was't. But mark, The chance that laid him low did make him king, And yet may crown us, too.

Prig. So't be in right

Of our old custom and election—law.

Hig. True, Prig; 'tis fit we do observe the laws. Here is the table doth exact from all A strict obedience, or expulsion. First, Be perfect in your crutches and your feign'd hurts, Then your torn passports; with the learned ways To stammer and be dumb, and blind and lame.

Prig. Ay, and shed tears to move compassion.

Fer. Are not the halting paces all set down?

Hig. All in the learned language. Brother—

Prig. Peace! (Boors call from behind.)

To your postures.

Enter three or four Boors, with pipes.

1 Boor. What, ho! mine host with the big belly! beer!

Stark English beer! Well met, my merry souls.

What! your trade thrives, methinks, since Wolfort reigns

O'er prostrate Flanders, in despite of Bruges!

Your state doth grow in numbers; marry, why?

He now thrives best who hath the least to lose.

Hig. Bless you, masters, we suffer with the times.

2 Boor. Come, landlord, beer.

Enter Landlord from the house, with beer.

Land. Here's o'the right sort. [Florez.]

1 Boor. Then here's to the right heir—the lost earl Where is old Clause?

He gives respect and countenance to beggary; [ject.

An' ye make him your king, I'd call myself his sub-

Hig. What, old solemnity, our grey-beard bishop?

Prig. See, here he comes! [eh!]

Enter CLAUSE.

1 Boor. Good morrow, worthy Clause:

How fares it with ye, man?

Clause. Not better than the times

Give token of: but for old Bruges here,

Whose charitable sons still feed our wants,

We had long fled this bleeding land,

Where tyrants do make beggars of ye all. [more—

1 Boor. There thou say'st well! Our nobles are no

Our cities ruin'd, and the great wealth of Flanders

Center'd in Bruges. She alone defends

Her rights and liberty 'gainst Wolfort's power.

Here's to her burgomaster, old Vandunke.

(Beggars and Boors drink to Vandunke.)

Clause. I will be with you straight; but first must hence

Awhile into the town. We'll meet anon. [Exit.]

Hig. Let's forward then. Our doxies do repose

Under yon trees. Go some, and call them hither,
And then trudge gaily home to Beggar's Bush.

GLEE.

Men. *Come, doxies, come. The cheerful day
Is bright, and winds are hush.*

Enter Women.

Women. *Then take thy staff, and troll the lay,
And trudge to Beggar's Bush.*

*Our welcome home, a blithe one, too,
The thrush's song shall be;
And never dwelt a merrier crew*

Beneath the greenwood tree. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Presence-chamber of the Earl of Flanders.

*Enter HUBERT disarmed and guarded, met by WOLF-
FORT and train. [arm'd him?]*

Wolf. What, Hubert stealing from me? Who dis-
'Twas more than I commanded; take your sword,
I am best guarded with it in your hand;
I've seen you use it nobly.

Hub. And will turn it
On my own bosom, ere it shall be drawn
Unworthily or rudely.

Wolf. Would you leave me
Without a farewell, Hubert? Fly a friend,
Unwearied in his study to advance you?
Who ever yet arriv'd to any grace,
Reward, or trust from me, but his approaches
Were by your fair reports of him prefer'd?
Nay, what is more, I've made myself your servant
In making you the master of those secrets, [me:
Which not the rack of conscience could draw from Nor I, when I ask'd mercy, trust my pray'rs with.
Yet, after these assurances of love,
These ties and bonds of friendship, to forsake me!
Forsake me as an enemy! Come, you must Give me a reason.

Hub. Sir, and so I will,
If I may do't in private; and you hear it.

Wolf. All leave the room. [Exeunt Guards, &c.
You have your will; now speak,
And use the liberty of our first friendship.

Hub. Friendship! When you prov'd traitor first,
that vanish'd;
Nor do I owe you any thought but hate.
I know my flight hath forfeited my head,
And so I make you first to understand
What a strange monster you have made yourself:
I welcome it.

Wolf. To me this is strange language.

Hub. To you! Why, what are you?

Wolf. Your prince and master,
The earl of Flanders.

Hub. By a proper title!
Rais'd to it by cunning, circumvention, force,
Blood, and proscriptions.

Wolf. And in all this wisdom
Had I not reason,—when the protector, Gerrard,
Who underhand had by his ministers
Detracted my great actions, made my faith
And loyalty suspected? in which failing,
He sought my life by practice.

Hub. With what forehead
Do you speak this to me? Who, as I know't,
Must and will say, 'tis false.

Wolf. Ha! my guard there. [hear,

Hub. You bad me speak, and promis'd you would
Which I now say you shall: not a sound more;
For I, that am contemner of mine own,
Am master of your life; then here's a sword
Between you and all aids: although you blind
The credulous beast, the multitude, you
Pass not these untruths on me.

Wolf. How! untruths?

Hub. Ay, and it is favourable language;
They'd been in a mean man lies and foul ones.
Were not those rumours,
Of being call'd unto your trial, spread
By your own followers? who, being suborn'd,
Came forth and took their oaths they had been hir'd

By Gerrard to your murder: this once heard
And easily believ'd, your well-taught slaves
Snatch'd hastily their arms, and barbarously kill'd
Such as were servants, or thought friends, to Ger-
Vowing the like to him. [rard,

Wolf. Will you yet end?

Hub. But he with his son Florez, (the true heir
By right unto this country from his mother,)
Forsook the city, and by secret ways,
As you give out, and we would gladly have't,
Escap'd their fury; though 'tis more than fear'd
They fell among the rest. Your cruelties since
So far transcend your former bloody ills,
As if, compar'd, they only would appear
Essays of mischief—do not stop your ears,
More are behind yet.

Wolf. Repeat them not.

Hub. A prince in nothing but your princely lusts
And boundless rapines.

Wolf. Hold, I beseech you;
Thou art to me in this a greater tyrant
Than e'er I was to any.

Hub. I end thus

The general grief. Now to my private wrong:
The loss of Gerrard's daughter, Jaculin,
The hop'd for partner of my lawful bed,
Your cruelty hath frighted from mine arms.
Think you that I had reason now to leave you?
My life is irksome; here securely take it,
And do me but this fruit of all your friendship,
That I may die by you, and not your hangman. [have Wolf. Oh! Hubert, these your words and reasons
As well drawn drops of blood from my griev'd heart,
As from mine eyes these tears! Can you but think
Where Gerrard is, or your lost love, or Florez,
Whom in his infancy—

Hub. You stole; and since
Have kept conceal'd, the better to maintain
The usurpation of his seat.

Wolf. By heav'n!

I stole him not, nor know I where he is,
Nor if he lives; soon after my return
From Brabant, whither I was sent to treat
About a future match with our young earl,
He was at that time missing, and remains
Unheard of to this hour; if you can find him,
I will resign the earldom.

Hub. Sir, do not abuse
My aptness to believe.

Wolf. Suspect not you

A faith that's built upon so true a sorrow.
Make your own terms, ask for them all conditions
My power can grant, or your suspicion prompt.
Hemskirke, the partner of my secret'st councils,
Shall journey with you to this wish'd discovery.
I have of late receiv'd intelligence,
That some of Gerrard's friends are 'bout Bruges
To be found; which I did then interpret
The cause of that town's standing out against me.
But now am glad, it may direct your purpose
Of giving them their safety, and me peace.

Hub. Be constant to your promise, and you have it.

Wolf. Distrust me not: and prosp'rous be your search. [Exit Hubert.]

Let me but have them once within my grasp,
Their blood shall write the warrant of my peace. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Street or Square in Bruges.

Enter three Merchants.

1 Mer. 'Tis much that you deliver of this Goswin.

2 Mer. He bears himself with such a confidence
As if he were the master of the sea,
And not a wind upon the sailor's compass
But from one point or other were his factor,
To bring him in the best commodities
Merchants e'er ventur'd for.

3 Mer. 'Tis strange!

2 Mer. Yet does he still continue a good man;
To doubt him would be held an injury,
Or rather, malice, with the best that traffic;

Yet this in him deserves the least of wonder,
Compar'd with other his peculiar fashions :
Is there a virgin of good fame wants dower,
He is a father to her : or soldier
That in his country's service, from the war
Hath brought home only scars and want, his house
Receives him, and relieves him with that care
As if what he possess'd had been laid up
For such good uses, and he steward on't.

1 Mer. I would not wish a better man to deal with.

2 Mer. Ne'er doubt it; he's your man. See, here he comes!

Enter GOSWIN, speaking to a Servant.

Gos. From England, said ye? bid him be welcome to my house. [Exit Servant.]

2 Mer. Save you, master Goswin!

Gos. Good day to all! [dities.]

1 Mer. We bring you the refusal of more commo-

Gos. Are you the owner of the ship that last night put into the harbour?

1 Mer. Both of the ship and lading.

Gos. What's the freight?

3 Mer. Rich cloth of gold, brought from Cambal.

Gos. Some two hours hence I'll come aboard.

1 Mer. The gunner shall speak you welcome.

Gos. I'll not fail.

3 Mer. Good morrow! [Exit with 1 Mer.]

2 Mer. Have you bethought ye further, sir,

On what I am to part with? [prus,

Gos. I take it at your own rate, your wine of Cy-
But for the rest, I cannot save in them.

2 Mer. Make me offer of something near the price
That may assure me, you can deal for them.

Gos. And if I could,

I would not do't with too much loss. [cheap.]

2 Mer. 'Tis a rich lading; you know they are so

Gos. For which I were your chapman, but I am Already out of cash. (Going.)

2 Mer. I'll give you day. (Following him.)

Gos. Why, look you, there is now in prison
And at your suit, a pirate; and past hope
To live a week, if you should prosecute
What you can prove against him: set him free,
And you shall have your money to a stiver,
And early payment.

2 Mer. This is above wonder!

A merchant of your rank, that have at sea
So many bottoms in the danger of
These water thieves, should be a means to save 'em,
And stay the hand of justice that is ready
To fall on them.

Gos. You mistake me,

If you think I would cherish in this captain
The wrong he did to you, or any man.

But I was lately with him, being assur'd
A braver fellow never put from shore.

I read his letters granted from this state.

Since want of what he could not live without

Compell'd him to the pirate act he did,

I pity his misfortunes; and to work you

To some compassion of them, I come up

To your own price. Save him, the goods are mine;
If not, seek elsewhere; I'll not deal for them.

2 Mer. Well, sir, for your love, I will once be led
To change my purpose.

Gos. For your own profit rather.

2 Mer. I'll presently make means for his discharge. [Exit.]

Gos. Heaven grant my ships a safe return before
The day of this great payment, as they are Expected hourly in port; my credit yet
Stands good with all the world.—[Enter GERRARD.]

Ger. Bless my good master!

The prayers of your poor beadsman ever shall
Be sent up for you.

Gos. God o' mercy, Clause!

There's something to put thee in mind hereafter
To think of me.

Ger. May He that gave it you,

Reward you for it with increase, good master!

Gos. I thrive the better for thy prayers.

Ger. I hope so;

For that I have fed upon your bounties,
And by the fire of your bless'd charity warm'd me :
And yet, good master, pardon that I'm bold
To make one suit more to you.

Gos. What is't? say on.

Ger. 'Tis not for money, [me.]
Nor clothes, good master; but your good word for Gos. That thou shalt have, Clause; for I think thee honest. [ble]

Ger. To-morrow, then, dear master, take the trou-
Of walking early unto Beggar's Bush;
And, as you see me, among others, brethren
In my affliction, when you are demanded
Which you like best amongst us, point out me,
And then pass by, as if you knew me not.

Gos. But what will that advantage thee?

Ger. Oh! much, sir;

'Twill give me the pre-eminence of the rest,
Make me a king among 'em.

At your better leisure,

I will inform you further of the good

It may do to me.

Gos. 'Troth! thou mak'st a wonder:

Have you a king and commonwealth among you?

Ger. We have. And there are states are govern'd

Gos. Ambition among beggars! [worse.]

Ger. Many great ones

Do part with half their states to have the place,

To cringe and beg in the first file, master.

Shall I be so bound unto your furtherance

In my petition?

Gos. That thou shalt not miss of,

Nor any worldly care make me forget it.

I will be early there. [Exit.]

Ger. Heaven guard my master! as it surely will,
To wrest the bloody sword from Welfort's grasp,
And save himself the land he's born to rule.

My friends, ere long, shall see their long-lost prince;

And Flanders, to the latest ages shew,

A merchant's still the tyrant's deadliest foe. [Exit.]

ACT II.—SCENE I.

HIGGIN, FERRET, PRIG, JACULIN, CLAUSE,
SNAP, GINKES, and other Beggars discovered.

Hig. Come, princes of the ragged regiment;

You o' the blood; what title e'er you bear,

I speak to all that stand in fair election

For the proud diadem of king of beggars.

Higgen, your orator, doth beseech you

All to stand forth, and put yourselves in rank,

That the first single comer may at view

Make a free choice.

Prig. First put a sentinel.

Hig. 'Thanks to my lord. The word's Fumbumbis.

[Exit Snap.]

Fer. Well; pray, my masters all, that Ferret be chosen:

Y'are like to have a merciful mild prince of me.

Prig. A very tyrant, I; an arrant tyrant,

If e'er I come to reign; therefore, look to't,

Except you do provide me mum enough,

And beer to booze with. I must have my capons,

And ducklings in the season, and fat chickens,

Or straight I seize on all your privilege,

Call in your crutches, wooden legs, false arms,

All shall be escheated; and then, some one cold night

I'll watch you, what old barn you go to roost in,

And there I'll smother you all i'th' musty hay.

Hig. Whew! This is tyrant-like, indeed.

Enter SNAP, preceding HUBERT and HEMSKIRKE, in cloaks.

Snap. Fumbumbis!

Prig. To your postures. Arm.

Hub. Yonder's the town, I see it.

Hig. Bless your good worships!

Fer. One small piece of money.

Ginkes. Amongst us all, poor wretches!

Prig. Blind and lame!

Hig. Pitiful worships!

Snapp. One little stiver.

Prig. Here be seven of us.

Hig. Seven, good masters! Oh! remember seven!
Seven blessings 'gainst seven deadly sins!

Prig. And seven sleepers.

Hems. There's, amongst you all.

Fer. Heaven reward you!

Hig. The prince of pity bless thee!

Hub. Do I see right? or is't my fancy?
Sure, 'tis her face. Come hither, pretty maid.

Jac. What would you? Can you keep a secret?
You look as though you could. I'll tell you. Hush!

SONG.—JACULIN.

*In ev'ry woodland, dale, and bower,
The fragrant roses blossom fair;
But where's the youth shall cull each flower,
To braid a garland for my hair?*

*Oh! he is far, far away,
And he knows not where I stray;*

*And should he e'er return
To his love, I'll answer nay.*

*My love in fight shall meet his doom,
Or for some fairer maiden sigh;*

*And with the rose's with'ring bloom,
My hopeless, hopeless heart shall die.*

Hub. Her voice, too, says the same; but, for my
I would not that her manners were so chang'd. [head,
Hear me, thou honest fellow; what's this maiden,
That lives amongst you here?

Snapp. Ao, ao, ao!

Hub. How! Nothing but signs? This is strange!
I would fain have it her—but not her thus.

Hig. He is deaf and dumb. (Stutters.)

Hub. 'Slid! they did all speak plain enough e'en
Dost thou know this same maid? [now.

Prig. She was born at the barn, yonder, (stutters)
By Beggar's Bush. Her name is—

Hig. So was her mother's, too. (Beggars retire.)

Hub. I must be better informed than by this way.
Here was another face, too, that I mark'd,
Of the old man's; I will come here again.
Protect us, our disguise now: pr'ythee, Hemskirke,
If we be taken, how dost thou imagine
This town will use us, that hath so long stood
Out against Wolfort?

Hems. Even to hang us forth
Upon their walls a sunning, to make crows' meat.
If I were not assur'd o' the burgomaster,
And had a pretty excuse to see a niece there,
I should scarce venture.

Hub. Come, 'tis now too late
To look back at the ports: good luck, and enter.

[Exit with Hems.]

Hig. A peery dog, I warrant him. [mean?

Ginkes. (To Clause.) What could his question

Clause. I know not; yet 'twas time to fly, he grew
Too close in his inquiries 'bout my daughter.

Hig. Hang them, for disturbing our
Noble ceremonies. Shall we renew them?

Prig. Incontinently, noble brother.

Enter GOSWIN.

Hig. Oh! here a judge comes! (Cry of "a judge!")

Gos. What ails you, sirs? What means this out-

Hig. Master, [cry?

A sort of poor souls met, heav'n's tools, good master,
Have had some little variance amongst ourselves
Who should be honestest of us, and which lives
Uprightest in his calling: now, 'cause we thought
We ne'er should 'gree upon 't ourselves, because Indeed, 'tis hard to say, we all resolv'd to put it
To him that should come next, and that's your mastership: [ter,

Which does your worship think is he? Sweet mas-
Look on us all, and tell us: we are seven of us,
Like to the seven wise masters, or the planets.

Gos. I should judge this, the man with the grey beard; (Pointing to Clause.)

And if he be not, I would he were!

There's something, too, amongst you,
To keep you all honest.

[Exit.]

Clause. Heav'n go with you!

Snapp. What is't?

Prig. A crown of gold.

Fer. For our new king—good luck! [Clause!

Prig. King Clause! I bid, God save the first king
After this golden token of a crown,
Where's Higgen, with his gratulating speech
In all our names?

Fer. Here he is, pumping for't. [once more,

Ginkes. H' has cough'd the second time; 'tis but
And then it comes.

Hig. Thou art chosen, venerable Clause,
Our king and sov'reign; monarch o' th' maunders;
And who is he that did not wish thee chosen,
Now thou art chosen? Ask 'em; all will say so;
Nay, swear't. 'Tis sworn so every day;
The times do give it sanction. When t' other day
We sat lamenting o'er our buried prince,
Of famous memory, (rest go with his rags!)
I then presag'd thou shortly wouldst be king,
And now thou art so. By that beard, king Clause,
Thou wert found out, and mark'd for sovereignty,
Oh! happy prince, and beard! long may it grow,
And thick, and fair, that who lives under it
May live as safe as under Beggar's Bush.
Of which this is the thing—that but the type.

(Coughs.)

Prig. On, good Higgen!

Hig. No impositions, taxes, grievances,
Lie lurking in this beard: but under him
Each man shall eat his own stol'n eggs and bacon
In his own shade: he will have no purveyors
For pigs, or poultry—

Clause. That we must have, my learned orator;
It is our will; and every man to keep
In his own path and circuit.

Hig. Do you hear?

You must hereafter maund in your own pads.
He says.

Clause. Besides, to give good words.

Hig. Do you mark?

To cut bien whids, that is the second law.

Clause. And keep afoot the humble and the common
Phrase of begging, lest men discover us.

We love not heaps of laws, where few will serve.

All. Oh! gracious prince! Save, save the good king Clause!

Hig. A song to crown him.

GLEE AND CHORUS.

Cast our caps and cares away,

This is beggars' holyday;

At the crowning of our king,

Thus we ever dance and sing.

In the world look out and see,

Where so happy prince as he,

Where the nations live so free

And so merry as do we?

Be it peace, or be it war,

Here at liberty we are.

And enjoy our ease and rest;

To the field we are not press'd;

Nor will any go to law

With the beggar for a straw:

All which happiness he brags,

He doth owe unto his rags.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in Vandunke's house.

Enter VANDUNKE, HUBERT, HEMSKIRKE, and MARGARET. [friend,

Vand. Captain, you're welcome; so is this your Most safely welcome; though our town stand out
Against your master, you shall find good quarters.
The truth is we love not him—Margaret, some wine.
Let's talk a little treason, if we can
Talk treason 'gainst the traitors; by your leave,
We, here in Bruges, think he does usurp;
And, therefore, I am bold—

[Exit Margaret, and returns with wine.]

Hub. Sir, your boldness
Haply becomes your tongue, but not our ears,
While we are his servants.

Vand. Good! let's drink, then;
That will become us all.
Here's to you with a heart, my captain's friend,
With a good heart; and if this make us speak
Bold words anon, 'tis all under the rose,
Forgotten; drown all memory when we drink.

Hub. 'Tis freely spoken; noble burgomaster,
I'll do you right.

Hems. Nay, sir, mynheer Vandunke
Is a true statesman. [throat

Vand. Fill my captain's cup; oh! that your cut-
Master, Wolfort, had been an honest man!

Hub. Sir?

Vand. Under the rose—

Hems. Here's to you;
And how does my niece?
Almost a woman, I think; she was my errand.

Vand. Ay, a kind uncle you are—fill him his glass—
That in seven years could not find leisure—

Hems. No, 'tis not so much.

Vand. I'll bate you ne'er an hour on't.
It was before the Brabander 'gan his war,
For moonshine, i'the water there, his daughter
That ne'er was lost, yet you could not find time
To see a kinswoman; but she is worth the seeing, sir,
Now you are come: you ask if she were a woman?
She is a woman, sir—bring her forth, Margaret—
And a fine woman, and has suitors.

Hems. How! What suitors are they?

Vand. Bachelors; young burghers;
And one a gallant, the prince of merchants
We call him here in Bruges.

Hems. How! a merchant?
I thought, Vandunke, you had understood me better,
And my niece, too, so trusted to you by me,
Than to admit of such in name of suitors.

Vand. Such! he is such a such, as were she mine,
I'd give him thirty thousand crowns with her.

Hems. Sir, you may deal for your own wares, but know,

That the same things, sir, fit not you and me. [Exit.

Vand. Why, give's some wine, then, that will fit us
Here's to you still, my captain's friend; but still [all;
I say, would Wolfort were an honest man!

Under the rose I speak it. But this merchant
Is a brave boy; he lives so, in the town here,
We know not what to think of him.

Your master is a traitor for all this,
Under the rose—here's to you—and usurps
The earldom from a better man.

Hub. Ay, marry, sir, where is this man?

Vand. Nay, soft! an' I could tell you,
'Tis ten to one I would not. Here's my hand—
I love not Wolfort—sit you still with that.
See, here my captain comes, and his fine niece,
And there's my merchant—view him well.

Enter HEMSKIRKE, GERTRUDE, and GOSWIN.

Hems. You must
Not only know me for your uncle now,
But obey me: you, to go cast yourself
Away upon a merchant? fie upon't! one
That makes his trade with oaths and perjuries.

Gos. If it be me you speak of, as your eye
Seems to direct, I wish you would speak to me, sir.

Hems. Sir, I do say she is no merchandise.
Will that suffice you?

Gos. Merchandise! good sir,
Though you be kinsman to her, take no leave thence
To use me with contempt. I ever thought
Your niece above all price.

Hems. And do so still;
Dost hear? her rate's at more than you are worth.

Gos. You do not know what is a gentleman's
Nor can you value him. [worth;

Hub. Well said, merchant.

Vand. Nay, let him alone.

Hems. A gentleman!
What, o' the woolpack, or the sugar-chest,
Or list of velvet? Which is't, pound or yard,
You vend your gentry by?

Hub. Oh! Hemskirke, fie! [Wolfort,

Vand. Come, do not mind 'em: drink; he is no
Captain, I advise you.

Hems. If 'twere the blood
Of Charlemagne, as't may for aught I know,
Be some good botcher's issue here in Bruges.

Gos. How!

Hems. Nay, I'm not certain on't; of this I am:
If you once buy and sell, your gentry's gone.

Gos. Ha, ha, ha!

Hems. You're angry, though you laugh.

Gos. Now do I smile in pity and contempt
Of your poor argument: do not you, the lords
Of land, if you be any, sell the grass,
The corn, the straw, the milk, the cheese?

Vand. And butter?

Remember butter, do not leave out butter.

Gos. The beefs and muttons that your grounds are stor'd with,

Beside the woods? Your empty honour, fetch'd
From the heralds A, B, C, and said o'er
With your court faces once an hour, shall ne'er
Make me mistake myself. Do not your lawyers
Sell all their practice, as your priests their prayers?
What is not bought and sold?

Hems. You now grow bold, sir.

Gos. I have been bred
Still with my honest freedom, and must use it.

Hems. Upon your equals, then.

Gos. Sir, he that will Provoke me first, doth make himself my equal.

Hems. No more.

Gos. Yes, sir; this little—
'Tshall be aside: then after as you please.
You appear the uncle, sir, to her I love
More than mine eyes; and I have heard your scorn
With so much scoffing, and with so much shame,
As each striv'd which is greater: but believe me,
I suck'd not in this patience with my milk;
Cast no despites on my profession
For the civility and tameness of it.
A good man bears a contumely worse
Than he would do an injury.
I would approach your kinswoman
With all respect due to yourself and her.

Hems. Away, companion! handling her!

(Pulls him from her.)

Gos. Nay, I do love no blows, sir.

(They fight; he gets Hemskirke's sword, and throws it away.)

Hub. Hold, sir!

Gert. Help, my Goswin!

Vand. Let 'em alone; my life for one.

Gos. Nay, come,
If you have will.

Hub. None to offend you, sir. [yes, sir,

Gos. He that had, thank himself! Not hand her?
And clasp her, and embrace her, and bear her
Through a whole race of uncles, arm'd;
And all their nephews, though they stood a wood
Of pikes, and wall of cannon. Kiss me, Gertrude;
Quake not, but kiss me.

Vand. Well said,
My merchant royal; fear no uncles; hang 'em,
Hang up all uncles!

Gos. In this circle, love,
Thou art as safe as in a tower of brass;
Let such as do wrong fear.

Vand. Ay, that's good.
Let Wolfort look to that.

Gos. Sir, here she stands,
Your niece and my belov'd; one of these titles
She must apply to; if unto the last,
Not all the anger can be sent unto her,
In frown or voice, or other art, shall force her,
Had Hercules a hand in't. Come, my joy,
Say, thou art mine, aloud, love—and profess it.

Vand. Do, and I drink to it.

Gos. Pr'ythee, say so, love. [blushes.

Gert. 'Twould take away the honour from my

Do not you play the tyrant, sweet; they speak it.

Hems. I thank you, niece.

Gos. Sir, thank her for your life,
And fetch your sword within. [Exit with Gert.]

Hub. A brave, clear spirit;
Hemskirke, you were to blame. A civil habit
Oft covers a good man; and you may meet
In person of a merchant, with a soul
As resolute and free, and always worthy
As else in any file of mankind. Pray you,
What meant you so to slight him?

Hems. 'Tis done now;

Ask me no more on't:

I was to blame, and I must suffer—(aside)—but yet
I'll be reveng'd. [Exit.]

Hub. I'll to the woods
To find our much-wrong'd banish'd nobles,
And trace the lonely haunt where my lost love,
My Jaculin, laments her alter'd fortunes.

There I may chance to learn
Somewhat to help my inquiries further.

How now, brave burgomaster? [dunke.]

Vand. I love not Wolfort, and my name's Van-

Hub. Come, go sleep within. [Wolfort—]

Vand. Earl Florez is right heir; and this same
Under the rose I speak it—

Hub. Very hardly. [breath'd,

Vand. Usurps; and is a rank traitor as ever
And all that do uphold him. Let me go:

Do you uphold him?

Hub. No.

Vand. Then hold up me. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.—SCENE I.—A Wood.

Enter GOSWIN.

Gos. No wind blows fair yet! no return of mo-
Letters, nor anything to hold my hopes up! [nies,
Why, then, 'tis destin'd that I fall! Fall miserably!
My credit I was built on sinking with me.

The raging north wind blows still stubbornly,
And on his boist'rous rack rides my sad ruin.

To-morrow with the sun-set, sets my credit:

To prison now! Well, yet there's this hope left me,

I may sink fairly under this day's venture;

And so to-morrow's cross'd, and all its curses.

This is the place his challenge call'd me to;

Now let me fall before my foe i'th' field,

And not at bar before my creditors.

He has kept his word. [Enter HEMSKIRKE.]

Now, sir, your sword's tongue only,
Loud as you dare—all other language—

Hem. Well, sir,

You shall not be long troubled: draw!

Gos. 'Tis done, sir; and now have at ye.

Hems. Now! [Enter Boors who attack Goswin.]

Gos. Betray'd to villains! Slaves, you shall buy me dearly.

Enter GERRARD and Beggars.

Ger. Now upon 'em bravely, boys!

Down with the gentlemen.

Boors. Hold, hold! [em!]

Ger. Down with 'em into the wood, and swinge
Conjure 'em soundly, boys! swinge 'em to jelly!

[Beggars beat off Hemskirke and Boors.]

Blessings upon my master! thou art not hurt?

Gos. That heav'n, which sent thee to my aid,
Still nerv'd my arm.

Ger. And let my wandering steps,
To where conceal'd I heard yon coward knave
Tutor his ruffian band to thy undoing.

Ger. I thank ye, Clause. Pr'ythee, now leave me,
For, by my troth, I have nothing left to give thee.

Ger. Indeed, I do not ask, sir; only it grieves me
To see you look so sad. Now goodness keep you
From troubles in your mind!

Gos. If I were troubled, [me.]

What could thy comfort do? Pr'ythee, Clause, leave

Ger. Why are ye sad?

Gos. Most true, I am so;

And such a sadness I have got will sink me! [ble
What would the knowledge do thee good, so misera-

Thou canst not help thyself! canst thou work mira-

Ger. You do not know, sir, what I can do. [cles?
Tell me your cause of grief; I must not leave ye.

Gos. How! [goodness,

Ger. By what ye hold most precious, by heav'n's
As your fair birth may prosper, good sir, tell me;
My mind believes yet something's in my power
May ease you of this trouble.

Gos. I will tell thee:

For a hundred thousand crowns, upon my credit
Taken up of merchants to supply my traffic,
To-morrow, Clause—to-morrow, which must come,
In prison thou shalt find me, poor and broken.

Ger. I cannot blame your grief, sir.

Gos. Now, what say'st thou? [ye,

Ger. I say, you should not shrink; for he that gave
Can give you more. Are ye, good master, ty'd
Within the compass of a day?

Gos. Even to-morrow.

But why do I stand mocking of my misery?
Is't not enough that floods and friends forsake me?

Ger. Have ye no friends left?

None that have felt your bounty worth the duty?

Gos. Friendship! thou know'st it not.

Ger. It is a duty; and as a duty, from those men have felt ye,

Should be return'd again; therefore, I'll do't.

Distrust not, but pull up your noble spirit;

For if the fortunes of ten thousand people

Can save ye, rest assur'd. You have forgot, sir,

The good you did; that was the pow'r you gave me.

You shall now know the king of beggars' treasure;

And let the winds blow as they list, the sea roar,

Yet here in safety you shall find your harbour.

Distrust me not, for if I live, I'll fit ye.

Gos. How fain I would believe thee!

Ger. If I fail, master, believe no man hereafter.

Gos. I will try thee; but He knows, that knows

Ger. Know me to-morrow: [all.]

And if I know not how to cure ye, kill me!

So pass in peace, my best, my worthiest master. [Exit.]

Gos. Still blow'st thou there? and from all other

Do all my agents sleep, that nothing comes? [parts

There's a conspiracy of friends and servants,

If not of elements, to ha' me break.

What should I think, unless the seas and sands

Had swallow'd up, or fire devour'd my ships,

I must ha' had some returns.

Enter first Merchant,

1 Mer. Save you, sir!

Gos. Save you!

1 Mer. No news yet o' your ships?

Gos. Not any yet, sir.

1 Mer. 'Tis strange! [Exit.]

Gos. 'Tis true, sir. What a voice was here now!

This was one passing bell; a thousand ravens

Sung in that man now, to presage my ruin!

Enter second Merchant.

2 Mer. Goswin, good day! these winds are very

Gos. They are so, sir—to hurt. [constant.]

2 Mer. Ha' you had no letters

Lately from England, nor from Denmark?

Gos. Neither. [lands

2 Mer. This wind brings them. Nor no news over

Through Spain, from the Straits?

Gos. Not any.

2 Mer. I am sorry, sir. [Exit.]

Gos. They talk me down; and, as 'tis said of vul-
tures,

That scent a field fought, and do smell the carcasses

By many hundred miles: so do these, my wrecks,

At greater distances. Then, heaven, thy will Come on, and be! For base, deceitful fortune

Shall never say, she's cut my throat in fear:

I am not broken yet; nor should I fall,

Methinks, with less than that; that ruins all. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another part of the Wood.

Enter HUBERT, as a Huntsman.

Hub. Thus have I stol'n away disguis'd from Hems-
To try these people; for my heart yet tells me [kirke,

Some of these beggars are the men I look for.
Appearing like myself, they have no reason
(Though my intent be fair,) but still to avoid me.
This is the wood they make their hidden home,
A fit place for coucealment; where, till fortune
Crown me with that I seek, I'll live amongst 'em.
They come: I'll couch awhile, and mark my time.

[Exit.

Enter HIGGEN, PRIG, FERRET, GINKES, and the rest, with the Boors in custody.

Hig. Come, bring him out, for here we sit in jus-
Each man take a cudgel, a good cudgel: [tice;
And now attend our sentence. That you are rogues,
And mischievous, base rascals—there's the point
I take it, is confess'd. [now—

Prig. Deny it, if ye dare, knaves.

Boors. We are rogues, sir.

Hig. To amplify the matter, then; rogues ye are,
And cudgell'd ye shall be, ere we leave ye.

Boors. Yes, sir.

Hig. Why did ye this?

Were you drunk when ye did it?

Boors. Yes, indeed, we were.

Prig. You shall be beaten sober.

Hig. Was it for want ye undertook it?

Boors. Yes, sir.

Hig. Ye shall be swing'd abundantly.

Has not the gentleman (pray, mark this point,
Brother Prigg,) reliev'd you often?

Boors. 'Tis most true, sir.

Hig. And as ye are true rascals,
Tell me but this: have ye not been drunk and often
At his charge?

Boors. Often, often.

Hig. There's the point, then;

They have cast themselves, brother Prig.
Proceed you now; I'm somewhat weary.

Prig. Can you do these things,
You most abominable scurvy rascals,
You turnip-eating rogues?

Boors. We're truly sorry. [presently

Prig. To the proof, you knaves; to the proof, and Give us a sign you feel compunction.
Every man up with his cudgel, and on his neighbour
Bestow such alms, till we shall say sufficient.

Hig. You know your doom:
One, two, three, and about it.

[Boors beat each other off.

Prig. That fellow in the blue has true compunc-

[tion.

Ger. Call in the gentleman:
His cause I'll hear myself.

Enter HEMSKIRKE, handcuffed.

Prig. With all due reverence
We do resign, sir.

Ger. Go fetch that paper was found upon him.

But, soft! who have we here? [Exit Ferret.

Enter HUBERT.

Hub. Good ev'n, my honest friends!

Ger. Good ev'n, good fellow!

Hub. May a poor huntsman, with a merry heart,
A voice shall make the forest ring about him,
Get leave to live amongst ye? True as steel, boys;
That knows all chases, and can watch all hours,
Force ye the crafty reynard, climb the quick-sets,
And rouse the lofty stag; and with my bell-horn
Ring him a knell, that all the woods shall mourn him,
Till in his funeral tears he fall before me.

Ger. Well spoke, my brave fellow.

Hub. (Aside.) What mak'st thee here?
Hemskirke, thou art not right, I fear.

Re-enter FERRET, with a paper.

Fer. Here is the paper.

Ger. Give it to me. You are sent here, sirrah,
To discover certain gentlemen; a spy knave!
And if you find 'em, if not by persuasion,
To bring 'em back—by poison to dispatch 'em!

Hub. By poison! ha! (Aside.)

Ger. Here is another—Hubert. What is that Hu-

Hub. You may perceive there— [bert, sir?

Ger. Here thou art commanded, when that Hubert
Has done his best and worthiest service this way,
To cut his throat; for here he's set down dangerous.

Hub. This is most impious! (Aside.)

Ger. Is not this true?

Hems. Yes. What are you the better? [dom;

Ger. You shall perceive, sir, ere you get your free-
Keep him still bound: and, friend, we take thee to us,
Into our company. Thou dar'st be true unto us?

Hig. Ay, and obedient, too?

Hub. As you had bred me. [us.

Ger. Then take our hand; thou'rt now a servant to Welcome him all.

Hig. Stand off, stand off, I'll do't; [son,
We bid you welcome three ways: first, for your per-
Which is a promising person; next for your quality,
Which is a decent and a gentle quality;
Last, for the frequent means you have to feed us;
You can steal, 'tis presum'd?

Hub. Yes, venison; an' if you want—

Hig. 'Tis well you understand that, for you
Shall practise it daily; you can drink, too?

Hub. Soundly. [cock;

Hig. And ye dare know a woman from a weather-

Hub. If I handle her.

Ger. As earnest of thy faith and resolution
Wilt thou undertake to keep this rascal prisoner?
One who basely contriv'd to undermine
A noble life, dear to the state and us. [wonder,

Hub. Sirs, I have kept wild dogs, and beasts for
And made 'em tame, too. Give into my custody
This roaring rascal, I shall hamper him.

Oh! he smells rank o'th' rascal.

Ger. Take him to thee; but if he 'scape—

Hub. Let me be even hang'd for him.

Come, sir, I'll tie you to the leash.

Hems. Away, rascal! [soundly,

Hub. Be not so stubborn: I shall swinge ye
An ye play tricks with me.

Ger. So, now away;

But ever have an eye, sir, to your prisoner.

Hub. He must blind both mine eyes, if he get from me. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—A Room in Gertrude's house.

Enter GOSWIN and GERTRUDE.

Gert. Indeed, you're welcome; I have heard your
'scape,

And, therefore, give her leave, that only loves you,
To bid you welcome: what is't makes you sad?

Why do you look so wild? Is't I offend you?

Beshrew my heart, not willingly.

Gos. No, Gertrude. [for,

Gert. Is't the delay of that you long have look'd
A happy marriage?

Gos. No news yet.

Gert. Do you hear, sir?

Gos. Have I liv'd

In all the happiness that fortune could seat me?

In all men's fair opinions?

Gert. Do you love me?

Gos. And can the devil,

In one ten days—that devil chance, devour me?

Gert. You do not love me.

Gos. No star prosperous! all at a swoop!

Gert. Goswin, you will not look upon me.

Gos. Can men's prayers,
Shot up to heaven with such a zeal as mine are,
Fall back like lazy mists, and never prosper?
Gyves I must wear, and cold must be my comfort,
Darkness, and want of meat—alas! she weeps, too,
Which is the top of all my sorrow—Gertrude!

Gert. No, no, you will know me.

Gos. The time grows on still,
And like a tumbling wave, I see my ruin

Come rolling over me. [slighting?

Gert. Tell me but how I have deserv'd your

Gos. For a hundred thousand crowns!

Gert. Farewell!

Gos. Of which I have scarce ten—oh! how it starts me!

Gert. And may the next you love, hearing my ruin—

Gos. I had forgot myself—oh! my best Gertrude! Crown of my joys and comforts.

Gert. Sweet, what ails ye?
I thought you had been vex'd with me.

Gos. My mind, wench,
My mind, o'erflow'd with sorrow, sunk my memory.

Gert. Am I not worthy of the knowledge of it?
And cannot I as well affect your sorrows
As your delights? you love no other woman?

Gos. No, I protest.

Gert. You have no ships lost lately?

Gos. None that I know of. [cence]

Gert. I hope you have spilled no blood whose inno-
May lay this on your conscience.

Gos. Clear, by heaven!

Gert. Why should you be thus, then?

Gos. Good Gertrude, ask not.
Even by the love you bear me.

Gert. I am obedient.

Gos. Go in; my fair; I will not be long from ye—
Nor long, I fear me, with thee. At my return
Dispose me as you please.

Gert. The good gods guide ye! [Exit.]

Gos. Now for myself, which is the least I hope for,
And when that fails, for man's worst fortune, pity. [Exit.]

ACT IV.—SCENE I.—A Street in Bruges.

Enter GOSWIN and two Merchants.

Gos. Why, gentlemen, 'tis but a week more; I entreat you

But seven short days; I am not running from you,
Nor, if you give me patience, is it possible
All my adventures fail. You've ships abroad
Endure the beating both of wind and weather,
I'm sure 'twould vex your hearts to be protested;
Ye're all fair merchants.

1 Mer. And must have fair play.
There is no living here else; for my part,
I would gladly stay; but my wants tell me,
I must wrong others in't.

Gos. No mercy in ye?

2 Mer. 'Tis foolish to depend on others' mercy.
Keep yourself right, sir; you have yet liv'd here
In lord-like prodigality, high and open;
Now ye find what 'tis.

1 Mer. Before your poverty,
We were of no mark, of no endeavour.

2 Mer. You stood alone; and scarce a sail at sea
But laden with your goods. Now I hope, sir,
We shall have sea-room.

Gos. Is my misery
Become my scorn, too? Have you no mercy,
No part of men left? Are all my bounties
To you, and to the town, turn'd my reproaches?

2 Mer. Well, get your monies ready; 'tis but two
We shall protest ye else, and suddenly. [hours;

Gos. But two days—

2 Mer. Not an hour. Ye know the hazard.

[Exeunt Merchants.]

Gos. How soon my light's put out! Hard-hearted
Bruges!
Within thy walls may never honest merchant
Venture his fortune more! [Enter GERRARD.]

Ger. Good fortune, master!

Gos. Thou mistak'st me, Clause;
I am not worth thy blessing.

Ger. Still a sad man!
No belief, gentle master?

Enter FERRET and GINKES, as porters.

Bring it in, then;
And now believe your beadsman.

Gos. Is this certain?

Or dost thou work upon my troubled senses?

Ger. 'Tis gold; 'tis there, a hundred thousand crowns;

And, good, sweet master, now be merry. Pay 'em!
Pay the poor, pelting knaves, that know no good-
And cheer your heart up. [ness.]

Gos. But, good Clause, tell me, [fully,
How cam'st thou by this mighty sum? If wrong-
I must not take it of thee; 'twill undo me!

Ger. Fear not; you have it by as honest means,
As though your father gave it.

Gos. What great security?

Ger. Away with that, sir;

Were ye not more than all the men in Bruges,
And all the money, in my thoughts?

Gos. But, Clause,
I may die presently.

Ger. Then this dies with you. [ments.]

Pay when you can, good master; I'll no parch-
Only this charity I entreat you,
Leave me this ring.

Gos. Alas! it is too poor, Clause.

Ger. 'Tis all I ask; and this withal, that when
I shall deliver't back, you shall grant me,
Freely, one poor petition.

Gos. There, I confirm it. (Gives the ring.)

And may my faith forsake me when I shun it! [Ex.]

Ger. Away! take up the money,
And follow that young gentleman. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Wood.—Enter JACULIN.

Jac. I surely cannot err. What borrow'd dress
Can hide my Hubert from me? How I wish,
Yet fear to be resolv'd. He went this way.
Shall I adventure? Oh! this dread suspense,
How it does load my heart!

Enter HUBERT.

Hub. I've lock'd my youth up close enough from
In an old tree, and set watch over him. [gadding,
My schemes are almost ripe—Ha, Jaculin!
If through her means, I can but make discovery.
Come hither, pretty maid.

Jac. No, no; you'll kiss me.

Hub. So I will. (Kisses her.)

What's your father's name?

Jac. He's gone to heaven!

Hub. Is it not Gerrard, sweet?

Jac. I'll stay no longer.

My mother's an old woman, and my brother
Was drown'd at sea. (Going.)

Hub. Stay! do not fly me thus. [me.]

Jac. (Aside.) Oh! how my heart melts within

Hub. (Aside.) 'Tis certain she! Pray, let me

Jac. No, no. [see your hand, sweet.]

Hub. (Aside.) Sure, I should know that ring!

Jac. (Aside.) 'Tis certain he. I had forgot my

Hub. Do you know me, chuck? [ring, too.]

Jac. No, indeed; I never saw ye:

I must be married to-morrow, to a capper.

Hub. (Aside.) How fain she would conceal herself, yet cannot.

My pretty wanderer, will you love me,
And leave that man? I'll wait you through the vale,
And make you dainty nose-gays.

Jac. And where put them?

Hub. Here, in thy bosom, sweet.

Jac. Can you love, then?

SONG.—JACULIN.

Tho' he is far away,
And over land and sea;
He'll come some happy day,
And prove his truth to me.
And when my love's returning,
My secret known too well,
Thro' all my blushes burning,
Shall want no tongue to tell.

Hub. One word more.

Did you ever know a maid call'd Jaculin?

Jac. Oh! I'm discover'd!

Hub. 'Tis she! Now I'm certain

They're all here. Turn, turn thee, lovely maid,
Thy Hubert speaks to thee.

Jac. Alas! I am forbid? Why thus disguis'd?

Hub. For justice and for thee, love!

Meet me anon, I'll tell thee all my purpose.

Jac. And may I trust thee, Hubert?

Hub. As thine own soul.

Jac. But yet you must not know me. This, and be constant ever. [Exit.

Hub. Oh! blessed certainty!
Now for my other project.
To turn the cunning toils were laid for me
To Hemskirke's ruin, and the tyrant's fall. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.

Enter VANDUNKE, followed by a Servant.

Van. With officers of justice, said ye? and Inquir'd for Goswin? Bid 'em come in. [Exit Serv.
Now will I play upon this envious crew,
That fain would run a royal vessel down.
They're here as bidden to a feast, before their hour:
I'll whet and disappoint their hungry appetites.

Enter the four Merchants.

2 Mer. Good day, most worthy burgomaster.
Our visit was to the rich merchant, Goswin.

Van. I'm sorry for't. I fear his strong necessity
Will bring him empty-handed. [ties
You must be merciful.

1 Mer. Oh! but he'll come;
He's rich, or from his 'ventures should be so.

2 Mer. I only wish
His forwardness to embrace all bargains,
Sink him not in the end.

1 Mer. (To Vand.) Have better hopes;
For my part, I am confident. [friends!

Vand. (Aside.) Here's a set of smiling mouth

3 Mer. His noble mind and ready hand contend
Which can add most to his free courtesies.

Vand. Affable wolves! (Aside.)

2 Mer. It was at his bidding,
I did free from prison a sea robber,
Who yet may live to pay him with his ruin.
What think you of that deed, burgomaster?

Vand. What think! as of a deed of noble pity:
And if that act did plunge him into ruin,
You may now share its glory, by relieving him;
And holding off your bonds.

2 Mer. I love and honour him,
But must not break my neck to heal his finger.

3 Mer. For my part, though his bounty has no
eyes,
Yet my necessities compel me to some foresight.

Vand. Have ye not often profited by this man,
And revell'd at his cost?

2 Mer. Sir, we confess—

Vand. Do, that y're all base knaves and hypocrites.
See, here he comes to challenge a return
Of kindness from ye.

1 Mer. When our bonds he paid.

Enter GOSWIN, with men carrying bags of money.

Gos. Now, sirs, your bonds. Set down those bags
Your pardon, that you wait. [of gold.

2 Mer. (Aside.) He deals in witchcraft!

1 Mer. Nay, sir, if it would do you courtesy,—

Gos. None at all, sir. (The Merchants bow.)

Vand. There's bending now of backs,
And jutting out of hips. (Aside.)

Gos. Take it, 'tis yours.

There's your ten thousand, sir. Give in my bills.
Your sixteen—

3 Mer. Pray, be pleas'd to make further use.

Gos. No.

Vand. That's plump! You're answer'd, I hope?

4 Mer. What I have, sir,
You may command. Pray, let me be your servant.

Gos. Put on your hats. I care not for your courtesies;

They're most untimely done, and no truth in 'em.

Vand. They're all lies, I'll vouch for 'em ev'ry

2 Mer. I have a freight of pepper. [one.

Vand. Rot your pepper! [thousand.

Gos. Shall I trust you again?—There's your ten

4 Mer. Or, if you want fine sugar, 'tis but sending.

Gos. No, I can send to Barbary; those people,
That never yet knew faith, have nobler freedoms.
How now?—[Enter a Sailor.]

Sail. Why, health to the noble merchant!
The Susan is returned.

Gos. Well?

Sail. Well, and rich, sir;
And now put in.

Vand. Do you mark that?

Gos. Heav'n, thou hast heard my prayers.
What news o'th' fly-boat?

Sail. If this wind hold till midnight,
She will be here, and wealthy.—'Scap'd fairly.

Vand. D'ye hear that, too, knaves.

Gos. How, pr'ythee, sailor?

Sail. Thus, sir. She had fought
Seven hours together, with six Turkish galleys,
And she fought bravely; but, at last, was boarded,
And overlaid with strength; when, presently,
Comes bearing up i'the wind, Captain Vannoke,
That valiant gentleman you redeem'd from prison.
He knew the boat, set in, and fought it bravely;
Beat all the galleys off, sunk three; redeem'd her,
And, as a service to ye, sent her home, sir.

Gos. An honest, noble captain, and a thankful!

Vand. And this is he you would have hang'd,
Ye land pirates!

Gos. There's for thy news. Go, drink the merchant's health, sailor.

Sail. Thank your bounty; and I'll do it to a doit.

Vand. Ay, drink till ye drown yourself,
Or you're no Englishman. [Exit Sailor.

Gos. This year, I hope, my friends, I shall'scape
For all your cares to catch me. [prison,

Vand. Come, sir, leave these pitiful knaves;
You must along with me:

Yonder is one who weeps and sobs.

Gos. Alas! how does she?

Vand. She will be better soon, I hope.

Gos. Why soon, sir? [night,

Vand. Why, when you have her in your arms. This
My boy, she is thy wife:

I'll cheer thee up with sack,
And, when thou'rt joyous, fling thee to thy mistress.

Gos. With all my heart, I take her.

You are paid, I hope?

2 Mer. You may please, sir,
To think of your poor servants in displeasure,
Whose all they have—goods, moneys, are at your

Gos. I thank you; [service.
And when I've need of you, I shall forget you.
[Exeunt.

SCENE IV.—A Wood.

Enter HUBERT and HEMSKIRKE.

Hub. You the earl's servant? [him,

Hems. I swear I am near as his own thoughts to Able to do thee service. Release me,
I'll make thee ranger over all the game. [too.

Hub. This may provoke me. Yet to prove a knave

Hems. 'Tis to prove honest; 'tis to do good service [prince.

For him thou'rt sworn to, huntsman; for thy

Hub. Then thou shalt see, sir. I will do a service That shall deserve, indeed. [vice,

'Tis not your setting free, for that's mere nothing;
But such a service, if the earl be noble,

He shall for ever love me.

Hems. What is't, huntsman?

Hub. Do you know any of these people live here?

Hems. No. [have 'em,

Hub. You are a fool, then. Here be those, to
I know the earl so well, would make him caper.

Hems. Any of the old lords, that rebell'd?

Hub. Peace!

All. I know 'em all, and can betray 'em.

Hems. But wilt thou do this service?

Hub. More than that, too.

Here's the right heir!

Hems. What, Florez? Oh! honest,
Honest huntsman!

Hub. Now, how to get them,
There's the matter.

Hems. By force.

Hub. Ay, that must do't.

And, with the person of the earl himself,

Authority and might must come on 'em,
Or else in vain. And thus I would have you do't.
To-morrow night be here, the hour be twelve:
Now for a guide to draw ye on these persons,
The woods being thick, and hard to hit, myself
With some beside, will wait you by th' great oak.

Hems. Keep but thy faith, and such a shower of wealth—

Hub. I warrant ye. Miss nothing that I tell ye.
Away, away! for here come those will hold ye.

[Exit Hemskirke.]

Enter GERRARD, HIGGEN, PRIG, GINKES, SNAP, FERRET, and others.

Ger. Now, what's the news in town?

Ginkes. No news but joy, sir.

Ev'ry man wooing of the noble merchant,
Who sends his hearty commendations to ye.

Fer. Yes; there's this news. This night he's to be married.

Ger. This night! He must not marry now.

Hub. Good sir,
By your leave, one word in private with ye.
Nay, do not start; I know ye.
Hubert speaks to ye, and you must be Gerrard,
The time invites you to it.

Ger. Challeng'd thus,
I throw aside disguise, and trust your honour.
Sir, I am Gerrard; say, how stand our hopes?

Hub. Fair, if you now pursue 'em. Hemskirke.
Let go, and these my causes I'll tell ye [I've Privately, and how I have wrought on him,
Gull'd him, and sent him home as a decoy,
To bring Lord Wolfort hither, with his guards,
To seize (so he'll expect) the banish'd lords;
But, so my plan succeed, his very guards
Shall serve to crush the tyranny they rais'd,
And, at my voice, shall hail their lawful prince.
Till I can prove me honest to my friends,
Look on, and strictly follow these directions.

Snap. What! does he marry Vandunke's pretty daughter? [pies!]

Prig. Oh! the puddings, the piping hot mince—

Hig. For the leg of a goose, now would I venture
I love a fat goose, as I love allegiance; [a limb:
And plague upon the boors, too well they know't;
And, therefore, starve their poultry.

Prig. Brother Higgen,
What think you of a wassail?

Hig. Worthily;
And then I'll make a speech in praise of merchants.

Prig. And I'll so roar out songs and glees!

Ger. 'Tis passing well, I both believe and joy in't,
And will be ready. Hear me all: keep in Till this, your huntsman, call ye forth; then do
His bidding faithfully. I must awhile
Forsake ye. On mine anger, no man stir hence.

Prig. Not to the wedding, sir?

Ger. Not any whither. [meat, too.]

Hig. The wedding must be seen, sir. We want
We're horribly out of meat.

Prig. Shall it be spoken,
Fat capons shak'd their tails at's in defiance?
Shall pigs, sir, that the parson's self would envy,
And dainty ducks—

Ger. Not a word more. Obey me! [Exit.]

Hig. Why, then, come doleful death, this is flat
And by this hand— [tyranny!]

Hub. What?

Hig. I'll go to sleep upon't.

Hub. No sleep to-night for any that have hearts
To hunt with me the savage, bloody boar
That wastes the land. I have a scheme, my hearts,
Shall, by one night of watching, win a feast,
Whereat a royal host shall bid you welcome.

[*Exeunt, crying "Long live our huntsman,
Hubert!"*]

SCENE V.—An entrance Hall in Bruges.

Enter GOSWIN, with a paper in his hand.

Gos. Such earnest bidding; nay, more like command,

To meet him here, on th' forfeit of my word,
In this the moment of my nuptial hour!

What this man is I know not, nor for what cause
He twice has thrust himself into my dangers.
But, sure, heav'n's hand is in't. By strange instinct,
Nature has taught me to behold his wants,
Not as a stranger's.—[Enter GERRARD.]
My honest, my best friend, I have been careful
To see thy moneys—

Clause. Sir, that brought not me.

Do you know this ring again?

Gos. Thou hadst it of me.

Clause. And do you well remember yet the boon
Upon the return of this? [you gave me]

Gos. Yes; and I grant it,

Be it what it will. Ask what thou canst, I'll do it,
Within my power.

Clause. You are not married yet?

Gos. No.

[turb ye.]

Clause. 'Faith, I shall ask you that, that will dis-

Gos. Do;

And if I faint and flinch in't,—

Clause. Well said, master;

And yet it grieves me, too, and yet it must be.

Gos. Pr'ythee, distrust me not.

Clause. You must not marry.

That's part of the power you gave me.

Gos. Not marry, Clause?

Clause. Not if you keep your promise,
And give me power to ask.

Gos. Pr'ythee, think better.

I will obey, by heaven!

Clause. I have thought the best, sir. [nesty?]

Gos. Give me thy reason. Dost thou fear her ho-

Clause. Chaste as the ice, for anything I know,

Gos. Must not marry? [sir.]

Shall I break now, when my poor heart is pawn'd?
When all the preparation—

Clause. Now, or never.

Gos. Come, 'tis not that thou wouldst: thou dost but fright me.

Clause. You may break, sir;

But never more in my thoughts appear honest.

Gos. Didst ever see her?

Clause. No.

Gos. She is such a wonder

For beauty and fair virtue, Europe has not.

Why hast thou made me happy to undo me?

But look upon her, then if thy heart relent not,
I'll quit her presently. Who waits there?

Bid my fair love come hither.

Pr'ythee, be merciful; take a man's heart,

And look upon her truly: take a friend's heart,

And feel what misery must follow this. [mise.]

Clause. Take you a noble heart, and keep your pro-
I forsook all I had to make you happy.

Enter GERTRUDE.

Can that thing call'd a woman stay your virtue?

Gos. Look, there she is. Now deal with me as Didst ever see a fairer? [thou wilt.]

Gert. What ails my love?

Gos. Didst thou ever,

By the fair light of heav'n, behold a sweeter?

Gert. Sure, h'as some strange design in hand,
He starts so.

Clause. She is most goodly.

Gos. Is she a thing, then, to be lost thus lightly?
Her mind is ten times sweeter, ten times nobler,—
And but to hear her speak—a paradise.

And such a love she bears to me,—a chaste love,—

And ready now to bless me; the priest too, ready

To say the holy words, shall make us happy.

This is a cruelty beyond man's study;

'Twill be her death to do't.

Clause. Let her die, then.

Gos. 'Twill kill me, too; 'twill murder me. By heav'n, Clause, [me.]

I'll give thee half I have. Come, thou shalt save

Clause. Then you must go with me; I can stay no longer.

If you be true and noble, in the dark walk
Of aged elms, that opens to the plain,
You'll meet me in this hour.

Gos. Hard heart, I'll follow thee. [Exit Clause.
Pray ye, go in. I have a weighty business
Concerns my life and state, (make no inquiry,)
This present hour befall'n me. My cloak there!

Gert. Is this your ceremony? Why is this stop,

Gos. We must part, [sir?
Gertrude, we must!

Gert. Must! What voice enjoins?
What power commands?

Gos. We shall meet again.

Gert. Who is yon man, that rules so absolute
O'er Goswin's will? [sweet,

Gos. Ask me no more. I can but tell thee this,
I'm ever thine. Farewell. [Exit Gert.

I know not why,
But to obey this man, to me seems now
As payment of some great religious debt
Nature stands bound for. [Exit.

ACT V.—SCENE I.—Woods.

Enter GERTRUDE and a Clown.

Ger. Lead, if we're right; thou said'st thou knew'st the way. [homeward!

Clown. Fear nothing, I do know it. Would 'twere

Gert. Wrought from me by a beggar! at the time
That most should tie him! 'tis some other love
That hath a more command on his affections,
And he that fetch'd him, a disguised agent,
Not what he personated. Darkness shroud
And cover love's too curious search in me;
For yet, suspicion, I would not name thee.

Clown. Mistress, it grows somewhat pretty and Gert. What then? [dark.

Clown. Nay, nothing. Do not think I am afraid,
Although, perhaps, you are.

Gert. I am not. Forward! [fear nothing.

Clown. Sure, but you are. Give me your hand—
What a fright one on's are in, you or I?

Gert. What ails the fellow?

Clown. Hark, hark! I beseech you.
Do you hear nothing?

Gert. No.

Clown. List! This wood is full of wolves,
Of hogs, and such carnivorous vermin.
Hark! 'tis the howling of a wolf!

Gert. Of the wind, coward! [now!

Clown. Help me to say my pray'rs. He's got me
I cannot speak! Do I speak, mistress? Tell me.

Gert. A precious guide I've got. (One halloes.)

Clown. It thunders now. You hear that, mistress?

Gert. I hear one halloa! [lightning!

Clown. 'Tis thunder, thunder! See, a flash of
Are you not blasted, mistress?

'T has played the barber with me; I have lost
My beard—I am shaven, mistress.

Gert. Pr'ythee, hold thy peace.

Both love and jealousy have made me bold.

Where my fate leads me, I must go. Hold off! [Ex.

Clown. The Lord go with you, then, for I will not.

Enter WOLFORT, HEMSKIRKE, and Soldiers.

Hems. It was the fellow,—sure, he that should guide—

The huntsman that did halloa. Who goes there?

Clown. Mistress, I am taken.

Hems. Ah, mistress! Now look forth.

Wolf. What are you, sirrah?

Clown. Truly, all is left

Of a poor boor by day, nothing by night.

I'm none that will stand out, great sir.

You might have spar'd your guns and drum;

You may subdue me with a walking-stick,

E'en when you please, and hold me with a pack-

Hems. What woman was't you call'd to? [thread.

Clown. I? None, sir.

Wolf. None! Did not you name a mistress?

Clown. Yes; but she's

No woman yet: she should have been this night,
But that a beggar stole away her bridegroom.

Enter Soldiers with GERTRUDE.

Hems. 'Tis she!

Gert. Ha! I am miserably lost!

Hems. This was a noble entrance to your fortune;
That being thus upon the point of marriage,
Upon her venture here, you should surprise her.

Wolf. I begin, Hemskirke, to believe my fate
Works to my end.

Hems. Yes, sir; and this adds trust
Unto our guide, who did assure me Florez
Liv'd in some merchant's shape, as Gerrard did
In the old beggar's. (Shouts heard.) That's he

Wolf. Good! Go we forth to meet him. [again!

Hems. Here's the oak, my lord. Come, madam,
you must along with us. [Exeunt.

Enter HUBERT, HIGGEN, PRIG, FERRET, SNAP,
and GINKES, like boors.

Hub. I like your habits well. They're safe!
stand close!

Hig. But what's the action we are for now, eh?
Robbing a ripper of his fish?

Prig. Or taking a poulterer prisoner?

Hig. Without ransom?

Snap. Or cutting off a convoy of butter?

Prig. Oh! I could drive a regiment
Of geese afore me, such a night as this,
Ten leagues with my hat and staff, and not a hiss
Heard, or a wing of my troop disorder'd.

Hig. Is it a fetching off a buck of clothes?
We are horribly out of linen.

Hub. No such matter.

Hig. Let me alone for any farmer's dog:
If you've a mind to the cheese-loft, 'tis but thus.
And he's a silenc'd mastiff during pleasure.

Hub. Would it please you to be silent?

Hig. Mum!

Re-enter WOLFORT, HEMSKIRKE, and Soldiers.

Wolf. Who's there?

Hub. A friend, the huntsman.

Hems. 'Tis he, himself. [these?

Hub. I have kept touch, sir. Which is the earl of Hems. This, my lord, 's the friend

Hath undertook the service.

Hub. And I have don't.

I know to pitch my toils, drive in my game;
For Florez, and his father
Gerrard, and Jaculin, young Florez' sister,
I'll have 'em all.

Wolf. We will double

Whatever Hemskirke now hath promis'd thee.

Hub. And I'll deserve it treble. What horse ha'

Wolf. A hundred. [you?

Hub. That's well. Ready to take 'em on sur-

Wolf. Yes. [prise?

Hems. Divide, then,

Your force into five squadrons; for there are
So many outlets; of all which passages

We must possess ourselves to round 'em in.

And that they may be more secure, I'll use

My wonted whoops and halloos, as I were
A hunting for 'em; which will make them rest

Careless of any noise, and be a direction

To other guides, how we approach 'em still.

Wolf. 'Tis order'd well, and relisheth the soldier.
Make the division, huntsman. You are my charge,

My fair one, I'll look to you. [Exeunt.

Clown. No one shall need to look to me,
I'll look unto myself. [Exit.

Hub. Now, comrades, is the promis'd hour at hand!

Here, where the roads do meet, lie conceal'd;

And, at the bugle's sound, rush forth to aid

Lord Hubert, who then rings the knell

Of Wolfort's power, and hails found Florez, prince. [Exit with Guards.

Enter GERRARD and FLOREZ.

Flo. 'Tis passing strange!

Ger. When we fled from Wolfort,
I sent you into England, there plac'd you [win,
With a brave Flanders merchant, call'd rich Gos-

Who, dying, left his name and wealth unto you,
As his reputed son. But though I
Should, as a subject, study you, my prince,
'Twill not discredit you to call me father.

Flo. Acknowledge you my father! Sir, I do;
And may impiety, conspiring with
My other sins, sink me, and suddenly,
When I forget to pay you a son's duty. (Kneels.)

Ger. I pray you, rise;
And may those powers that see and love this in you
Reward you for it. Taught by your example,
Having receiv'd the rights due to a father,
I tender you th' allegiance of a subject,
Which, as my prince, accept of.

Flo. Kneel to me!
May mountains first fall down beneath their valleys,
And fire no more mount upwards, when I suffer
An act in nature so preposterous.

I am your son, sir; prouder to be so,
Than I shall ever of those specious titles,
Left to me by my mother.

Ger. I do believe it.—
By this time, sir, I hope you want no reasons
Why I broke off your marriage;
For now, as Florez, and a prince, remember
The fair maid whom you chose to be your bride,
Being so far beneath you, even your love
Must grant she's not your equal.

Flo. In descent,
Or borrow'd glories from dead ancestors;
But for her beauty, chastity, and virtues,
A monarch might receive from her, not give,
Though she were his crown's purchase.

Enter HUBERT, HEMSKIRKE, WOLFORT, BERTHA,
and Lords, with torches.

Hub. Sir, here be two of 'em,
The father and the son.

Ger. Who's this? Wolfort? [treason.]
Wolf. Impostor! ay, to charge thee with thy
In this disguise, that hath so long conceal'd you,
I must find Gerrard.
And in this merchant's habit, one call'd Florez,
Who would be earl.

Flo. And is, wert thou a subject.
Bertha. Goswin turn'd prince!
Oh! I am poorer by this greatness
Than all my former jealousies or misfortunes!

Flo. Gertrude!
Wolf. Stay, sir; hold, on your life!
Bertha. His life! oh! first take mine;
And since I cannot hope to wed him now,
Let me but fall a part of his glad ransom. [treat

Flo. So proud a fiend as Wolfort!
Wolf. For so lost a thing as Florez!
Flo. And that be so,
Rather than she should stoop again to thee!
There is no death, but's sweeter than all life,
When Wolfort is to give it. Oh! my Gertrude!

Wolf. This is no Gertrude, nor no Hemskirke's niece, [tha,
Nor Vandunke's daughter; this is Bertha, Ber-
Heiress of Brabant, she that caus'd the war.

Hems. Whom I did steal to do great Wolfort ser-
Flo. Insolent villain! [vice.

Enter JACULIN.
Wolf. Who is this, huntsman? [Florez.
Hub. More, more, sir. This is Jaculin, sister to
Ger. How they triumph in their treachery!
Wolf. Why here's brave game! this was sport royal!

Huntsman, your horn: first wind me Florez' fall,
Next Gerrard's, then his daughter, Jaculin's.
We'll hang 'em, Hemskirke, on these trees.

Hems. Not here, my lord; 'twill spoil your triumph.
Hub. A public scaffold will shew better sport.
Florez. Wretch! art thou not content thou hast be-
But mock'st us, too? [tray'd us,

Ger. False Hubert! this is monstrous!
Wolf. Hubert!

Hems. Who, this? [bert!

Ger. Yes, this is Hubert; false and perjur'd Hu-
I hope he has help'd himself unto a tree.

Wolf. The first, the first of any; and most glad I
I'll let you go before, but for a train: [have you, sir.
Is't you have done this service? [Hubert.

Hub. As your poor huntsman, sir. But now as
The wolf's a-foot, let slip. (Sounds his horn.)

Enter VANDUNKE, Merchants, HIGGEN, PRIG,
FERRET, SNAP, and Soldiers, who seize on Wolfort and Hemskirke.

Wolf. Betray'd!
Hub. No; but well catch'd; and I the huntsman.

Vand. How do you, Wolfort? Rascal! good knave, Wolfort!

I speak it now without the rose: and Hemskirke,
Rogue Hemskirke! you that have no niece; this lady
Was stol'n by you, and ta'en by you, and now
Resigned by me, to the right owner here.
Take her, my prince.

Flo. Can this be possible?
Welcome, my love! my sweet, my beauteous love!

Gert. And shall we part no more? [ter,

Vand. I ha' given you her twice; now keep her bet-
And thank lord Hubert that compos'd the plot,
And in good Gerrard's name sent for Vandunke,
And got me out with my brave boys, to march
Like Cæsar when he bred his commentaries;
So I to breed my chronicle, came forth,
Cæsar Vandunke, and veni, vidi, vici.

Hig. Captain Prig, sir!

Prig. And colonel Higgen!

Vand. Peace, rogues!

Give me my bottle, and set down my drums,
I'll sit in judgment on 'em: you stole the lady.

Wolf. Well, I can stand, and praise the toil that took me,

And laughing in them die! they were brave snares!

Flo. 'Twere truer valour, if thou durst repent
The wrongs th' hast done, and live!

Wolf. Who! I repent,
And say I am sorry! Yes; 'tis the fool's language,
But not for Wolfort.

Vand. Wolfort, thou art a devil, [longing!
And speak'st his language. Now, might I have my Under this row of trees here would I hang thee.

Florez. No; let him live
Banish'd from our state. That is thy doom.

Vand. Then hang this worthy captain here, this
For profit of th' example. [Hemskirke,

Florez. No, let him
Enjoy his shame, too, with his conscious life,

To shew how much our innocence contemns
All practice from the guiltiest to molest us.

Away with them! [Exit Wolfort, guarded.

Ger. Sir, you must help to join
A pair of hands, as they have done of hearts,
And to their loves wish joys.

Flo. As to mine own—my gracious sister,— Worthiest brother! [Embracing.)

Vand. Away with them! a noble prince!
And yet I'd fain some one were hang'd.

Ger. Sir, here be friends ask to be look'd on too,
And thank'd; who though their trade be none o'th'
best,

Have yet us'd me with courtesy, and been true
Subjects unto me, while I was their king. [Bruges,

Vand. Your grace command them follow me to
They'll turn the wheel for Crab the rope-maker.

Flo. Do you hear, sirs?

Hig. We do; thanks to your grace. [a week.

Vand. They shall beat hemp, and be whipp'd twice

Prig. Thank your good lordship.

Flo. No, I will take the care on me to find
Some manly and more profitable course,

To fit them as a part of the republic.

Be it our care to prove unto the world

Our better title o'er usurped favour,

In how much we shall use it for the good

Ev'n of the meanest subjects in our state. [Exeunt.
